

Ibn Khallikan's

Wafayat al-Ayan
Wa Anba Abna al-Zaman
A Biographical Dictionary

Vols – 1 through 7

ISBN 81-7151-170-8

Eng translation
M. de Slane
Edited by Dr S. Moinul Haq

Kitab Bhavan – New Delhi – 110002 (India)

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 1

Eng. Translation

M. de Slane

Edited by

Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. B00075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

T. W. BEALE

Thomas Beale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and edited by H.G. Keene, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It provides detailed biographical information on all the main figures in the history of the East from the first century A.D. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is an outstanding work of scholarship and has been highly acclaimed by Oriental scholars and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. O00018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan
wa

Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME I

Edited by:

S. MOINUL HAQ

M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN

New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set

ISBN 81-7151-171-6 (Vol. I)

First Published in India

1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers

Maujpur, Ghonda

Delhi-110053

CONTENTS

	PAGE
EDITOR'S PREFACE ... ..	V—IX
NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION ... ..	X
INTRODUCTION BY M. DE SLANE ... ..	1
THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE ... ..	42
TEXT —
1. Ibrāhīm al-Nakha'i ... ..	46
2. Abū Thawr Ibrāhīm al-Kalbī ... ..	47
3. Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī ... ..	48
4. Abū Ishāq al-Isfara'īnī ... ..	49
5. Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī ... ..	51
6. The Khaṭīb Abū Ishāq al-'Irāqī ... ..	55
7. Abū Ishāq Zahir al-Dīn ... ..	59
8. Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī ... ..	61
9. Ibrāhīm al-Nadīm al-Mawṣilī ... ..	67
10. Ibrāhīm al-Ṣulī ... ..	69
11. Niṣṭawayh ... ..	74
12. Abū Ishāq al-Zajjāj ... ..	76
13. Al-Ifīlī ... ..	79
14. Abū Ishāq al-Ṣabī'i ... ..	80
15. Abū Ishāq al-Huṣrī ... ..	84
16. Abū Ishāq Ibn Khafajah al-Andalusī ... ..	87
17. Abū Ishāq al-Kalbī al-Ghazzī ... ..	90
18. Ibn Qurqul ... ..	96
19. The Imam Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal ... ..	97
20. Ibn Surayj ... ..	100
21. Ibn al-Qāṣṣ al-Ṭabarī ... ..	103
22. Abū Ḥamid al-Marwarrudhī ... ..	104
23. Ibn al-Qaṭṭān ... ..	106
24. Al-Ṭabāwī ... ..	107
25. Abū Ḥamid al-Isfara'īnī ... ..	110
26. Al-Maḥāmīlī ... ..	113
27. Al-Bayḥaqī ... ..	114
28. Al-Nasā'ī the Ḥafīẓ ... ..	116
29. Al-Qudūrī ... ..	117
30. Al-Tha'labī al-Naysapūrī ... ..	118
31. Ibn Abī Duwād ... ..	120

	PAGE
32. The Ḥafiz Abu Nu'aym al-Iṣbahānī ...	135
33. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baḡhdādī ...	137
34. Abu 'l-Husayn al-Rawandī ...	139
35. Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Harawī ...	141
36. Al-Khawāṣṣī ...	142
37. Abu 'l-Futoḥ Aḥmad al-Ghazzālī ...	142
38. Ibn Barḥān al-'Uḡulī ...	144
39. Al-Naḥḥās, the Grammarian ...	145
40. Ibn Baqīyyah al-'Abdī, the Grammarian ...	146
41. Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Sahl, the kاتب ...	147
42. Tha'lab, the Grammarian ...	147
43. The Ḥafiz al-Silafī ...	152
44. Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Manā'ī al-Irbilī ...	157
45. Ibn 'Abd Rabbīh ...	159
46. Abu 'l-'Āla al-Ma'arrī ...	163
47. Abn 'Amir Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Ashja'ī al-Andalusī ...	168
48. Ibn Fāris al-Rāzī the Philologist ...	171
49. Abn Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī ...	173
50. Al-Nāmi ...	182
51. Badī' al-Zamān al-Hamadānī ...	186
52. Abu 'l-Qasīm Ibn Ṭabaṭabā ...	188
53. Abu 'l-Raqa'maq ...	191
54. Jaḥḥāḥ al-Barmakī ...	194
55. Ibn Darraj al-Andalusī ...	196
56. Ibn Zaydun al-Andalusī ...	201
57. Ibn al-Abbār, the Poet ...	204
58. Al-Manāzī ...	206
59. Ibn al-Khayyāṭ, the Poet ...	207
60. Al-Maydānī ...	211
61. Ibn al-Khazin ...	212
62. Naṣīḥ al-Dīn al-Arrajānī ...	215
63. Ibn Munir al-Ṭarābulusī ...	221
64. Al-Qaḍī al-Rashīd Abn 'l-Husayn ...	227
65. Al-Nafīs al-Lakhmī ...	232
66. Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Sabtī ...	235
67. Ibn al-'Arif ...	236

CONTENTS

	PAGE
68. Ibn al-Huṭay'ah al-Lakhmī ...	238
69. Ibn al-Rifa'ī ...	239
70. Aḥmad Ibn Ṭulun ...	241
71. Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh ...	242
72. Naṣr al-Dawlat Ibn Marwān al-Kurdī ...	245
73. Al-Musta'li ...	247
74. Ibn al-Maṣḥṭab ...	251
75. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Irbilī ...	257
76. 'Azīz al-Dīn al-Mustawfī ...	260
77. Artuq Ibn Aksuk ...	262
78. Al-Basāsiri ...	264
79. Nor al-Dīn Arsilān Shāh ...	266
80. Azhar Ibn al-Sammān ...	267
81. 'Usāmah Ibn Murshid ...	269
82. Ibn Rāhawayh ...	274
83. Abū 'Amr al-Shaybānī ...	276
84. Ishaq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī ...	277
85. Ishaq Ibn Hunayn ...	283
86. As'ad al-Mihani ...	285
87. Abū 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijlī ...	287
88. Al-As'ad Ibn Mammāti ...	289
89. Bahā al-Dīn al-Sinjārī ...	294
90. Al-Muzani ...	298
91. Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah ...	301
92. Abū 'Alī al-Qālī ...	312
93. The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād ...	314
94. Ibn Khālaf al-Saraqustī ...	320
95. Al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī ...	321
96. Al-Zāhir al-'Ubaydī ...	325
97. Aṣḥḥab al-Qaysī ...	327
98. Aṣbagh al-Mālikī ...	329
99. 'Āq Sunqur, the Ḥajib ...	330
100. 'Āq Sunqur al-Bursuqī ...	331
INDEX ...	335

EDITOR'S PREFACE

AN eminent jurisconsult and a distinguished historian, Ibn Khallikān has been held in high esteem as a writer for more than seven centuries. His reputation rests mainly on his monumental work, Wafayāt al-A'yān wa anba' abna' al-Zamān, which attracted the attention of the orientalisists in the early nineteenth century. The well-known scholar, M. G. de Slane, brought out its first edition in 1838; subsequently he published its English translation in four volumes. Since then the Arabic text has been published several times and in different countries. The latest edition is that of Muḥammad Muḥī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd (Cairo, 1948) who has given a life sketch of the author and added useful footnotes. The Wafayāt soon became a popular source-book in the world of Islam. This is indicated by the fact that other historians wrote supplements to it, and two well-known Muslim Princes had it translated into Persian. The first of these translations was undertaken by Yūsuf Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Uḡmān for Naṣīr al-Dunyā wal-Dīn Abū 'l-Faṭḥ-Maḥmūd Shāh of Gujarāt (commonly known as Maḥmūd Bigarah) who reigned from A.H. 863 to 917/A.D. 1459 to 1512. The second rendering was made for Sulṭān Salīm of Turkey who reigned from A.H. 918 to 926/A.D. 1513 to 1521.

Both the translators appear to be frugal in their renderings; they have tried to be brief, and have often abridged portions of the text for this purpose. They have omitted most of the verses quoted by the author; those that have been retained are in the original language.

Yūsuf Ibn Aḥmad has entitled his work as Manẓar al-Insān fī Tarjamah Wafayāt al-A'yān; * Kabīr Ibn Uways has not given any name to his translation.

In de Slane's English translation, which is generally known as Ibn Khallikān's Biographical Dictionary, a fairly detailed account of the author is given. We would, however, like to add a few words about de Slane's work. Baron Mac-Guckin de Slane was born (circa 1800) in an Irish family. He migrated to France in his childhood and became a French citizen. He studied Arabic under the well-known orientalist, Sylvestre de Sacy. Then he went to Constantinople for further studies and research. On completing the course of his studies he got the post of an Interpreter in the army and was sent to Algiers. Later he was promoted to the post of principal Interpreter and got the rank of a Major. While he held these posts he devoted his spare time to learning local dialects and mastering classical Arabic. He edited and translated some Arabic works on North Africa; he was now recognized as an eminent scholar of Arabic and was made a member of the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. In 1864, he was appointed Professor of Algerian dialects at the Ecole des Langues Orientales (School of Oriental Languages) in Paris. On de Perceval's death, he succeeded him as Professor of Classical Arabic, which position he occupied till his death in 1878.

---

* See Rieu, I, 334 a.

M. de Slane started his literary career in 1837 with the editing of the Dirwān of Imra' al-Qays. In 1838-42 he published the Arabic text of the Wafayāt (only up to No. 678) from Paris. In 1843 he started publishing its English translation under the title, Ibn Khallikān's Biographical Dictionary; it was completed in 1871 and appeared in four volumes. During this period he also published (in 1852-56) the French translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Kitāb al-'Ibar (sections on the Berbers): its Arabic text had been edited by him in 1837-41. It was followed (in 1857) by the publication of the Arabic text of al-Bakrī's Kitāb al-Mamālik wa 'l-Masālik (sections on North Africa), and its French translation, in 1857-58. Then he prepared the catalogue of the Arabic MSS. in the Bibliotheque Nationale; his last important work was the French translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Muqaddimah.

"Ibn Khallikān's Wafayāt," Brockelmann has rightly said, "is one of the most important aids to the study of biography and literary history." Its English translation by de Slane had been out of print for a considerable time, and was therefore beyond the access of most of the students of Islamic History and Civilization. The Pakistan Historical Society, keeping in view the importance and utility of this work, as a source-book, decided to publish a reprint of de Slane's translation with necessary editing and notes in the light of the autograph MS. of Ibn Khallikān. We are grateful to the authorities of the British Museum not only for providing the photostat copy of this extremely rare manuscript but also for assisting the Society by sharing its cost. The comparison of the English translation with the autograph of Ibn Khallikān was necessary because de Slane obtained it when he had already translated a considerable portion of the book. A careful examination of the autograph has revealed the fact that there are substantial differences between its text and the one on which de Slane's translation has been based. These differences have been mentioned in the Editor's footnotes. As de Slane has not properly transliterated the oriental names, necessary corrections have been made in their orthography. In the footnotes I have also added the corresponding Christian dates of events on the basis of Eduard Mahter's calculations; de Slane has given the names of the months only.

Ibn Khallikān completed his book in 1256 A.D. and died in 1282. Subsequently new material was incorporated in the body of the book; some new notices were added, and in some cases additional information was given. Only a portion of the new material has been accepted by de Slane as the composition of Ibn Khallikān.

The printed text of the Wafayāt is about double the size of the autograph; de Slane is of the opinion that Ibn Khallikān continued improving his work and adding further details, but a more probable explanation may be found in the author's appeal to the readers to make corrections wherever necessary.<sup>1</sup> This is why we come across lengthy and rather frequent interpolations in this work. However, de Slane's suggestion also cannot be rejected outright. As an illustration we may mention the story related about the wazīr, al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh on the authority of the grammarian, Abu 'Alī al-Fārisī,<sup>1</sup> and repeated again about al-Māman<sup>2</sup>. In the autograph it is given only in the account of the latter, and not of the former. Obviously someone else has added it to the account of al-Fārisī.

---

1 Vide Author's Preface.

It may be mentioned here that the Editor of the Teheran text, Mawlawī Muḥammad Bāqir Iṣbahānī says: "I saw in the library of Prince Mu'tamad al-Dawlah Fīrḥād Mirzā, son of 'Abbās Mirzā, son of Fath 'Alī Shāh Qajār, a manuscript of Wafāyāt al-A'yān by Aḥmad Ibn Khallikān. The Prince had collated his manuscript with several others and corrected it very carefully. Besides, he added notices of a few persons on the margin of his manuscript, which had been omitted by Ibn Khallikān, in order to make the work more comprehensive." Some additions in the later manuscripts have also been pointed out in the notes.

It is a well-known fact that oriental scholars frequently use invocatory phrases—such as 'Mercy of God be upon him', or 'May God be pleased with him', etc.—, and Ibn Khallikān is not an exception. M. de Slane has not translated these expressions; we have also not added them. In this connection it may be mentioned that our historians and biographers often conclude their accounts and narrations with the phrase 'God knows best'. This has been omitted; it does not however necessarily mean that the writer is not certain of the truth and veracity of his narration.

The Pakistan Historical Society is grateful to the Government of Pakistan for giving a special grant for this project. Without this aid it would have been difficult for the Society to undertake the publication of an edited text of de Slane's English

---

<sup>1</sup> Vide No. 117.

<sup>2</sup> Vide No. 12.

Translation of the Wafayat, and the English Translation of Ibn Sa'd's Ṭabaqāt which is under preparation.

I am thankful to Mr. H. K. Ghazanfar, for his valuable assistance in editing the translation, particularly in comparing it with the text of the autograph. I also thank Mufti Intizāmullāh Shihābī and other members of the Society's Research staff for their assistance.

KARACHI ;
August, 1961.

S. MOINUL HAQ

NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

ا	=	a	ط	=	t
ب	=	b	ظ	=
ت	=	t	ع	=	'
ث	=	th	غ	=	gh
ج	=	j	ف	=	f
ح	=	h	ق	=	q
خ	=	kh	ك	=	k
د	=	d	ل	=	l
ذ	=	dh	م	=	m
ر	=	r	ن	=	n
ز	=	z	و	=	w
س	=	s	ه	=	h
ش	=	sh	اَو	=	aw
ي	=	i	ي	=	y ;
ف	=	f	اَي	=	ay

Long vowels: a, i, u.

Short vowels: a, i, u.

INTRODUCTION

Ibn Khallikān's Biographical Dictionary has always been considered as a work of the highest importance for the civil and literary history of the Muslim people. From its first appearance till the present day, its reputation has continued undiminished, and the judgment of the author's countrymen has been confirmed by the unanimous voice of Oriental scholars. If the later Arabic historians filled their pages with extracts drawn from it as from a pure and abundant source,—if rhetoricians, grammarians and compilers of anecdotes have culled from it the choicest passages,—learned men essayed to complete it by supplements, or to condense it by abridgements with the design of rendering its utility more general,—we find, nearer home, and equally valid testimony borne to its merit by the suffrages of the illustrious Pococke, Schultens, Reiske, and De Sacy.

The variety of its subject might have alone sufficed to fix the attention of every person who took an interest in Muslim history and Arabic literature, but when that quality was combined with others which clearly indicated the intelligence, learning, and abilities of the author, the work had an undoubted right to general estimation. None felt this more deeply than Sir William Jones, and none expressed their opinion in stronger terms. When that accomplished scholar penned his Poeseos Asiaticae Commentarium, he traced these lines, in which, notwithstanding the heightened tone of his colouring, there is a degree of truth such as precludes me from adding any eulogy of my own: "Scriptoris politissimi Ebni Khallikan opus historicum non magis verborum elegantia et ubertate commendatur, quam illustriorum poetarum versibus quibus conspergitur. Ac nescio an hic omnibus vitarum scriptoribus (non) sit anteposendus. Est certe copiosior Nepote, elegantior Plutarcho, Laertio jucundior: et dignus est profecto liber, qui in omnes Europæ linguas conversus prodeat."

Were the work of Ibn Khallikān not before the reader, it might be necessary to point out the sources which he consulted and the plan which he adopted; but the author here speaks for himself, he names the writers whose works he has consulted, he or his translator gives their lives in nearly every case, and he follows the natural system of noticing those persons only who held a conspicuous place in the Muslim world. It is true that when he treats of those men whose names figure in history, he prefers relating anecdotes illustrative of their personal character to the less amusing duty of fully sketching out their lives. For this, however, a reason subsists: the great historical work of his friend and professor, Ibn al-Aṭhīr, contained all the requisite information, and was then generally read; he did not think it necessary to repeat the tale more fully set forth in a book the well deserved popularity of which he could not suppose would ever be rivalled by the reputation of his own. We might even add that those very anecdotes with which he fills his articles are more precious to a European reader than the fullest narrative of the series of events which mark the life of any individual, since from them we acquire a clearer insight into the manners of the different classes, and collect more useful hints on the civil organization of the Muslim people, than any indications which a notice exclusively biographical could supply. It must also be observed that in judging a work of this kind, the European reader may find faults where the Muslim sees only beauties, and vice versa. The former will blame Ibn Khallikān's idea of giving the lives of those persons only, the date of whose death was known; of quoting poetry too frequently, and of showing bad taste in the selection; of giving too many notices on doctors of the law, and too few on historians, poets, and other literary men. Yet we find that a native of Aleppo, the shaykh Nūr al-Dīn Ḥasan Ibn Ḥabīb, who died A. H. 779 (A. D. 1377-8), extracted from Ibn Khallikān's work the lives of two hundred and thirty persons with the passages from their books, and this selection he published under the title of Ma'āni Ahl al-Bayān min Wafayāt Ibn Khallikān, or Beauties of eminent writers extracted from Ibn Khallikān's biographical work. It would appear from this that our author's taste in his quotations was not considered as bad in the country where his language was spoken and in which the writings of the poets were read and understood. Ibn Ḥabīb composed also a history of Egypt from A. H. 648 to A. H. 761. It is entitled Durrat al-Aslāk fī Dawlat al-Atrāk

there is a copy of it in the Leyden library and another in the Bibliothèque du Roi. We shall next allow Ḥajjī Khalīfah to speak: "Some historians", says he, meaning of course Muslim writers, "have blamed Ibn Khallikān for his concision in the lives of men eminent for their learning in the law; in some cases he confines his notice of them to a few lines, whilst he fills pages, nay sheets, with the life of a single poet or of a literary man. It happens also, in more than one case, that those to whom he has allotted the longest articles were persons accused of laxity in the religious belief, and yet he mentions them with praise and quotes passages from their poems. But it may perhaps be offered in extenuation of this, that the history of the man learned in the law was already well known, and that the lustre of his reputation, like the light of the sun, could not possibly be hidden from any, whilst the renown of the poet was by no means general." Be the imperfections of his work what they may, we must yet take into consideration that it was the first of its kind in the long series of Arabic literature. Before him, none ever thought of combining in one treatise and in alphabetical order, the lives of the most remarkable men of Islamism, no matter to what class they belonged. There existed, it is true, a great number of biographical dictionaries composed anteriorly to his, and some of them dating from a remote period, but they were works of a special cast and limited in their subject: some treated of eminent jurisconsults, to the exclusion of every other profession; others contained notices, on the learned men who inhabited a particular city; some again gave the lives of such persons as were mentioned in the Sunan, or Collections of Traditions. The only book which bore any resemblance to his by the generality of its contents was the Fihrist, composed in the fourth century of the Hijrah, but that curious biographical and bibliographical work is formed of six sections, each of which is devoted to one particular class of persons, to the total neglect of alphabetical or chronological arrangement.

During many years my attention was directed towards Ibn Khallikān's works, knowing that from it, above all others, the clearest and most correct ideas could be acquired of the rise and progress of Arabic literature, and that it furnished many facts of the utmost importance for general history, and not to be found in any other writer. A natural transition led me from the work to the author, and in my endeavours to attain a fair appreciation of the one, I was led to inquire into the life and times of the other. In pursuing this task, I collected from different sources a great number of notices respecting him, his masters, his disciples, and his acquaintances; whilst the indications furnished by his own work, enabled me to fix with precision the dates of the principal occurrences which marked his life. But the circumstances which influenced his character in youth, the relations which subsisted at different periods between him and the masters of the empire, the great political events which occurred during his career in the world and always attracted his attention;—these were subjects which required long study and extensive researches. The results which I have already obtained encourage me to proceed yet farther, and for this reason I shall reserve my notice on the Life and Times of Ibn Khallikān till the last volume of this translation shall be given to the press. The materials collected by me will be then better digested, and form an article more complete than any which I could draw up at the present moment. But as the just curiosity of some readers may require a more immediate satisfaction, I shall give here the text and translation of a notice on Ibn Khallikān by the celebrated historian Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn. It is extracted from the first volume of his al-Manhal al-Ṣāfi, a work on which some observations will be found in a subsequent page. Another life of the same writer by an anonymous author has been given in Arabic and in Latin by Tydeman, in his Conspectus operis Ibn Chalikani, and a note on the same subject has been inserted by M. Quatremère in his translation of al-Maqrīzī's History of the Mamlūk Sultāns, vol. I, part 2, p. 180.

أحمد بن محمد بن إبراهيم بن أبي بكر بن خلكان بن باوك بفتح الواو بن
 شاكل بفتح الكاف بن الحسين بن مالك بن جعفر بن يحيى بن خالد
 بن برمك الامام العلامة شمس الدين ابوالعباس البلخي الاصل
 الاربلى المولد الدمشقى الدار والوفاة الشافعى قاضى قضاء دمشق
 وعالمها ومورخها مولده باربلى فى يوم الخميس حادى عشر شهر

ربيع الآخر سنة ثمان وست مائة و امه من نسل خلف بن ايوب صاحب ابي حنيفة رضي الله عنه و نشأ باربل و تفقه بالموصل ثم قدم دمشق في عنفوان شببته فاقام بها مدة يسيرة و توجه الى ديار مصر و اشتغل بها ايضا و حصل من كل علم طرفا جيدا و برع في الفقه و الاصول و العربية و غير ذلك و افتى و درس و نظم و نثر و لي قضاء دمشق من القاهرة و خرج منها في السابع و العشرين من ذي الحجة سنة ست و ستين وست مائة و توجه الى دمشق فدخلها في ثالث المحرم سنة سبع و ستين فباشرها مدة عشر سنين و في اول ولايته للقضاء كان منفردا الى ان ورد عليه الخبر بان برز المرسوم الشريف الظاهري بان يكون بدمشق اربع ( اربعة 1 ) قضاة و وصل ثلثه تقاليد لشمس الدين عبدالله بن محمد بن عطا الحنفى و لزين الدين عبدالسلام الزاوى المالكي و لشمس الدين عبدالرحمان الحنبلى و كانوا قبل ذلك نوابا للشافعى قال الشيخ شهاب الدين ابوسامه و من العجيب اجتماع ثلثه القضاة بدمشق لقب كل واحد منهم شمس الدين في زمن واحد فقال بعض الادباء بدمشق ايه قد * ظهرت للناس تماما كلما ازدادوا شموسا * زادت الدنيا ظلاما وقال غيره -

اهل دمشق استرابوا * من كثرة الاحكام

اذ هم جميعا شموس * و حالهم في ظلام

ثم صرف قاضى القضاة شمس الدين بن خلكان هذا عن قضاء دمشق و قدم القاهرة و دام بها نحو من سبع سنين و تولى الحكم بها نيابة عن قاضى القضاة بدرالدين السنجارى و درس بالقاهرة و افتى و صنف الى ان اعيد الى دمشق قاضيا بعد القاضى عزالدين بن الصائغ و توجه الى دمشق فلما قرب منها خرج نائبها عزالدين ايدرس بجميع الموكب و الامراء و ارباب الوظائف لتلقيه و اما روءاء دمشق فانهم تلقوه من عدة مراحل و هناك الشعراء بعدة قصائد من ذلك ما انشده الشيخ رشيد الدين عمر بن اسمعيل الفارق -

انت في الشام مثل يوسف في مصر و عندى ان الكرام جناس

فلكل سبع شداد و بعد السبع عام فيه يغاث الناس

قلت هذا القول لمدة مفارقتة لدمشق الى ان عاد ثانيا اليها و
قال فيه نور الدين بن مصعب -

رايت اهل الشام طرا * ما فيهم قط غير راض
اتا هم الخير بعد شر * فالوقت بسط بلا انقبض
وعوضوا فرجه بحزن * قد انصف الدهر في التقاضى
وسرهم بعد طول غم * قدوم قاض وعزل قاض
فكلهم شاكر و شاك * بحال مستقبل و ماض

و دام في هذه الولاية بدمشق الى سنة ثمانين و ست مائة
و صرف عن القضاء و لزم داره الى ان توفي يوم السبت سادس
عشرين شهر رجب و قيل سادس عشرة سنة احدى و ثمانين
و ست مائة بالمدرسة النجيبية بدمشق و دفن بقاسيون و كان اماما
عالما بارعا متفنا كثيرا الفضائل اديبا شاعرا جامعا مورخا وتاريخه
وفيات الاعيان مشهور وهو في غاية الحسن و كان جوادا ممد حامدحه
شعراء عصره بغير القصائد و كان يجيزهم عليها الجوائز السنية
وكان عنده عقل و احتمال و ستر عن العورات ولما كان معزولا
بالديار المصرية حصل له ضائق قبل ان يبلغ الامير بدر الدين الخازندار
ذلك فاستمر به بنفقة هائلة ومايه اردب قمح فامتنع عن قبولها
و ذكر الحافظ قطب الدين في تاريخه وقال كان اماما اديبا بارعا
حاكما عدلا مورخا جامعا و ذكره ايضا الحافظ ابو محمد البرزالي
في معجمه وقال فيه احد علماء عصره المشهورين و سيد ادباء دهره
المذكورين جمع بين علوم جمه فقه و عريه و تاريخ و
لغة و غير ذلك و جمع تاريخا نفيسا اقتصر فيه على المشهورين
من كل فن وولى قضاء الشافعية مدة و درس و اتمى و سمع الحديث
من ابن الكرم الصوفي باريك و سمع منه البخاري عن ابي الوقت و
سمع من التاوى و ابن الجمیزی و اجازه المويد الطوسي و ابو روح
و ابن الصفار و الحسين بن احمد القشيري و اسمعيل بن محمد بن علي
بن عبد الله السيد الحسيني و اخرون من نيسابور و ذكر مولده ثم
قال له يد طولی في علم اللغة ولم يرفي وقته من يعرف ديوان
المتنبى كمعرفته و كان مجلسه كثيرا الفوائد و التحقيق و البحث
لا يوجد فيه غير ذلك انتهى وقال الشهاب محمود في تاريخه كنت

كثير الاجتماع به في مباشرته الثانية<sup>١</sup> للاقتباس من فوائده رحمه الله
انتهى قلت واثنى عليه ايضا غير واحد وقد طال الشرح في ذلك
ولا بد من ذكر شئ من شعره فمن ذلك -

تمثلتموا لى و البلاد بعيدة * فخيلى لى ان الفواد لكم مغشى
وناجاكمو قابى على البعد والنوى * فانستموا لفظا وواحشتموا معنى
وله ايضا -

يا جارة النحى هل من عودة فعسى * يفى من مكرات الوجد مخمور
اذا ظفرت من الدنيا بقربكى * وفكل ذنب جناح الحب مغفور
وله ايضا -

يارب ان العبد يخفى عيبه * فاستر بحامك ما بدامن عيبه
ولقد اتاك و ماله من شافع * لذنوبه فاقبل شفاعة شبيه

“Abu ‘l-‘Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Abī Bakr Ibn Khallikān Ibn Bāwak Ibn Shākal Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Malīk Ibn Ja‘far Ibn Yāhyā Ibn Khalīd Ibn Barmak<sup>1</sup> surnamed Shams al-Dīn (sun of religion), drew his descent from a family of Balkh. This very eminent scholar and follower of Shāfi‘ī’s doctrines was born at Arbela, but resided and died at Damascus, where he had filled the place of chief qaḍī. By his talents and his writings he merited the honourable title of the most learned man and the ablest historian of that city. He was born on Thursday, the 11th of the latter Rabī‘, A. H. 608 (22nd Sept. A. D. 1211). His mother descended from Khalaf Ibn Ayyūb, a disciple of Abū Ḥanīfah. He passed the first years of his life at Arbela and then proceeded to Mosul, where he studied Jurisprudence, and was still in the prime of youth when he went to Damascus. After a short residence in that city he travelled to Egypt, where he resumed his studies and acquired a competent knowledge of all the sciences, whilst he attained a great pre-eminence as a jurisconsult, a theologian, and grammarian. In that country he acted in the capacities of a mufti and a public teacher, but without neglecting to cultivate his talent as a prose-writer and a poet. Having been appointed qāḍī of Damascus, he left Cairo on the 27th of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A. H. 666, and arrived at the former city on the third of Muḥarram, A. H. 667.<sup>1</sup> During a period of ten years he fulfilled in person the duties of his office; at first he exercised his authority without a colleague, but he then received information that a decree had been issued by order of the noble prince al-Malik al-Zāhir (Bibars), declaring that there should be four qāḍīs at Damascus. Three acts of investiture then arrived, drawn up in favour of Shams al-Dīn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Aṭa the Hanafite, Zayn al-Dīn 'Abd al-Salām al-Zowāwī the Malekite, and Shams al-Dīn 'Abd ar-Raḥmān the Hanbalite. Before that time they were merely the deputies of the Shafite qāḍī. It was remarked as an extraordinary circumstance by the Shayḫ Shihāb al-Dīn Abū Sāmā that there should be at the same time three qāḍīs at Damascus, all surnamed Shams al-Dīn (sun of religion). It was on this occasion that the following lines were composed by one of the literary men in the city :

<sup>1</sup> This genealogy is incomplete; the descent of Ibn Khallikān from the Barmekide family is a point which I shall examine when treating of his life and times.

'The people of Damascus have witnessed a perfect miracle : the greater the number of suns, the more the world was in the dark.'

Another poet said on the same subject :

'The men of Damascus are bewildered with the multitude of legal decisions; their qāḍīs are all suns, and yet they are in the dark.'

"Ibn Khallikān was afterwards removed from the *qāḍī*ship of Damascus, and proceeded to Cairo, where he was nominated deputy to the chief qāḍī Badr al-Dīn al-Sinjārī. During his residence there he pursued his literary labours, and discharged the duties of a professor and muftī till his re-appointment to the place of qāḍī at Damascus, as successor to 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Ṣāigh. He then set out for that city, and at his approach the governor 'Izz al-Dīn 'Aydmar went out in state to receive him with the amīrs and the persons in office; as for the principal inhabitants, they had already made a journey of some days to meet him on the road. Numerous qaṣīdās were composed by the poets, in which they congratulated him on his reinstatement: and one of these pieces, which was recited to him by the Shaykh Rashīd al-Dīn 'Umar Ibn Ismā'il al-Fāriqi, contained the following passage:

---

<sup>1</sup> These dates are wrong. Ibn Khallikān was appointed qāḍī of Damascus A. H. 659.

'Like Joseph in Egypt, you have now completed your probation, and in my opinion all generous men form a race apart. They all have seven years of suffering to undergo, but then cometh a year which sheds joy and abundance upon mankind.'

"In this he alludes to the length of time Ibn Khallikān was away from them. The piece which follows was composed by Nūr al-Dīn Ibn Muṣ'ab:

'Among all the people of Damascus, I did not find one displeased. After evil, good has come unto them; it is the time for joy unrestrained. The pleasure which he had already inspired was succeeded by grief, but fortune acted justly in the end: after protracted sadness they were restored to joy by the arrival of one qādī and the dismissal of another. They are now all grateful for what is coming, and all complaining of what is past.'

"He continued to fill the post of qādī at Damascus till the year 680, when he was dismissed, and from that period till the day of his death, he never went out of doors. He died on Saturday the 26th of Rajab,—some say, the 16th,—A. H. 681 (29th October A. D. 1282), in the Najībiya College at Damascus, and was interred at Mount Qāsiyān. He was a man of the greatest reputation for learning, versed in various sciences, and highly accomplished; he was a scholar, a poet, a compiler, and an historian. His celebrated biographical work, the Wafayāt, is the acme of perfection. The contemporary poets were encouraged by his generous character to celebrate his praises in poems of great beauty, certain of obtaining an ample recompense from his liberality. His conduct was marked by prudence, moderation, and indulgence for the failings of others. When residing in Egypt, subsequently to his (first) removal from office, he was for a time much reduced in circumstances, and the lord-treasurer Badr al-Dīn, who happened to be informed of his situation, ordered him a large sum of money as a present, with one hundred *ardeb*s of wheat besides; this gift, however, he would never consent to accept. The hāfiẓ Quṭb al-Dīn mentions him in his History, and styles him an imām, a learned scholar, a man of superior abilities, an equitable judge, an historian, and a compiler. He is also spoken of by the ḥāfiẓ Abu Muḥammad al-Berzālī in his Muʿjam, as 'one of the most illustrious scholars of his time, the chief of the learned men of the age, even the most famous; master of a great variety of sciences, such as law, grammar, history, philology, etc. He compiled a valuable historical work, in which he gives the lives of those persons only who had attained celebrity in the class to which they belonged. He filled for a time the place of Shafite qāḍī and was also a professor and a mufti. He learned the Traditions at Arbela from Ibn al-Karm* al-Ṣūfī, who also explained to him the Ṣaḥiḥ of al-Bukhārī, after having been taught it himself by Abu 'l-Waqt. He received also Traditions from al-Tawī and Ibn al-Jumayzī, and was licensed to teach Traditions by al-Muwayyad al-Ṭasī, Abu Rūh [and] Ibn al-Ṣalfār, al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad al-Qushayrī, Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Sayyid al-Ḥusaynī, and others at Naysapur.' The historian then gives the date of his birth, and continues: 'He was profoundly learned in the pure Arabic language, and no person of that time was better acquainted with the poems of al-Mutanabbī than he. When he received company, the conversation was most instructive, being entirely devoted to learned investigations and the elucidation of obscure points.' Shihāb al-Dīn Maḥmūd says in his history: 'The second time that he filled the place of qāḍī, I used to visit him very often, that I might profit by his instructive conversation.' Many other writers have spoken of him in equally favourable terms, but the details which have been given on that subject are already sufficiently copious. It is now absolutely necessary that we should give some passages of his poetry; such are the following:

'I had your image before my eyes, though you dwelt in a distant land; and it seemed to me that my heart was your place of abode. Though absent and far away, my heart held converse with you; you seemed to speak familiarly (with your lover), but in reality you were still afflicting him with your aversion.

'Maiden! thou who dwellest near our tribe, can I dare to hope for thy return? Then perhaps, may thy lover, who now suffers from the intoxication of passion, recover his reason. There is but one thing in the world which I desire: let me meet there and all the cruelties of love shall be forgotten !

*al Mukram, No. 376 in autograph.—Ed.

‘O Lord! thy humble creature strives to conceal his faults. in the kindness, cast a veil over his faults when they appear. He has come unto thee. but has no friend to intercede for him; receive then the intercession of his hairs hoary with age.’ ”

The well merited celebrity which Ibn Khallikān’s work rapidly acquired, and the esteem in which it was justly held for its exactness, induced many learned men to undertake the task of rendering it still more complete. I shall here enumerate those different essays as I find them indicated in the Bibliography of Hājji Khalifah and other sources.—“Tāj al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Bāqī Ibn ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Makḥḥamī, a member of the sect of Mālik, added to it about thirty articles. This writer, who died A. H. 745 (A. D. 1342-3), blames the poverty of Ibn Khallikān’s style, and gives the preference to that of Ibn al-Aṭṭār.”—He cannot mean Ibn al-Aṭṭār the historian, whose style is remarkably simple; but as there were three brothers who bore this name and who are all noticed by our author, Tāj al-Dīn may perhaps have had in view some work composed by one of the two others, and written in the full dignity of what the Arabs consider a fine style, and which is always the more admired the less it is intelligible to the ordinary reader. Indeed many of their authors explained their own works to students, who rendered the same service to others; but when this traditional exegesis was interrupted, a consummation which happened sooner or later, no person was tempted to take up a book which he could not hope to understand. and the masterpiece of style reposed undisturbed on the shelf and finally sunk into oblivion.

“A continuation of Ibn Khallikān’s work was written by Ḥusayn Ibn ‘Aibek who died in the year (no date given).” I suspect that Hājji Khalifah never saw the work and that he knew nothing of the author. There was an Ibn ‘Aibek who wrote a supplement to Ibn Khallikān, but of this more hereafter.—“To this supplement a continuation of thirty articles was added by Zayn al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Rahmān Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-‘Irāqī, who died

A. H. 806 (A. D. 1403-4)".—"Another supplement, bearing the title of 'Uqūd al-Jinān (buds of the garden)', and containing the lives of many persons mentioned incidentally in Ibn Khallikān's Biographical Dictionary, was drawn up by the Shaykh Badr al-Dīn al-Zarkashī, who died A. H. 994 (A. D. 1586)." — Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Shākir composed a work called Fawā'id al-Wafayāt (omissions of the Wafayāt)". Wafayāt al-A'yām, or deaths of eminent men, is the Arabic title of Ibn Khallikān's book.—"Ibn Shākir died A. H. 764 (A. D. 1362-3)." —This is probably the work of which a volume is described by Casiri in his Biblioth. Arab. Hisp. No. 1774.—Another supplement, not noticed by Hājji Khalifah, is the Tālt Kitāb Wafayāt al-A'yām (continuation of Ibn Khallikān's biographical dictionary), by al-Muwaffaq Faḍl Allāh Ibn Abī Fakhr al-Ṣaqqā'ī الصقاعي. This is a short work arranged alphabetically and accompanied with a supplement, which is arranged chronologically and extends from A. H. 660 to A. H. 725. A copy of the Tālt is in the Bib. du Roi, under the No. 732.

It appears from an inscription on the first page of this MS. that it once belonged to Khalil Ibn 'Ayybak, the author of the following work: "Wāfi 'l-Wafayāt (supplement to the Wafayāt)", by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Khalil Ibn 'Ayybak al-Safadī. This author died A. H. 764 (1362-3). In it he has collected the lives of all the illustrious and eminent men who fixed his attention; thus he gives notices of the principal Companions of Muḥammad and the next class (Tābi'is) of the early Muslims; he mentions also princes, amīrs, qāḍis, governors, Qur'ān-readers, Traditionists, jurisconsults, shaykhs, holy men, saints, grammarians, literary men, poets, philosophers, physicians, followers of heretical sects, authors, etc."—Hājji Khalifah does not say expressly that this work was intended as a supplement to that of Ibn Khallikān, but the title is a sufficient proof that it was so. And what a supplement!—twenty-six large volumes! This enormous compilation had the usual fate of works too extensive; it was seldom copied, and remained almost unknown. Eleven detached volumes of it are preserved in the Bodleyan Library, another is in the possession of M. de Hammer, and one, as I have been informed, was lately acquired by M. Gayangos. This unwieldy supplement was not however sufficiently complete in the opinion of a very learned Egyptian historian. "The Amir Jamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn Yūsuf Ibn Taghūrī Bardī" --or Tangri Verdi-- "who died A. H. 874 (A. D. 1469-70), composed"--as a supplement to this supplement-- "three volumes, which he entitled al-Manḥal al-Ṣāfi wa 'l-Mustawfi ba'd al-Wāfi (the pure source and the full complement, after the Wāfi). This work, forming three volumes, contains the lives of eminent men, drawn up in alphabetical order."--The copy in the Bib. du Roi is composed of five volumes, and yet the last two or three letters are wanting. The same writer drew up the history of Egypt in the form of annals, and entitled al-Nujūm al-Zāhiraḥ; which, though very voluminous (eight folio volumes), has survived; but his al-Baḥr-'al-Zākhir, or annals of Islamism, was not so fortunate; only one volume of it, the fifth, exists in the Bib. du Roi; it contains a part of the reign of the Khalif 'Uthmān, the reign of 'Alī, that of Mu'āwiyah, and the first years of Yazīd; a space of about thirty-nine years; and for this he has required a large quarto volume. If he brought the history down to his own time, the work must have formed twenty volumes at the lowest evaluation.

We now come to the abridgments: "Al-Jinān (the garden) by Ṣhams al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Turkumānī; this writer died some time after the year A. H. 750 (A. D. 1349-50). Another abridgment of it was made by al-Malik al-Afḍal 'Abbās Ibn al-Malik al-Afḍal al-Mujāhid 'Alī, sovereign of Yeman; he died A. H. 778 (A. D. 1376-7)."--See Johansen's Historia Yemane.--"A third was made by Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a member of the sect of al-Ṣhāfi'i and a native of Ghazza (Gaza in Palestine); he died A. H. 822 (A. D. 1419)." A fourth was made subsequently to the appearance of Ḥājji Khalīfah's bibliographical dictionary. In the MS. of that work, Bib. du Roi, fonds Schulz, the following additional article is found: "An abridgment of the original work was also made by Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣṭafā al-Farādī, who died A. H. 1126 (A. D. 1714). He entitled it al-Tajrīd (superfluities stripped off)."

We learn also from Ḥājji Khalīfah that the biographical dictionary was translated into Persian by Zāḥir al-Dīn al-Ardebilī, who died at Cairo, A. H. 930 (A. D. 1523-4). "I have read", says he, "in a Persian epistle composed by Qādī Ibn Uways Ibn Muḥammad, but better known by the name of Qādī Zadal, who died A. H. 930, that the Sulṭān Selīm Khān the First"—the son of Bāyazīd; he came to the throne A. H. 918 (A. D. 1512-13) and died 926 (A. D. 1520)—"had been making searches for books on history, that he paid a particular degree of attention to the work of Ibn Khallikān. This induced al-Ardebilī to translate it into Persian for his use, but he had only executed the half of his task when the sulṭān died. This is probably the same person as the Zahīr al-Dīn above mentioned."

The facts and observations here presented refer directly to Ibn Khallikān or to his work, but some further remarks are requisite in order that a number of allusions peculiar to Arabic literature, and frequently occurring in the course of these volumes, may be clearly understood. The points intended to be elucidated are the manner in which learning was developed by the influence of Islamism, the distinction between the sciences positively encouraged by it and those which it merely tolerated, the difference between Muslim schools and Muslim colleges, the special cast of the sciences taught equally in each, the character of Arabic poetry and the nature of the qaṣīdah. Had a regular treatise on the history of Arabian literature existed in that language, these particularities could not have long escaped notice; but as they are only mentioned incidentally by native writers, they have been usually passed over without receiving that attention which they deserved. These points, however, are of such material importance for the literary history of the Arabs that I felt it my duty to investigate them; the extreme difficulty of discovering the scattered facts serving to establish them was amply repaid by occasional success, and the results to which I have been led shall be confided to the following pages, with other observations which, though familiar to Orientalists, are not on that account less requisite for most readers. And yet it must be acknowledged that much more remains to be done; the foundations are indeed laid out, but the edifice is yet to be reared; a task which no doubt will sooner or later be accomplished by the zeal and learning of European scholars.

The oldest monuments of Arabic literature which we still possess were composed within the century which preceded the birth of Muḥammad<sup>1</sup> They consist in short pieces of verse uttered on the spur of the moment<sup>2</sup>, narrations of combats

M. de Sacy, in his Mémoire sur les anciens monumens de la littérature arabe, has fully established this point in refuting Albert Schulten's extravagant opinions on the antiquity of Arabic literature. The celebrated poem attributed to Abū Adina, or Udaina (see Schulten's Monumenta vetustiora Arabiae, p. 57), is one of the few pieces which M. de Sacy considers as of genuine antiquity, and according to him it was composed towards A. D. 450. I am by no means inclined to admit this opinion; the language and style of the piece are comparatively modern and such as denote an author who lived in the second century after the Hijrah, a period in which many literary forgeries of a similar kind were committed. The real author was perhaps Kḥalaf al-Aḥmar, whose character as a fabricator of ancient poems was notorious (no. 249). The poems of Amro 'l-Qays, or, as the name should be properly pronounced, 'Imra al-Qays, are the sole pieces extant of an undeniable antiquity they were composed at least fifty years before the birth of Muḥammad, as I have shown in my preface to his Diwān, and my deduction is fully confirmed by the following passage, which the learned author of the History of Aleppo, Kamāl al-Dīn 'Umar 'Ibn al-Adīm, has inserted in his biographical dictionary of the remarkable men who lived in or visited that city (Bughyat al-Talab fi Tārīkh Ḥalab, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds, No. 726, fol. 194 verso) "The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'Amr 'Uṭmān Ibn Bakr estimated that Imra al-Qays was anterior to Muḥammad by one hundred and fifty or two hundred years; but al-Wazīr al-Maḡhribi observes that by estimation and approximation it has been established that the interval between the death of Imra al-Qays and the birth of the Prophet was really fifty or fifty-five years."

These pieces of verse are almost always of the measure called rajaz, one of the simplest and also the very earliest of the systems of versification employed in Arabic poetry. The old rajaz verses were considered by Arabic philologists and grammarians as of the highest importance of their favourite study, on account of the rare words, expressions, and constructions with which they abound. To a person familiar with the Arabic of the Muslim writers, these productions of the old Pagan Arabs seem to belong to another language, as it frequently happens that in a fragment of five or six lines he will not meet a single word with the meaning of which he is acquainted. They are the remains of the different dialects once spoken in the Arabian Peninsula and in the plains which separate Syria from Mesopotamia before the period in which the Qur'ān, that great monument of the Quraysh dialect had fixed the Arabic language.

between hostile tribes, passages in rhythmical prose<sup>1</sup> and qaṣīdahs, or elegies. The study of these remains reveals the existence of a language perfect in its form and application, admirably suited to express the various ideas which the aspect of nature could suggest to a pastoral people, and as equally adapted to portray the fiercer passions of the mind. The variety of its inflections, the regularity of its syntax, and the harmony of its prosody are not less striking, and they furnish in themselves a sufficient proof of the high degree of culture which the language of the Arabic nation had already attained<sup>2</sup>. The superior merit of this early literature was ever afterwards acknowledged by the Arabs themselves; it furnished them not only with models but ideas for their poetical production; and its influence has always continued perceptible in the qaṣīdah<sup>3</sup> which still contains the same thoughts, the same allusions as of old, and drags its slow length along in monotonous dignity.

A great change came over the spirit of Arabic literature on the appearance of the Qur'ān, an extraordinary compound of falsehood and truth,* which moulded a people of shepherds and robbers into a nation and launched them forth to the conquest of the world. It is considered by Muslims as the word of God, —His eternal, uncreated word,—revealed to mankind in the <sup>1</sup> When the Arabs of the desert wished to express themselves with elegance, they adopted a rhythmical arrangement of words and that parallelism of phrase which is the characteristic of good Arabic prose. This peculiarity is evident in all the pieces which have been handed down to us as specimens of the idiom spoken in the Desert, and is by no means an innovation of Muslim writers; the Ḥamāsah, the Kitāb al-Aghānī, and the 'Amālī of Abu 'Alī 'l-Qāli furnish a copious supply of examples which prove that the art of composing in rhythmical prose not only existed before Muḥammad's time, but was even then generally practised and had been brought to a high degree of perfection.

<sup>2</sup> This is in some degree attributable to the annual meetings of the poets at the fair of 'Ukāz, but the poems of Imra al-Qays are a proof that the language had acquired its regularity and flexibility from some other source, as he never attended these assemblies. His was the dialect of the Himyarite Arabs, and it was most probably at the court of his ancestors, the kings of the tribe of Kinda, that it received its polish.

See Introduction, page 35.

* The author's prejudice is too evident to be refuted. Such expressions are to be condemned in the strongest terms.—Ed.

language of Paradise, to remain a standing miracle by its admirable style. This opinion deterred nearly every attempt at imitation<sup>1</sup>; the book stood apart in the majesty of its supposed* excellence, but the study of its contents, combined with that of the Traditions relative to its authority, gave rise to almost all the branches of Arabian learning. The mode by which this was effected shall be here briefly explained, but it is requisite to make some previous observations on the Traditions.

The sayings of Muḥammad were considered by his followers as the result of divine inspiration, and they therefore treasured them up in their memory with the same care which they had taken in learning by heart the chapters of the Qur'ān. They recorded also his behaviour under particular circumstances, the acts of his daily life, even the most trifling, and they related them to the rising generation as examples of conduct for every Muslim.<sup>2</sup> It may be easily imagined that the mass of these Traditions increased rapidly: the different accounts of the same event, the same thoughts expressed in other terms, and even fabricated statements were received with equal avidity by the followers of Islamism, and soon became so numerous that no single man could recollect them all. It was, therefore, necessary to put them down in writing, and the first essay of this kind was made by Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī during the reign of the khalīf 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz.<sup>3</sup> Other doctors in different cities of the Muslim empire, and between the years 140 and 150 of <sup>1</sup> Ibn al-Muqaffa' al-Mutanabbi' Abu'l - 'Alā al-Ma'arri, and few others who like them did not hold very orthodox opinions, essayed in some of their writings to surpass the style of the Qur'ān, but their attempt was naturally considered as a failure. Were we to examine the Qur'ān by the rules of rhetoric and criticism as they are taught in Muslim schools, we should be obliged to acknowledge that it is the perfection of thought and expression; an inevitable result, as the Muslims drew their principles of rhetoric from that very book.

---

<sup>2</sup> The distinction between the Ḥadīth (sayings) and the Sunan (doings) is not attended to by doctors of the Muslim law; both are equally authoritative.

<sup>3</sup> The author of the Muḥṭāṣar al-Awṭ'il mentions this fact on the authority of al-Suyūṭī, most probably from the Awṭ'il, one of the numerous treatises by that writer.

* See Editor's note, p. 16.

the Hijrah, classed the Traditions according to the subjects which they served to illustrate<sup>1</sup> and towards the beginning of the third century, al-Bukhārī undertook to reduce their number by selecting those only which were supported by the best authority. In discriminating between the true and the false, he was guided by the character of the persons through whom they had passed down, and he rejected those which could not be traced up through an unbroken series of Traditionists all men of unimpeached veracity and acknowledged piety. His example was followed by other doctors, and the united contents of the six Ṣaḥīḥs, or genuine collections, form to the presentday one of the four columns which support the edifice of Muslim law. These Traditions serve to explain points of doctrine not set forth with sufficient clearness in the Qur'ān, and they are therefore considered as the indispensable supplement to that book. Their style is concise and elliptic, but pure and elegant abounding with idiomatic expressions peculiar to the Arabs of the desert, and not to be perfectly understood without a commentary. The perusal of these documents is however most instructive, and the European scholar who makes it his task to study them will acquire not only a profound knowledge of pure Arabic, but a deep insight into the manners and character of every Muslim people.

The necessity of distinguishing the genuine Traditions from the false gave rise to new branches of literature. A just appreciation of the credit to which each Traditionist was entitled could only be formed from a knowledge of his moral character, and this could be best estimated from an examination of his life. Hence the numerous biographical works arranged in chronological order<sup>2</sup> and containing short accounts of the principal Traditionists and doctors of the law, with the indication of their tutors and their pupils, the places of their birth and residence, the race from which they sprung, and the year of their death. This again led Muslim critics to the study of genealogy and geography.

The use of writing existed in Arabia before the promulgation of Islamism, but grammar was not known as an art till the difficulty of reciting the Qur'an correctly induced the khalif 'Al to make it an object of his attention. He imposed on Abu 'l-Aswad al-Duwalî the task of drawing up such instructions as would enable the Muslims to read their sacred book and speak their language without making gross faults.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Of this further notice will be taken; see page 24.

The sense of the Qur'an was felt to be obscure in many places, and this was justly attributed to two causes: indirect allusions to circumstances of which no further notice was taken and the use of many words and phrases borrowed from the tribes of the Desert. The allusions were explained by the companions of Muḥammad, and these explanations, handed down by tradition, are still preserved in the commentaries on the Qur'an; but the meaning of its obscure expressions could only be obtained from a comparison of the passages in which they are found with similar passages preserved in the early monuments of the Arabic language. It was this reason which induced Ibn 'Abbās, soon after the death of his cousin Muḥammad, to encourage the study of poetry, and from that time it became an indispensable branch of education. But the poems of the ancient Arabs were usually made on some particular occasion, and to understand them well it was necessary to know the motive which led the author to compose them; and as it generally happened that he was not only a poet, but a warrior, they often contained allusions to the battle-days wherein he himself had fought. This led the Muslim scholar to study the history of the old Arabic tribes, and here again he could not see his way without the help of genealogy.

The duty of pilgrimage contributed to turn their attention to geography. The believers who dwelt in distant lands required to know the towns and countries through which they had to pass before arriving at Mekka; lists and itineraries were drawn up for this purpose, and hence all their geographical works received the general title of Musālik wa Mamālik (Roads and Realms). Every mosque in the Muslim empire must be turned towards Mekka, and the founder had therefore to ascertain previously the latitude and longitude of the place where the edifice was to be erected. This required some knowledge of astronomy, a science of foreign growth, but which had been encouraged from the earliest period of Islamism, since some knowledge of its requisite to ascertain the hours of prayer, which could only be determined by means of the altitude of the sun. In the latitude of Mekka the daily variation of the hours, caused by the sun's movement in the ecliptic, was so light, that it produced very little change in the times of prayer throughout the year; but in higher latitudes the difference became perceptible, and it was only by tables or almanacs that the muwadhhdhin was enabled to know the precise moment at which he should call the faithful to public worship<sup>1</sup>. The Muslim Lent begins on the first appearance of the new moon in the month of Ramaḍān. The Sunite doctors require that the moon should be seen before the fast can commence; but in Egypt, under the Fatimides, and in the countries where the Shiite doctrines prevailed, the day of the new moon was fixed beforehand by calculations to which lunar tables served as a basis, and these tables were gradually improved by the assiduity of astronomers, encouraged in their labours by the patronage of government.

<sup>1</sup> See the life of Abu 'l-Aswad, No. 290.

In their arithmetical calculations the Arabs employed certain letters of the alphabet with a numerical value, but they afterwards adopted the Indian ciphers.<sup>2</sup> The arithmetic of fractions was cultivated by them very early; the Qur'ān, in fixing the shares of inheritance to which the nearer and the more distant heirs are entitled, rendered it indispensable.<sup>3</sup> The first principles of algebra seem to have been known to them even in the lifetime of

---

1 The works serving to point out the precise hours of prayer were called Mawaqit مواقيت and their authors were entitled Muwaqqit موقت the muwadhhdhins of mosques were sometimes Muwaqqits.

2 In their astronomical works they employ both systems of notation, but in the tables they generally make use of letters, as by their means they can express all numbers below two thousand.

3 The art reckoning fractions was known to Zayd Ibn Thābit, one of Muḥammad's Companions and he applied it, with the approbation of his master, to the division of inheritances. The imām al-Shāfi'i improved on Zayd's principles, and his system was taken by the author of the Sirajiyah as the basis of his work.

Muhammad.<sup>1</sup>

General history was not at first considered by Muslims as a lawful science, and many doctors were by religious scruples to condemn its study. But the history of literary men, that is, of doctors of the law, poets, philologists and grammarians, received their approval, inasmuch as the writings of such persons were connected with those branches of learning, the germs of which had expanded under the influence of the Qur'ān and the Traditions. All the great cities had their literary history, into which the patriotism of the author, anxious to exalt the glory of his native place, sometime induced the lives of great princes, generals, vizirs, and other public officers.<sup>2</sup> It was only when pious Muslims had been led to believe that political history was instructive and edifying, since it marks the way of God towards man, that writings of this cast obtained at length a hesitating approval.

The documents relative to Muhammadan history were transmitted during the first centuries by oral tradition from one hāfiẓ to another, and these persons made it an object of their particular care not to alter, in the least degree, the narrations which they had received. The pieces thus preserved were generally furnished by eye-witnesses of the facts which are related in them, and are therefore of the highest importance not for the history of the Muslim people, but for that of the Arabic language. The hāfiẓ who communicated a narration of this kind to his scholar, <sup>1</sup> Though the history of algebra was not the immediate object of my studies, I met in Arabic writers some particular circumstances relative to it which have fixed my attention and led me to the conclusion which I here announce; but more extensive researches must be made before I can furnish the complete proofs of my assertion.

<sup>2</sup> Some of these histories with their continuations formed collections of from eighty to one hundred large volumes, a few of which are yet to be found in European libraries. The Bibliothèque de Roi possesses a folio volume closely written and containing a very small part of Khafīf's History of Baghdad—a portion only of the letter 'ayn. Another large volume on the History of Aleppo contains only a small part of the first letter of the alphabet. The extent of some of these collections may be best appreciated from Hājī Khalīfah's account of them in his Bibliographical Dictionary; see the articles Tārīkh Baghdad. Tārīkh Haleb, Tawārīkh Dimesch, etc.

never neglected indicating beforehand the series of persons through whom it had successively passed before it came down to him, and this introduction, or support. Isnād as the Arabs call it, is the surest proof that what follows is authentic. The increasing number of these narrations became at length a burden to the best memory, and it was found necessary to write down the more ancient of them lest they should be forgotten. One of the first and most important of these collections was Ibn Islāq's History of the Muslim wars, a work of which we possess but a small portion, containing the life of Muḥammad, with notes and additions by a later editor, Ibn Hiṣḥām; this is a book of the highest authority and deservedly so, but it is unfortunately of great rareness. This History of Islamism by al-Ṭabarī was formed also in a similar manner; being merely a collection of individual narrations preceded by their isnāds: many of them relate to same event, and from their mutual comparison a very complete idea can be acquired of the history of that early period. These collections of original documents were consulted by later historians, such as Ibn-al-Jawzī, Ibn-al-Aṭhīr, and others, and it was from these sources that they drew the facts set forth in their respective works. It may be laid down as a general principle that Islamic history assumed at first the form of a collection of statements, each of them authenticated by an isnād; then came a writer who combined these accounts, but suppressed the isnāds and the repetitions; he was followed by the maker of abridgments, who condensed the work of his predecessor and furnished a less extensive book on the same subject. The greater work then lay buried in some public library; none were inclined to go to the expense of having it copied for their own use when an abridgment of it could be procured at a cheap rate; and there it remained till time, worms, and war accomplished its destruction. Abu 'l-Fidā and al-Suyūṭī did nearly as much harm to Ibn al-Aṭhīr and al-Ṭabarī as Justin and Florus did to Livy and Tacitus.

In all the Muslim cities, the sciences connected with Islamism were actively cultivated, but Baṣrah and Kūfah attained, at an early period, a high pre-eminence for learning. A great rivalry prevailed between the schools of these two cities, but the utmost difference which we can now discover in their systems of doctrine not very material; they each transmitted with some variations, the works of the older poets, each had a particular manner of explaining the obscure passages contained in these pieces, and each solved certain grammatical difficulties in a way peculiar to itself. The study of grammar and philology reached a high degree of perfection in these schools, and through them the early literature of the Arabs was handed down by oral transmission, with the same exactness as others delivered the Qur'ān and the Traditions. The idiom spoken by the Arabs of the desert was the great object of their studies, and its copious phraseology was preserved from oblivion by their labours. The number of their compilations, consisting in passages of prose and verse which they had received from the different tribes, would be hardly credible, were the fact not supported by the united testimony of all the Arabian biographers. The articles contained in these philological collections were generally classed under different heads, each of which formed a separate treatise. Some were on camels, some on horses, others on plants, tents, arms, hunting, hospitality, etc. ; in a word, on every subject furnished by nomadic life. These documents served later as the ground work of dictionaries, and it was probably from them that al-Fairnzābādī drew the quantity of extracts which swelled out his first Arabic lexicon, the Lāmi', to sixty volumes.<sup>1</sup>

During a considerable period all the knowledge of the Muslims was transmitted by tradition ; nay, doctors of the law composed works and taught them to their pupils, without having written them down, so great was the prejudice against learning acquired from books. Religious scruples long hindered them from putting them on paper ; they said also, and very justly when we consider the nature of their written character, that what was confided to paper could not be perfectly understood without a master and they observed besides that it was more exposed to alterations and destruction than when it was engraved on the mind. Information of all sorts continued to accumulate in this manner, till at length it obliged them to put it in some order and have recourse to the pen. "In the year of the Hijrah 143 says al-Dhahabī<sup>1</sup> the learned men of Islamism began to draw up<sup>2</sup> the Traditions, jurisprudence, and the interpretation of the Qur'ān. Ibn Jurayj composed his books at Mekka; Sa'id Ibn Abi 'Uruba,<sup>3</sup> Hammād Ibn Maslamah, and others composed theirs at Baṣrah; Abū Ḥanīfah and Rabī'at al-Rā'i drew up their works on Jurisprudence at Kufah, and al-Auzā'i in Spain; Mālik composed his Muwatta at Medīnah; Ibn Ishāq then drew up his Maghāzī (Wars of Islamism); Ma'nar<sup>4</sup> composed in Yemen, <sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd 'Allah Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn Kuimāz al-Dhahabī, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and surnamed Shams al-Dīn (the sun of religion), was born in the month of Rajab, A. H. 673 (January, A. D. 1275) at Damascus; but his ancestors, who were of the Turcoman nation, inhabited Mayyafariqīn. He was the chief ḥāfiẓ and Qur'ān-reader of Syria. Having received the first principles of learning at the place of his birth, he visited successively Ba'labakk, Cairo, Nāblus, Aleppo, Mekkah, Medīnah, Jerusalem, and Tripolis, that he might complete his studies under the eminent teachers who then inhabited these cities. He died at Damascus, A. H. 748 (A. D. 1347-8). His works were very numerous and consisted in compilations, abridgments, and original treatises; the title of sixty-seven are given by Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn, who acknowledges however that he did not notice the whole of al-Dhahabī's productions. The most important of them are the Annals of Islamism, of which a broken set is preserved in the Bibliothèque du Roi; this work was composed of twenty-one volumes. An abridged history of eminent men, forming a number of volumes. An abridged history of the Muslim kingdoms. An examination into the credibility of Trāditionists. A chronological biography of those who bore the title of ḥāfiẓ (Tabaqat al-ḥuffāz) in two volumes. A biography of Qur'ān-readers (Tabaqat al-Qurra) a copy of which work is in the Bib. du Roi. An abridgment of the Khāṭib's History of Baghdad and of al-Sam'ānī's. An abridgment in ten volumes of the history of Damascus; another of the Hākīm's History of Naishāpūr. The history of al-Hallāj; an abridgment of Abū'l-Fida's Geography, etc.—(Al-Manḥal al-Sāfi, vol. V. fol. 86 verso).

---

<sup>1</sup> See his preface to the Qāmūs.

In the original text, the word employed is tadwīn (تدوين).

<sup>3</sup> Abū'l-Naḍr Sa'id Ibn Abi 'Uruba Marwān, a native of Baṣrah and a mawla to the tribe of 'Alī, learned the Traditions from Naḍr Ibn Anas Ibn Mālik and Qutāda; Ibn Mubārak was one of his disciples. According to al-Bukhārī, he died A. H. 156 (A. D. 772-3) Tabaqat al-Muḥaddithīn, MS. No. 736.

<sup>4</sup> Abū 'Urwah Ma'nar Ibn Abi 'Urwah Raṣhīd was a mawla to the tribe of Azd and a native of Baṣrah but he settled in Yemen. He learned the Traditions from al-Zuhri, and among his own pupils he had al-Ḥawrī. Ibn 'Uyainah and Ibn Mubārak. He died in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 153 (September, A. D. 770) or by another statement, in 158. —(Tab. al-Muḥad).

and Sufyan al-Thawrī wrote his book the Jāmi'. Very soon after, Ibn Hishām, Layth Ibn Sa'd, and Abd 'Allah Ibn Lahī'ah composed their works ; then followed Ibn al-Mubārak and the Qāḍī Abū Yūsuf, at which period the classification and registering of knowledge was carried to a great length. The treatises on grammar and on the language were then drawn up,<sup>1</sup> as also history and the adventures of the desert Arabs. Before this, all the learned spoke from memory, and the information which they communicated to their pupils was devoid of order, but from that time the acquisition of learning was rendered easy and its preservation by the memory became gradually less frequent."<sup>2</sup>

The task of tracing the progress of the Muslims in legal studies would be extremely difficult for a European pen, and the labour of many years would hardly suffice for its accomplishment. The observations which follow are therefore to be considered in no other light than as a very imperfect sketch. On the first establishment of Islamism, the text of the Qur'ān and the example given by Muḥammad sufficed to guide the first doctors of the law to the solution of the different questions to which the theocratical organisation of the Muslim empire gave rise ; but soon after the death of their lawgiver, the state of the Arab people underwent an immense alteration ; a great portion of the nomadic tribes having abandoned their former mode of life on settling in the countries which they had subdued.<sup>3</sup> The possession of power and riches gave rise to new feelings, new ideas, and new manners they had entered into a new sphere of existence and found themselves under the necessity of establishing a system of rules and regulations calculated to ensure the uniformity of their religious rites, and give a more comprehensive action to the principles

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khallikān and the author of the Fihrist appear in a number of cases, to designate unwritten works by the term 'kutub' (books), and written ones by the words 'kutub muṣannafah' (composed books). This is, however, a point which requires further examination, for 'kutub' may perhaps signify compilations and 'kutub muṣannafah' original works.

<sup>2</sup> This citation is copied from Abu'l-Mahāsin's Nujūm under the year 143.

<sup>3</sup> In Ibn al-Jawzī's Talqīḥ, MS. No. 631, will be found the names of the principal tabi'is who settled in the following places: Ṭā'if, Yemen, Yamāmah, Baḥrayn, Kufah, Baṣrah, Madā'in, Khurāsān, Wāsiṭ, Baghdad, Syria, Mesopotamia, the frontiers of Syria, and Egypt.

of their civil law. Thus their general code, the main points of which had been previously fixed, received its development from the progress of the people in civilisation.

Muslim law flows from four sources : the Qur'ān, the Sunnah or Traditions, the general practice or common consent of the ancient imāms, and the principles deduced from the comparison of these three. The imperfection of the legal regulations contained in the Qur'ān obliged the first Muslims to consult Muḥammad on those difficulties which the text of that work was inadequate to solve ; his opinion was scrupulously followed, and the validity of his decisions was considered as incontrovertible. The ancient imāms, that is, the principal jurisconsults of the first, second, and third centuries after the Hijrah, founded their general practice on that of their predecessors, but some of them presumed to decide on cases hitherto unforeseen, by means of analogical deductions from the three first source of the law. These were called the Mujtahid imāms because they employed the utmost efforts of their mind to attain the right solution of such questions as were submitted to their judgment.<sup>1</sup> Among those imāms Abn Ḥanīfah, al-Shāfi'ī, Mālik, and Ibn Ḥanbal stood pre-eminent not only for their abilities but for the number of points which each settled of his own authority and formed into a body of supplementary doctrines. It naturally happened that these four held different opinions in some cases, but as all the dogmas and leading principles of the law had been already immutably fixed, their decisions related to questions of mere secondary importance, and their doctrine, in the main, was perfectly orthodox. At the present day, the difference which subsists between the practice of their respective followers lies in some particular modifications of the general form of prayer, and in the solution of some legal questions relating principally to property. Of these four sects, the Ḥanbalite and Mālekite may be considered as the most rigid, the Shāfite as the most conformable to the spirit of Islamism, and the Ḥanīfite as the mildest and most philosophical of them all.<sup>1</sup> Two other imāms, Abū Dawūd al-Zāhirī and Sufyān at-Thawrī, were also chiefs of orthodox sects, but their opinions had not many followers, and after some time were totally abandoned. Ibn Jarir al-Ṭabarī, whose reputation as an historian is so familiar to Europeans, founded also a particular sect, which disappeared soon after his death.

<sup>1</sup> Mujtahid is derived from jahd (effort). This title has long ceased to be in use among the Sunnites, but it is still borne in Persia by the chief jurisconsult of each province. Some of the older travellers write this name Muṣṭahid and derive it from shahad (to bear witness to the truth). The derivation of the word qa'id (chief) from qu'la (to judge) is a mistake of a similar kind.

The heretical doctrines of the Shiites, who under the name of Rāfiqites or Ismāʿīlians, hold so prominent a place in Muslim history, had little influence on Arabic literature; but the science of scholastic theology, a Motazelite innovation, gave to the language a scientific precision which it had not hitherto possessed, and which was still more deeply impressed on its style by the translations of Aristotle's works and those of other Greek philosophers. The art of medicine was received from foreigners; the early physicians were natives of India, the next were tributary subjects, and al-Kindī was one of the first Muslims<sup>2</sup> by whom it was practised. The influence of medical writings on general literature was necessarily very slight. Alchemy, an art cultivated from the most ancient times, was always a favourite study with the Muslims, and in this pursuit they made many discoveries which served later to form the basis of chemistry. Astrology, like alchemy, was one of the oldest delusions of the human mind, and, although reproved by the Sunnah, it has always continued to flourish in every Muslim country, but what they considered as its parasitical branch, astronomy, has long since faded and shrunk away.

---

<sup>1</sup> The following passage, extracted from Ibn Khaldun's Prolegomena to his Universal History, merits a place here: "The science of Jurisprudence forms two systems: that of the followers of private judgment and analogy (ahl al-rāʾi wa'l-qiyās) who were natives of 'Irāq, and that of the followers of Tradition who were natives of Hijāz. As the people of 'Irāq possessed but few Traditions, they had often recourse to analogical deductions and attained great proficiency therein, for which reason they were called the followers of private judgment: the imām Abū Ḥanīfah, who was their chief and had acquired a perfect knowledge of this system, taught it to his disciples. The people of Hijāz had for imām Mālik Ibn Anas and then al-Shāfi'ī. Some time after, a portion of the learned men disapproved of analogical deductions and rejected that mode of proceeding: these were the Zāhirites (followers of Abū Dawūd Sulaymān), and they laid down as a principle that all points of law should be taken from the Nuṣūṣ (text of the Qur'ān and Traditions) and the Ijmā' (universal accord of the ancient imāms)."

<sup>2</sup> It was once supposed that al-Kindī was a Jew, but this is now well known to be false. He belonged to one of the most noble Arabian tribes, that of Kinda, his father and grandfather were Muslims and his great-grandfather was one of Muhammad's companions. It might be said that he was a convert to the Jewish religion, but how then did he contrive to escape the punishment of death inflicted by the law of Muhammad upon apostates, and why should he have borne the title of the Philosopher of the Muslims? M. De Sacy has already remarked and refuted this error in his Abdallatif, p. 487.

It is generally mentioned by Arabic historians that the first madrasah (place of study) was founded at Baghdad in the year 459 of the Hijrah (A. D. 1066), by the celebrated Nizām al-Mulk. This statement has led some European writers to assert that the first Arabian Academy, or College, was established by that vizir. The idea which they attach to these words is not, however, very clear; if they mean that an academy or college is an institution which students must frequent that they may obtain their degrees, then they are mistaken in supposing madrasahs to be the first establishments of the kind; and if they add that the academies were civil foundations endowed with real estates, and containing chambers or cells in which the students lodged, they are still wrong in the date, for, according to a very good authority, a madrasah was founded at Naysapūr for Abn Ishāq al-Isfārāinī, the celebrated Shāfite doctor and professor, who, we know, died A. H. 418<sup>1</sup>. A fact of this nature could not escape the attention of the celebrated annalist and biographer al-Dhahabī, and his observations on the subject are deserving of a place here. He says in his Annals of Islamism<sup>2</sup>: "Those who pretend that Nizām al-Mulk was the first founder of madrasahs are mistaken. Before his birth the Bayhaqiān madrasah existed at Naysapūr as also the Saidian madrasah; the latter was built by the amir Nasr Ibn Subuktikin, a brother of the sultān Maḥmūd, when governor of that city. The third was founded at the same place by the Ṣūfī preacher Abu Sa'd Isma'il Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Muthanna of Astarabād, one of the Khaṭīb al-Baghdadi's masters. The fourth was in the same city, and had been erected for the master Abu Ishāq." Al-Suyūṭī, who cites the foregoing passage in his Husn al-Muḥaḍḍarah<sup>1</sup> then subjoins some extracts from other writers which also merit insertion: "The Hākim<sup>2</sup> says in his article on the master Abu Ishāq: Before this madrasah there was no other like it in Naysāpūr, from which it is manifest that others had been founded there previously. Tāj al-Dīn al-Subkī says in his work, entitled al-Ṭabaqāt al-Kubra<sup>3</sup>: 'Upon reflection I am strongly inclined to think that Niẓām al-Mulk was the first who established in them a fixed allowance for the support of students المعالييم الطلبة for I have not been able to ascertain that such was previously the case." In corroboration of the preceding remarks other similar facts might be adduced and without specifying the existence of a dār al-'ilm or house of science opened at Baghdad under the patronage of the vizir Sāpur Ibn Ardašhīr, who died A. H. 416<sup>1</sup>, we might refer, as M. de Hammer has already done, to the dār al-Ḥikmah<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> His life is given in No. 48.

<sup>2</sup> Cited by al-Suyūṭī in his Ḥusn al-Muḥā'ara, MS. No. 652. fol. 235.

<sup>1</sup> Al-Suyūṭī died A. H. 911 (A. D. 1505). A full account of his life and a complete list of his writings will be found in the work entitled Soluti liber de interpretibus Korani, by Mcursinge, Leyden, 1839. *

<sup>2</sup> This is the celebrated Abū 'Abd Allah Muḥammad Ibn al-Batī. His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>3</sup> Abu Naṣr 'Abd al-Wahlhāb Ibn Taqī al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Dī'ā al-Dīn 'Abd al-Kāfī, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and chief qāḍī (qāḍī 'l-quḍāt) of Damascus, drew his descent from one of those members of the tribe of Khazraj who took up arms for Muḥammad. He bore the surnames of Tāj al-Dīn (crown of religion) and al-Subkī (native of Subk, a village in Egypt). This celebrated imām was equally illustrious as a juriconsult, a theologian, and a professor. One of his masters was the well-known historian Shams al-Dīn al-Dhahabī. He filled four times the place of qāḍī at Damascus, and officiated as a Khaṭīb or preacher in the great mosque founded by the Omayyides in that city. Among the numerous works which he composed, the most remarkable are—an abridgment of Ibn Hājjib's (grammatical) work (the Kāfiyah); the chronological history of the Shafite doctors, in three editions designated as the al-Ṭabaqāt al-Kubra (the greater), al-Ṭabaqāt al-Wuṣṭā (the medium), and al-Ṭabaqāt al-Suḡhwa (the less). He left different pieces in prose and verse. Born at Cario, A. H. 728 (A. D. 1327-8); died of the plague at Damascus, A. H. 771 (A. D. 1369-70). (Al-Manhal al-Ṣifī. Ṭab. al-Shafī).—His father Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, surnamed Taqī al-Dīn, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and eminent as a juriconsult, a kāfz, an interpreter, a reader of the Qur'ān, a theologian, a teacher of scholastic divinity, a grammarian, and a philologist. He was born at Subk in Shārqiyah, a province of Lower Egypt, A. H. 673 (A. D. 1274-5). In 731 he was appointed qāḍī of Damascus, where he acted also as a professor. He died A. H. 756 (A. D. 1355), leaving after him a high reputation for learning and virtue. He wrote some works, of which the principal is a commentary on the Qur'ān, entitled al-Durr al-Naẓīm in three volumes. For further details, see the Ṭabaqāt al-Shūfiyyin, MS. No. 861.

<sup>1</sup> See No. 241.

<sup>2</sup> The Dār al-Ḥikmah differed from every other school and madrasah by the sciences taught in it and by the peculiar object of its institution, which was to propagate the Batinite doctrines. See M. de Sacy, Exposé de l'histoire des Druzes, vie de Hakem, p. cccxii. Al-Maqrīzī, in his Khiṭaṭ, gives the following account of this establishment:—The Dār al-'Ilm or house of science, called also the Dār al-Ḥikmah or house of philosophy, was opened by the khalif al-Ḥākim in the month of the latter Jumāda, A. H. 395. The public of all classes were admitted and had permission to read or copy, as they pleased the works which the khalif had sent to it from his own libraries. The quantity of books which it contained was immense, and consisted of treatises on all the sciences and on general literature; among these volumes were some written by the most celebrated penmen. The interior of the establishment was carpeted, gilt, and hung with curtains over the windows and the doors and a number of guardians, slaves, and farrāshes kept the whole in order. Lessons were given in it by jurisconsults, Qur'ān-readers, astronomers, grammarians, philologists, and physicians, who all received salaries for their services. Paper, pens, and ink were always ready for the public. In the year 403 al-Ḥākim sent for a number of arithmeticians, logicians jurisconsults, and physicians employed in the Dār al-'ilm; each class was introduced separately and discussed questions in his presence, after which he clothed them in robes of honour and made them rich presents. This establishment possessed an annual revenue of two thousand five hundred and seventy dinārs for its support, of which sum a part was employed in the following manner: for mats, 10 dinārs; salary of the kātib or copyist, 90 dinārs; salary of the librarian, 48 dinārs; for water 12 dinārs; for the farrāsh, 15 dinārs; for paper, ink and pens, 12 dinārs; for the mending of the curtains, 1 dinār; reparation of books and replacing lost leaves, 12 dinārs; a carpet for winter, 5 dinārs; for palmleaves, to strew floor the in winter, 8 dinārs.—When Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn re-established the Sunnite doctrines in Egypt, he founded the college called after him al-Madrasah al-Ṣalāḥiyyah, and nominated the shayḥ Najm al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khubūḥānī as its president, with a monthly salary of forty dinārs (about 20 pounds) as chief professor, and another of ten as administrator of the waqfs, or property granted to the establishment for its support. He allowed him besides sixty Egyptian raṭls (pounds weight) of bread daily and two skins of Nile water.—(Ḥusn al-Muḥājarah, fol. 235).

or house of wisdom established at Cairo by the Fatimide khalif al-Hākīm in the year 395 of the Hijrah, and to another college founded by the same prince for students of the sect of Mālik, A. H. 400.<sup>1</sup> It is, therefore, manifest that Nizām al-Mulk was not the first who founded a madrasah or college, and it is easy to prove that academies existed long before his time; that they were held in the mosques, as is still the case at Cairo, Ispahān, Bukhāra, Qayrawān, and Fez. The Egyptian historians remark that under the reign of al-'Azīz Nizār, public lectures on different branches of knowledge were opened in the mosque al-Azhar at Old Cairo and that the professors were paid by government. Still earlier Ibrāhīm Ibn Hishām al-Makḥzamī<sup>2</sup> caused regular lessons to be given in the great mosque of Damascus; in the time of Bilāl Ibn Abī Burdah, who died A. H. 126, grammar was taught publicly in the mosques, and Abn 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Sulamī, who died A. H. 74, taught the readings of the Qur'ān in the mosque of Kufah; it has been even handed down on good authority that the first who taught in a mosque and instructed a circle of pupils in the reading of the Qur'ān was Abu 'l-Dardā, and he died A. H. 32.<sup>3</sup> We know moreover that the first school for Arabic literature was established by Ibn 'Abbās, and that he himself gave regular lectures to an immense multitude who assembled in a valley near Mekkah. A great number of passages might also be adduced, if necessary, to prove that from the time of the Tābi'in<sup>4</sup> the regular academies or upper schools were held in the mosques; and that the sciences taught therein were such as related to the Qur'ān and the Traditions.<sup>5</sup> The names of all the great doctors who professed in the different cities of the Muslim empire are still known to us, and from the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqaha alone a chronological list of teachers might be drawn up,

<sup>1</sup> See M. de Sacy's Druzes, tom I, pages cccxii and cccxli.

<sup>2</sup> Ibrāhīm Ibn Hishām al-Makḥzamī was one of Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik's provincial governors: that khalif died in the year 125 of the Hijrah.

<sup>3</sup> Al-Yāfi'i Mir'āt al-Janān.

<sup>4</sup> See note 2 of author's preface.

<sup>5</sup> During the first centuries of Islamism, professors received no other remuneration from their scholars than the presents which it was customary for the latter to give on passing to a higher class.

commencing with the Ṭābi'its and descending to the latest times. Mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and metaphysics were excluded from the course of usual instruction, even in the madrasahs<sup>1</sup> and could only be learned from private masters, as was still the case till very lately. From the preceding observations it may be concluded that Nizām al-Mulk founded neither the first madrasah nor the first academy, and that the institution called after him the Nizāmiah was merely one of the earliest civil establishments for the propagation of learning; the talent of its professors' shed, it is true, a brilliant lustre upon its reputation, but the mosques continued nevertheless to be the only regular academies acknowledged by the law.<sup>2</sup>

It appears from a number of passages in the different Ṭabaqāts and in the work of Ibn K<sup>h</sup>allikān, that the young student commenced his labours by learning the Qur'ān by heart, and also as many of the Traditions as he was able to acquire at his native place; to this he joined a slight acquaintance with grammar and some knowledge of poetry; on attaining the age of from fourteen to sixteen, he began his travels and visited the great cities, where he learned Traditions and received certificates of licence<sup>3</sup> from eminent Traditionists. He then followed the different courses of lectures which were held in the mosques or in the madrasahs, and in some cases he attached himself to one of the professors and lived with him not only as a pupil, but as a menial servant. He there learned by heart the approved works on the dogmas of religion, and studied the commentaries on the same works under the tuition of his master; he acquired a correct knowledge of the different readings of the Qur'ān and of its orthodox interpretation whilst he pursued the study of ancient poetry and philology, grammar and rhetoric, in order to attain the faculty of appreciating perfectly the admirable style which characterises the Qur'ān. The secondary points of jurisprudence, forming the doctrines of the sect to which he belonged, then became the object of his particular study, and an acquaintance with logic and dialectics completed his education. Having obtained from his professors certificates of capacity and licence to teach the works which he had mastered, he found the career open to the places of khāṭib or preacher, imām, qāḍī, muftī and professor. Such was the usual course of education, and its beneficial influence on the mind and character cannot be doubted.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The only exception I have hitherto remarked is offered by al-Hākim's Dār al-Ḥikmah.

<sup>2</sup> These observations will account for a singular statement made by al-Maqqari in his History of Spain, where he says, MS. No. 704, fol 60 recto: "Though learning was highly valued by the inhabitants of Spain's gentle and common, they had no madrasahs specially established for the propagation of learning; but all the sciences were taught in the mosques for payment." M. Gayangos has omitted this curious passage in his abridged translation of that work.

<sup>3</sup> See a note on the subject of Ijāzahs, or certificates of capacity, in M. Hamaker's Specimen Catalogi MSS. Bib. Lugd. Bat. See also M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. I, p. 123.

It is much more difficult to mark out the line of study followed by those who were destined to fill places in the public administration. The kātib should be not only, as his name implies, a good penman, but also a master of the beauties of the Arabic language, well acquainted with grammar and the writings of the poets, a skilful accountant and gifted with a capacity for business.<sup>2</sup> Some *kātib*s were employed to draw up state papers; others to keep the public accounts and registers, or to receive the tithes and the revenues of the state: every governor of a province had his kātib whose duty was to keep the correspondence, and to receive the taxes of the district, the rents of the government farms, etc. Out of this money a fixed sum was yearly remitted to the sovereign; the governor reserving the rest for his own use and the payment of the troops, and persons entitled to salaries, such as the qāḍīs, the jurisconsults, the imāms of the great mosques, the clerks in the public offices, etc. Part of it was absorbed also by works of public utility, and in defraying the expenses of his court. He was obliged besides to maintain the post-horse establishment, but the post-master, who acted also as a spy over the governor, was nominated by the sovereign.

---

<sup>1</sup> It may be remarked that nearly all the Muslim authors with whose works we are acquainted, were either doctors of the law, or had followed the course of studies necessary to become one.

<sup>2</sup> The title of Kātib was sometimes given to copyists of the Qur'ān.

The great quantity of verses quoted by Ibn Khallikān, and of which it may with justice be said, Sunt bona, sunt mediocria, sunt mala plura, requires from the translator some observations. The decline of Arabic poetry can be easily traced down from the accession of the Abbasides to the time of the Ayyubites; for many centuries the patrons of the belles-lettres were of foreign extraction, and writers who sought their favour were obliged to conform their own judgment to that of persons who were in general unable to appreciate the true beauties of literary compositions. Works which had obtained the patronage of the prince could not fail to fix the attention of other poets who took them as models which they strove to imitate and to surpass. The opinion held in the schools that the ancient qaṣīdahs were master-pieces of art contributed also to the perversion of good taste; their plan and ideas were servilely copied, and it was by refinement of expression alone that writers could display their talent; verbal quibbles, far-fetched allusions, thoughts borrowed from the old writers and stained so as to be hardly recognisable, such were the means by which they strove to attain originality; sense was sacrificed to sound, the most discordant ideas were linked together for the futile advantage of obtaining a recurrence of words having a similar written form or a similar pronunciation; poets wrote for the ear and the eye, not for the mind, and yet the high estimation in which their productions were held may be judged from the readiness of Ibn Khallikān to quote them. His taste was that of the age in which he lived, and the extracts which he gives enable the reader to form an idea of the Arab mind at the period of the Crusades. The same feeling of impartiality which induces me to express so severe a censure on the generality of the islamic poets, obliges me also to make some exceptions. The qaṣīdahs of al-Mutanabbī are full of fire, daring originality, and depth of thought; he often reaches the sublime, and his style, though blemished by occasional faults, is very fine; al-Buḥārī is remarkable for grace and elegance; Abu'l-'Alā for dignity and beauty, but Ibn al-Fāriḍ seems superior to them all; his pieces teem with sentiment and poetry; in his mystic reveries he soars towards the confines of another world pervaded with spiritual beauty; and glides with the reader from one enchanting scene to another; the judgment is captivated by the genius of the poet, and can hardly perceive the traits of false taste which disfigure, from time to time, his admirable style.

Having pointed out the influence of the qaṣīdah or elegy, it may not be amiss to sketch the plan generally followed in this species of composition. The poet, accompanied by two friends, approaches, after a long journey through the desert, to the place where he saw his mistress the year before and where he hopes to meet her again. At his request they direct the camels on which they are mounted towards the spot, but the ruins of the rustic dwellings, the withered moss, brushwood, and branches of trees with which were formed the frail abodes where the tribe has passed the summer, the hearth stones blackened by the fire, the solitary raven hovering around in search of a scanty nourishment—every object he perceives strikes him with the conviction that his beloved and her family have removed to some other region in the desert. Overcome with grief, heedless of the consolations of his friends who exhort him to be firm, he long remains plunged in silent affliction; at length he finds relief in a torrent of tears, and raising up his head, he extemporizes a mournful elegy. He commences by mentioning the places which he had already visited in hopes of finding her whom he loved, and calls to mind the dangers which he had encountered in the desert. He describes the camel which, though fatigued still full of ardour, had borne him into the depths of the wilderness; he vaunts his own courage and extols the glory of his tribe. An adventure which happened on the previous night then comes to his memory; a fire blazing on a lofty hill had attracted their attention and guided them to the tent of a generous Arab, where they found shelter and hospitality. He then praises the charms of his mistress, and complains of the pains of love and absence, whilst his companions hurry him away. He casts a parting look towards the place where she had resided, and lo! a dark cloud, fringed with rain and rent with lightnings, overhangs the spot. This sight fills his heart with joy; an abundant shower is about to shed new life upon the parched soil, and thus ensure a rich herbage for the flocks: the family of his beloved will then soon return and settle again in their former habitation.

Such may be considered as the outline of the pastoral qaṣīdah; in these productions, the same ideas almost constantly recur, and the same words frequently serve to express them. The eulogistic qaṣīdah, or poem in praise of some great man, assumes also the same form, with the sole difference that, in place of a mistress, it is a generous patron whom the poet goes to visit, or else, after praising the object of his passion, he celebrates the noble qualities of the man who is always ready, with abundant gifts, to bestow consolation on the afflicted lover.

It results from this that a person familiar with the mode of composition followed in the qaṣīdah can often, from a single word in a verse, perceive the drift of the poet and discover, almost intuitively the thoughts which are to follow. He has thus a means of determining the true reading amidst the mass of errors with which copyists usually disfigure Arabic poetry; knowing what the poet intends to say, he feels no longer any difficulty in disengaging the author's words from the faults of a corrupted text. The same peculiarity is frequently perceptible in pieces of a few verses; these generally reproduce some of the ideas contained in the qaṣīdah, and for this reason they are justly styled fragmants by Arabic writers.

There exist also some compositions of an original form; such are the dubayt or distich, and the mawālīa, both borrowed from the Persians, and the muwashshaha, invented in Spain by Ibn 'Abd Rabbih.<sup>1</sup> Pieces of this kind became general favourites by the novelty of their form and matter: the mawālīa was adopted by the dervishes, and the muwashshaha was cultivated with passion and attained its perfection in Andalusia, whence it was transported to the East. It cannot be denied that the Moorish poets, with all their extravagance of thought and expression, were far superior in their perception of the beauties of nature and the delicacies of sentiment to their brethren of the East, and the European reader will often discover in their poems, with some surprise, the same ideas, metaphors, and systems of versification which characterise the works of the troubadours and the early Italian poets.

<sup>1</sup> Consult on the Muwashshaha Mr. de Hammer's memoir in the Journal Asiatique for August 1839; and Freytags Arabische Verskunst, page 417. In the printed edition of Abu 'l-Fida's Geography, preface page xii, will be found a muwashshaha by the author. The distich and mawālīa are spoken of also by Mr. de Hammer in the memoir just mentioned, pages 167 et 168. In page 166 of the same memoir the word Haghriftis is a mistake of the printer for 'Maḡhrībīns'.

An idea borrowed from the ante-Islamic poets and of frequent recurrence in the qasīdahs of later authors is the ṭayf al-khiyāl or phantom. The lover journeys with a caravan through the desert; for many nights his grief at being separated from his beloved prevents him from sleeping, but at length he yields to fatigue and closes his eyes. A phantom then approaches towards him, unseen by all but himself, and in it he recognizes the image of his mistress, come to visit and console him. It was sent to him by the beloved, or rather it is herself in spirit, who has crossed the dreary waste and fled towards his couch: she too had slept, but it was to go and see her lover in her dreams.<sup>1</sup> They thus meet in spite of the foes and spies who always surround the poet, ready to betray him if he obtain an interview with the beloved, and who are so jealous that they hinder him from sleeping, lest he should see her image in his dreams: it is only when they slumber that he dare close his eyes.

The figurative language of the Muslim poets is often difficult to be understood. The narcissus is the eye; the feeble stem of that plant bends languidly under its flower, and thus recalls to mind the languor of the eyes. Pearls signify both tears and teeth; the latter are sometimes called hailstones, from their whiteness and moisture; the lips are cornelians or rubies; the gums, a pomegranate flower; the dark foliage of the myrtle is synonymous with the black hair of the beloved, or with the first down which appears on the cheeks of youths at the period of puberty. The down itself is called the 'idhār'* or head-stall of the bridle, and the curve of the idhār is compared to the letters lām (ل) and nūn (ن).

<sup>1</sup> Fuller information on this subject will be found in a memoir inserted by me in the Journal Asiatique for April, 1838.

*The 'idhār' means the portion of beard growing just below the ears and then by metonymy the term is applied to the portion of cheeks where beard grows. It is generally used in the latter sense.—Ed.

†Curled locks are compared to the letter lām (ل) and nūn (ن) rather than the downs. In some verses quoted by Ibn Khāllikān (autograph) we have جمال and not عذار.—Ed.

Ringlets trace on the cheek or neck the letter 'waw' (واو) ; they are also called scorpions, either for their dark colour or their agitated movements<sup>1</sup> ; the eye is sword ; the eyelids, scabbards ; the whiteness of the complexion, camphor : and a mole or beauty-spot, musk, which term denotes also dark hair.<sup>2</sup> A mole is sometimes compared also to an ant creeping on the cheek towards the honey of the mouth : a handsome face is both a full moon and day ; black hair is night ; the waist is a willow-branch or a lance ; the water of the face is self-respect ; a poet sells the water of his face when he bestows mercenary praises on a rich patron devoid of every noble quality.

Some of the verses quoted by Ibn Khallikān are of a nature such as precludes translation. Had they been composed by a female on youth whom she loved, they would seldom offer any thing objectionable ; but as the case is not so, they are utterly repugnant to European readers. Propriety suggested their suppression, but as it was requisite to give an idea of what they are, a few of them have been arrayed, and rather awkwardly, in a Latin garb. It must not, however, be supposed that they are always the produce of a degraded passion ; in many cases they were the usual expressions of simple friendship and affection, or of those platonic attachments which the translated works of some Greek philosophers first taught the Muslims. Indeed, love and friendship are so closely confounded by them, that they designate both feelings by the same word, and it is not uncommon to meet epistles addressed by one aged doctor to another and containing sentiments of the strongest kind, but which are the expressions of friendship only. It often happens also that a poet describes his mistress under the attributes of the other sex, lest he should offend that excessive prudery of oriental feelings which, since the fourth century of Islamism, scarcely allows an allusion to women, and more particularly in poetry; and this rigidity is still carried so far, that at Cairo public singers dare not amuse their auditors with a song in which the beloved is indicated as a female. Some of those pieces have also a mystic import, as the commentators of Ḥafiz, Sa'di, and Shēbisteri have not failed to observe. In the Journal Asiatique for February, 1839, will be found a note on this subject inserted by the writer, and Buckingham's Travels in Assyria, vol. I, p. 159 of the 8vo edition, offer some pages in accordance with the opinion there advanced. It cannot however be denied that the feelings which inspired poetry of this kind were not always pure, and that polygamy and jealousy have infected the morals of some eastern nations with the foulest corruption.

<sup>1</sup> The author of the Scholia on Thucydides, A§, 6, remarks that the word "Scorpio"* was employed to designate boys, curls.

<sup>2</sup> In a second memoir, which I have inserted in the Journal Asiatique for February, 1839, will be found a number of observations relative to these metaphors, with examples.

*In original the Greek form is given.—Ed.

Ibn Khallikān drew up his work, A. H. 654 (A. D. 1256), but during the remainder of his life he continued to improve it by additions and corrections.* These alternations are frequently perceptible, even in the translation their insertion in the text having been effected with so little attention, that in many places they interrupt the primitive narration: this, however, is not considered by Orientals as a defect, their custom being to place all notes and illustrations in the body of the work. The author published new editions of his Biographical Dictionary at different periods, and the latest was followed by the writer in preparing for the press the edition of the Arabic text from which the following translation is made.

The difficulty of rendering a work of this nature into a European language can be appreciated by those only who have made similar essays; the writer had at first the intention of giving it in a French translation, and a portion of his task was already executed when he offered his work to the Oriental Translation Committee; in compliance with their wishes he recommenced it in English, and endeavoured to make it as literal as he possibly could. It is true that the idiomatic expressions peculiar to the Arabic tongue, the scholastic terms and technicalities, the learned

---

* Probably some other hands made addition in the name of Ibn-i-Khallikān. If all such pieces are separated as we have marked in this edition; it will be observed that the style is quite different from that of Ibn-i-Khallikān.

allusions and pieces of poetry do not always admit of a close translation; to render them fully, clearly, and exactly is incompatible with conciseness, and it was by paraphrases only that such a task could be accomplished. In some cases, where the text itself required elucidation, the translator has given the necessary information under the form of notes, and he made it his particular care to cope with every difficulty and clear up, if possible, every obscurity. He may not have been always fortunate in his efforts; in some cases he has acknowledged his inability, and perhaps in many more he may have been mistaken; but his constant endeavours to attain correctness will, he hopes, entitle him to the indulgence of orientalisists when they detect his errors.

A number of biographical notices, drawn from original and authentic sources, have been added in the notes, but there still remain in this volume the names of many persons whose lives are not given. For this, three reasons are to be assigned: the first, that in the text of the following volumes, these lives are to be found; the second, that the translator was unable to discover who they were; and the third, that the information which he had obtained respecting them was too slight to merit mention, and he preferred waiting some time longer, in hopes that further researches might be more successful and lead to results worthy of insertion in an ensuing volume.

The work itself is arranged in alphabetical order, but as a great majority of the persons whose lives it contains are usually designated by a particular surname, it was absolutely necessary that a general index of such appellations should be given; who but an oriental scholar could know that the life of the poet Abu Tammām is to be found under the name of Ḥabīb; that of al-Mutanabbī under Aḥmad; and that of al-Ṭabarī, the historian, under Muḥammad? It is hardly necessary to observe that the Arabic nomenclature of persons is composed—first, of the surname, as Abu Bakr (the father of Bakr); then, of the real name, as Aḥmad; next, of the patronymic, as Ibn Jarir (the son of Garir); and then the ethnic name, as al-Azdī (belonging to the tribe of Azd), al-Miṣri (native of Misr, or Egypt), etc., to which must be added nicknames derived from some particular circumstance.

The genealogies are sometimes extended to a great length, but it will be perceived, upon examination, that in this the author's design was to point out correctly the descent of the individual from an ancestor who was well known, and these lists, will be sometimes found useful for tracing the relationship and affiliation of the Arabic tribes. For the pronunciation of proper names the translator has followed the authority of the Qamūs and al-Dhahabī, and for the names of places the Marāsid of al-Suyūṭī and the Taqwīm al-Bulḍān of Abu 'l-Fidā. The autograph manuscript of Ibn Khallikān, in which every word of doubtful pronunciation is accompanied with the vowel points, was also of the greatest service to the translator, but a portion of this volume had been already printed before he was aware that a document so precious was in existence. On receiving it from the proprietor, Dr. Cureton, to whom he acknowledges himself deeply indebted for so great a favour, he reviewed his translation from the beginning and verified all the points respecting which some doubts were still remaining on his mind; the results have been inserted in the additional notes. Whilst the last part of the volume was in the course of translation, the autograph was constantly consulted and for the second volume it will be equally useful.

The transcription of Arabic proper names by means of the Roman alphabet offers great difficulties, and in this part of his task the translator aimed simply at representing the pronunciation of the word as it would strike a European ear: a system liable to many objections had the original text not been published. The h represents the gh as pronounced by the Scotch in daughter, the Spanish j, or the German ch pronounced with emphasis. The gh is an r deprived of its rattling sound; the a is to be pronounced as in man; the ā as in father; the i as in pin; the ī as the ee in been; the u as in but; and the ū as the oo in soon. The circumflex serving to mark the long vowels, has been sometimes omitted, either by inadvertence or because the name was so familiar that the presence of such a sign was needless. The names of some places are given according to the corrupt pronunciation current in Europe; thus Mawsil is written as Mosul; al Qāhirah, Cairo; Ḥalab, Aleppo, etc.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE

IN the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement ! ! Thus saith the needy suppliant for the mercy of the Most High, Shams al-Dīn Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Abī-Bakr Ibn Khallikān, follower of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī.

Praise be to God, to Whom alone belongeth the attribute of eternal existence ; Who hath passed on His creatures the doom of death, and prescribed to all living beings a certain term, beyond which they cannot pass when once it is expired ; Who, in this sentence, hath dealt equally between the noble and the lowly-born, the powerful and the weak : to Him do I give praise for His abundant favours and His gifts pure (from ill) ; such praise as a man can offer who avoweth his inability to reach even the lowest strain of (fitting) eulogy : I bear witness that there is no god but the only God, Who hath no partner (in His power) : such witness as a man can bear who showeth at all times a sincere heart, and who hopeth in the mercy of his Lord, morning and evening : I bear witness that Muḥammad, His servant and apostle, is the most excellent of the prophets, the most noble of the saints ; and that it is he who inviteth to walk in the white path (of salvation) : God grant to him and to his family of illustrious princes such blessings as may endure while heaven and earth do last ; God be gracious to his wives, and to his holy and pious Companions.

The motive which induced me to compose this work, forming an historical compendium, was this : I had always been intent on studying the history of those men of renown who lived before my time; I was desirous of knowing the dates of their birth and death, and of learning who among them lived within the limits of each separate century. The results which I obtained incited me to increase the stock which I had acquired, and to redouble my researches; I applied my mind therefore to the study of works written specially on the subject, and gathered, from the mouths of the masters versed in this science, that information which I could not find in books; I persevered in this pursuit till I had amassed a large quantity of documents roughly drawn up, which contained the events of a great number of years; I had also another portion of these facts impressed on my memory. It so happened, however, that when I had to recur to my notes, I could not find what I sought unless with some difficulty, because they were not regularly arranged; I was, therefore, obliged to class them, and I adopted the alphabetical order, judging it more convenient than the chronological. In this I made it a rule to give the first place to those names which begin with a hamza, and the next to those in which the second letter is a hamza, or the nearest to it in order; thus, I put the word Ibrāhīm before Aḥmad, because the letter b stands nearer to the hamza than the letter h. This plan I followed up to the last, so that my work might be more easily consulted; it led, however, to the necessity of placing (in some instances, the life of) a modern before that of an ancient, and of inserting the name of one person between those of two others who belong to a different class; but the convenience (I aimed at) rendered this unavoidable.

---

1 In translating this well-known expression, which the Muslims place at the beginning of all their books I have taken al-Zamakhsharī for my guide ; in his commentary on the Qur'ān, this writer makes the following remark : "The word Raḥmān denotes a more extensive idea than Raḥīm ; for this reason, people say (in speaking of God) "the Merciful (al-Raḥmān) in this world and in the next ;" and "the Clement (al-Raḥīm) in this world !"

I have not assigned a place in this compendium to the Companions of Muḥammad, or to the Tābi'is,<sup>1</sup> a few only excepted, whose history many persons require to know; neither have I given the lives of the Khalifs, because the numerous works on the subject rendered it unnecessary for me to do so; but I have made mention of a great number of talented individuals with whom I was acquainted, and who supplied me with some of the information transmitted in this book; or else who lived in my time, but whom I never saw: (my object in this was) to make known to the future generation the circumstances of their life.

---

1 The word Tābi'i means a follower; it is employed especially to denote a Muslim who had met with some of the Companions of Muḥammad, but had never seen Muḥammad himself.

I have not limited my work to the history of any one particular class of persons, as learned men, princes, amīrs, vizīrs, or poets; but I have spoken of all those whose names are familiar to the public, and about whom questions are frequently asked; I have, however, related the facts I could ascertain respecting them in a concise manner, lest my work should become too voluminous; I have fixed, with all possible exactness, the dates of their birth and death; I have traced up their genealogy as high as I could; I have marked down the orthography of those names which are liable to be written incorrectly; and I have cited the traits which may best serve to characterize each individual, such as noble actions, singular anecdotes, verses, and letters, so that the reader may derive amusement from my work, and find it not exclusively of such a uniform cast as would prove tiresome; for the most effectual inducement to reading a book arises from the variety of its style.

My work thus formed, it was incumbent on me to begin it with a short invocation, intended to conciliate Divine favour; this, joined to the rest, made up the present volume, which I designed as a help to my memory, and which I intitled: Book of the Deaths of eminent Men, and History of the Sons of the epoch; drawn from written sources and oral traditions, or ascertained by personal observation; by this I intended that the contents of the work should be denoted by the title alone. If any person possessing information on the subject I have treated, perceive faults in this book, he will do a meritorious action in correcting them after due verification<sup>1</sup>; for I myself have spared no pains in drawing from works of established repute for accuracy, and have never, through carelessness, cited extracts from doubtful authorities; on the contrary, I have done all in my power to attain correctness.

I put this work in order in the year 654 (A. D. 1256), at Cairo, though taken up by other avocations and living under circumstances unfavourable to such a task. The reader ought therefore to excuse me, and consider that it was the motive I stated which induced me to undertake it, and that no vain fancy could ever have inspired my mind with the absurd idea of ranking among authors: a current proverb says, There are men for each business: and how could such an honour happen to me, who have but a limited share of information in this science? Besides, he who boasts of a talent with which he is not gifted, is like one who arrays himself in the garb<sup>1</sup> of falsehood. God preserve us from falling into the gulfs of error, and grant us, through His grace and bounty, that surest safeguard, the knowledge of our real abilities. Amen.

---

<sup>1</sup> This inconsiderate authorization of changing and correcting is the main cause of the numerous discrepancies between the manuscripts of Ibn Khallikān's work.

---

<sup>1</sup> The word ثوب , dual of ثوب (garment) is employed here and elsewhere, to signify a suit of clothes—See de Sacy's Hariri, p. 65, l. 15. As the clothing of the ancient Arabs consisted of an ازار (izār, tied round the waist), and a رداء (ridā, thrown over the shoulders), the dual number is very naturally made use of to denote the entire dress.

IBN KHALLIKAN'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

1. IBRĀHĪM AL-NAKHA'Ī

Abū 'Imrān, surnamed also Abu 'Ammār, Ibrāhīm Ibn Yazīd Ibn al-Aswad Ibn 'Amr Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn Hārithah Ibn Sa'd Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Nakha' al-Nakha'ī, native of Kufah, and a celebrated imām and doctor, was one of the Tābats. Though he had seen and visited 'Ā'ishah (widow of Muḥammad), there exist no authentic traditions received by him from her: he died A. H. 95 or 96 (A. D. 713-4), aged 49, some say 58, but the first number is correct. When the death of al-Nakha'ī drew near, he was sorely troubled in spirit, and being spoken to about it, said: "What peril can be greater than mine? I must expect a messenger from my Lord, sent to announce to me either paradise or hell! I declare solemnly I would rather remain as I am now, with (my soul<sup>1</sup>) struggling in my throat, till the day of resurrection (than undergo such a hazard)". His mother, Mulayka, daughter of Yazīd Ibn Qays, was sister to al-Aswad Ibn Yazīd al-Nakha'ī<sup>2</sup>, who was therefore maternal uncle to Ibrāhīm. Nakh'a means belonging to al-Nakh'a which is a great branch of the tribe of Madhij, in Yamen; al-Nakh'a's name was Jasn Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Ulla Ibn Jald* Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Udad; he was surnamed al-Nakh'a, because he had removed far away, intakh'a, from his people: this tribe has produced a great number of remarkable men. Others have given a different genealogy of al-Nakh'a, but the one here given is correct; it is taken from Ibn al-Kalbī's Jamharat al-Nisab (Universal Genealogist).

---

<sup>1</sup> In the original Arabic, the word نفسى, my soul, is understood; two similar cases occur in the Qur'ān: see Flügel's edition; Surat LVI, verse 82; and s. LXXV, v. 26.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'Amr al-Aswad Ibn Yazīd Ibn Qays al-Nakha'ī, one of the Taba'is; in his youth, he saw the Khalifs Abu Bakr and 'Umar, and learned the traditions from the Khalif Ali; Ibn Mas'ūd (see de Sacy's Anthologie Grammaticale, p. 38); Mu'ādh (de Sacy's Chrestomathie Arab. t. III. p. 149); and 'Ā'ishah. His exactitude and authority as a traditionist were universally admitted; he died A. H. 75 (A. D. 694). Another celebrated tābi'ī of the same family, 'Alqama Ibn Qays al-Nakha'ī, native of Kufāh and uncle to al-Aswad, was one of the greatest doctors of his time; he learned the traditions from 'Umar, 'Uthman, 'Ali, Ibn Mas'ūd and 'Ā'ishah. His merit was held in such high estimation, that the Companions of Muḥammad themselves consulted him on questions touching the law. He died A. H. 63 (A. D. 682-3) ('Uthmani's Tabaqāt al-Fuqaha, manuscript of the Bibliothèque du Roi, No. 755).

2. ABU THAWR IBRAHĪM ALKALBĪ

The doctor Abu Thawr Ibrāhīm Ibn Khālīd Ibn Abi 'l-Yamān al-Kalbī was a disciple of the imām al-Shāfi'ī who taught him those ancient sayings<sup>1</sup> which he has transmitted to posterity. This eminent doctor and trustworthy traditionist on religious affairs wrote some works on the Ahkām<sup>2</sup>, and he evinced in these treatises an equal knowledge of the tradition and jurispru-

<sup>1</sup> These ancient sayings were probably old proverbial expressions used by the Arabs of the Desert, who alone were supposed to know perfectly the pure Arabic. Al-Shāfi'ī had passed twenty years of his life in the desert, studying the language; he had, besides, a profound knowledge of the ancient history of the Arabs. (Uṭhmānī's Tabaqāt, f. 24, verso.)

<sup>2</sup> The Ahkām, or Sentences, are the articles which compose the code of Muslim law; they have been drawn from four sources: the Qur'ān; the Sunna or traditions; the general consent of the ancient imāms, and analogical deductions obtained from the comprison of these three. (D'Oohson's Tableau de l'empire Oiheman, t. I, p. 5 of the Introduction; Flügel's Hājji Khālifah, t. I, pp. 177, 332.)

*The translator has read it Khālīd and the editor of Egyptian edition Mohi al-Din Abdul-Hameed has given in footnote variants.—Ed.

[For further reference, vide Ibn-i-Hajar 'Asqālānī's Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb published by Dā'i'rat al-Ma'ārif, Hyderabad, Deccan, A. H. 1325, Vol. I, p. 177 and Sam'ānī's Ansāb f. 557 a.

In genealogical table one difference deserves mention: Ibrāhīm Ibn Yazīd Ibn Qays Ibn al-Aswad. The name of Qays is omitted by Ibn Khallikān. Ansāb, f. 557 a.—Ed.] dance. His first studies were taken up with the doctrines of the Rationalists<sup>1</sup>, but al-Shāfi'i, having come to 'Irāq, he went often to see him, became his follower, and renounced the opinions of his former sect. He persevered in his adhesion to al-Shāfi'i's principles, and died the 26th Safar,* A. H. 246 (A.D. 860), at Baghdād, where he was buried in the cemetery by the gate of Kenās. Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal said of him: "I look on him as a second Sufyān al-Thawri<sup>2</sup>; I have known him as a zealous "Sunite for the last fifty years;"

3. ABŪ IṢḤĀQ AL-MARWAZĪ

Abū Iṣḥāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Iṣḥāq-al-Marwazī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i was the greatest mufti and professor of his time. He learned the principles of jurisprudence from Abū 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj; and having attained great excellence in this science, he succeeded Ibn Surayj as chief of the Shafites in 'Irāq. He composed many works, and commented the Mukhtaṣar, or Abridgment of the Doctrine of al-Shāfi'i by al-Muzanī. He was for a long time professor and mufti at Baghdād, and a great number of his pupils attained eminence. It was after him that the street of Marwazī, in that quarter of Baghdād called the Grant of al-Rabi,<sup>3</sup> received its name. Towards the end of his life, he

---

[For further reference vide Tahdhīb, Vol. I, p. 118 and Ansīb f. 485 b.—Ed.]

1 The followers of Abū Ḥanifa's doctrines were called Rationalists, by the members of the other three orthodox sects, because they preferred, in certain cases, the guidance of reason to that of tradition, in deciding legal questions (Shāhrastāni; Pocock's Specimen Hist. Ar., p. 292).

2 Literally thus: "He is to me as if he were in the skin of Sufyān al-Thawri." This passage is to be found also in Uthmānī's Tabaqāt (fol. 49 r.) where the word rendered by skin is written mislāk: the vowel points having been added by the author himself: this circumstance leaves no doubt of the correctness of the reading given in the printed Arabic text.

3 Some particulars respecting the Grant of Rabi will be found in the life of al-Rabi 'Ibn Yunus.

22 May.—Ed.

set out for Egypt, where he finished his days the 9th Rajab, A. H. 340 (A. D. 951)*, and was interred near the tomb of the imām al-Shāfi'i: some say he died a little before midnight, on Sunday 11th Rajab of the same year. Marwazi means belonging to Marw al-Shāh-jān, one of the four capitals of Khurasān, the others being Nayshapur, Herāt, and Balkh. This city was so named in order to distinguish it from Marw al-Rūd: Shāh-jān is a Persian word, which signifies the soul of the king; for Shah means king, and jan, soul; the custom of the Persians being to place the consequent before the antecedent, when in the relation of annexion.<sup>1</sup> This city was founded by Alexander Dhu 'l-Qarnayn,<sup>2</sup> and is the seat of the government of Khurasān. In forming the relative adjective from Marw, a z is added, as in Rāzi, derived from Ray, and Iṣṭakhar-ī, from Iṣṭakhr this is one way of its formation; but according to the opinion of those who have studied the subject, such relatives are only used when speaking of human beings; in all other cases, the z must not be added. Therefore one may say of a man he is a Marwazi; and of a garment or other thing, it is Marwi; some say, however, that the x may be added in all cases, and that the difference in the form of the relative makes no difference in its signification. The remainder of our observations concerning these two cities will be found in the life of the Qāḍi Abu Ḥamid Aḥmad Ibn 'Āmir al-Marwarraḍhī.

4. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-ISFARĀ'INĪ

The master Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Mihrān al-Isfara'ini, surnamed Rukn al-Dīn (column of religion) doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i was an able divine in scholastic

<sup>1</sup> See de Sacy's Grammaire Arabe, vol. I, p. 47, for the explanation of these terms.

<sup>2</sup> Marw al-Shāh-jān is probably the ancient Antiocha Margianae, founded by Alexander the Great, and then called Alexandria; having been ruined afterwards it was rebuilt by Antiochus, son of Seleucus, who gave it his own name.

*11 December.—Ed.

and dogmatic theology. The ḥākim Abu 'Abd Allāh<sup>1</sup> has spoken him in these terms: "The generality of the shaykhs of Nayshāpur took lessons from him in theology, and his learning was acknowledged by the people of 'Irāq and Khurasān; he is the author of some important works; among others that great one entitled: Jāmi 'al-Jalt, at treatise on the dogmas of religion, and a refutation of the impious, which I have seen in five volumes. The qāḍi Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī, being at Isfarā'in, took lessons from him in the principles of jurisprudence, and it was for him that the celebrated college of Nayshāpur was founded.<sup>2</sup> * [Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī cites his name in his continuation of the History of Nayshāpur and speaks of him thus: "He was one of those learned men who attained the rank of mujtahid<sup>3</sup> by reason of his profound knowledge in the sciences, and of his possessing all the necessary qualifications for being an imām (or chief of a sect). This doctor, the ornament of the East, used to say: 'I wish I may die at Nayshāpur, so that all its inhabitants may pray over me]' and it was there he died, on the 10th Muḥarram, A.H. 418 (A. D. 1027).† His body was afterwards removed to Isfarā'in, where it was buried in the chapel which bears his name." The Shaykh Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī frequented his lessons, and the ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr al-Bayhaqī, and other writers, quote frequently in their works traditions derived from him. He had heard the lectures of Abū Bakr al-Isma'īlī,<sup>4</sup> in Khurasān; those of Abū

---

1 The life of the ḥākim Abū 'Abd Allāh will be found amongst those of the Muḥammads.

2 This is an important fact for the literary history of the Muslims; it being generally supposed that their first college was founded at Baḡhdād, by Nizām al-Mulk, A. H. 459 (A. D. 1066).

3 Those doctors who followed the opinions of no other sect, but judged for themselves, were called 'mujtahid'. (M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, t. I, p. 169).

4 Abu Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Ismā'il Ibn al-'Abbās al-Isma'īlī, one of the great doctors of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, was highly celebrated for his writings and his knowledge of the law and the traditions, a great quantity of which he picked up in his travels. He

(Contd. on page 51)

* [ ] From "Abu 'l-Hasan" to "over me" not in the autograph.—Ed.
 † 20 February.—Ed.

Muḥammad Du'luj* Ibn Aḥmad al-Sajazī,<sup>1</sup> in ʿIrāq; and also those of their contemporaries. †[We shall speak of Isfarāʾin in the article on the shaykh Abū Ḥamid Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Isfarāʾinī.]

(For further reference see) Ansāb, f. 33 b.—Ed.

5. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-SHĪRĀZĪ

The shaykh Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn ʿAlī Ibn Yūsuf al-Shīrāzī al-Fīrūzābādī surnamed Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion), dwelt in Baghḍād, and studied jurisprudence under many eminent men; he was an assiduous pupil of Abū ʿl-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī, and profited by his lessons, he then acted as his substitute, and was appointed by him director of repetitions (or undertutor) of the class; after which he became the first imām of his time in composed (1) A Commentary on the Jāmiʿ Saḥīḥ, or Collection of authentic Traditions: by Termedhī; (2) a Muʿjam, معجم, which treated probably of the traditionists, and the right orthography of their names; (3) a Musnad, or Collection of Traditions traced up to the Khalīf ʿUmar—عمر; a correct and excellent work, but voluminous. Ismāʿīlī had for pupils his son, Abū Saʿd, and all the doctors of Jurjān; he died in Rajab, A.H. 371 (A.D. 982), aged 94 years (Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfiʿiyyin. Ṭab. al-Fuqaha, Abulfedae Annales, t. II, p. 551).

(Contd. from page 50)

1 The imām Abu Muḥammad Du'luj Ibn Aḥmad al-Sajazī (of Sejestān), celebrated muftī and first traditionist of his days. This doctor was also an extensive trader, and became the richest merchant of his time by his commercial expeditions. Part of his wealth was employed in founding annuities for deserving persons in Mekka, ʿIraq, and Sejestān: he was particularly liberal to men of learning. He died A.H. 351 (A.D. 962), aged 91. Dāraqu nī, a celebrated doctor, relates that Du'luj bought the house in Mekka which belonged to al-ʿAbbās, uncle of Muḥammad, for thirty thousand dinars. (Yāfiʿis Mirʾāt al-janān; Man., No. 637, fol. 264, verso.)

*The translator read it 'Da'laj'.—Ed.

† [ ] From "We shall" to "al-Isfarāʾinī" not in the autograph.—Ed.

Baghdād,. Nizām al-Mulk, having founded the college (called Nizāmiyah) in that city, offered its direction to Abn Ishāq; and, on his refusal, appointed to that place Abn Naṣr Ibn al-Sabbāgh, author of the Shāmil; this doctor filled the situation for a short period; then Abn Ishāq consented to accept it, and held it till his death: I have given the details relating to this in the life of Ibn al-Sabbāgh to which I, therefore, refer the reader. Abn Ishāq wrote a number of instructive and useful books, such as the Muḥadḍḥab, a treatise on the doctrines of his sect; the Tanbih, or Call, a work on jurisprudence; the Lum'a, or Glimpses, with a commentary wherein the dogmas of religion are treated of, the Nukat, or shrewd Devices on controversial subjects; the Tabṣīrah, or Monitor; the Ma'īnah, or Succour; the Talḥīṣ,* or summary, a treatise on dialectics, etc. The number of those who profited by his instruction was very great. He composed some good poetry, of which I shall give the following verses:

"I asked of Men : Where is a true friend to be found ?
Their answer was : To such there is no way ; cling, if thou can'st, to the robe of the noble-minded ; for the man of noble mind is seldom met within the world."

It is related by the shāikh Abn Bakr Muhammad al-Ṭarṭāshī (whose life shall be given later), that a clever poet of Baghdad, called 'Āsim, made the following pretty verses in praise of Abn Ishāq (to whom God be merciful) :

"Thou seest his body worn away by his active mind ; it bears the marks of that ardour which fires his soul ; when the human mind is great with lofty thoughts, a body lean and worn is no disgrace."

Abn Ishāq was a man of the utmost devotion, and rigidly attentive to his religious duties : his merits were countless. He was born at Firāzābād, A. H. 393 (A. D. 1003), and died in Baghdad* on the eve of Sunday,‡ 21st of the second

* The title of his book is not mentioned in the autograph copy and Hājī Khalifah also has not mentioned it in the list of Shīrāzī's works. Also see Cairo edition, p. 10, footnote.—Ed.

†It should be 'love' according to the autograph in which there is ذیل for ود.—Ed.

‡Sunday, 5 November, 1083, appears to be more correct.—Ed.

Jumāda (according to al-Samʿānī in his Dhayl, but others say the 1st* Jumāda), A. H. 476 (A. D. 1083), and was buried the next morning in the cemetery at the gate of Abrez.† The following elegy was made on his death by Ibn Nāqīyā, whose life will be found among those of the 'Abd Allāhs:

"A fatal event hath struck our eyes with consternation<sup>1</sup> and hath caused our tears to flow mingled with blood ! What hath happened to fortune ? She cannot collect her strength, since the loss of her favoured son, Abn Ishāq. Say : He is dead ! but his memory hath not died ; it will live and endure while Time doth run his course.

‡[Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn al-Najjār<sup>2</sup> mentions Abn Ishāq in his his-

1 The expression قام قيامته is very frequently used by later writers ; it signifies literally : the day of resurrection is come ; which means that his trouble and consternation are as great as if the day of judgment were already present. (See other examples in Maqrizī's Histoire des Mamluks, t. 1, p. 95). The Persians use the word رستخیز in a similar sense.

2 The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Maḥmūd Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Muḥrisin, surnamed Ibn al-Najjār, was born at Baḡhdād A. H. 578 (A. D. 1183) ; at the age of ten he began to learn the traditions, and when he had reached his fifteenth year, he was able to continue his studies without assistance. طالب بنفسه. After having learned a great number of traditions and mastered the seven different manners of reading the Qur'ān

قرا بالسمع he undertook a long journey, and spent twenty-seven years in visiting Syria, Egypt, Hijāz, and the cities of Ispahān, Ḥarrān, Herāt and Nayḥapur ; during his travels he carefully noted down whatever information he could collect from the illustrious and the obscure, from the high and the low. كتب عن من دب و نزل و عرج

He was a man of deep and extensive knowledge, humble and pious, remarkable for his self-denial and holy life. He died A. H. 643 (A. D. 1245), at Baḡhdād and was interred in the cemetery of the Martyrs, مقابر الشهداء by the gate of Ḥarb. The best known of his works is the

(Contd. on page 54)

*Friday, 6 October 1083, and so it seems to be wrong.—Ed.

†Arabic text has Abzer but the autograph does not support it.—Ed.

‡[ ] From "Muḥibb al-Dīn" to "in his stead" on page 55 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

tory of Baġhdād, and speaks of him in these terms : "He was the imām of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and one of those men of merit whose reputation spread abroad : in learning and self-denial he excelled every person of his time ; and most of the learned in the great cities were his pupils. Born and bred at the town of Firāzābād, in the province of Fāris, he went to Shīrāz, where he studied under Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Bayḍāwī<sup>1</sup> and Ibn Rāmīn<sup>2</sup> ; from thence he proceeded to Baṣrah, where he had al-Jawzī<sup>3</sup> for master ; in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 415, he entered Baġhdād to study under Abū 'l-Tayyib al-Ṭabari. He was born A. H. 393." "I asked him," said Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Humaydi, "the date of his birth, and he mentioned to me some circumstances which point out the year 396 (A. D. 1006), as he said that he set out to travel in search of learning in the year 410,<sup>4</sup> and went to Shīrāz :

(Contd. from page 53)

Supplement, in sixteen volumes, to the History of Baġhdād by the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr Aḥmad al-Baġhdādī. Ibn Qāḍī Shuhba, who has furnished us with most of the above details, gives a list of sixteen other works by the same author (Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn. See also Hamaker's Specimen Catalogi, etc., p. 247 and Bibliothèque Orient, Naggiar).

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Bayḍāwī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i, was born at al-Bāyḍā, a large town in the district of Isṭakḥar, eight parasangs from Shīrāz. He studied jurisprudence in the city of 'Āmul, and then went to Baġhdād, where he received lessons from Abū Ḥāmid al-Isferā'īni and other celebrated doctors, and became himself professor and mufti. He was well learned in the doctrines of his sect, and skilled in controversy, logic, and dogmatic theology. He died suddenly at Baġhdād A. H. 424 (A. D. 1033). Among other celebrated men born at-Bayḍā, was the Qāḍī Naṣr al-Dīn Abū 'l-Khayr 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar al-Bayḍāwī, author of the well-known Commentary on the Qur'ān : he died at Shīrāz, A. H. 691 (A. D. 1292) (Ṭab. al-Shāfi'īn, Ṭab. al-Fuqaha).

<sup>2</sup> The shaykh Abū Aḥmad 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Rāmīn, native of Baġhdād, and pupil of the celebrated al-Dārakī ; he was deeply learned in jurisprudence and dogmatic theology, on which latter subject he wrote some esteemed works. Died A. H. 430 (A. D. 1039).

<sup>3</sup> I have as yet met with no information respecting this doctor.

<sup>4</sup> It appears by this that students began to travel at the age of fourteen or fifteen: after having acquired whatever instruction their native place could afford, they went to different countries, studying successively in each, under doctors and professors of repute ; they sometimes continued this wandering life for many years.

others however place his birth in 395, but God knows it best." On his death, his pupils sat in solemn mourning in the Nizāmiya college, and after that ceremony, Muwyyad al-Mulk, son of Nizām al-Mulk, appointed Abū Sa'd al-Mutwallī to the vacant place, but when Nizām al-Mulk heard of it, he wrote to disapprove of that nomination, adding that the college should be shut up during a year, on account of Abū Ishāq's death; he then blamed the person who had undertaken to fill his place, and ordered the shaiḫ Ibn al-Sabbāgh to profess in his stead.] — "Firūzabād is a town in the province of Fāris, and it is believed by some to be the same city which is called Jūr;" so says Abu Sa'd al-Sam'anī in his work; the Ansāb: some persons pronounce the name of this town Fayrūzābād.

6. THE KHAṬĪB ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-'IRĀQĪ

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Musallam, native of Egypt and doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i, known also by the name of al-'Irāqī (native of Irāq), was a preacher (khaṭīb) of the great mosque (of 'Amr) in Old Cairo, and a talented jurisconsult; he wrote a good commentary in ten volumes on the Muḥadḍḥab by Abū Ishāq Shīrāzī. Though not a native of 'Irāq, he was called so, because he had travelled to Bagḥdād, and studied there for some time: when in that city, he took lessons in jurisprudence from Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Urmāwī,<sup>1</sup> one of Abū Ishāq Shīrāzī's disciples, and from Abū 'I-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn al-Mubārak,* surnamed Ibn al-Kall, native of Bagḥdād. In his own country he studied jurisprudence under the qāḍi Abū 'I-Ma'ālī al-Mujallī Ibn Jumay' (whose life shall be given later); when in Bagḥdād, he was called al-Misrī (the Egyptian), but he got the name of al-'Irāqī on his return to Egypt. He is said to have related that his master, Ibn al-Kīlāl recited to him, in Bagdad, the following verses, but without naming their author:

<sup>1</sup> The imām and jurisconsult Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-'Urmāwī (native of Ormiya in Adherbijān) was a pupil of the celebrated Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī. Died A. H. 537 (A. D. 1142) (Tab. al-Fuqaha).

*M. de Slane writes "Ibn al-Mubārīk".—Ed.

"Falschhood is rendered pleasing if clothed in gilded terms; and Truth may sometimes assume a repulsive form: in praising honey, you may say: This is the saliva of the bee: in blaming, call it: the ejection of the wasp. Describe it with such blame and praise as this, and you do not exaggerate: elegant language can make darkness and appear like light."

Al-'Irāqī was born at Old Cairo, A. H. 510 (A. D. 1116); he died in that city on Thursday, 21st of the first Jumādā, A. H. 596 (A. D. 1200)*, and was buried at the foot of mount Muqattam. He had a son of great talent and merit, named Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Ḥukm, who became preacher of the mosque on the death of his father, and composed some good sermons and pleasing poetry, of which the following verses may be cited: they were written 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Jibrīl, commonly called Ibn Akḥī 'ilm, chief of the treasury-office in Cairo, who had shattered his hand by a fall: ‡

"Imād Ibn Jibrīl has a hand which bears an evil mark: though given to thieving, it had as yet escaped a tardy amputation; but a fracture has happened to it now which will not be readily healed."

He wrote other verses in the same style of originality as the preceding which I have, however, since met with in the poetical works of Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfah (whose life shall be given later); so that I cannot decide to which author they belong. 'Abd al-Ḥukm composed the following verses on a man condemned to death (for murder), and who was shot dead by

† It may appear strange that such a word as this should be thought compatible with an elegant style: the fact is, however, that it is often employed by Arabic writers; and the Muslim poet, in describing the pleasures of love, never fails vaunting the intoxicating draughts imbibed from the honeyed lips of his mistress.

*The date should be Friday, 9 March.—Ed.

the person authorized to take blood-revenge; the arrow striking him in the heart: †

"From the heart (the middle) of the bow you expelled its son (the arrow); and the bow sighed; for a mother will sigh when separated from her child: but the bow was not aware that the arrow you shot off would merely pass from one heart to another."

The idea expressed in the first of these verses was taken from the following lines, composed by a native of Maghreb:

"No doubt of my affliction when my friends depart; on that day of separation when I and sadness shall be (inseparable) brothers! The very bow, though formed of wood, utters a sigh when forced to send away its arrow."

The idea in 'Abd al-Ḥukm's second verse is taken from a poem rhyming in m, by 'Umārat al-Yamanī, and of which we shall speak hereafter in that person's life: al-Yamanī, having come from Mekka to Egypt, composed this poem in praise of the reigning prince, al-Fa'iz 'Isa Ibn Zāfir al-'Ubaydi, and of his vizir, Ṣalīḥ Ṭalā'ī: Ibn Ruzzik (whose lives will be found in this work); in the course of the poem, he lauds in these terms the camels which had borne him to Egypt:

"They went forth at eve from the Ka'ba of al-Baḥā and the Ḥarem<sup>2</sup> to visit the Ka'ba of generosity and nobleness. Did the temple know that, on leaving it I should only pass from one harem (sanctuary) to another?"

The following verses are also by 'Abd al-Ḥukm:

"When my beloved perceived my eyes pour forth their tears, she pressed me to restore the pearls which had adorned her neck: astonished (then at her mistake) she smiled; and I said to my friend: That which she though lost is in her mouth."

† Literally: in the liver. The Arabic word signifies also that part of the bow which is equally distant from the two extremities: there is a play upon this double meaning in the verses immediately following.

2 Al-Baḥā, the gravelly, is the name of the valley in which Mekka is built; the Ḥarem is the sacred territory of Mekka; the Ka'ba is the temple of that city towards which all the Muslims turn when saying their prayers; a Ka'ba of generosity means a noble and liberal patron, on whom all eyes are fixed with hope.

al-Kīlāl recited to him, in Baghdād, the following verses, but without naming their author:

"Falschhood is rendered pleasing if clothed in gilded terms; and Truth may sometimes assume a repulsive form: in praising honey, you may say: This is the saliva of the bee: in blaming, call it: the ejection of the wasp. Describe it with such blame and praise as this, and you do not exaggerate: elegant language can make darkness and appear like light."

Al-'Irāqī was born at Old Cairo, A. H. 510 (A. D. 1116); he died in that city on Thursday, 21st of the first Jumādā, A. H. 596 (A. D. 1200)*, and was buried at the foot of mount Muqāṭṭam. He had a son of great talent and merit, named Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Ḥukm, who became preacher of the mosque on the death of his father, and composed some good sermons and pleasing poetry, of which the following verses may be cited: they were written 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Jibrīl, commonly called Ibn Akḥī 'ilm, chief of the treasury-office in Cairo, who had shattered his hand by a fall: ‡

"Imād Ibn Jibrīl has a hand which bears an evil mark: though given to thieving, it had as yet escaped a tardy amputation; but a fracture has happened to it now which will not be readily healed."

He wrote other verses in the same style of originality as the preceding which I have, however, since met with in the poetical works of Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfah (whose life shall be given later); so that I cannot decide to which author they belong. 'Abd al-Ḥukm composed the following verses on a man condemned to death (for murder), and who was shot dead by

† It may appear strange that such a word as this should be thought compatible with an elegant style: the fact is, however, that it is often employed by Arabic writers; and the Muslim poet, in describing the pleasures of love, never fails vaunting the intoxicating draughts imbibed from the honeyed lips of his mistress.

*The date should be Friday, 9 March.—Ed.

the person authorized to take blood-revenge; the arrow striking him in the heart: †

"From the heart (the middle) of the bow you expelled its son (the arrow); and the bow sighed; for a mother will sigh when separated from her child: but the bow was not aware that the arrow you shot off would merely pass from one heart to another."

The idea expressed in the first of these verses was taken from the following lines, composed by a native of Maghreb:

"No doubt of my affliction when my friends depart; on that day of separation when I and sadness shall be (inseparable) brothers! The very bow, though formed of wood, utters a sigh when forced to send away its arrow."

The idea in 'Abd al-Ḥukm's second verse is taken from a poem rhyming in m, by 'Umārat al-Yamanī, and of which we shall speak hereafter in that person's life: al-Yamanī, having come from Mekka to Egypt, composed this poem in praise of the reigning prince, al-Fa'iz 'Isa Ibn Zāfir al-'Ubaydi, and of his vizir, Ṣalīḥ Ṭalā'ī: Ibn Ruzzik (whose lives will be found in this work); in the course of the poem, he lauds in these terms the camels which had borne him to Egypt:

"They went forth at eve from the Ka'ba of al-Baḥā and the Ḥarem<sup>2</sup> to visit the Ka'ba of generosity and nobleness. Did the temple know that, on leaving it I should only pass from one harem (sanctuary) to another?"

The following verses are also by 'Abd al-Ḥukm:

"When my beloved perceived my eyes pour forth their tears, she pressed me to restore the pearls which had adorned her neck: astonished (then at her mistake) she smiled; and I said to my friend: That which she though lost is in her mouth."

† Literally: in the liver. The Arabic word signifies also that part of the bow which is equally distant from the two extremities: there is a play upon this double meaning in the verses immediately following.

2 Al-Baḥā, the gravelly, is the name of the valley in which Mekka is built; the Ḥarem is the sacred territory of Mekka; the Ka'ba is the temple of that city towards which all the Muslims turn when saying their prayers; a Ka'ba of generosity means a noble and liberal patron, on whom all eyes are fixed with hope.

This idea is taken from the following piece of verse, composed by Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Aṭīya, better known as Ibn al-Zaqqāq, native of Valentia in Spain :

"A fawn (-like nymph) passed round the cups at dawn; the morning brightened up, and still she pushed them round; the flowery mead offered us its anemones, and the scented myrtles now began to breathe. 'Where,' said I, 'are the white blossoms of the anthemis?' My companion answered: 'I deposited them in the mouth of her who fills my cup.' 'She who poured out the wine denied the charge; but her smiles betrayed her, and she blushed with confusion.' "

Safī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, commonly called Ibn Shukr vizīr of al-Malik al-'Ādil Ibn Ayyub, having taken from 'Abd al-Ḥukm the place of preacher in the mosque of Old Cairo, this poet wrote him the following lines :

"To what door shall I repair for refuge, if not to thine? from whom can I expect liberality, if not from thee? All paths and ways are closed up against me, except that which leads towards thee; direct me then how to act. It seems as if the (hospitable) doors of other men had become (one single door) thy door! It seems as if thou alone wert all the human race!"

The thought in this last verse is borrowed from the poet al-Salāmī, who says :

"I encouraged my hopes with the prospect of dominion, (and) all mankind (my subjects); the world was to be my palace; and eternity, one day of my reign!"

We shall speak of the poem from which this verse is taken, in the Life of Aḍad al-Dawlat (Fennakhusrā) Ibn Buwayh, under the letter F. The following verses were pronounced by 'Abd al-Ḥukm when he first unveiled his bride:

"When the charms of the bride were disclosed to my eyes, she hid her face with her hand, on which was graven a net-work tracery.<sup>1</sup> 'Your efforts to hide your countenance will not avail,' said I; 'when has a net hid the light of the sun?' "

---

<sup>1</sup> Among the 'Arab women it is still customary to tattoo the hands and arms.

By the same :

"At the feast, where we spent the night in pleasure, it seemed as if we were borne asleep upon the waters ; over us were the constellations : under us, the boat ; in those, stars : in this, full-moons."<sup>1</sup>

By the same :

"Proceed gently ! all affairs admit delay : do you, who are a lion, fear to be insulted ? If you dwelt in Egypt, you would be a Nile (spreading abundance) ! If you went to Syria you would be a fertilizing shower !"

This author was born on Sunday eve, 19th of the First Jumada, A. H. 563 (A. D. 1168)* ; he died at Old Cairo, on the morning of the 28th Shā'aban, A. H. 613 (A. D. 1216), and was buried at the foot of mount Muqāṭṭam, A great deal of his poetry, and all of an agreeable cast, was recited to me by his son. The 'Imād al-Din, above-mentioned, bore the name of Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'I-Amāna Jibrīl Ibn al-Moghayra Ibn Sulṭān Ibn Ni'ma ; he was a worthy man, and celebrated for his great integrity in the fulfilment of his duty ; he had been employed most part of his life in different government-offices at Old Cairo and Alexandria. Born A. H. 558 (A. D. 1163); died at Cairo, the 5th of Sha'abān, A. H. 637 (A. D. 1240).†

7. ABŪ IṢḤĀQ ḌAHĪR AL-DĪN

Abū Iṣḥāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Naṣr Ibn 'Askar, surnamed Ḍahīr al-Dīn (support of religion), doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'ī, qāḍī of Sallāmiya, and native of Mosul, is thus spoken of by Ibn al-Dubaythī in his History<sup>2</sup> : "Abū Iṣḥāq, native of Mosul, studied

1 In this verse, the poet plays upon the double meaning of the word Aflāk which signifies the constellations of the zodiac and ships ; by the full moons, he designates his fair companions, the partners in his pleasures.

2 This work of Ibn al-Dubaythī is a continuation of the History of Baḥḥad Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ānī, which is itself a supplement to the celebrated work composed by Abū Bakr A'mad, surnamed al-Khaṭīb al-Baḥḥādī : the lives of these writers will be found in this work.

*3 March.—Ed.

†11 December.—Ed.

‡1 March.—Ed.

jurisprudence in that city under the qādī Abn 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusain Ibn Naṣr Ibn Khamīs, native of the same place, from whom he learned the traditions : having then travelled to Baghḍād, he took lessons from a number of masters, and returned to his native place. He became qādī of Sallāmiya, a town in the dependency of Mosul, and he taught, when in Irbil (Arbela), a portion of the works of Abu 'l-Barakāt 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad al-Anbārī, the grammarian, under whom he had studied at Baghḍād along with many natives of that city." This talented jurisconsult was originally from Sindiya, in 'Irāq ; he studied law at the Nizāmiya college in Baghḍād, he learned and taught the traditions, and filled, for a long time, the place of qādī in Sallāmiya. His reigning passion was poetry, and his verses, the following for instance, are very pleasing :

"Oh, my friends ! call me not a man of perfidy ; no perfidy is in my character. I swear by the days of my life which have passed away, and by those joys which have departed that I have been always constant in my promised friendship, and that the ties of my attachment have never yet been broken."

By the same :

"The bounty of a generous man, promised but long delayed, is never pure from alloy. Vain and useless are the lightnings from the cloud, if it withholds its promised showers. He who defers fulfilling his promise merits blame, though his hands should lavish riches after the long delay. Oh, tree of bounty ! the man must not be blamed who shakes thy branches when he needs thy fruit."

In a village called al-Bawāzīj, near Sallāmiya, was a convent inhabited by a fraternity of dervishes, under a shaykh named Mekkī, upon whom the following verses were made by Abn Ishāq :

"Go bear to Mekkī this word of good counsel ; for good counsel merits attention : when was it taught, as a point of religion, that the pursuit of riches is a precept inculcated by Muḥammad, and therefore to be followed ? (When was it taught) that a man should eat with the voracity of a camel, and leap about in the conventicle till he fall. Were he hungry, were his stomach empty, he would neither whirl round for joy nor listen to musicians. They say : We are intoxicated with the love of the Divinity ! But that which intoxicates the fraternity is draughts (of the wine cup). The ass in a rich pasture acts as they ; when its thirst and hunger are satisfied, it skips about."

Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī* mentions his name with eulogium in the History of Arbela, and cites numerous extracts from his works, and from the letters he received from him : the k̄atib 'Imād al-Dīn also speaks of him in the Kharidah<sup>1</sup>, as a young man of talent. The following verses are his :

"I said to her : Unite to me thee in the bonds of love ! but she turned away her head as if I had asked her to commit a crime. If she reject my love through fear of sinning (she should reflect) that it is a grievous sin to cause (by a cruel refusal) the death of a Muslim."

This writer died at Sallāmiya, on Thursday, the 3rd of the Second Rabī A. H. 610 (A. D. 1213) : he had a son whom I met at Aleppo, and who recited to me a great deal of his own and of his father's poetry : he wrote verses well, and hit upon fine ideas. Sallāmiya was a village on the east bank of the Tigris, a day's journey lower down than Mosul, which stands on the west bank : the town of Sallāmiya, in which Zahr al-Dīn was qādī, is now in ruins, and a new village of the same name has been founded in the neighbourhood.

8. IBRĀHĪM IBN AL-MAHDĪ

Abn Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī Ibn Abi Ja'far al-Mansūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib al-Hāshimī (descended from Hāshim, grandfather to Muḥammad), brother to Hārūn al-Rashid.

---

<sup>1</sup> See MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1414, fol. 191, verso.

*M. de Slane writes it as "al-Mastawfī".—Ed.

†22 August.—Ed.

This prince had a great talent as a singer, and an able hand on musical instruments ; he was also an agreeable companion at parties of pleasure. Being of a dark complexion which he inherited from his mother Shikla or Shakla (who was a Negress) and of a large frame of body, he received the name of al-Tinnīn (the dragon). He was a man of great merit and a perfect scholar, possessed of an open heart and a generous hand ; his like had never before been seen among the sons of khalifs, none of whom spoke with more propriety and elegance or composed verses with greater ability. He was proclaimed khalif at Baghḍād some time after A. H. 200, during the absence of al-Māmūn (the reigning khalif) in Khurāsān ; (the history of that event is well known)<sup>1</sup> ; and he continued for two years khalif in that city : al-Ṭabari says, in his Annals, that the reign of Ibrāhīm lasted one year, eleven months, and twelve days. The cause which induced the people to renounce allegiance to al-Māmūn and proclaim Ibrāhīm khalif, was the conduct of the former, who, during his stay in Khurāsān, appointed for his successor Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā, whose life shall be given in the letter ع . This choice being highly displeasing to (the members of the reigning family) the Abbasides,<sup>2</sup> who were in Baghḍād, they proclaimed Ibrāhīm, uncle to al-Māmūn Khalif, under the title of al-Mubārak (the Blessed) ; this took place on Tuesday, 25th Dhu'l Hijja, A. H. 201 (June, A. D. 817).<sup>3</sup> The Abbasides of Baghḍād began first by making a secret promise to allegiance to Ibrāhīm, and the inhabitants of the city took a similar engagement the 1st Muḥarram 202 (July 20th, A. D. 817) pronouncing at the same time the deposition of al-Māmūn ; then, on Friday, 5th Muḥarram, they published their resolution, and Ibrāhīm mounted the pulpit.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See Abulfedae Annales, t. II, p. 117.

<sup>2</sup> It must be recollected that the number of persons descended from al-Abbās amounted, in A. H. 200 to 33,000, according to a census made by al-Māmūn. (Ibn al-Atḥīr. Abu 'l-Fidā.)

<sup>3</sup> During more than three centuries it was customary for the khalifa to pronounce in person, the khutba, or declaration of faith, from the pulpit every Friday ; Ibrāhīm, in mounting the pulpit, had thus openly assumed the functions of khalif. The details of this revolt are to be found in the Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā ; see also, in the Bibliothèque Orientale, the article Mamoun.

*14 July.—Ed.

Al-Māmun, on appointing 'Ali Ibn Mūsā for his successor, had ordered the public to cease wearing black, which was the distinctive colour of the Abbasides, and to put on green (which colour was appropriated to the family of 'Ali and their partisans): this gave also great dissatisfaction to the Abbasides, and was one of the motives which provoked their enmity towards al-Māmun: the wearing of black was re-established on Thursday, 29th Dhu'l-Qa'da 207 (May A. D. 823)*; the reason which rendered this change necessary is given by al-Ṭabarī in his Annals.<sup>1</sup> On al-Māmun's setting out for Baghdād from Khurāsān, Ibrāhīm became apprehensive for his personal safety, and concealed himself; this was on Wednesday, 16th† Dhu'l-Hijja, 203 (June, A. D. 819)‡; before which took place many events long to relate, and

---

1 The entire original text of al-Ṭabarī is not to be found in the Bib. du Roi; but Ibn al-Aṭḥir, who has often copied him verbatim in his Annals, furnishes us with the following passage: "In the year 207 took place the revolt of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Tālib, in the country of the tribe of 'Akk, situated in the province of Yemen. He called on the people to adopt the Riḍā (the accepted of God) of the family of Muḥammad." (Indeed every Abbaside who revolted against the Omayyades, and every member of the family of 'Alī who revolted against the Abbasides, represented himself as a lieutenant of that mysterious person the Riḍā, who was of course unknown to the uninitiated, and in some cases was the very individual who headed the insurrection). "The cause of this revolt was the unjust conduct of the government agents in Yemen, which obliged the people to proclaim 'Abd al-Raḥmān. When news of this came to Al-Māmun, he sent against him Dinār Ibn 'Abd Allah, with a numerous army, and gave him also letters of pardon for the rebel. Dinār after visiting the great fair of Mekka, and performing the pilgrimage, marched towards Yemen, and set pardon to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who accepted it, and submitted to the authority of al-Māmun, by placing his hand in that of Dinār, who brought him to al-Māmun. On account of this (revolt) al-Māmun forbid the members of the family of 'Alī to enter into his presence, and ordered them to wear black: this took place the 28th Dhu 'l-Qa'da." (Ibn al-Aṭḥir's Kāmil, Arabic MS. of the Bib. du Roi, under the year 207.)

*16 April.—Ed.

†The date should be 17 which corresponds to 15 June.—Ed.

‡15 June.—Ed.

which I have no space to record in this abridgment.<sup>1</sup> Al-Māman made his entry into Baghdād on Sunday, 15th Safar, 204 (August, 819)*. At the time when Ibrāhīm concealed himself, the poet Dī'bil al-Khuzā'i made the following verses on him :

"The son of Shakla and his gang raised tumults in 'Irāq ; then every fool and villain flew to join him ! Were Ibrāhīm fit to reign, the empire had devolved by right to Mukhāriq† to Zulzul, and to Māriq ! Must it be ? but no ! 'tis impossible ! Must the patrimony of the khalifs pass from one reprobate to another ?"

Mukhāriq, Zulzul, and Māriq, the persons mentioned in the foregoing verses, were public singers of that time. The history of Ibrāhīm's adventures is long (to relate) and well known<sup>2</sup> (so we shall merely cite the following incident of his life, and give it in his own words) ; "Al-Māman said to me, on my going to see him after having obtained pardon : 'Is it thou who art the Negro khalif ?' to which I replied : 'Commander of the Faithful ! I am he whom thou hast deigned to pardon ; and it has been said by the slave of Banu 'l-Ḥashās.<sup>3</sup>

"When men extol their worth, slave of the family of Ḥashās can supply, by his verses, the defect of birth and fortune.

Though I be a slave, my soul, through its noble nature, is free ; though my body be 'dark, my mind is fair'."

1 Those events are related by Abu 'l-Fidā in his Annals.

2 During the time of Ibrāhīm's concealment, he had a number of hair-breadth escapes, and the history of his disguises and adventures is very amusing ; but it has not as yet been translated into any European language : M. Humbert, of Geneva, has given however the Arabic text of it in his Analecta Arabica ; and M. Caussin de Perceval intends publishing a French translation of the Kitāb al-Aḥnānī, in which will be found many curious stories respecting Ibrāhīm.

3 According to the author of the Masālik al-Absār (Arabic MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancient fonds, no. 1371, fol. 78) ; this poet's name was Suḡaym سوغيم and the Banu 'l-Ḥashās were a branch of the tribe of Asad.

I suspect him to have lived before the introduction of Islamism ; Tabrizī cites a verse of his in the commentary on the Ḥamīsa, p. 492.

*The date should be 16 Safar (12 August). Even then there is some discrepancy, Sunday fell on 14 August. The date is not clear in autograph.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Muḥāriq but has corrected this error in No. 91.—Ed.

To this al-Māmūn replied : 'Uncle ! a jest of mine has put you in a serious mood.' He then spoke these verses :

"Blackness of skin cannot degrade an ingenious mind, or lessen the worth of the scholar and the wit. Let darkness claim the colour of your body ; I claim as mine your fair and candid soul."

A modern poet, Ibn Qalāqīs, whose life we shall give, has versified the same thought, with some additions of his own and expressed it most happily ; his word and are :

"There are females dark in skin, but in conduct clear and pure ; whose presence would induce the (white) camphor to envy the (black) musk : 'tis thus with the pupil of the eye ; men think it black, though merely (concentrated) light."

The khalif al-Mu'taṣim, successor of al-Māmūn, was one day seated on his throne, having on his right al-'Abbās, son to al-Māmūn, and on his left Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī, when the latter began playing with a ring he held in his hand ; "what ring is that ?" said al-'Abbās ; "it is a ring," replied Ibrāhīm, "which I pledged during the reign of your father,<sup>1</sup> but which I redeemed only in the reign of the Commander of the Faithful (here present)." "By Allah," answered al-'Abbās, "since you are ungrateful to my father, who spared your life notwithstanding the enormity of your crime, you will not be thankful to the Commander of the Faithful for having redeemed your ring." The other was silenced by this retort. Ibrāhīm's, adventures form a very long narrative which is related by historians. I, however, have abridged his history, and indicated the leading points only ; but al-Ṭabarī and others have given it in full. When al-Māmūn got Ibrāhīm in his power, he consulted the vizir Ahmed Ibn Abī Khālīd al-Aḥwal<sup>2</sup> as to what should be done

---

1 Al-Māmūn was reputed avaricious, and to this Ibrāhīm alluded for a khalif should not have suffered any of his family to remain in want.

2 The vizir Ahmad Ibn Abī Khālīd al-Aḥwal was a freed man, and had been employed as kātib or scribe in the government offices before his nomination to the place of vizir. He was a man of great intelligence, prudence, and foresight, and possessed, besides, the talent of expressing with the prisoner, and received this answer : "Commander of the Faithful ! if you punish him with death, you will have your like (among sovereigns), but if you forgive him, you will be peerless." Ibrāhīm was born about the 1st of Dhu 'l-Qa'da, A. H. 162 (July, A. D. 779)*; and died at Sarr-man-raa, on Friday, 7th Ramaḍān, 224 (July, A. D. 839)†; funeral prayers were read over him by his nephew al-Mu'taṣim. Al-Jawharī (the lexicographer) mentions in his Ṣiḥāḥ, under the word raa, six different manners of writing Surra-man-ra'ā, viz : Surra-man-ra'ā, Sarra-min-ra'ā, Surra-min-rā'a, Sarra-man-rā'a, Sa'a-man-ra'ā, and Samarra which last, with the final syllable lengthened, has been employed by al-Buḥārī, in this verse : "And you placed it as a leading mark at Samarra". I know not, however, if this pronunciation be in use, or if the poet only adopted it from necessity (on account of the measure of the verse, which here requires a long final syllable). This city, which is situated in 'Irāq, was built by al-Mu'taṣim in the year 220 (A. D. 835); in it is the cavern from which the Imamites expect the coming forth of the twelfth Imām<sup>1</sup> whose life shall be given in the letter Al.

---

(Continued from page 65)

his ideas in an elegant and correct style. He died A. H. 210 (A. D. 825) according to Fakḥr al-Dīn. (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 895, fol. 218.) D'Herbelot, in the Bibliothèque Orientale, article, Aḥmed, relates an anecdote tending to prove the ignorance of this vizir : in this he has committed a double mistake : the Arabic expression made use of by the khalif Mu'taṣim is incorrectly translated (compare the note given by Reiske in the second volume of Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, page 684, with M. de Sacy's observation in the Anthologie grammaticale, p. 138); the second error of D'Herbelot consists in applying this anecdote to Aḥmad Ibn Abi Khālīd, and not to Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammār Ibn Shādhi (عمار بن شاذي) who was the ignorant vizir in question (compare Ibn Khallikān's Life of Muḥammad Ibn al-Zayyāt with Fakḥr al-Dīn, Nos. 655 and 667).

I See Bib. Orient., Imām.

*20 July.—Ed.

†The date should be Friday 9 Ramaḍān, 224 (25 July A. D. 859).—Ed.

9. IBRĀHĪM AL-NADĪM AL-MAWṢILĪ

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Māhān (or Maymūn) Ibn Bahman Ibn Yask* adopted member of the tribe of Tamīm, and descended from a family of Arrajān (a city in the province of Khūzestān): he is generally known by the title of al-Nadīm al-Mawṣilī (the social companion or singer from Mosul), though not born in that city; but having gone to live there for some time, he was called a Mosulite; (such is the observation made by Abū 'l-Faraj, of Ispahān, in his Kitāb al-Aghānī): he came of a noble Persian house, but his father had emigrated and settled at Kufa. The first khālif in whose presence he sung was al-Mahdi, son of al-Manṣūr, he was unequalled as a singer, and he discovered several new musical modes; when Ibrāhīm sung, with his wife's brother, Manṣūr, called also Zulzul, to accompany him on the lute, the audience were transported with pleasure. His adventures and concerts are equally famous: it is related that the khālif Hārūn al-Rashīd was passionately fond of a fair slave named Marīda, but they quarrelled, and their mutual displeasure continued for some time. This induced Jāfar the Barmakide (Hārūn's vizir) to order (the poet) al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf to compose something applicable to the circumstance, and the following verses were written by him in consequence:

"Return to the friends you have abandoned; the bondsman of love but seldom shuns (his mistress): if your mutual estrangement long endure, indifference will glide (into your hearts) and (lost affection) will hardly be retrieved."

In pursuance to Jāfar's orders, Ibrāhīm sung these verses to al-Rashīd, who immediately hastened to Marīda, and got reconciled to her. She then asked him what brought about this event; and being informed of what had passed, ordered to Ibrāhīm and al-'Abbās a present of 10,000 dirhems each, and al-Rashīd, on her request, recompensed them with a reward of 40,000 dirhems.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The silver dirhems of al-Rashīd's coinage are nearly of the same weight as the French franc, but they are much broader and thinner.

* M. de Slane gives Nusk and his reading is followed in Egyptian editions: however Teheran edition agrees with the autograph.—Ed.

Ibrāhīm had been put into the Muṣbiq or chief prison of Baghḍād by al-Rashīd, and Salm al-Khāsir<sup>1</sup> (the poet) related to Abu 'l-'Atāhiya what had happened : on which the latter pronounced these verses :

"Oh, Salm ! Salm ! without thee no joy remains : al-Mawṣili is in prison, and our life has become bitter ! Pleasures are no longer sweet, since their author--nobles of men ! is hidden by the prison (from our sight). Al-Mawṣili has been abandoned by all God's creatures ; but their life (now) feels harsh and irksome. Disport and joy are in prison, and nought remains on earth to disport and give joy."

Ibrāhīm was born at Kūfa. A. H. 125 (A. D. 742), and he died in Baghḍād of a disorder in the intestines.* A. H. 188 (A. D. 804) ; others say 213 (A. D. 828), but the first is the right date : we shall speak again of this event in the Life of al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥmāf (which see). It is said that Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili, Abu 'l-'Atāhiya the poet, and Abu 'Amr al-Shaybānī the grammarian, died at Baghḍād, in the year 213, and on the same day ; it is also related that Ibrāhīm was yet a child when his father died, and that the tribe of Tamīm took charge of him, and brought him up ; for which reason he was styled Tamīmī. We shall make

---

<sup>1</sup> Abu 'Amr Salm Ibn 'Amr al-Khāsir (the loser) native of Basrah, a poet notorious for his profligate life, lived at Baghḍād, and was contemporary with the Khalīfs al-Mahdī, al-Hādī, and al-Rashīd ; he made verses in praise of the Khalīfs and the Barmakides. The surname of the loser was given to him, because he sold a copy of the Qur'ān to buy a book of poetry with the money, or else, because he had squandered the riches he inherited from his father ; such are the explanations given in the Kamūs ; but the anonymous author of the remodelled edition of Ibn Khallikān's work (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 731) says that Sālim, for so he calls him erroneously, bought a lute with the money he got for his Qur'ān ; the same writer gives the year 186 as that of his death ; but it must be remarked that this author is very often mistaken, and shows great ignorance in many of the alterations made by him in Ibn Khallikān's work. The author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī, mentions Salm in the Life of Abu 'l-'Atāhiya, but furnishes no information respecting him. Ibn al-'Abbār, in his al-Ḥullat al-Siyarā (Arabic MS. belonging to the Asiatic Society of Paris), states that the book of poetry bought by Salm was the diwān of 'Imra'u l-'Qays (fol. 141, recto). The analysis of this work is given by Casiri, in his Bibliotheca Arabica under the number 1649. (Vide no. 239.—Ed.) mention of his son Ishāq. According to al-Jawhari<sup>1</sup> and al-Ḥāzimi, the word Arrajān is written with a double r : we shall speak again of this place in the Life of Aḥmad al-Araǧānī.

*Collic pain is a better word.—Ed.

(For further reference, see Ans b, f. 544 b. — Ed.)

10. IBRĀHĪM AL-SŪLĪ

Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣul-Takīn al-Ṣulī was a poet of reputation and talent : his works have been collected and form a small volume of exquisite pieces; the following is a specimen of his tender style:

"Visits draw close the hearts which coolness had parted ; but my visit to (the capricious) Layla has changed her affection to dislike ! The maids that dwell in the (distant) valley of al-Liwā are nearer to me than Layla, though her dwelling be here at hand."<sup>2</sup>

The style of his prose writings is admirable ; as, for instance, in the following threatening letter written by him in the name of the khālīf to some rebels : "know that the Commander of the Faithful hath patience ; to which, if useless, threats succeed ; if they avail not, his resolutions shall. Adieu." This address is not only concise but also highly figurative in fact, it has given rise to the following verse :

<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khallikān has omitted the Life of al-Jawhari in his work, but some information may be obtained on this subject from Hamaker's Specimen Catalogi Cod. MSS. Lugd. Bat., p. 48. This lexicographer died at Nayshāpur A.H. 392 (A. D. 1002). (Yāfi'i's Kitāb al-Janan, MS. No. 137.)

<sup>2</sup> The Arabic word which signifies to draw near, means also to be reconciled, and, by a similar analogy, the word which denotes separation or distance can be taken in the sense of alienation or mutual coolness ; such quibbles and conceits were highly in favour at the time when Ibn Khallikān wrote, though ancient authors were very sparing of them. The valley of Liwa, or the retired spot on the edge of the desert, is frequently mentioned by the ante-Islamic poets ; there it is that the mistress of the poet is supposed to reside. The Muslim poets make continual allusions to the works of their predecessors, the nomadic Arabs ; those works were for them whereas the Greek and Latin classics are for us.

"To useless delay threats succeed ; if they avail not, resolution shall."

This author used to say : "In composing my letters I relied merely on those ideas which my mind might inspire, and on those sentiments which might spring from my heart ; I except, however, these two passages : 'That which guarded them exposed them (to danger) ; and their asylum became their prison !' and in another letter of mine : 'They hurled him from his fortress to a prison, and they caused him to exchange hope for death' !<sup>1</sup> In the latter sentence I imitated the following verse by Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Anṣārī, surnamed Sarī - 'al-ḥawānī (the vanquished by the fair)<sup>2</sup> :

(He appeared) standing on (mount) Muhaj, on the (fatal) day of Dhu-Rahaj<sup>3</sup> he seemed the speedy death of all my hopes.*

"In the former sentence, I imitated an expression used by Abu Tammām in these verses :

'If he enter the desert, he shall meet with sword and lance instead of hospitality ; and he shall quench his thirst at the cistern of Death ! If he raise a wall around him, it shall not be

1 Here in the Arabic text, some words of nearly a similar sound, but of different significations, are joined together artfully enough ; but the beauty, if any, of these expressions is quite lost in the translation.

2 Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Anṣārī was one of the galaxy of poets who shone at the court of the Abbasside khalifs. In his verses he celebrated the praises of al-Māman al-Raṣhīd, the Barmakides, and other great men ; he was appointed Redressor of Grievances (see de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I. p. 132) in Jurjān, through the protection of the vizir al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl Dhu 'l-Ryāsātayn. He was surnamed the vanquished by the fair on account of his having composed the following verse :

What then is life, if we spend not our evenings with (those we) love, and if we fall not, towards morning, vanquished by the wine-cup and by fair large eyes ? (See Freytag's Hamāsa, p. 428).

The author of the Kitāb al-Aḥḥānī gives little information respecting this poet ; he merely says that Ibn Qunber ابن قنبر وهو الحكم بن

محمد بن قنبر (a poet of the time of al-Māman, and Muslim Ibn al-Walid composed virulent satires against each other, and that they sometimes came to blows. (Aḥḥānī, t. III, p. 252.)

3 Such, I believe, is the sense of the Arabic words, but I must acknowledge that I have still some doubts (vide editor's translation).

*The sense appears to be : He controls the human souls on the day of battle as if he is the (angel of) death hastening (to disrupt) hopes.—Ed.

his fortress, but his prison ! If not, let him know that you are angry with him, and fear alone shall doubtless cause his death.' "

Ibrāhīm al-Ṣulī was sister's son to al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf, the famous poet : he was called al-Ṣulī, after his grandfather, Ṣul-Tekin, a prince of Jurjān, who made profession of Islāmism to Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abi-Ṣufra (the Muslim conqueror of Khurasān). The hāfiz Abu 'l-Qāsim Ḥamza Ibn al-Yūsuf al-Sahmī<sup>1</sup> says, in his History of Jurjān : "Al-Ṣulī came of family, native of Jurjān ; (Ṣul, or as it is sometimes pronounced, Jūl, is the name of a demesne situated in Jurjān : he was paternal uncle to the father of Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Yalīya Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣulī, author of the Book of Vizīrs and other works ; so their genealogies meet in one common progenitor, al-'Abbās (al-Ṣulī's father)." * [Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Daw'ūd Ibn al-Jarrāh<sup>2</sup> mentions him in his Kitāb al-Waraqāt in these terms : "Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣul, surnamed Abū Ishāq, native of Baghḍād, drew his origin from Khurāsān ; he was a better poet than the other *Kātib*s who were contemporary with him, and his style was more graceful than

1 Al-Sahmī died A. H. 427 (A. D. 1036) : (Tab. al-Huff. z.). Besides the history of his native place, Jurjān, he composed some other works, such as the Arbain al-Buldaniya, which is mentioned by Ḥājji Khalifa in his Bibliographical Lexicon : Flügel's edition, vol. I, page 233.

2 Muḥammad Ibn Daw'ūd Ibn al-Jarrāh, one of the most learned men of his time, had been brought up under the tuition of the ablest masters in eloquence, poetry, and the sciences. He followed the profession of copyist, and transcribed a great number of works, the copies of which he always read over after in order to correct whatever faults he might have made. When 'Abd Allāh, son to the khalif al-Mu'tazz, usurped the sovereign authority, A. H. 296 (A. D. 908), Ibn al-Jarrāh became his vizir, and filled that place till the fall of his master, who reigned only one day : he then sought concealment in the house of the eunuch Manis, whom he thought his friend, but Manis caused him to be murdered in order to gain the favour of the vizir Ibn al-Furāt, who had advised him to commit this treacherous action (Kitāb al-Fehrist, No. 874. fol. 174, verso.) See also the Life of Ibn al-Furāt in this work.

3 The *Kātib*s, or writers, were the persons employed in the public offices: the directors, clerks, and secretaries in government service were all called *Kātib*s.

*From Abū ' 'Abd Allāh" to "abridgment as this" on page 72, is not in autograph.—Ed.

theirs ; his poems are short, containing from three to ten verses only ; but his descriptions of the vicissitudes of fortune have not been outdone. He belonged to a highly respectable Turkish family ; the two brothers, Şul and Fayruz were Turkish princes of Jurjān, who had adopted the Magian religion, and become quite like Persians. When Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab came to Jurjān, they obtained from him their amnesty, and Şul having made to him profession of Islamism, remained constantly with him till they both fell in the battle of al-'Aqr.<sup>1</sup> Abu 'Umara Muḥammad Ibn Şul was one of the principal (Abbasid) missionaries<sup>2</sup> ; he was killed along with Muqātil Ibn Ḥakīm al-'Akkī<sup>3</sup> and some others, by 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī al-'Abbāsī, uncle to the Khalīfs Saifāh and al-Manşūr, when he revolted against his nephew<sup>4</sup>. Ibrāhīm and his brother 'Abd Allāh became adherents to (the vizir) al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, surnamed Dhu 'l-Riyāsatayn.<sup>5</sup> Ibrāhīm was then

1 Some particulars about the battle of al-'Aqr will be found in the Life of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab.

2 During the first four centuries of Islamism, every family which pretended to the throne employed agents or missionaries to second their views; those men were sent to different provinces of the empire, where they established secret clubs, or lodges, the members of which had to pass through different degrees of initiation; each club was under a president, who received his orders from the provincial missionary, who was himself under the orders of the grandmaster, Da'ūd-Durāt. The family of 'Alī, the Abbasides, the Edrisites, and the Fātimites always kept up their missionary establishments, even when in the height of their power. (See Ibn al-Aṭṭār and Ibn Khaldūn, passim.) M. de Sacy has given a most interesting account of the Qarāmīta missions, which were established for the purpose of overturning the Abbasides, and destroying all religions whatsoever. (See Exposé de la Religion des Druses, t. I. Introduction.)

3 Muqātil, one of the most active Abbaside missionaries, was then governor of Ḥarrān, which city was taken by 'Abd Allāh after a siege of forty days. His son Muḥammad Ibn Muqātil, was foster-brother to the Khalīf ar-Raṣṣīd, who appointed him governor of Ifriqiya in A.H. 181. (Uyūn al-Akḥbār, MS. No. 736, fol. 137.—Ibn al-'Abbār's al-Ḥullat al-Siyara, f. 13 MS. belonging to the Asiatic Society of Paris.)

4 See Abulfedae Annales, t. II, p. 9.

5 Dhu 'l-Riyāsatayn, the possessor of the two authorities, namely, the civil and the military. (جمع بين السيف والقلم) surnam: of honour given to the vizir al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl. (See his Life in this work.) This title became afterwards very common, particularly in Spain.

employed in the provinces, as agent for the Sultān, and filled successively different places in the government offices, till he died ; he was then director of the demesne and gratuity office<sup>1</sup> at-Sarra-man-ra'a: his death took place in the middle of Sha'bān, A. H. 243 (December, A. D. 857). The poet Di'bīl al-Khuḏā'ī said of him : "If Ibrāhīm had sought to make out his livelihood by his poetical talents, he would have (gained all and) left us nothing !" I read the collection of his poems and made the following extracts from it ; but I suspect the first not to be his, as I found it also in the poetical works of Muslim Ibn al-Walīd al-Anṣārī :

"Let not the longing of your soul for family and home prevent your enjoying an easy life in comfort : in every country where you choose to dwell, you will find a family and (friendly) neighbours in place of those you left behind."

The following verses are by al-Ṣulī ; and it is said that if they be frequently repeated by a person under sudden misfortune, God will deliver him from it :

"A man meets with a disaster he cannot avert, and from which God alone can deliver him. But often, when the evil is complete, with rings (and iron meshes) strongly riven,<sup>2</sup> it passes away while he thinks that nothing can dispel it."

By the same :

"The fittest sharer in your joy is he who has been partner<sup>3</sup> in your sorrow : when generous (travellers) repose in the plain,

1 The government was then in possession of a great number of demesnes, mostly in the conquered provinces, and which were usually farmed out (their Arabic name is Ḍiā'a, farms). From the passage of Ibn al-Jarrāh cited by Ibn al-Khalīkān, I am induced to believe that the income of these lands was divided, as a gratuitous donation among the persons employed by government. We find very often the Jund, or paid troops, receiving gratuities of free gifts from the Ḳhalīfs and the governors of provinces; it is probable that those farm rents were employed for the purpose.

2 This metaphor is taken from the large and wide coats of mail which were so highly prized and so loudly celebrated by the ante-Islamic poets: as a coat of mail cover the body of the warrior, so misfortunes surround the wretched on every side.

3 The verb واسى is employed here for أسى, which takes its signification from the word أسوه (sharer). (See al-Tabrizi's commentary on the Ḥamāsa, page 696.

they think of those who kept them company in the rugged stations (left behind). "

The next verses are said to have been written by him to Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, vizīr to al-Mu'taṣim :

"When Fortune treated me as a brother, you were also my brother ; but when she rejected me, you became my rancorous foe. I once blamed Fortune for her rigour towards you, but now I blame her (for the treatment I experienced) from you I counted you (as a protector) against misfortunes, and behold me now imploring your mercy ! "

By the same :

"Thou wast dear to me as the apple of my eye ; for thee (alone) my eyes shed their tears. Die now who may, since thou art gone ! Thou wast my only care."

Abū Tammām cites in his Humāyah<sup>1</sup>, in the chapter of amatory poetry, the following verses by al-Ṣulī :

"I am told that Layla has sent an intercessor to implore my favour ; why is not Layla herself that intercessor ? Does there then exist one whom I honour more than Layla ? (find such and challenge glory !)<sup>2</sup> or am I then a man that will not obey her ?"

This poet has written a great number of charming pieces (which I cannot cite here, as) brevity suits best such an abridgement as this.] We shall mention his nephew Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā al-Ṣulī among the Muḥammads. Ibrāhīm al-Ṣulī died the 15th Shu'abān, A. H. 243 (December, A. D. 857)* at Sarra-man-rāa.

For further reference, see Ansāb, f. 357 b.—Ed.

11. NIFĀWAYH

Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Urfah Ibn Sulaymān Ibn al-Mughayrah Ibn Ḥabīb Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah al-Azdī, surnamed Nifāwayh, the grammarian, native of Wāsiṭ, was a man of learning and talent and author of some esteemed works on general literature. He was born at Wāsiṭ, A. H. 244 A. D. 858), though some say A. H. 250; he dwelt at Baḡhdād where he died on Wednesday, 6th Ṣafar, about an hour after sunrise, A. H. 323 (A. D. 935)*; others say, however, that he and Ibn Mujāhid al-Muqri<sup>1</sup> died at Baḡhdād in the year 324: he was buried the next day at the gate of Kūfah. Ibn Khālawayh remarks that Niṣṭawayh was the only man among the learned who was named Ibrāhīm and surnamed Abn 'Abd Allāh. The following specimen of his poetry is quoted by Abn 'Alī al-Qālī in his Kitāb al-'Anālī.

<sup>1</sup> See Freytag's Hamāsa, p. 540, with the Commentary of al-Tabrizī.

<sup>2</sup> This reminds us of Virgil's "Die quibus in terris, et eris mihi magnus Apollo."

*7 December.—Ed.

"My heart (fixed) on thee, is more tender than thy cheeks;<sup>2</sup> my strength less than the power of thine eyes!<sup>3</sup> Why wilt thou not pity him whose soul is unjustly tortured, and whom love inclineth towards thee with affection?"

1 Abu Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Musā Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn Mujāhid al-Muqri, teacher of the right reading of the Qur'ān, and first man in 'Irāq in that capacity was born in Baḡhdād A. H. 245 (A. D. 859). He read the whole Qur'ān over, ختمه, twenty times, under the tuition of 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Abdās; his other masters were Qunbul and 'Abd Allāh Ibn Salāmah. The celebrated grammarian Ṭha'lab says: "None in our time know the Book of God (the Qur'ān) better than Ibn Mujāhid." Ibn al-Aḥzam relates that, on going to Baḡhdād, he found Ibn Mujāhid's course of lectures followed by nearly three hundred eminent men مصدر; and 'Alī Ibn 'Umar al-Ghazzi states that Ibn Mujāhid had forty-four assistant teachers at his course له في

حلقته أربعته وأربعون خليفته يأخذون على الناس. He used to say, whoever reads the Qur'ān in the manner taught by Abu 'Amr and follows the doctrines of the sect of al-Shāfi'i is in the right way of salvation. Ibn Mujāhid was also an elegant and accomplished scholar, and taught from memory the poems of Ibn al-Mu'tazz; he died A. H. 324 (A. D. 936) (Ṭabaqat al-Shāfi'i-in).—The persons whose names are mentioned in the preceding passages are spoken of by Ibn Khālikān; so further observations are postponed.

2 The Arabic poets say of a fair lady, that the petal of a rose would hurt her cheek, and that a glance from her lover's eye makes it bleed; that is blush.

3 To please Arabian taste, adies' eyes should be languishing and tender but langour and tenderness are nearly synonymous with feebleness, the Arabic equivalent of which is generally made use of in this case. Some poets go farther and talk of their being vanquished by sickly eyes.

*14 January.—Ed.

The following epigram was made on him by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Zayd Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn, native of Wasīṭ, a celebrated metaphysician, and author of the Imāma and a treatise on the unattainable excellence of the style in which the Qur'ān is written; etc.

"He that likes not the sight of a reprobate should avoid meeting Nifṭawayh! May God burn him with one-half of his name,<sup>1</sup> and cause him to be denounced with the other."

(The author of this charade) Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad died A. H. 307 (A. D. 919) or 306. *['Abd al-'Azīz Ibn al-Faḍl relates this anecdote: "Ibn Surayj Ibn Daw'ud al-Ẓāhirī, and Nifṭawayh went forth to a feast, whither they were invited: now the way lead them to a narrow passage and each of them wished his companions to pass before himself so Ibn Surayj said: 'A strait road begetteth evil manners.' ('Yea!') said Ibn Daw'ud, 'but it teacheth the true worth of men'; to this Nifṭawayh rejoined: 'When friendship is solid, ceremony is done away'."] Nifṭawayh is sometimes pronounced, but not so correctly, Nafṭawayh; Abū Maṣṣār al-Ḥa'ālībī says, towards the beginning of his work, the Laṭā'if-al-Ma'ārif, that he received this name for his ugliness and dark complexion, he being likened to the substance called nift (naphtha or bitumen): this name was given him in imitation of that of Sībawayh (the famous grammarian), whose son he was called on account of his grammatical knowledge, and of his following the system, and teaching the work of that writer.

We shall treat of Nifṭawayh and the other names of this form in our life of Sībawayh, whose name is 'Amr: consult that article.

12. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-ZAJJĀJ

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Sarī Ibn Sahl al-Zajjāj, the grammarian, was a man of solid information on <sup>1</sup> The first half of his name is nift (naphtha or bitumen): the other half is wayh (woe)!

*[ ] From "'Abd al-'Aziz" to "done away" not in the autograph.—Ed.

philological and religious subjects; he published the following works: Treatise on the figurative expressions of the Qur'an; Book of Dictates;<sup>1</sup> Extracts from his complete Treatise on Logic, with a commentary by himself;<sup>2</sup> different treatises on etymology, prosody, versification, the Muslim sects, the nature of man, and of the horse; an abridgement of grammar; a work on the relation between the first and fourth forms of Arabic verbs; Treatise on nouns which are either of the first or second declension; explanation of the Arabic verses cited as examples by Sibawayh in his grammar; Book of Anecdotes; Treatise on the influence of the constellations upon the weather,<sup>3</sup> etc. Al-Mubarrad and Tha'ālab gave him lessons in philology: he was originally a glassgrinder, and was, therefore, named al-Zajjāj (the glassman), even after he had quitted his trade to study philology. The vizīr 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb' honoured him with his intimacy, and al-Qāsim, son of 'Ubayd Allāh, had him for master in belles letters; and when al-Qāsim was appointed vizir, al-Zajjāj gained considerable sums through his influence. * [The shaykh Abn 'Alī 'l-Fārisi, the grammarian, relates the following anecdote: "I and my master, al-Zajjāj, went to visit the vizīr al-Qāsim; we had just entered when a eunuch came up, and whispered to him some secret information, on which the

1 Dictates, إمالي; consult M. de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, p. 137, and Flügel's Hajji Khalifah, t. 1, p. 427.

2 It must be observed that many professors taught from works written by themselves, and not published till later sometimes even not till after the death of the author. The extracts here mentioned were probably those portions of al-Zajjāj's treatise which he had explained to his scholars. This seems to be the work mentioned under the title of جامع المنطق in Hajji Khalifah's Bibliographical Dictionary.

3 See Pocock's Specimen Hist. Arabum, p. 168. Hajji Khalifah remarks that a considerable number of works has been written on this subject.

4 'Ubayd Allāh, vizīr to the khalīf al-Mu'taḍid, and an able statesman, died A. H. 288 (A. D. 901). His son al-Qāsim was vizīr to the khalīf al-Mu'taḍid, and his successor al-Muktafi; he died in the reign of the latter. He was equally conspicuous for his talents and for his skill as a politician. (MS. No. 895, f. 236).

* [ ] From "The shaykh" to "vizīr's case" on page 78 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

vizīr, who appeared highly pleased, rose and withdrew, but came back almost immediately, with marks of great dissatisfaction in his countenance. The shaykh who was on familiar terms with him, having asked what was the matter, received from him this answer: 'There came here occasionally a fair slave belonging to one of our (public) singing women, who had refused to sell her to me though I offered to purchase her: some person, however, advised the mistress to make me a present of the slave, in hopes of my giving in return double the value. Just as you came in, the eunuch informed me of the circumstance, and I went out immediately to converse with her, but found her unwell: such was the cause of the dissatisfaction you remarked in me.' On this, our shaykh took the inkstand placed before the vizīr, and wrote these lines:

1 "Eques impetuusus, cum hastā suā promptus ad confossionem in tenebris, praedam suam sanguine, inficere voluit; sed cum prohibuit illa, cum sanguine, a sanguine suo."<sup>2</sup>

We shall speak again of these two verses in the life of Barān, daughter to al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl; the story is there related in a different manner, as if this circumstance had happened to her with al-Māmūn: it is hard to say which relation is the true one, but that concerning al-Māmūn was perhaps the source whence al-Zajjāj took the verses which he applied to the vizīr's case.] This grammarian died at Baghdād, on Friday,† 19th of the Second Jumādā, A. H. 310 (October, A. D. 922);‡ according to others, his death took place in A. H. 311 or 316: having then passed his eightieth year. It was after him that Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-

---

1 There are certain passages in this work which cannot, for obvious reasons, be given in English: this for example.

<sup>2</sup>In English it means cavellier, going with his lancet, capable of striking its target in darkness, intended to bleed his prey but abstained seeing blood already flowing.—Ed.

†In the year 311 and 316 the day and date may tally. In 310 Friday was on 16 of Second Jumādā.

‡In the year 310 it was 14 October; in 311 it was 3 October 923 and in 316 it was 8 August, 928.—Ed.

Rahmān, author of the Jumal fi 'l-Nahw, was called al-Zajjāi, having been one of his pupils, as will be mentioned in his life; Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī was another of his pupils.

13. AL-IFLĪLĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Zakariyā Ibn Mufarrij* Ibn Yahyā Ibn Ziyād Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khalid Ibn Sa'd Ibn Abī Waqqāṣ al-Qurayshī (descended from the tribe of Quraysh) al-Zahrī,<sup>1</sup> 'generally known by the name of al-'Ifllī, was a native of Cordova and a first-rate grammarian and philologist; he possessed also a perfect acquaintance with the explanations which have been given of those (obscure) ideas which are met with in (ancient) poetry; he wrote a good and well-known commentary on the poetical works of al-Mutanabbī, and he taught from memory the Book of Dictates, by Abū 'Alī 'l-Qālī, which work he had learned from Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Zubaydī. As a teacher of belles letters he held an eminent rank in Spain, where he also became vizīr to al-Muktafi Billāh.<sup>2</sup> He knew by heart the poetry (of the ancient Arabs) and could relate their history and the traditional accounts of their combats; his memory was also furnished with a considerable stock of poetry composed by his own countrymen. He was most particularly exact in his choice of words; his tongue was veracious, his private conduct good, and his heart pure. Among a number of works which he studied

1 Zahrī means belonging to Zahrā, or Medinat al-Zahrā, a palace and town founded by the Moorish prince 'Abd al-Rahmān, in the year 324 (A. D. 936), at three leagues from Cordova. The Arabic historians speak in the highest terms of the magnificence of this new city, of which not a single trace now remains.

2 The MSS. of Ibn Khallikān's work agree in the orthography of the name al-Muktafi-Billāh; but Casiri, in his Bibliotheca Arabica, t. II, p. 207 Conde and Ibn al-Abbār in his al-Hullat al-Siyara write it al-Mustakfi-Billoh, which title was assumed by Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān on his accession to the throne of Cordova A. H. 415 (A. D. 1024).

* M. de Slane reads "Mufrij".-- Ed.

may be reckoned the Ḥarīb al-Muṣannaf, the al-ʿAlfīz,<sup>1</sup> etc. His birth took place in the month of Shawwāl, 352 (A. D. 963), and his death happened towards the end of the eleventh hour, on Saturday* 13th Dhu 'l-Qa'adah, 441 (April, A. D. 1050)†: he was buried on Sunday, late in the afternoon, in the court of a ruined mosque near the gate of 'Āmir at Cordova. al-ʿIfīlī signifies a native of al-ʿIfīl, a village in Syria, from which his family originally came.

In the autograph the notice of al-ʿIfīlī is written on the margin and so a portion of it is not legible and it is hard to agree with this opinion.—Ed.

14. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-ṢĀBĪʿ

Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Hilāl Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Zahraun Ibn Ḥabbun al-Ḥarrānī<sup>2</sup> al-Ṣabīʿī,<sup>3</sup> author of the celebrated epistles<sup>4</sup> and of some charming poetry, was clerk of the Baghdād chancery office,<sup>5</sup>

1 Hājji Khalifah says, in his Bibliographical Dictionary, that the former of these works is by 'Abu 'Amr al-Shaybānī, and that al-Aṣma'ī Ibn al-'Arabi, and Tha'lab, have each written a work called al-ʿAlfāz (vocabulary).

2 Al-Ḥarrānī means native of Ḥarrān in Mesopotamia, a city formerly inhabited by the Sabeans, and the chief seat of their religion; it was in ruins when Abu 'l-Fida wrote his Geography.

3 Al-Ṣabīʿī (the Sabeans); see the Bibliothèque Orientale. SABI; Sale's Qur'ān Introduction, sect. I; and Prideaux's Connexion, vol. I, p. 248; edition of 1820.

4 The author of the Kitāb al-Fehrist (Arabic MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 874, fol. 182) mentions two collections of epistles written by al-Ṣabīʿī, one entitled Correspondence with the Sharīf ar-Raḍī; the other: Collection of Epistles; neither of which works I have met with.

5 In the Chancery-office of the khalīfs were drawn up the diplomas, letters patent and of provision, political correspondence, etc.: as the style of those writings was, and has always been, elaborately elegant, the clerks of this office were necessarily chosen among men of talent and instruction.

*M. de Slane has erroneously rendered سبت by Sunday.—Ed.

†7 April.—Ed.

in which he acted as secretary to the khalif<sup>1</sup> and to Izz al-Dawlah Bakhtyār, of the family of Buwayh, the Daylamite. In the year 349 (A. D. 960) he was appointed president of the board of correspondence,<sup>2</sup> and incurred the hatred of Āḍad al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, in consequence of having addressed to that prince some letters hurtful to his feelings. When Izz al-Dawlah was slain<sup>3</sup> Āḍad al-Dawlah took possession of Baghdād, and put Abū Ishāq in prison, this happened in the year 367 (April, A. D. 978). His intention was to have had Abū Ishāq trodden to death by elephants, but (a respite was granted him) through the intercession of his friends, and he finally recovered his liberty in 371 (A. D. 981); Āḍad al-Dawlah having previously required of him to write a history of the Daylamite dynasty. In consequence of this order Abū Ishāq composed his work entitled al-Tāji (the Imperial) but (could not regain the favour of Āḍad al-Dawlah), who had learned that a friend of Abū Ishāq's on going to see him, found him busily engaged in composing notes and making rough and fair copies (of some work, and that this friend) having asked him what he was doing, received this answer: "I am writing falsehoods and putting lies together." This story stirred up the then appeased anger of Āḍad al-Dawlah, and excited his hatred afresh: so that, during his life-time, Abū Ishāq continued in disgrace.

Abū Ishāq al-Sābi'i was very strict in the observance of his religion, and had refused to turn Muslim, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations of Izz al-Dawlah; he kept the fast of Ramaḍān the same as the Muslims; he also knew the Qur'ān by 1 This khalif, whose name Ibn Khallikān seems unwilling to mention was al-Muṭi' Lillāh, the 23rd of the Abbāside dynasty. He was a weak prince completely governed by Mu'izz al-Dawlah, and 'Izz al-Dawlah, son of Mu'izz.

2 President of the Board of Correspondence, or Secretary of State, under the Abbāsides; his duty was to read over and correct official letters, after which he sealed them with a sort of red clay kneaded with water, on which he stamped the device of the khalif. See Von Hammer's work, entitled Ueber die Länder-verwaltung unter dem Khalifat; where will be found, in a small compass, much important information concerning the organisation of the Muslim empire.

3 See Abulfedae Annales, t. II, p. 535, and the life of Bakhtyār: in this work.

heart perfectly well, and quoted it in his epistles. He had a black slave called Yumn, to whom he was much attached, and on whom he made some verses remarkable for their originality of thought : the following, for instance, which are cited along with others of his by al-Tha'ālibī, in his Kitāb al-Ġhilmān :

"The dark-skinned Yumn said to one whose colour equalled the whiteness of the eye<sup>1</sup> : 'Why should your face boast its clear complexion ? Do you think that, by so clear a tint, it gains additional merit ? Were a mole of my colour on that face, it would adorn it<sup>2</sup>; but one of your colour on my cheek would disfigure me.' "

In this last verse is an allusion to the following lines, from a piece of verse written by Ibn al-Ramī on a black slave girl :

"One advantage of a dark complexion is (and truth can never be concealed)<sup>3</sup>—that a spot of deeper shade does not misbecome it ; though a white speck on a fair skin is considered as a blemish."

In these well-known verses, the poet has attained to perfection<sup>4</sup>

1 The expression خائنته العين , deceiving eyes, occurs in the Qur'ān sur. XL, verse 20 ; this induces me to suppose that the word الخائن, in the verse cited by Ibn Khallikān, is employed to denote the eye alone, without suggesting the idea of any quality whatsoever. Simple adjective, serving as nouns, are met with in many languages, but this is more particularly the case in Arabic. Though not completely sure of the meaning of this word I am nevertheless inclined to think that I have expressed the idea of the poet.

2 Black moles on the face were and are considered by the Muslims as real beauty spots.

3 This singularly-placed parenthesis signifies literally : and Truth possesses a ladder and a hole : a strange expression, imitated from the Qur'ān, sur. VI, v. 35, which Sale renders thus : "If their aversion (to thy admonitions) be grievous unto thee, if thou can'st, seek out a den (whereby thou mayest penetrate) into (the inmost parts) of the earth, or a ladder (by which thou mayest ascend) unto heaven," etc. From this the poet's meaning appears to be : Truth must make its way ; it can mount to heaven and penetrate into the depths of the earth.

4 These verses are, however, by no means remarkable for their style in the original Arabic ; their sense has been just given ; from which it will probably be inferred that our author did not possess a very correct taste or judgment ; though it must be recollected that his taste was precisely that of the epoch in which he lived.

Al-Tha'libi gives also the following verses composed by Abn Ishāq on his slave :

"Your face is so (handsome) that my hand seems to have sketched its outline,<sup>1</sup> but your words (are false and) have fatigued my hopes. In that (countenance) is seen an image of the full moon, over which night has, however, cast a tint of her darkness. Black misbecomes you not ; nay, by it you are increased in beauty ; black is the only colour princes wear. Were you not mine I should purchase you with all my wealth ! Did I not possess you, I should give my life to obtain you."

The prose and verse of Abn Ishāq contain every species of beauty : he died at Baghḍād on Monday (or Thursday according to others) 12 Shawwāl, A. H. 384 (November, A. D. 994),* at the age of 71 years. Abu 'i-Faraj Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Warrāq better known by the name of Ibn Abī Yāqūb al-Nadīm al-Baghḍādī, says, in his Kitāb al-Fihrist,<sup>2</sup> that Abn Ishāq al-Sabī'i was born some time after the year 320 (A. D. 932), and died before 380 ; he was buried in the cemetery of Baghḍād called Shuntzi, and a well-known elegy, the rhyme of which is in D, was written on his death by the Sharīf al-Raḍī ; it begins thus :

"Hast thou seen whom they bore aloft on the bier ? Hast thou seen how the light of our assemblies is extinguished ?"

The public blamed al-Raḍī for this poem, because he, who was a sharīf (descendant from Muḥammad) had lamented the death of a Sabean, but he replied : "It was his merit alone the loss of which I lamented." The word Sabī'i (Sabean) is written with a final hamza ; but many different derivations are given of it ; some say it comes from Ṣābi'i son of Maṭṭṣhalah (Methuselah), son of Idrīs (Enoch), who was of the ancient orthodox religion ;<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This verse is quite sufficient to prove that its author was not a Muslim for representations of the human figure are expressly forbidden by Muḥammad ; see the Mishkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, vol. II, p. 368.

<sup>2</sup> See Kitāb al-Fihrist, MS. No. 874, fol. 182. This work was composed A. H. 337.

<sup>3</sup> The ancient orthodoxy according to the Muslim doctors, is the religion professed by all the patriarchs and prophets anterior to Muḥammad ; who himself taught that Islamism was only a continuation or revival of the old and true religion.

*19 November was Monday, 12 Shawwāl.

others derive it from 'al-Sābi'i, son of Mārī, a contemporary of Abraham ; others again say that the word Sābi'i was used by the 'Arabs of the Desert to denote a person who abandoned the religion of his people, and for this reason it was that Muḥammad was called Sābi'i by the tribe of Quraysh : but God knows (that) best !

15. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-ḤUṢRĪ

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī Ibn Tamīm, surnamed al-Ḥuṣrī, native of Qayrawān and a celebrated poet, composed the following works : a diwān, or volume of poetry ; the Zahr al-'Ādāb (Flower of Instruction and Fruit of Hearts), in three volumes, filled with singularities of every sort ; the kitāb al-Maṣūn (the Secret or Mystery of hidden Love) in one volume, containing amusing and instructive anecdotes. Ibn Rashīq mentions him in his Annūdhaj, and gives, along with some particulars of his life a quantity of his poetry. "The youth of Qayrawān adds this writer, gathered to his house and took his lessons ; they looked on him as their chief, and felt for him deep respect ; his works got into circulation and gifts poured in upon him from all sides. He then cites as his these verses.

"I love you with a love which surpasses understanding, and which is far beyond the reach of my power of description. The utmost of my knowledge thereof is, that I feel my inability to acquire a just knowledge of it."

Ibn Bassām, author of the Dha'irah or Treasury ; containing beauties (from the writings) of the natives of the (Spanish) peninsula<sup>1</sup> relates a story in which he gives two verses of al-Ḥuṣrī's :

---

<sup>1</sup> By the word Jazīrah (isle) the Arabic writers designate both Mesopotamia and Spain : Hājji Khalifah, who gives the title of Ibn Bassām's work in his Biographical Dictionary, says positively that the Jazīrah here mentioned is Andalus, or Spain.

"The lām of that 'idhār' has caused my heart to drink of death. It is dark as night, upon (a skin) clear as day."

Al-Ḥuṣrī was son of a maternal aunt to Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Ḥuṣrī, the life of which poet we shall give in the letter 'Ayn.

Abu Ishāq died at Qayrawān, A. H. 413 (A. D. 1022); Ibn Bassām says, however, in the Dhaḥḥirah: "I learned that his death took place in 453" (A. D. 1061); but the first is the correct date, though the Qaḍī al-Rashīd Ibn Zubayr states in his Kitāb al-Janān, vol. I, in the life of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Fakīk,<sup>2</sup> that the above-mentioned al-Ḥuṣrī composed his work the Zahr al-Ādāb, A. H. 450, which indicates that Ibn Bassām was correct in what he said<sup>3</sup>; God, however, knows that best.—Al-Ḥuṣrī means a maker or seller of mats (ḥuṣūr). Qayrawān is a city in Ifriqiyah (Africa propria), and was founded by 'Uqbah Ibn 'Āmir al-Ṣaḥābī (companion of Muḥammad): Ifriqiyah was so

1 What is meant by the lām of the 'idhār' is explained in the Introduction to this volume, to which the reader is referred; my reason for not translating this expression is there given. See also my article in the Journal Asiatique of Paris for February 1839, page 174.

2 In the Kharidah of 'Imād al-Dīn (Arabic manuscript of the Bib. du Roi, fonds Asselin, No. 363, fol. 7, verso) are given some fragments of poetry by al-Fakīk, who is there said to have had great reputation as a satirist, and to have died A. H. 500 (1106-7).

3 It may be easily perceived that the passage containing the statement from the Kitāb al-Janān has been inserted later; indeed it is not to be found in some MSS.*

4 Abu 'l-Fida in his Annals, Ibn Khāldūn in his Universal History, and other writers name the founder of Qayrawān 'Uqbah Ibn Nāfi; but 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Qurayshī, historian of the conquest of Africa, calls him 'Uqbah Ibn 'Āmir (see Arabic MSS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 824, f. 2), and so also Ibn Khāllikān writes his name. The following passage from the Hullat al-Siyara (fol. 138), militates strongly however against Ibn Khāllikān: "'Uqbah Ibn Nāfi al-Fihri was sent on an expedition by Mu'āwīyah Ibn Abī Sufyān, A. H. 43 (A. D. 663), and entered Ifriqya at the head of ten thousand Muslims. He founded the city of Qayrawān, and left after him an honourable reputation; he was an excellent governor, and God granted all for which he prayed. He was deprived of his place, and reinstated, A. H. 62 (A. D. 681-2). In the year 93 (A. D. 711-2) he and some troops which accompanied him were slain by the Berbers at Tahāja, where his tomb is revered to this day." The author then enters into the details of his death.

* The passage is written on the margin of the autograph.—Ed.

called after Ifriqūs or Ifriqīn Ibn Qays Ibn Sayfī, the Ḥimyarite, who subdued that country. Some say that Jarjir governed it at that time, and that it was then the Berbers got their name ; he having said to them : "How great is your gibberish (berbera)!" but God knows it best.<sup>1</sup> Al-Qayrawān, when a common noun, signifies a caravan ; it is a Persian word introduced into the Arabic language : it is related that a caravan had halted on the spot where the city was afterwards built, wherefore it was called Qayrawān. This word means also a troop of soldiers ; Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' the philologist, says, on some competent authority, that Qayrawān signifies a troop, and qayrawān a caravan.

1 Ibn Khaldūn, in his Universal History, gives a similar relation with some details too curious to be omitted here. He says : "To Abrahah Dhu 'l-Manār succeeded his son Ifriquṣh ; Ibn al-Kalbi says that Ifriquṣh was the son of Qays Ibn Ṣayfī and brother to al-Ḥārith al-Raysh, and that it was he who built, in the Gharb (or Maḡhreb), the city named after him Ifriqiyah, to which (city) he sent the Berbers from the land of Cana'an, on his passing close by them when Josua had defeated them in Syria and slain (a number of) them. (Ifriquṣh) then took charge of the few (who remained) and marched them before him to Ifriqiyah, where he settled them. It is said that Jirjis was king of that country, and it was he (Ifriquṣh) who gave "the Berbers this name ; for, on conquering Maḡhreb he heard their strange language, and said : "How great is your gibberish (Berbera) !" for which reason they were called Berbers ; this word, in the language of the desert Arabs, signifies mingled and unintelligible noises ; whence the roaring of the lion is called berbera. When (Ifriquṣh) returned from his expedition to Maḡhreb, he left there Ṣunhāja and Quṣāma (branches) of the tribe of Himyar, and these are still there, but they are not of the same stock as the Berbers.—Thus say al-Ṭabari, al-Jurjāni, al-Mas'adi, Ibn al-Kalbi, al-Bayhaqī, and all the genealogists."

This statement requires some observations : the Jirjis mentioned by Ibn Khaldūn and Ibn Khallikān seems to have been considered by them the same person as the prefect Gregorus, whose history is related in the 51st chapter of Gibbon's Decline and Fall ; for Ibn Khaldūn, in another part of his work, says positively that he commanded in Maḡhreb when 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Sarḥ conquered that country in the khilāfat of 'Uṭhmān. The dubitative expression, it is said made use of here by both authors, proves that they had great doubts of Jirjis being a contemporary with Ifriquṣh. But the most remarkable circumstance spoken of by Ibn Khaldūn is that of Josua's destroying the Berbers in the land of Can'an, which coincides singularly with what Procopius says in his history of the Vandal War, part II, 10, p. 449 ; edition of Bonn. We find there also the Gergesaei* the Gergashites of the Bible, JOSHUA, XXIV, 11,

(Continued on page 87)

* M. de Slane has given the Greek pronunciation also of the name.—Ed.

16. ABŪ ISHĀQ IBN KHAFĀJAH AL-ANDALUSĪ

Abn Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khafājah al-Andalusī (native of Spain); a poet praised by Ibn Bassām in his Dhakhīrah: "He lived," says this author, "in the east of Spain and never essayed to court the favour of the petty kings who ruled that country, notwithstanding the eagerness which they shewed to patronise literary men." He composed a volume of excellent poetry,<sup>1</sup> from which are taken the following original and pleasing verses on an evening party :

"Oft in social evenings has ebriety borne me to the ground and made my couch feel soft and even. The acacia clothed me with its shade, whilst the branches waved and the doves held (mutual) converse. The sun sunk feebly towards west, the thunder rose (from the horizon) and the clouds breathed (coolness)."

The following fine thought is by the same author :

"What means that 'idhār'<sup>2</sup> which seems to have traced

---

(Continued from page 86)

which word has a most suspicious likeness to the Girgis of our Arabic writers. Could Ibn al-Kalbī, whose authority is cited by Ibn Khaldūn in this passage, have read an incorrect Arabic translation of Procopius ?

The preceding citation from Ibn Khaldūn is taken from the Arabic text of his History of the 'Arabs, p. 48; this work, which is now (1839) in a forward state of publication at Paris, has been critically studied and translated by the learned editor, the Abate Arri of Turin, to whose friendship I am indebted for the communication of the foregoing passage.

For further particulars I refer the reader to the note 3, page 99 of that gentleman's Italian translation.

1 The poetical works of Ibn Khafājah al-Andalusī are still extant: see No. 418, fonds Asselin in the Bib. du Roi.

2 The meaning of the word 'idhār' is given in the Introduction.

with the shades of night a miḥrāb on the qiblah of thy face ?<sup>1</sup>
 Therein I see thy youth (which before was not submissive), sink prostrate, lowly bent and turning (from its former state).<sup>2</sup>
 I well knew by the lightning-flash of thy (brilliant) teeth, that a cloud would soon be cast upon thy cheeks."<sup>3</sup>

By the same :

"Thy youth hath deserted the mansion in which it dwelt, and I stopped to weep over the time-worn vestiges of its former abode. In that face the 'idhār' shows like the trench which surrounds (the Arab's tent), and the moles on thy face represent the (blackened) stones of the rustic hearth."<sup>4</sup>

A poet of later times, named al-'Imād* Abū Ālī Ibn 'Abd al-Nūr<sup>5</sup> al-Laznī, who inhabited Mosul and who shall be mentioned

1 In this piece the poet fancies a resemblance between the face of the person whom he addresses and a mosque in which a true believer worships. The Qiblah is that part of the horizon, or of a mosque, which is in the direction of the temple of Mekkah towards which the Muslims turn when they say their prayers. The Miḥrāb is a niche or recess in the wall of the mosque, and serves to point out the Qiblah. Far fetched ideas like his are frequently met within the writings of the Moorish poets.

2 This verse is a mere play upon words; in place of saying simply, thy youth is gone, this fine writer represents it as prostrated to the ground like a man who prays; so it is now humbled, though before full of haughtiness; and it has quitted its former state, like a repenting sinner who abandons his former ways.

3 By all the poets of the later school, handsome teeth are said to flash lightning; but lightning is accompanied by clouds, so here the cheeks are shaded or clouded by the growth of the 'idhār'.

4 All those ideas, with the exception of the 'idhār' are borrowed from the ancient Arabic classics; that is to say, from the works of the ante-Islamite poets, which every well educated Arab learned by heart. Later Arabic poetry is often an intentional imitation of these old authors: the thoughts are generally the same, though expressed in a different manner. Such was the taste of Arab critics, who looked on the poems of the ancient Arabs as perfect models in style and ideas: whence the key to all the obscure allusions met with in the Muslim poets must be looked for in the Mu'allaqahs, the poems of 'Imra 'l-Qays, Nābiḡah, etc.

5 'Abd al-Nūr means the Servant of Light; Light is one of the ninety-nine names by which God had designated himself in the Qur'ān; see surat xxiv, verse 35, where it said: "God is the Light of the heavens and the earth."

* M. de Slane gives 'Imad-al-Dīn and al-Lazzi, see also No. 718.—Ed.

again in the life of Kamāl al-Dīn Mnsa Ibn Yūnus, has taken hold of this idea and said :

*"I took the 'idhar on the darkened cheeks of that youth for the trench (which surrounds the tent), and the moles on his face for the blackened stones of the hearth in the midst of the ruined dwelling. So I stopped to lament (his youth now passed away ; I wept as) with the eyes of 'Urwa, and sighed as if I were Ghaylān."<sup>1</sup>

This Abū Ishāq was born A. H. 450 (A. D. 1058), in the isle of Shuqr (Xucar), a dependency of Balansiya (Valencia), a city of Spain ; he died on Sunday, 25 Shawwal A. H. 533 (June, A. D. 1139).† Shuqr is a village lying between Shāṭiba (Xativa) and Valencia ; it is called an isle from its being surrounded by the waters (of the river which bears the same name). Andalus is an island<sup>2</sup> joined to the long land (or continent) which reaches to Constantinople the great ; it is called an island because the sea encompasses it on all sides except the northern ; its shape is triangular, the eastern angle being contiguous to the mountain

---

1 The Arabic poet generally begins his piece by describing the sorrow and regret he feels on arriving, after a long absence and a fatiguing journey at the station where the tribe of his mistress was last encamped, and at which he expected to find her again ; but where nothing now remains except the nearly obliterated ruins of the rustic dwellings. The poet 'Urwa died of a broken heart on hearing that his mistress had married another Ghaylān or Dhu 'l-Rumma excelled in painting the pains of love. His life is given in this work.

2 There is no word in the Arabic language for peninsula ; they make use of jazīrah, (isle), in its stead.

*According to the original it should be rendered : I took the cheek of the youth with scorpion-like locks falling on the two temples for the trench . . . —Ed.

†That should be 26 Shawwal because the author says "four days remained from the month". It means that full month of 30 days should be reckoned.—Ed.

(range) through which the way leads to Ifranja (France); did this mountain not exist, the two seas had been united. It is related that the first person who dwelt in that country after the deluge was Andalus, son of Japhet, son of Noah, from whom it took its name.

17. ABŪ ISHĀQ AL-KALBĪ AL-GHAZZĪ

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Yahyā Ibn Uthmān Ibn Muḥammad al-Kalbī (belonging to the tribe of Kulb) al-Ashhabī; or according to Ibn al-Najjār in his History of Baḥdād: Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn 'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Abd Allāh al-Ashhabī al-Kalbī al-Ghazzī (native of Gaza); this celebrated and talented poet is spoken of in these terms by Ibn 'Asākir in his history of Damascus: "He came to Damascus in the year 481 (A. D. 1088) and attended the lectures of Naṣr al-Maqdisī<sup>2</sup> the jurisconsult; he then set out for Baḥdād and fixed his dwelling in the Niẓāmiya College for many years; there he composed elegies and panegyrics on more than one professor and also on other persons; from thence he travelled to Khurāsān and made eulogiums on a number of its princes, and his poetry got into circulation there." Ibn 'Asākir then gives a number of his pieces and finishes by speaking

---

1 Al-Ashhabī means descended from al-Ashhab, who was probably one of al-Ghazzī's ancestors.

2 The shaykh Naṣr Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Naṣr al-Maqdisī (native of Bayt al-Maqdis or Jerusalem), an imām of great authority and a pillar of Islamism, was equally learned and pious; he composed the following works: the Tahdhīb, التمهيد, the Maqṣad, المقصد, the Kifī, الكافي and a commentary on the Ishāra (see Hājji Khālifah, t. I, no. 765) of Salīm al-Rāzī, etc. He studied Jurisprudence at Sūr (Tyre) under Salīm al-Rāzī for four years, and then settled at Damascus, A. H. 480, where he spent his life in the practice of great austerities and mortifications; died in the month of Maḥarram, 490 (January, A. D. 1097), and was buried at Damascus, where his tomb continued to be highly venerated (Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, Tab-al-Fuqahī).

highly of him*: the volume of his poetical works, selected by himself, contains one thousand verses, according to what he says in his preface. The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Kharīdah, and, after praising him says: "He travelled over the provinces and journeyed abroad; he was repeatedly departing and removing; he penetrated far into the regions of Khurasān and Kermān, and met with the remarkable men (of the time)."† Nāṣirī al-Dīn Mukram Ibn al-'Alā, vizīr of Kermān,<sup>1</sup> was celebrated by him in a poem rhyming in b, which contains this original idea:

"Of (civil) fortune we have borne a load above our strength;
'tis thus the fractured limb bears its bandages."

The same poem contains this pretty thought on a short night:

"It was night over whose face we hoped the 'idhār<sup>2</sup> would slowly glide, but no sooner had it traced its (dark) outline than it turned grey from the presence of morning."

The poem (from which these verses are taken) is a long one. The following is a good and well-known piece of his composition:

"'How'! said they, 'you have abandoned poetry?' 'Yes'; through compulsion, I replied; 'the source of my inducements and of my motives (to it) is sealed up'.<sup>3</sup> The dwellings (of hospitality) are deserted; no generous man now lives whose bounty may be hoped for; no fair beauty now exists deserving of love. 'Tis strange that poetry should find no purchaser, and yet be adulterated and stolen though it clog the market."

The following verses, by the same author, are remarkable for the pleasing artifice with which they are worded<sup>4</sup>:

1 The province of Kermān was at that time an independent state governed by Seljūq prince.

2 See note on lām, No. 15.

3 Literally: The door of inducements and motives is locked.

4 This artifice consists in bringing together words of different significations, but all written and pronounced nearly in the same manner: it is obvious that sense must, in such cases, be frequently sacrificed to sound.

*This is the end of the quotation from Ḥaṣṣī.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Naṣr.—Ed.

"Biting sarcasms and base submission to a worthless (guardian) are two things which render prohibition bitter (to the soul). Reason (says): Rather choose wounds from the points of pliant (lances), than court (a mistress) and with those two bitter (humiliations)."

By the same :

"The only privilege granted to this vizīr in the council-chamber is the right of wagging his beard as a sign of consent. Such a pillar of the state (wazīr) and supporting nothing is like the waterless sea of prosody."<sup>1</sup>

By the same :

"(The hearts of) men are so dried up, that if they wept, a tear would hardly flow to wet their eyes.* The hand of (the patron) whom we praise no longer sheds the dew (of liberality), and the forehead of him whom we satirize no longer grows moist (with shame)."

This author composed a number of long poems full of original ideas : and the following extract is considered by literary men as a beautiful passage and elegantly turned :

"A mark (of recognition) from you will suffice me ; the best answer to a salutation, on the morning lovers separate, is made by a rosy finger !<sup>2</sup>—(When we met again) her mantle flew off in her confusion, and the knot which secured her collar of pearls was broken during the darkness : she then smiled so as to illuminate the night, and she gathered up her scattered pearls by the light of her well ranged (teeth)."

In this last verse he alludes to the following thought, expressed by the Sharif al-Raḍī in one of his poems :

1 In the Arabic system of prosody, the different metres are called seas.

2 The word عنم, 'Anam, here translated by rosy finger, is the name of a long and reddish fruit which grows in Hījāz; the poets compare their mistress's taper fingers, when dyed with hanna, to this fruit. (See de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. II, p. 416; and Freytag's Hamāsah, p. 288.

* Arabic جفون is the plural of جفن which means eyelid.—Ed.

† M. de Slane reads it al-Rīla : for his life, see Ibn Khallikān, No. 639.—Ed.

"During that night, the lustre of her (smiling) teeth lighted up, amidst the gloom of darkness, the spot on which to impress my kisses."

A poet of Baghḍād has come near the above idea in a Mawālyā,<sup>1</sup> composed according to their usual system of either omitting the final vowels or placing them at random :

"I held Layla in my arms with a wild embrace, and said : A propitious star has risen upon my fortune. She smiled, and the hidden pearls shone forth ; the night seemed day ; and the jealous spics awoke."<sup>2</sup>

The original source of this idea is in one of the following verses composed by Abu 'l-Ṭamaḥān al-Qaynī :

"I spring from a race of which alone the men are men ! when one of its princes dies, another like him arises. So shift the stars of heaven ; when one sets, another appears, followed by others. \(The brightness of)* their glory and their faces lighted up the night, so that the artisan could string the pearls he drilled."

This last verse is said to be the most laudatory of any made in the Times of Ignorance;<sup>3</sup> it is also said to be the most lying. (The next verse after it is) :

"Wherever they were, they always had a noble chief ; wherever his squadrons went, there also went Death."

The author of these verses, Abu 'l-Ṭamaḥān Ḥanzalah† Ibn as-Sharqī<sup>4</sup> was one of the poets who lived in the Times of Ignorance—Ghazzāl was born A. H. 441 (A. D. 1049) in the town of

1 In the Arabische Verskunst by Professor Freytag, some notice is taken of the songs called Mawālyā; the derivation of this name is given by the Baron von Hammer in the Journal Asiatique for August, 1835.

2 The mistress of the Arabic poet is generally represented as closely guarded, so that lovers' meetings could only take place by stealth.

3 The Times of Ignorance: a term used by the Muslims to denote all that period of Arabic history anterior to the preaching of Muḥammad.

4 A fragment of a poem by Abu 'l-Ṭamaḥān will be found, along with his genealogy, in the Ḥamasa, p. 558.

* The translation of one verse, which repeats as the third of these verses, is omitted.—Ed.

† The name of Abu 'l-Ṭamaḥān is given differently. Al-Āmidī in his book al-Mutalaf wa'l Mu'htalaf الموتراف والمختلاف, gives another name Rabi'ah b. Kinānah b. al-Qayn b. Jasr.—Ed.

Ghazzah (Gaza) (where Hāshim, grandfather to Muḥammad, was buried); and died A. H. 524 (A. D. 1130), in Khurāsān (on the road) between Marw and Balkh; to which latter place he was carried, and there he was interred. It is related of him that he said on the approach of death: "I hope God will pardon me for three reasons: I am from the same town as al-Shāfiʿī; I am an old man, and am far from my family." May God be merciful to him and justify his hope! As it is possible this book may fall into the hands of some person living far off from our country, and who, not knowing where Gaza is situated, may desire information on that subject; I shall state that Gaza is a town* in the dependencies of Palestine and situated on the Syrian Sea (or Mediterranean) near Askalan (Ascalon); it is the first Syrian town met with on passing the frontier of Egypt, and is one of those caravan stations which the Qurʾān makes mention of in these terms: the caravan station of winter and of summer (sur. CVI, verse 2) where all the commentators agree in explaining the winter† station by the country of Yemen, and the summer station by Syria; for the Qurayshites, in their commercial expeditions, went to Syria in summer on account of the healthiness of the country in that season; and they travelled to Yemen in winter because it is a hot country to which it is impossible to go in summer. Ibn Hāshim says towards the beginning of his Sirat al-Rasūl:<sup>1</sup> "The first who established for the Quraysh the caravan stations of winter and summer was Hāshim, grandfather to the blessed Prophet;" a little farther on he writes: "Ibn Ishāq says: 'Then Hāshim, son of 'Abd Munāf, died at Gaza in the land of Palestine on a commercial expedition':"

---

1 The Sirat al-Rasūl, or History of the Prophet Muḥammad, was drawn up by 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Hāshim from documents collected by Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq: lives of both these writers are given by Ibn Khallikān. The passages here cited are to be found in the MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 629. f. 20, 21.

* Small town or village.—Ed.

† According to the autograph order should be changed: summer station precedes winter station.—Ed.

and a little farther on : "Maṭrūd Ibn Ka'ab al-Khuzā'i said in an elegy on the descendants of 'Abd Munāf"—he then gives a poem in which is this verse :

"And Hāshim (is) in a grave over which the winds sweep (the sand), in the midst of the desert between the Gazas."

On which he makes this observation : "Those skilled in etymology say that the Gazas mean here Gaza alone ; it would seem that the poet had given to each part of the town the name of the whole town, from his putting Gaza in the plural number."<sup>1</sup> This place was known from that time by the name of the Gaza of Hāshim, for his grave is there, though not apparent or known : and on passing through the town, I could obtain no information from the inhabitants respecting it. When the celebrated poet Abu Nuwās went from Baḥdād to Old Cairo with the intention of reciting to al-Khaṣīb Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamid,<sup>2</sup> president of the land-tax office at Old Cairo, a poem made by him in his praise, he inserted in it the names of the different places he stopped at on the way ; one of the verses is :

"These (women) went with the caravan towards the Gaza of Hāshim and serious business (shakār) awaited them at al-Faramā."

There are two words here which require explanation : al-Faramā (Farma) is the name of the great city which was capital of Egypt in the time of the patriarch Abraham ; and Hājir (Hagar), mother of Ismā'īl, was from Umm al-Arab (mother of the Arabs), a village in its dependencies : al-Faramā is that well-known station on the right-hand* of the traveller going from Egypt to Syria by

---

1 The Arabian commentators always endeavour to give grammatical explanations for every irregularity; we have here an example of it; the true reason of this poet's writing—Ghazzat for Ghazza was the necessity he was under of making all the verses of his poem rhyme in انت.

2 Ibn Khallikān, in different parts of his work, furnishes information about al-Khaṣīb.

* يسار means left hand.—Ed.

the shore way ; it is situated on the edge of the desert lying between Sāih<sup>1</sup> and Quṣayr (on the Red Sea) : when I saw it, it was in ruins, nothing remaining but its vestiges ; it was situated on a high hill. The Arabs are unanimous in considering Ismā'il to be their progenitor, and in believing that his mother was a native of Umm al-'Arab, the village above mentioned. The second word to be explained is shukūr, it signifies things taken to heart and causing serious reflections ; the singular is shaqr.

18. IBN QURQŪL

Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bādīs Ibn al-Qa'id al-Ḥamzī, generally known by the name of Ibn Qurqūl, author of the work called Maṭālī' 'l-Anwār (Rising of the Lights), which he composed on the plan of the Mashāriq al-Anwār by the Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ ; he was a man of talent and had studied in Spain under a number of learned professors : such is the only information I have been able to procure respecting him. He was born in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 505 (A. D. 1111) at al-Mariya (Almeria), a town in Spain, and died at Fez early on Friday evening, 6 Shawwāl 569 (May, A. D. 1174)* after having been to public prayers in the mosque. When his death drew near, he began repeating frequently and quickly the surat of the Qur'ān entitled Ikh-lāṣ<sup>2</sup> ; he then made the profession of faith thrice, and falling prostrate in adoration, was dead on touching the ground.—Al-Mariya is a large seaport city in Spain. Fez is a great city in Maghreb, near Ceuta : al-Ḥamzī means belonging to Ḥamzat

1 The canton named al-Sāih is situated near 'Abbāsa ; which city, according to Abu 'l-Fida in his Geography, lay at a day's journey to the north of Bilbais. In the Kitāb al-Sulūk by Maqrizi, and the Masālik al-Absār, we find this name written sāniḥ سَانِح in place of Sāih سَائِح.

2 The surat entitled Ikh-lāṣ (sincere resignation) is also called the Tawḥīd, or Declaration of God's Unity ; it is the one hundred and twelfth chapter of the Qur'ān, and contains only four short verses ; a tradition of Muḥammad has declared its recitation three times to be equivalent to that of the entire Qur'ān.

* 10 May.—Ed.

Āshīr, a village in North Africa lying between Bijāyah (Bugia) and Qal'ah Banī Ḥammād; so I have been informed by a number of natives of that country: 'Āshīr shall be again spoken of in the life of Zīrī Ibn Manād.<sup>1</sup>

19. THE IMĀM AḤMAD IBN ḤANBAL

The imām Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad al-Shaybānī al-Marwazī (descended from the tribe of Shaybān and native of Marw) was the son of Muḥammad Ibn Ḥanbal Ibn Hilāl Ibn Asad Ibn Idrīs Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥayyān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ans Ibn 'Auf Ibn Qisīṭ Ibn Māzin Ibn Shaybān Ibn Dhuhl Ibn Tha'labah Ibn 'Ukabah Ibn Ṣa'b Ibn 'Alī Ibn Bakr Ibn Wā'il Ibn Qāsīṭ Ibn Hīnab Ibn Afṣā<sup>2</sup> Ibn Du'ma Ibn Jadīlāh Ibn Asad Ibn Rabīah Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān; this is his correct genealogy, though some make him descend from Māzin Ibn Dhuhl Ibn Shaybān Ibn Tha'labah Ibn 'Ukabah, which however is a mistake, for it must be observed that he came from Shaybān Ibn Dhuhl and not from Dhuhl Ibn Shaybān, whose paternal uncle was the Dhuhl Ibn Tha'labah above mentioned. His mother left the city of Marw during her pregnancy, and brought him forth at Baghḍād in the month of the First Rabī' A. H. 164 (A. D. 780); but some say he was born at Marw and was a child at the breast when brought to Baghḍād. Ibn Ḥanbal was a traditionist of the first class, and composed a Musnad* or collection of authenticated traditions more copious than those any other person had till then been able to form; it is said that he knew by heart one million† of these traditions. He had been a pupil and a favourite of al-Shāfi'ī, and continued constantly with him until that imām set out for Egypt: al-Shāfi'ī in speaking of him said: "I went forth from Baghḍād

<sup>1</sup> In the life of Zīrī, the author merely refers back to what he says here; Abū 'l-Fida, in his Geographical work (see Arabic text, p. 124), mentions Āsir as a fort in the province of Bugia.

<sup>2</sup> In the manuscripts of Ibn Khallikān this name is written Aqsa but it appears from the Ansīb al-'Arab and Utḥmānī's Ṭabaqāt (No. 755, f. 46) that the right orthography is Afṣa.‡

* M. de Slane's pronunciation is Musnad.—Ed.

† Musnad contains 30,000 traditions.

‡ In the autograph and in all printed editions it is Afṣa.—Ed.

and left not behind me a more pious man or a better jurisconsult than Ibn Hanbal." In the year 220 (A. D. 835), sometime between the 20 and 30 Ramaḡān, he was required to declare that the Qur'ān was created,<sup>1</sup> but would not, and although beaten and imprisoned, persisted in his refusal. He was a handsome man of middle size, having his hair dyed of a light red colour with hinna,<sup>2</sup> and a few black hairs appearing in his (white) beard. He taught traditions to a number of eminent doctors, among whom were Muḡammad al-Bukḡarī and Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj al-Naysapūrī; and in the latter part of his life he had not his equal for learning and piety<sup>3</sup>: he died at Bagḡdād, A. H. 241 (A. D. 855), on Friday* morning at sunrise, the 12 of the First Rabi'; others say the 17, and some place his death in the Second Rabi'; he was buried in the cemetery without the Gate of Ḥarb, which is so called after Ḥarb Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a companion of the Khalif Abū Ja'far al-Manṡūr's, from whom also the street called al-Ḥarbiyah took its name. The tomb of Aḡmad Ibn Hanbal is a well-known object in that burying-ground, and is visited (by pious persons). It was estimated that the number of men present at his funeral was eight hundred thousand, and of women sixty thousand; and it is said that twenty thousand Christians, Jews, and Magians became Muslims on the day of his death. Abū 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī writes in the 46th chapter of the work in which he treats of the history of Biṡhr al-Ḥafī: 'Ibrahim al-

1 The eternity of the Qur'ān, considered as the word of God, is the orthodox Muslim doctrine.

2 The ancient Arabs dyed their hair and beard red with the leaves of the plant called hinna (lawsonia inermis); Muḡammad recommended his followers to adopt this custom, so that they might not be mistaken for Christians or Jews, who, as he says, never colour their hair. (See Mishkāt-al-Maṡ bih, t. II, p. 359 et seq.)

3 The author betrays here his partiality towards the founder of his sect, al-Ṣḡafī'i who died about forty years before Ibn Hanbal.

* Friday 30 August corresponded to 12 of Second Rabi' while the 12 of First Rabi' fell on Wednesday 31 July and the 17 fell on Monday 5 August. — Ed.

Ḥarbī<sup>1</sup> relates as follows: I saw in a dream Bishr al-Ḥafī, who seemed to come out of the Mosque of Ruṣāfa<sup>2</sup> bearing something in his sleeve which swung about, and I said: 'What hath God done with thee?' he replied: 'He hath pardoned me and honoured me.' And I said: 'What is that in thy sleeve?' he replied: 'Yesterday the soul of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal came unto us and pearls and rubies were scattered over it, and these are some I picked up.' I said: 'What were Yahya Ibn Mu'in and Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal doing?' He answered: 'They were gone to visit the Lord of all created things, and the table was laid out for them'. I said: 'Why didst thou not eat with them?' He replied: 'He (the Lord) knew that I had to abstain from eating, so he allowed me to look on his sacred face.'"<sup>3</sup> In the genealogy of Ibn Ḥanbal, Ḥayān is written with a double Ya; the names of his other ancestors are sufficiently known and common, for which reason I need not fix their orthography, which I should do however, did I not apprehend being prolix.<sup>4</sup>

1 Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Isḥāq Ibn Baḥīr al-Ḥarbī was hāfiẓ of great reputation, a learned traditionist and had studied jurisprudence under Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal; he wrote a number of works, and was equally holy in practice and precept. Died at Bagdad, A. H. 285 (A. D. 898), aged 87 years. (Yūfi'ī Muḥtasar Tarikh al-Khaṭīb, MS. belonging to the Bib. du Roi, No. 634, fol. 62.

2 Ruṣāfa is the name of a quarter of Baḥdād situated, according to Abu 'l-Fida in his Geography, on the east bank of the Tigris.

3 The Muslims are taught to believe that those dreams are true in which a holy man, a prophet, or the Divinity himself is seen; they are authorised there to by the Sunnah. See Mishkat-al-Masābiḥ. t. II, p. 338; Lane's Modern Egyptians, and a note on the life of Ibn Nubāta in the Journal Asiatique for January 1839.

4 The imperfections of the Arabic alphabet are well known; a single point omitted, added, or displaced may cause one letter to be taken for another and there are no less than sixteen of the Arabic letters which are pointed; the vowels are also omitted in the MSS.; this increases the difficulties of the reader; and authors are obliged to write out in full the spelling of the word or name which they wish to preserve from being altered by copyists.

I have seen some differences in the statement of his genealogy, but the series I give is the most exact of any I have met with. He had two sons, both men of learning; their names were Saliḥ and 'Abd Allāh; Saliḥ was qādi of Ispahān and died there at an early age in the month of Ramaḍān 266 (A. D. 880). He was born in 203 (A. D. 818); his brother 'Abd Allāh lived till the year 290 (A. D. 903), and died at the age of seventy-seven years, on Sunday 22 of the First Jumāda,* some say the Second; he was surnamed Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and it was after him that the imām Aḥmad was called Abū 'Abd Allāh (Father of 'Abd Allāh).

20. IBN SURAYJ

Abū 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Surayj, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i is spoken of in these terms by Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī in his Ṭabaqāt<sup>1</sup>: "He was one of the great Shafite doctors and Muslim imāms, and was surnamed The Bright Fire†; he filled the post of qādi at Shīrāz and surpassed in talent all al-Shāfi'i pupils even at Muzan'i himself: the catalogue of his works contains four hundred articles. He was an active defender of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and refuted its adversaries; he wrote also observations on the works of Muḥammad Ibn

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibn qādi Shuhba and Hājjī Khalīfah call this work, Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqaha (classes of jurisconsults): that is, Biographical notices of celebrated jurisconsults, classified in a particular order. It would appear from an observation made by al-'Uḥmīnī in his Ṭabaqāt (fol. 111, verso), when speaking of Abū Sa'id Muḥammad al-Naysāpuri, that in the work of Abū Ishāq of al-Shīrāzī, the lives of the doctors are arranged according to the degree of merit and learning of each individual.

*24 April.—Ed.

†In the original الباز meaning hawk, M. de Slane has read it probably النار with dot above and so rendered it as fire.—Ed.

‡The word in original is فرع which means deduced problems from the fundamental principles, profounded in the books of Muḥammad.—Ed.

al-Ḥasan al-Ḥanafī. The shāikh Abū Ḥamid al-Isfarā'īnī said of him : "In our knowledge of the plain points of jurisprudence we keep pace with Abū 'l-Abbās, but he surpasses us in the niceties of that science. He studied the law under Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Anmā'ī, and some of his pupils became the first doctors among the Muslims : through his medium al-Shāfi'ī's doctrines were spread into many countries." He had frequent discussions with Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Dā'ud al-Zāhirī, who is related to have said to him once (in the course of an argument) : "Give me time to swallow my saliva (and I will answer you) ;" to which the other replied : " You might swallow the river Tigris (before you answer me)!" Another time Abū Bakr said to him : "Give me a moment (to answer) ;" and his adversary retorted : "I will give you to the end of time! (before you do it)." Another day Abū Bakr made him this remark : "I speak to you concerning the foot, and you answer me concerning the head ;" to which Ibn Surayj retorted ; "It is so with the ox, when its hoof is sore, they grease its horns."<sup>2</sup> It was said to him in speaking of the age in which he lived : "God raised up 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz at the beginning of the first century after the Hijrah, that he might manifest orthodoxy and destroy innovation ; then God in his bounty placed at the opening of the next century the imam al-Shāfi'ī, that he might manifest orthodoxy and force innovation to lie hid ; and God graciously conferred thee on the beginning of the following century, that thou mightest strengthen orthodoxy and weaken innovation." Along with his other talents, Ibn Surayj possessed that of composing 1 Literally: till the hour (of Final Judgement) comes.

---

2 This answer of Ibn Surayj means in other terms: "Though what I said to you appears quite irrelevant to your question, it is notwithstanding precise and well applied, but you have not the sense to perceive it: you are like the ox who knows not that the greasing of its horns will cure the soreness of its hoofs, which is nevertheless the fact." In comparing his adversary to an ox, he treats him as a heavy and stupid fellow: the 'Arabs call such a person baqr (ox)—See M. Humbert's Anthologie Arabe, page 183.

good poetry; he died at Baghḍād the 25 of the First Jumāda 306 (A. D. 918)*; others say Monday† 25 of the First Rabi'; he was buried in the court of his house at the Suwajjat Ghālib (Ghālib's Small Bazaar) which is on the west bank of the Tigris, near the suburb of al-Karkh; he was aged 57 years and six months. His tomb is still conspicuous in that spot and is visited by devotees: no other edifice or tomb near it has remained, and there it stands alone. His grandfather Surayj was celebrated for the extreme sanctity of his life‡: I have read in some book that he was a Persian without any knowledge of Arabic, and that he had a vision,<sup>1</sup> in which he saw and conversed with the Creator, who, in ending, said to him: "Ya Surayj! ʔalab kun," to which he answered: "Ya Khuda! ser bi-ser." these words, which were repeated three times, are Persian, and mean: O Surayj! seek. O Lord! head with head, which is as much as if he had said: I am contented to attain salvation head with head.<sup>2</sup> I have since found in the History of Baghḍād that he who had this vision was called Surayj Ibn Yunus Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥarith al-Marwazī; he was a devout and self-denying man, possessing supernatural gifts: died at Baghḍād in the month of the First Rabi' 235 (A. D. 849).<sup>3</sup> I also saw in a dream a book containing traditions traced up to Surayj through an unbroken series of

---

1 See note on dreams, No. 19.

2 Head with head; that is: without obtaining pre-eminence over others. This metaphor is taken from horse-racing. See also Reiske's note in Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, t. I, p. 330.

3 Ibn Khalikān appears here to have some doubts respecting the identity of this Surayj with Surayj, grandfather to Abu 'l-'Abbās; Yaḥyā'i, however says, in his Annals, that he was so. (See Mira'āt al-Janān, No. 637, f. 187.

*5 November.—Ed.

†Monday fell on 7 September which date corresponds to 27 of First Rabi' according to Fatmī calendar.—Ed.

‡This story is also given in Sam'ānī's Ansāb.—Ed.

sound authorities.<sup>1</sup> As for the first anecdote, I heard it from one of our holy shaykhs.

21. IBN AL-QĀSS AL-ṬABARĪ

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Abī Aḥmad, better known by the name of Ibn al-Qāss al-Ṭabarī, was a doctor of the sect of al-Sahābī and a native of Ṭabarestān, where he was esteemed the highest authority of the time in religious matters. After learning jurisprudence from Ibn Surayj (whose life has been just given), he composed a great number of works, among others: the Ṭalkhīs (Abridgement)<sup>2</sup> the Guide for Qālis, the Mawāqit, the Miftāh.<sup>3</sup> etc. The Ṭalkhīs has been commented by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Khātān and the shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Sinjī<sup>4</sup>; it is a little book, and is cited by the Imām (al-) Ḥaramayn in different parts of his Nihāyah and also by al-Ḥazzālī: all the works of Ibn al-Qāss are short but very instructive. He often addressed pious exhortations to the people, and having come, in one of his journeys, to Ṭarsūs (where it is said he acted as qāṭi), an assembly met to hear him preach, and he was there seized with such compunction and terror at the thoughts of God's majesty, that he swooned away and died A. H. 335 or 336 (A. D. 946-7). His father was called al-Qāss (the Narrator), because he used to relate (qisṣā) histories

1 It has been already said that dreams in which holy men appear are considered by the Muslims as true, see No. 19, note on dreams; here then is a proof that Surayj was a traditionist of unquestioned authority, since the series spoken of goes no farther than him. He was therefore an imām of traditions; a holy character in the eyes of the Muslims; he must also have obtained eternal happiness, or Ibn Khallikān would not have seen him with so sacred a book in his hand as a Collection of Traditions; for such is the conclusion which our author wishes to be drawn from his dream.

2 This work is a treatise on the secondary points of jurisprudence; see Flügel's Hājji Khālifah, No. 3543.

3 Hājji Khālifah mentions the Mawāqit (the prescribed time) without giving any information as to its contents; the Miftāh, or key to the legal doctrines of the Shāfiite sect is also mentioned by him.

4 In the Arabic text this name is incorrectly printed al-Shinjī.

and anecdotes.<sup>1</sup>—Ṭāberestān is an extensive province in Persia adjacent to Khurāsān; it has two capitals, Saria<sup>2</sup> and 'Āmul, and is well defended by fortresses and defiles. Ṭarsūs is a city on the frontiers of Rūmīyah (Asia Minor) near the towns of al-Maṣṣiṣa (the ancient Mopsuestia) and Adhana; al-Mamān, son of Hārān al-Raṣhīd, was interred there: this place is spoken of in the Muḥadḍhab and the Wasit<sup>3</sup> in the chapter of waqfs.<sup>4</sup>

22. ABŪ ḤĀMID AL-MARWARRŪDHĪ

Al-Qidī Abū Ḥāmid Aḥmad Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Bishr Ibn Ḥāmid al-Marwarrūdī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, studied jurisprudence under Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī; he composed the work called the Jāmi, a collection of doctrines special to his sect; a commentary on the Muḥtaṣar by al-Muzānī, and a treatise on the principles of jurisprudence. This doctor, who was an imām of surpassing

---

1 In the early ages of Islamism, the narrator of histories was a person highly respected; at time few historical works had been composed, and it was from these persons alone that information could be obtained; they always began each of their relation by a statement of the persons through whom it was successively handed down, and they were particularly careful not to change or suppress a single word in those ancient traditions; it was with such document that al-Ṭabari composed his celebrated history. merely arranging them in chronological order.

2 This appears to be the same city which is now called Serī; Abū 'I-Fida places it in Mazenderan.

3 The Muḥadḍhab was written by Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī; and the Wasit by Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad al-Ghazzālī.

4 The term waqf, in the Muhammadan law, designates any sort of property conceded in perpetuity to religious establishment; many pious Muslims willed their estates to the support of strong places on the enemy's borders, war with infidels being religious duty; Tarsūs must therefore have possessed much property of this kind, on account of its importance as a frontier city, and it is probably for this reason that it is spoken of in the treatise of Waqfs.

merit,<sup>1</sup> settled at Baṣrah, where he gave public lessons and had among his auditors the jurists of that city. Abu 'l-Ḥayyān al-Tawhīdī<sup>2</sup> said of him. "I heard Abū Ḥamid al-Marwarrudī say: 'No man should be flattered on account of his extraction, neither should he be blamed: for the tall man is not praised for his stature, nor the ugly man blamed for his ill-favouredness.'" Died A. H. 362 (A. D. 972-3). Marawarrudī means native of Marwarrud, a well-known city in Khurāsān, built on a river, in Persian ar-Rud, and situated at forty parasangs from Marw al-Shāhjan; these are the two Marws so frequently mentioned by poets: the word Shāhjan is added to the name of the larger one, from which also is derived the relative adjective Marwazi; the word rūd (river) is joined to that of the other city in order to distinguish between them: Marwarrud has for relative adjective Marwarrudī, and Marwazi also according to al-Sam'ānī: it was one of the cities taken by al-Aḥnāf Ibn Qays, and mention shall be made of it in his life<sup>3</sup>; he had been sent against it at the head of the vanguard

1 Literally, whose dust was not split or entered into; a strange expression but frequently made use of by writers who affect elegance of style; the poet Nābiḡha al-Ḍhubānī seems to have been the first who imagined it, and it is still found in one of his poems: Yusuf al-Shantmarī, author of an excellent commentary on the six poets (see the Divān d' Amro 'l-Kuīs, introduction), gives the following explanation of its meaning: "Thou hast not split my dust, that is: I have surpassed thee, and the distance between us is so wide. that thou hast not come up with me or split my dust; this expression originated in speaking of a good race-horse which passed the others and got clear of them, so that they could not enter into the dust he raised."

2 Abu 'l-Ḥayyān 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās al-Tawhīdī, native of Baḥdād, was ḥay'ah or superior of the Sāfīs, whose doctrines he treated of in the Treasures (Dhakhḥir), and other works. In the life of Ibn al-Umayd Muḥammad by Ibn Khallikān, will be found more particulars respecting him; see also Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, fol. 21, verso.

3 In the life of al-Aḥnāf the author says little or nothing about these cities, and scarcely any information on the subject is to be found in al-Mākin or Abu 'l-Fida; the following details may not therefore be uninteresting. In the thirtieth year of the Hijra (A. D. 650-1), Tabarestān was conquered by the Muslims under the orders of Sa'īd Ibn al-'Ās, and 'Abd Allāh by 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Āmir, general of the army. Shihjān means the king's soul: my reason for making these long observations is to prevent these places from being taken one for the other.

(Continued on page 106)

23. IBN AL-QATTĀN

Abū 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, was a native of Bagḥdād and a leading doctor in the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. He learned jurisprudence under Ibn Surayj and, after him, under Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī: he then professed at Bagḥdād, and men of learning gained information at his lectures; he wrote besides a great

---

(Continued from page 105)

Ibn Āmir Ibn Kariz (کریز) subdued Faras, Sejestan and Khurāsān. The people of Herāt offered some resistance, but were defeated; the cities of Naysāpur and Sarakhs (سرخس) surrendered peaceably, and Marw also obtained peace on condition of paying two million of dirhems every year. Al-Aḥnāf Ibn Qays was then sent by 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Āmir into Tukhārestān at the head of four thousand horses, and defeated the forces of that country, though seconded by those of Jawzajān and other districts; he then, with four hundred thousand (?) men, laid siege to the city of Bal'ḥ, and endeavoured to penetrate into Kluwarezm, but without success. 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Āmir then set out from Naysāpur to perform the pilgrimage to Mekkah, leaving as his lieutenant in Khurāsān al-Aḥnāf, who defeated the united forces of that country. 'Abd Allāh, on his return from Mekkah, went to Baṣrah, where he fixed his residence, while his lieutenants governed Khurāsān, Sejistān, and Persian Irāq (الجزال). The quantity of tribute received by the Khalīf 'Uṭmān was so great that it became necessary to form a number of large treasuries at Medinah on purpose to contain it. It is said that the treasures of Khusroes taken by the Muslims amounted to one hundred thousand badrahs of gold; each badrah (بدره) containing four thousand pieces. (Tārīkh al-Khāmīs, Arabic MS. of the Bib. du Rol, No. 635, fol. 345.

number of works, and the students of that time all travelled to 'Irāq that they might be instructed by him or by Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Dāraki; when al-Dāraki died, Ibn al-Qaṭṭān became chief of the Shafite sect (in that country). Abu Ishāq al-Shīrāzī mentions him in his Ṭabaqāt and says that he died A. H. 359 (A. D. 970), to which the Kḥaṭīb (Abu Bakr Aḥmad al-Baḡhdādī) adds: "In the month of the First Jumada": he was one of the chief Shafite doctors, and composed works on the principles of Jurisprudence and its secondary points.* ( Ibn al-Jawzī) author of the Shudhūr al-uqūd says that Baḡhdād (the native place of Ibn al-Qaṭṭān) was built in the year 146 (A. D. 763).

24 AL-ṬAḤĀWĪ

Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Salāma Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al Azdi al-Ṭaḥāwī was a doctor of the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah and became head of the Hanīfites in Egypt. He had been a follower of al-Shāfi'i's sect, and taken lessons from al-Muzani, who said to him one day: "By God! no good will ever come of you." Provoked by this remark, al-Ṭaḥāwī passed over to Abū Ja'far Ibn Abī 'Imrān the Hanafite<sup>1</sup> and studied under him: he said afterwards, on composing his Muḥṭaṣar or Compendium of Jurisprudence: "God be merciful to Abū Ibrāhīm!" (meaning al-Muzani),

---

1 The ḥāfiẓ Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Abī 'Imrān, native of Baḡhdād, was an imām of high authority in the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah. He was a man of solid learning and composed a work, entitled al-Ḥijaj (الحجج); he filled the place of qaṣī in Egypt, and lost his sight in that country. Died A. H. 280 (A. D. 893) (Ṭab. al-Hanafīn, fol. 110, verso.)

* فروع literally means branches; in jurisprudence it means deductions.—Ed.

"were he living, he should have to expiate his oath."<sup>1</sup> Abū Ya'la al-Khalīlī says, in his Irshād<sup>2</sup>, in the life of al-Muzanī : Al-Tahawī was sister's son to al-Muzanī ; and Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Shurūṭī relates having asked him why he differed in opinion from his uncle, and preferred Abū Ḥanīfa's doctrine? to which al-Ṭahāwī replied : 'Because I saw my uncle pore over the works of Abū Ḥanīfa.' This doctor wrote a number of instructive books, such as the Aḥkām al-Qur'ān,<sup>3</sup> Iḥtilāf al-'Ulama (Points of doctrine on which the learned differ), Ma'ānī 'l-Āthār (The obscure ideas and allusions in the Traditions), the Shurūṭ (Treatise on drawing up bonds), a great historical work, etc. Al-Quḍa'ī in his Khīṭab speaks of him in these terms : "In his youth he met with al-Muzanī and most of the doctors contemporary with him, and became remarkably skilled in drawing up bonds." The qāḍī Abū 'Ubayd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abda'

1 Al-Muzanī had sworn by God, but his oath proved false, he should therefore have explained his perjury had he lived. This expiation consists in granting freedom to a slave, or in once feeding or clothing ten paupers; if the person guilty of this crime have not the means of fulfilling either of the above conditions, he is only obliged to fast for three days.—(D'Ohsson's Tableau de l'Empire Othoman, t. IV, p. 286.)

2 This work is spoken of by Ḥājjī Khalīfa; see Flügel's edition, No. 520. The author, Abū Ya'la Khalīl Ibn 'Abd Allāh, was a native of Qazwin. He died A.H. 446 (A.D. 1054), and was considered a traditionist of the first authority. (Yāfi's Annals.)

3 See note on مكالمات, No. 2.

4 In Arabic Shurūṭ (conditions), the name given to that branch of jurisprudence which treats of drawing up legal acts and bonds in proper form. (See Ḥājjī Khalīfa.)

5 Abū 'Ubayd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abda al-'Abbādānī, doctor of the Hanafite sect, born at Baṣrah, A.H. 218 (A.D. 833); he studied under a number of celebrated masters, and then went to Egypt, where he was appointed Inspector of Wrongs (see de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 132), and was afterwards nominated qāḍī, in the year 278, by Khumarawayh, son of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭaulun. He was a generous patron of men of learning, and always ready to oblige those who applied to him. During the troubles which ensued in Egypt on the death of Jā'ish, son of Khumarawayh, Ibn 'Abda was obliged to lie concealed for a considerable period; he was restored to the place of qāḍī, A.H. 292, but he quitted it soon after and retired to 'Irāq, where he died, A.H. 312 (A.D. 924), aged 95 years. (Al-Asqalānī's History of the Qādis of Egypt, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 691.)

took him for secretary; he was then in a destitute condition, but was enriched by the kindness of Abū 'Ubayd, who was a very generous man. Then the qādī Abū 'Ubayd 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ḥarb<sup>1</sup> appointed him scrivener<sup>2</sup> after the circumstance which occurred between Maṣṣār the doctor and himself<sup>3</sup>; this was in the year 306 (A. D. 918). The public notaries were averse through jealousy to his being nominated scrivener, as they did not wish the same person to be both chief jurisconsult<sup>4</sup> and receiver of attestations; but a number of them having gone that year to Mekkah to sojourn there some time from religious motives, Abū 'Ubayd took advantage of their absence and nominated Abū Ja'far on the attestations of Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Māmān and Abū Bakr Ibn Saqlāb.<sup>5</sup> Al-Ṭahāwī was born in 238 (A. D. 852), or 229 (A. D. 843), according to Abū Sa'd al-Samānī, who is here right; another author adds that his birth was on Sunday* eve, 11 of the First Rabi'; he died at Old Cairo on Thursday 1st of Dhu 'l-Qa'ada 321 (A. D. 933),† and was buried in the

1 'Alī Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Ḥarb, surnamed Ibn Harbawayh, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and native of Baḡhdād. In A. H. 293 he went to Egypt and replaced Ibn 'Abda as qādī; he was afterwards deposed in the year 311, and died at Baḡhdād in 319 (A. D. 931). (Al-Asqalānī, Al-'Uṭhmānī.)

2 In Arabic, Adl; see what Ibn Khaldūn says of the duties of this public officer, in de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 40; consult also Von Hammer's Landerverwaltung unter dem Chalifate, p. 103.

3 This occurrence is again spoken of in the life of Maṣṣār; it was a quarrel between the two doctors.

4 The jurisconsults called the law the science, to indicate its high importance; for the same reason, the chief jurisconsult is called the chief of the science, which is the name given him here.

5 Those persons were probably notaries also.

*Sunday 29 August was 8 Rabi' and in 239 Sunday fell on 11 Rabi' corresponding to 20 August.—Ed.

†23 October.—Ed.

Qarāfa<sup>1</sup> where his tomb is still remarked. In the life of the doctor Maṣṣār Ibn Ismā'il al-Darīr, mention is again made of him, so the reader is referred to it. His father died A. H. 264 (A. D. 877-8). Ṭahāwī means native of Ṭahā, which is a town in Upper Egypt (Ṣa'id) Azdi: signifies sprung from Azd, a great and renowned tribe in Yemen.

25. ABŪ ḤĀMID AL-ISFARĀ'INĪ

The shaykh Abn Ḥāmid Aḥmad Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Isfār'īnī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, became Imām and professor,<sup>2</sup> at Baghdād, where his lectures were attended by more than three hundred students in jurisprudence: (the subject of his lessons was) the Mu'htaşar by al-Muzanī, which he explained with additional observations of his own; and (by his successful

1 There were two-cemeteries at Old Cairo, called the Greater and the Lesser Qarāfa: al-Maqriẓī, in his Khīṭaṭ, describes them both and gives copious information respecting the tombs, chapels, mosques, and Muslim convents with which they were filled. See also M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 238.

2 The expression رياسته الدنيا والدين chieftainship of the world and of the religion is so obscure, that its signification can only be found by comparing the different passages in which it occurs. Its real meaning, deduced from an examination of six passages, appears to be that given here; namely the places of imām and chief professor: for it is to be observed that all the persons, to whom this title is applied, were great imāms and famous professors, and nothing more. In 'al-Ūthmānī's Ṭabaqāt we find that Muḥammad al-Salūkī became the imām of the world in jurisprudence, exegesis, polite literature, philology, grammar, poetry, and scholastic divinity; the same author says of Ibrāhīm al-Marwazī, that he succeeded to the place of رياسته العلم, chieftainship of science, or head-professorship, and that he filled the land with his pupils. These two passages, selected from many others, appear decisive as to the sense of رياسته الدنيا, chieftainship of the world. The chieftainship of the religion indicates, most probably, the place of the chief imām.

instruction) he filled the earth with partisans (of al-Shāfi'i's opinions). He explained the doctrines of his sect in two works, the Great and the Small Ta'liqat<sup>1</sup>; another short work of his, the Bustān or Garden, consists of singular anecdotes. He learned jurisprudence from Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Marzubān and then from Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Dīraki; contemporaries all acknowledged his superior merit and discriminating judgment; and the Khaṭīb (Abū Bakr Aḥmad) speaks of him, in his History of Baḡhdād, in these terms: "Abu Ḥāmid taught a small portion of traditions, which he himself had learned from Abn Allāh Ibn 'Adī, Abū Bakr al-Ismā'īlī, Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abdal al-Isfara'īnī and others; (as a traditionist) he is a sure authority. I saw him more than once and was present at his lectures in the mosque of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak which lies at the upper end of the Grant of al-Rabi'<sup>2</sup> and I heard some persons mention that seven hundred students of jurisprudence went to his lectures, and (for that reason) people used to say: 'If al-Shāfi'i saw him, he would be delighted'." The shaykh Abn Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, in his Tabaqāt relates as follows: "Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Kudārī, the Hanefite used to praise and extol Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfara'īnī above all others; and it was told to the vizīr Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn<sup>3</sup> that he had said: 'I consider Abū Ḥāmid an abler doctor and divine than al-Shāfi'i.' On this, I remarked to the vizīr that it was al-Qudārī's confidence in Abū Ḥāmid's talents, and his zeal for the Hanefite sect, which led him to undervalue al-Shāfi'i, so no attention should be paid to what he had said; for Abū Ḥāmid, and even more ancient and learned doctors than he, were far from

---

1 Ta'lika signifies an appendix or supplement; the Moslem schoolmen give this title to collections of notes and observations on the system of doctrine followed by the sect; these notes were generally taken by the scholars during the lectures of their professors. Hajji Khalifa mentions a number of works bearing this title, and he remarks that al-Isfara'īnī's Ta'liqch treats of the Shafite doctrines. (See Flügel's edition, t. II, No. 3120.)

2 See No. 2, note on "ancient sayings." The khaṭīb could not then have been more than eleven or twelve years of age.

3 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn, surnamed Rais ar-Ruasa (chief of the chiefs) was vizīr to the Khalīf al-Qā'im Bi-amr Illāh; he was put to death by al-Baṣāṣiri, A. H. 450 (A. D. 1058). (See Abū 'l-Fida's Annals.)

the rank of al-Shāfiʿī ; to whom and to whose successors we might apply this verse of the poet's :

'They sojourned at Mekkah among the tribes of Naufal, but thou hast settled at al-Bayda, the most distant station.' "

It is related of Abū Ḥāmid that he said : "I never, in quitting the meetings for discussing points of law,<sup>1</sup> had to regret omitting a necessary observation." It is also related that, in one of those meetings, a doctor addressed him in an improper manner, and then went to him that night to ask his pardon : on which Abū Ḥāmid repeated these verses :

"A deliberate insult is offered before the public ; then comes a private excuse which only confirms the fault. He who thinks that a private excuse can efface a public insult is in a great mistake."

This doctor was born in A. H. 344 (A. D. 955), and went to Baghdād in 363 (A. D. 973-4), or 364 according to the Khaṭīb : he there taught jurisprudence from the year 370 till his death, which happened Friday evening, 18th Shawwāl. A. H. 406 (March, A. D. 1016),* at Baghdād ; the next morning he was buried in (the court of) his house. His body was afterwards transported to the (cemetery at the) Gate of Ḥarb in the year 410. The Khaṭīb says : "I prayed over his bier in the plain" (Ṣahrā) beyond the Bridge of Abu 'l-Dann ; and the imām who lead the prayer was Abū 'Abd Allāh, son to (the Khalif) al-Muhtadi, and preacher of the Mosque of Al-Manṣūr, it was day witnessed by crowds of people and filled with deep sorrow and grievous lamentation."—Iṣfarā'īn means native of Iṣfarā'īn, a town of Khurasān in the territory of Naysāpur, half way between it and Jurjān.—

---

<sup>1</sup> These debating societies were held by students under the presidency of their professor, or by doctors of the different sects between themselves.

*30 March.—Ed.

The verse applied to al-Shāfi'i by the shaykh Abū Ishāq has another belonging to it which runs thus :

"For thou didst fear on her account<sup>1</sup> the evil talk of hidden foes with sharpened tongue ; who say, but never perform."

26. AL-MAHĀMILĪ

Abū 'l-Ḥasan Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Abān al-Ḍubbī al-Mahāmili, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i. He learned jurisprudence from Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfārā'ini, and put down in writing a Ta'liqah<sup>2</sup> which was taught him by Abū Ḥāmid, and whose name it bears. The penetration and intelligence with which he was gifted enabled him to eclipse all his contemporaries ; in jurisprudence he became remarkably eminent, and professed it both in the lifetime of his master Abū Ḥāmid and after his decease. He learned the Traditions from Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar<sup>3</sup> and other traditionists of the same period, having been taken by his father on a journey to Kūfa, in order that he might hear them from the lips of that teacher. He composed on the doctrines of his sect a large book, entitled the Majmūah (Collection) ; another in one volume, called Muqni' (sufficient) ; a little work entitled the Lubāb (Morrow), and a fourth called

---

1 The mistress of the Arabic poet is generally of a different tribe from his, and she is supposed to be always guarded by a number of jealous relations, ready to wreak vengeance on any lover who should dare to make known the object of his passion.

2 See No. 26, note on Ta'liqah.

3 Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar was born at Baḡhād, A. H. 286 (A. D. 899). He became the first traditionist of his time in Irāq, and had among his auditors the celebrated al-Dāraquṇi. Died A. H. 379 (A. D. 989). It appears that he was a partisan of the Shi'ite doctrines, (Tab. al-Huffāz).

the Awsaṭ (Medium), besides a great number of treatises on controversial subjects. He professed at Baḡḡad, and his name is mentioned in the Chronicle of that city compiled by the Khaṭīb. Died on Wednesday, 20 of the Second Rabī', 415 (A. D. 1024)*; born A. H. 368 (A. D. 978-9). Ḍubbi means belonging to Ḍubb, which is a great and well-known tribe; Mahāmilt is derived from Mahāmīl, which is the name of the litters in which travellers are carried,

27. AL-BAYHAQĪ

Abu Bakr Aḥmad al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mūsā al-Bayhaqī al-Khosrjerdī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi', the great and illustrious ḥāfiẓ,<sup>1</sup> who in his age stood alone without a rival for the variety of his attainments, was one of the principal disciples of the ḥakīm Abu 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Bayyī' by whom he was taught the traditions, but whom he soon surpassed in all the different parts of knowledge. He learned jurisprudence from Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Nāṣir Ibn Muḥammad al-'Umari al-Marwazī,<sup>2</sup> but the traditions were his favourite study, and it was as a traditionist that he attained reputation. In this pursuit he travelled to 'Irāq, Jibāl (Persian Irāq), Hijāz and Khurāsān, in which

---

1 The persons who know the Qur'ān by heart are called Ḥāfiẓ; but this title is given more especially to those doctors who have learned by heart the contents of the six great collections of Traditions (see the Miṣḥḥat al-Maṣābiḥ, vol. I, p. 3), who can cite the names of the persons by whom each tradition has been successively handed down, and who can point out those traditionists whose authority cannot be admitted without limitation and those who merit full confidence. The word ḥāfiẓ is sometimes made use of to designate a narrator of historical traditions.

2 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-'Umari was one of the most noted doctors who studied under al-Qaffāl and Abu 'l-Tayyib al-Salaki; he died A. H. 444 (A. D. 1052).—(Al-'Uḥmānī's Tabaqāt, fol. 85 verso.)

*1 July 21 Rabī', i.e. nine days remaining to the end of the month.—Ed.

country, as well as in all the others visited by him, he received the traditions from the lips of the learned of that time; he then began to write on the subject, and composed a great number of works, which, it is said, amount to one thousand volumes.* It was he who first collected the sentences<sup>1</sup> of al-Shāfi'i with which he formed ten volumes: the best known of his works are—the Great and the Small Collections of Traditions: Proofs of the prophetic Mission; Acts and Traditions (of Muḥammad); Path of Faith; Merits of al-Shāfi'i descendant of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib; Merits of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, etc. Al-Bayhaqi was a man little solicitous about worldly goods, and the Imam al-Ḥaramayn said of him: "There was no follower of the Shafite sect who was not under some obligation to al-Shāfi'i, al-Bayhaqi excepted; for al-Shāfi'i was under obligations to him." Al-Bayhaqi was a most active defender of the doctrine instituted by al-Shāfi'i, and was invited to Naysāpur, in order to propagate the knowledge (of that doctrine); he went there in consequence, and led a (simple and holy) life such as that of the primitive Muslims; he taught traditions to a great number of eminent doctors, among others, Zāhir al-Shāhāmī<sup>2</sup>, Muḥammad al-Furāwī and 'Abd al-Mun'im al-Qushayrī<sup>3</sup>; he was born in the month of Shā'bān, 384 (A. D. 994); died the 10 of the First Jumada, 458 (A. D. 1066)†, at Naysāpur, whence his body was transported to Bayhaq (his native place), which is a collection of villages in the dependency of Naysāpur, at twenty parasangs from that city; Khusrājerd is the name of one of those villages.

---

1 Sentences; that is, legal opinions received as positive precepts by the followers of his sect. Al-'Uṭhmānī remarks (Ṭabaqāt fol. 22 verso), that among the numerous authors who wrote on the life and virtues of al-Shāfi'i the ablest and most exact was al-Bayhaqi, who, in two thick volumes, treated fully of his merits, the circumstances of his life, etc., all on the best authority.

2 Abu 'l-Qāsim Zāhir Ibn Ṭāhir al Shāhāmī and his brother Abu Bakr Wajīh were two celebrated traditionists of that time.

3 Abu 'l-Muẓaffar 'Abd al-Mun'im al-Qushayrī was son to 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Hawāzin, whose life is given in this work.

*Original جزو; lit. means part.—Ed.

†9 April.—Ed.

28. AL-NASĀ'Ī THE ḤĀFIZ

The ḥāfiz Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Shu'ayb Ibn 'Alī Ibn Sinān Ibn Baḥr al-Nasā'ī, chief traditionist of his age and author of a Sunan, or collection of traditions, was an inhabitant of Old Cairo, in which city his works got into circulation, and where he had also many pupils. Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Isfahānī gives the following account of his death: "I heard our elders in Old Cairo relate that Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān left Miṣr towards the end of his life and went to Damascus, where he was asked what he thought of Mu'āwīya and what tradition he knew respecting the merits of that prince; to which he made this reply: 'It is not then enough for Mu'āwīya to enter (into salvation) on an equal footing with others, but he must even surpass them by exclusive merits.'<sup>1</sup> But some relate that his answer was: 'I know not any tradition respecting his special merit but this: May God never satiate thy belly!'<sup>2</sup> Now this doctor was an advocate for the rights of the khalīf 'Alī; so the people began to strike him on the sides, nor did they discontinue till they thrust him out of the mosque. (In another account it is said that they struck him on the testicles and trod him under foot.) He was then borne to Ramla, where he expired." The ḥāfiz Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Dāraquṭnī relates as follows: "Al-Nasā'ī, after the illtreatment he underwent at Damascus, asked to be borne to Mecca, where he died on his arrival, and was buried between al-Ṣafa and al-Marwa; his death happened in the month of Shahbān, A. H. 303" (February, A. D. 916). The ḥāfiz Abū Nu'aym al-Isfahānī adds the following particulars: "The people having trampled on al-Nasā'ī at Damascus, he died from the effects of that ill usage whilst he was bearing (to Mekkah). He composed a work called al-Khaṣā'is (Particularities), treating of the merits of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib and those of his family; the greater part of the traditions contained therein are alleged on the authority of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal. Having been asked why he did not write a work on the merits of Muḥammad's companions, he answered: 'On entering Damascus, I found a great number of persons holding 'Alī in aversion, for which reason I intended that God should direct them by means of this book. 'He used to abstain from food every second day,* and was remarked for being of an ardent† temperament. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Aṣākir of Damascus relates that he had four wives, to each of whom he paid equal attentions and that he possessed concubines besides. Al-Dāraqutni declares him a martyr, on account of the trials he underwent at Damascus, and says that he died on Monday, 13 Ṣafar, 303 (August, A. D. 915)‡, at Mekkah; other state that he died at Ramlah in Palestine. Abn Sa'īd 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Yūnus, author of the Annals of Egypt, writes in that work: "Al-Nasā'i came to Miṣr a long time ago, he was traditionist of the first order; his word was held a sure authority, his information was exact, and his memory retentive. He left Miṣr in the month of Dhu'lqa'ada, 302." I find in my handwriting, in the rough copy of this work, that al-Nasā'i was born at Nasa, A. H. 214 or 215 (A. D. 829, 830). Nasā'i means native of Nasa, a city in Khurāsān, which has produced a number of eminent men.

---

<sup>1</sup> The expression راسا براسا has been already explained, No. 20, note 5 on Head with Head.

<sup>2</sup> Mu'āwīya was so voracious that his greediness became proverbial. (See Freytag's Proverbia Meidanii, t. I, p. 135). The imprecation cited by al-Nasā'ī was probably uttered by one of Mu'āwīya's enemies, and party spirit prevented it from being forgotten.

29. AL-QUDŪRI.

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'afar Ibn Ḥamdān, surnamed al-Qudūri, was a doctor of

---

*According to printed text it should be translated: He used to fast on alternate days or literally: He used to fast one day and to break it on the other.—Ed.

†Oversexed is proper word.—Ed.

‡28 August.—Ed.

the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah, and became president of the Ḥanefites in 'Irāq. In treating speculative points he had the talent of expressing his ideas with great precision; he was also versed in the traditions; and the khāṭib Abū Bakr, author of the History of Baḡhdād who had learned them from him, alleged his authority in citing them. He wrote several treatises on the doctrines of his sect; among others, that celebrated work, the Muṭṭahhaṣar (Abridgement). He was accustomed to discuss controversial subjects with Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfara'īnī, the Shafite doctor; in whose life has already been given the high opinion which he expressed of Abū Ḥāmid's merits.<sup>1</sup> Al-Qudrī was born A. H. 362 (A. D. 972-3); he died on Sunday, 5 of Rajab, 428 (April, A. D. 1037),* at Baḡhdād, and was buried the same day in (the court of) his dwelling, in the street of Abū Khalf; but his body was afterwards transported to a tomb in the great street of al-Manṣur, where it was placed by the side of Abū Bakr al-Khwarezmī, the Hanafite doctor.<sup>2</sup>—Qudrī is derived from quḍūr, plural of qidr (caldron): I know not for what reason he was so-called; but such is the derivation of that appellation as given by al-Sam'ānī, in his work called al-Anṣāb.

30. AL-THA'LABĪ AL-NAYSĀPŪRĪ

Abū Ishāq Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Th'alabī, native of Naysāpur, and a well-known commentator on the Qur'an, was the most skilful man of his time in explaining the difficulties of that book; and his work, entitled the Great

<sup>1</sup> See No. 25. page 112.

<sup>2</sup> The shaykh and imām Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Muḥammad al-Khwarezmī, a celebrated professor, and mufti of the Hanefite sect; for intelligence, learning, and integrity, he possessed a high reputation; and his society was courted by persons of every rank. Died A. H. 403 (A. D. 1012-3). (Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafīyīn; MS. of the Bib. du Roi, founts St. Germain, No. 132, fol. 142 verso.)

*24 April.—Ed.

Commentary, surpassed all others on the subject. He is also author of the Kitāb al-'Arā'is (Book of Brides), containing the history of the prophets, and of other treatises. Al-Sam'āni makes mention of him and adds: "Some of the learned say that the name of Tha'labī, or Tha'libī was given to him not as a patronymic, but a surname." Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī relates the following circumstance concerning him: "I saw in a dream the Lord of Glory,<sup>1</sup> who was speaking to me and I to him; during this it happened that the Lord (may his name be exalted), said: 'The holy man draweth near.' I turned, and lo! Aḥmad al-Tha'labī was drawing near." 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Ismā'il al-Fārisī, in his Siyāq or continuation of the history of Naysāpur, speaks of him and praises him: "He was," says he, "an exact and trustworthy transmitter of traditions; he gave them on the authority of Abū Ṭāhir Ibn Khuzayma and the imām Abū Bakr Ibn Mihrān, teacher of the art of reading the Qur'ān correctly. He taught a great number of traditions which he had learned from many masters. He died in 427 (A. D. 1035-6)." Another writer states that his death took place in the month of Muḥarram, 427; and a third that it happened Wednesday,* 23 Muḥarram, 437 (A. D. 1045).—Nayspāuri means belonging to Naysāpur, which is one of the fairest and greatest cities in Khurāsān, abounding above others, in all the conveniencies of life; it was so called because Sībīr Zu 'l-Aktāf, a Persian king of the last race, having come to the site of the place, which was then overgrown with reeds, was pleased with it and said: "It were well a city were here;" he then ordered the reeds to be cut down and the city to be built; and it was named Naisābar, because Nai in Persian means reed. This is what al-Sam'āni says in his Ansāb.

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 19, note on dreams, and Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol I, p. 271, 338.

*Wednesday fell on 23 Muḥarram 427 corresponding to 26 November, 1035, while 3 Muḥarram 437 corresponding to 10 August was Saturday.—Ed.

31. IBN ABI DUWĀD

The qādī Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād Farāḥ Ibn Jarīr Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbād Ibn Salām Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Abd Hind Ibn Laḥm<sup>1</sup> Ibn Mālik Ibn Qanaṣ Ibn Ma'na Ibn Barjān Ibn Daws Ibn al-Dīl Ibn Omayya Ibn Hudḥāfah *Ibn Zuhrt Ibn Iyad Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'ad Ibn 'Adnān al-Iyādi : this qādī was celebrated for his manly character and his zeal in serving his friends ; and many anecdotes of his humane interference with the Khalīf al-Mu'tasim are still preserved. Abū 'Abd Allāh<sup>2</sup> al-Marzubāni makes the following mention of him in the Murshid where he treats of the Motazelite divines: † 'It is said that Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād's family drew its origin from a village near Qinnisrin<sup>3</sup> but he himself, when yet a boy, was taken to Damascus<sup>1</sup> by his father, who went there on a commercial undertaking. Aḥmad passed his youth in the pursuit of learning (more particularly jurisprudence and scholastic theology), till he

---

1 This name and the preceding are uncertain. the MSS. all differ.

2 In the Arabic text, this name is erroneously printed 'Ubayd Allāh.

3 The town of Qinnisrin no longer exists, having been gradually abandoned by its inhabitants for the city of Aleppo, from which it lay at the distance of ten miles in a southern direction. It was, however, one of the most important places of Syria during the first centuries of Islamism, having been one of the military colonies of settlements (جند) established by the Arabs, when they conquered that country.

*M. de Slane reads it Hudaka (Hudḥāqah) which is wrong.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Zahr.—Ed.

‡Mutakallimin is the group of theologians who advance rational arguments for dogmatic beliefs. M. de Slane has rendered the term as scholastic theologians at other places.—Ed.

obtained that eminence he afterwards held. He studied under Hayyāj Ibn al-'Alā al-Sulmī, and had been a pupil of Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā<sup>2</sup>; this rendered him partial to the doctrines of the Motazelites." "Never", says Abu 'l-Aynā, "did I meet a person invested with authority who spoke with more correctness and precision than Ibn Abī Duwād." Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mauṣilī relates the following anecdote respecting him: "I heard Ibn Abī Duwād say at the court of al-Mu'taṣim: 'I never speak first to a khalīf about business in the presence of the vizir Muḥammad Ibn al-Zayyāt, lest he should learn (from my example) how to begin a conversation with the prince and how business is done.'<sup>3</sup> He was the first who ever opened a conversation with a khalīf, for till that time none spoke to the prince till he spoke first to them." Abu 'l-Aynā says that Ibn Abī Duwād was a good poet and that he expressed his thoughts with elegance and precision. Al-Marzubānī relates that his name is mentioned by Dībil Ibn 'Alī al-Khuzāi, in his book containing the list of poets, and that some fine verses of his are quoted there. Ibn Abī Duwād used to say: "There are three classes of men who must be tread with honour and esteem: the learned, the magistrates, and our friends*; whoever slights the learned, loses his religion; whoever slights the magistrates, loses his property; and whoever slights his friends, loses his manliness."—Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Iḥāsan relates as follows: "We were assembled in the presence of al-Māmun, and the names of the people of Medina who engaged their fidelity to Muḥammad on the night [of al-'Aqaba,<sup>4</sup> were enumerated; there was some disagreement however on the subject, when Ibn Abī Duwād came in

---

1 Damascus; in the Arabic: al-Shām.

2 Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā was the founder of the Motazelite sect. His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 The printed Arabic text and most of the MS. have here الثاني لها but الثاني is the right reading.

4 Abulfedae Annales, t. I, p. 59.

* Brothers or literally relatives.—Ed.

and counted them up one by one, names, sur names, and genealogies; on which al-Māman said: 'When men want a man of talent for companion, let them take a person like Aḥmad!' 'Nay,' said Aḥmad, 'but when a man of learning keeps company with a khalif, let him find one like the Commander of the Faithful, from whom he may gain information, and whose conversation is more learned than his own. "One of Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād's maxims was: "A man is not perfect unless he have abilities sufficient for elevating to the pulpit his friend, though a simple soldier of police and for sending to the gibbet his enemy, though a vizir."<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-'Aynā relates of him the following anecdote: "Al-Afshīn<sup>2</sup> bore envy towards Abū Dulāf al-Oāsim Ibn 'Īsa al-'Ijlī for his knowledge of the pure Arabic language and for his bravery; he therefore plotted against him, and caused witness to be borne that he had committed treason* and murder; he then had him arrested on a pretext he imagined, and having held a sitting to try him, he ordered him to be brought forth along with the headsman that was to put him to death. When news of this reached Ibn Abī Duwād, he instantly mounted his horse,<sup>3</sup> set off with the notaries who happened to be present (at his tribunal)<sup>4</sup>, and came in on al-Afshīn, before whom Abū Dulāf had just been led for execution. He then stopped and said: 'I am a messenger to thee from the

1 The pulpit or minbar was in those times specially reserved for the khalif or his deputy, who alone had the right of pronouncing the khutbah. (Seed Ohsson, t. I, p. 204.) The gibbet was merely the trunk of a palm-tree to which the bodies of executed persons were tied and exposed to public views. It sometimes happened that living criminals were tied up in the same manner.

2 See Elmakin, p. 141 et seq. To what d'Herbelot says of this general, under the heads Afshin and Babek, I shall only add here, that Ibn Ṣhākīr, in his 'Oyūn al-Tuw̄rīḥ' (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 638, fol. 232 v.), says that al-Afshīn was descended from the ancient kings of Persia; and Sib: Ibn al-Jawzi states in his Mir'āṭ al-Zamān (MS. No. 640, fol. 117 v.) that the real name of al-Afshīn was Ḥaydar Ibn Kaus; and that the governors of Osrushana, اسروشانه, a province in Transoxiana, bore the title of Afshīn, in the same way as each king of Persia was called Chosroes, and of Greece, Caesar.

3 In the East, respectable persons never stir out but on horseback.

4 See No. 24, note on Adl.

* جناية is a only crime.—Ed.

Commander of the Faithful ; he commands thee to do no ill to al-Qāsim Ibn 'Īsā, and moreover to give him up to me.' Turning then to the notaries, he said : 'Bear witness that I have delivered him the message sent by the Commander of the Faithful and that al-Qāsim is alive and in health. The notaries answered : 'We are witnesses thereof.' So al-Afshīn could not do al-Qāsim harm and Ibn Abī Duwād went instantly to the khalif al-Mu'taṣim and said : "Commander of the Faithful ! I have fulfilled in thy name a message which thou didst not give me, yet count it for one of my best deeds, and through it I hope for Paradise.* He then told him what had passed, and the khalif approved his conduct, and having sent for al-Qāsim, set him at liberty and gave him a present ; he then reprimanded severely al-Afshīn for having dared to act so. Al-Mu'taṣim, being moved by violent anger against Muḥammad Ibn al-Jāḥim the Barmakide, ordered his head to be struck off ; the prisoner was already placed blindfolded on the executioner's leather carpet,<sup>1</sup> and the sword was just brandishing to strike him when Ibn Abī Duwād, conscious that no petty shift could save him, said to the Khalif : 'How canst thou take his wealth, if thou killest him ?'—'Who is to hinder me ?' replied the khalif. 'God' answered the other, 'doth not permit it, neither is it allowed by the Apostle of God, nor by the justice of the Commander of the Faithful ! for his wealth belongeth to his heirs if thou slayest him, unless thou givest legal proof of his guilt. It is much easier for thee to order him, while he yet liveth, to refund what he hath embezzled.' 'Keep him in custody,' said al-Mu'taṣim, 'till an inquest be held.' Then, after some delay, the affair ended by Muḥammad's paying a sum of money and being set at liberty."—The following anecdote is told by al-Jāḥiẓ : "Al-Mu'taṣim was moved with wrath against an inhabitant of Mesopotamia, and had the sword and executioner's carpet brought in ; he then said to the prisoner : 'Thou hast done so, and acted so<sup>1</sup>; strike off his head!' 'Commander of the Faithful,' said Ibn Abī Duwād, 'the sword is going here before justice; make some delay in this business, for the man is wrongly accused. The ḫalīf kept silence for a short time—here we shall finish the narration in Ibn Abī Duwād's own words: 'I had then so pressing a call to make water, that I could no longer retain, yet I knew that if I went out, he should surely die; so I gathered my garment under me and yielded to it, but I succeeded in saving the man. When I stood up, al-Mu'taṣim saw that my garments were wet, and said: 'O Abī 'Abd Allāh, was there any water under you?' 'No, Commander of the Faithful,' I replied, 'but it happened so and so.' On hearing the circumstance, the ḫalīf laughed, and preyed for me; saying: 'Well done! may God bless thee!' Al-Mu'taṣim then clothed him in a robe of honour and ordered him a present of one hundred thousand dirhems."—Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Kalbī says that Ibn Abī Duwād was all soul from his head to his foot, and Lāzān Ibn Ismā'il makes this remark: "I never saw one man more submissive to another than al-Mu'taṣim was to Ibn Abī Duwād; when a trifle was asked of him, he would refuse, but Ibn Abī Duwād would then come in and speak to him in favour of his (the ḫalīf's) family, of the people in the frontier garrisons, of the inhabitants of Makkah and Medina and of those who dwelt far off in the countries of the East and West, and al-Mu'taṣim would grant all he desired. One day he spoke to the ḫalīf to obtain a sum of one million of dirhems digging a canal in the most distant part of Khurāsān, and received this answer: 'What have I to do with this canal?' 'Commander of the Faithful,' said Ibn Abī Duwād, 'God will call you to an equal account of your superintendence over the affairs of the most distant, and over those of the nearest of your subjects.' He then continued to manage adroitly the humour of the ḫalīf till the money was granted."

<sup>1</sup> As executions often took place in the audience-hall of the Khalif, a skin was then spread under the condemned person to catch the blood.

* 'to you' should be subjoined.—Ed.

1 The verbs فعل and صنع have both a peculiar signification in certain cases and mean to do something wrong or disagreeable:—فعلت ومنعت thou hast done (wrong) and committed (evil) لا أفعلن ولا أصنع I shall do and act, i. e. I shall punish—فعلانة a female who acts (wrong) a prostitute.

Al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Daḥḥāk, the celebrated poet, said to one of the metaphysicians* of that time: "In the opinion of us (poets) Ibn Abī Duwād does not know the (pure Arabic) language; you look on him as not being a good metaphysician*; the jurists think him unskilled in the law; but al-Mu'taṣim considers him learned in all those sciences." Ibn Abī Duwād narrates in the terms the origin of his connection with the Khalīfah al-Māmūn: "I used to go with the other doctors to Yaḥyā Ibn al-Akṭham's assemblies,<sup>1</sup> and I was there one day when a messenger came from al-Māmūn to state that the Commander of the Faithful desired Ibn al-Akṭham to go to him with all his company. Ibn al-Akṭham was unwilling to take me with him, but he had no means of leaving me behind; so I went with the others, and we held a conversation in the presence of al-Māmūn, who turned to look at me when I began to speak, and listened to my words with attention and approbation. He then asked me who I was, and I told him my pedigree. 'What,' said he, 'has delayed you so long from coming to see us?' Not wishing to do an ill office to Yaḥyā, I replied: 'Destiny detained me, and it was necessary that the term of God's written decree should arrive'. 'Let it be known to you,'<sup>2</sup> said he, 'that in future we shall hold no assembly unless you come to it.' I answered: 'Yes, Commander of the Faithful (I shall obey your order). After that, our connection was gradually formed." Others relate this affair in a different manner: Yaḥyā Ibn al-Aṭḥam, they say, went to Baṣra from Khurāsān to act as qāḍī in the name of al-Māmūn; this was towards the end of the year 202 (about June, A. D. 818).

---

1 The vizīrs and qāḍis held assemblies at their houses on stated days.

2 In the Arabic text لا اعلمن is printed for لا اعلن which is the right reading, though the MSS. gives the other; a similar error exists in good MSS. of the Qur'ān, where لا اذبحنه is written for لا ذبحن in the 21st verse of the 27th surat.

*Vide note on Mutakallimn p. 120. Since Kalam is scholastic philosophy, not metaphysics.—Ed.

Yahyā was then a young man, somewhat more than twenty years of age. He there chose for companions a number of men remarkable for their learning and honourable character, among whom was Ibn Abī Duwād. When al-Māman came to Baghdād in 204, he told Yahyā to choose some from among his companions to be admitted into the society of the Khalif and to be his frequent visitors. In consequence of this, Yahyā selected twenty, and among them Ibn Abī Duwād, but the khalif, on finding the number too great, ordered Yahyā to make a selection out of them, and ten persons were chosen, amongst whom was Ibn Abī Duwād; but the khalif desired a fresh reduction to be made, and Yahyā chose five, one of whom was Ibn Abī Duwād: such was the origin of his connection with the khalif. When al-Māman was on his death-bed, he addressed to his brother al-Mu'taṣim his testament, which contained this recommendation: "As for Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, let him never cease to be the associated of your councils on every subject, for he is most worthy of having such confidence placed in him<sup>1</sup>; and I recommend you not to take a vizīr when I die." Al-Mu'taṣim, on his accession to the Khalifate, appointed Ibn Abī Duwād chief qāḍī (qāḍī 'l-quḍāt), and deposed Yahyā Ibn al-Akṭham; and Ibn Abī Duwād became so great a favourite with the khalif, that neither his public nor private business was done without his advice. In the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 220 (September, A. D. 835), Ibn Abī Duwād cruelly persecuted Aḥmad Ibn Haubal and tried to force him to admit that the Qur'ān was created.<sup>2</sup> Al-Mu'taṣim in dying was succeeded by his son al-Wāṭḥiq Billāh, under whom Ibn Abī Duwād continued to enjoy high favour; when he died, his brother al-Mutawakkil succeeded to the khalifate, and in the beginning of his reign Ibn Abī Duwād lost the use of his right side from a paralytic stroke,

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: He is the place for that.

<sup>2</sup> Ibn Abī Duwād followed the Metazelite doctrine, and of course believed the Qur'ān to have been created; orthodox Muslims are bound to believe that it existed from all eternity. (See Pocock's Specimen, 2nd edition, p. 222; and d'Ohsson's Tableau de l'Empire Othoman, t. I, l. 83 et seq.)

in consequence of which al-Mutawakkil conferred the place of qāḍī on Muḥammad, son of Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, who was afterwards, in 236 (A. D. 850), replaced as Inspector of Grievances<sup>1</sup> by Yaḥyā Ibn al-Akṭham. Al-Aṭhiq had ordered that every person should arise on seeing the vizir Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, and Ibn Abī Duwād would stand up on seeing the vizir, but then turn towards the qibla in order to say his prayers; for which reason Ibn al-Zayyāt pronounced the following verses:

"He says his prayer since he had the advantage of bearing hatred against me; I see that from that time, he fulfils his pious duties and his fasts. May his heart be never free from such envenomed hatred as may leave him no repose."<sup>2</sup>

The praises of Ibn Abī Duwād were celebrated by a number of contemporary poets, and 'Alī al-Razī relates this anecdote on the subject: "I saw the poet Abū Tammām with Ibn Abī Duwād, to whom he was making a man recite for him a poem in which were these words:

"The generosity of Aḥmad Ibn Duwād has caused all the afflictions of evil Fortune to be forgotten! Never did I travel to distant regions without owing to his bounty my conveyance and my subsistence."

Ibn Abī Duwād here asked him if that thought was his own, or if he had borrowed it? To which Abū Tammām replied that it was his own, but that he made in it an allusion to the following verse, composed by Abū Nawās:

"If our words seem to convey the praises of any other, it is thou alone on whom our thoughts are turned."<sup>3</sup>

1 The Inspector of Grievances was a judge like the qāḍī, but he possessed moreover executive power.

2 Literally: As may leave him sitting down and standing up. (See de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 89, and t. III, p. 270.) The vizir had in view the double signification of this expression.

3 Ibn Khallikān has certainly made a mistake here and given a wrong verse.

*In the rendering of this line there is some error, the original means: He offered midday prayers since he had the advantage of bearing hatred against me, and I notice him after that offering sacrifice and keeping fast.

Abū Tammām had passed a great number of days at the door of Ibn Abī Dūwād without being admitted to see him, for which reason he complained bitterly of his conduct to one of his friends. Some time after, he was introduced, and Ibn Abī Dūwād said to him: "O Abū Tammām, have you reproached enough?" To which he answered: "Reproaches are made to individuals only, but thou art all mankind<sup>1</sup>; and how can reproaches be made to them?" "Where did you come by that idea?" said the qāḍī. Abū Tammām replied: "I borrowed it from the knowing one" (meaning Abū Nuwās), who said of al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī':

"God is not to be blamed if he unite (the noble qualities of) all mankind in a sole 'individual.'"

On the appointment of Ibn Abī Dūwād as Inspector of Grievances, Abū Tammām addressed his complaints to him in a poem, which contained the following passage:

"Since your neglect causes the ruin of poetry and poets, we need not wonder if they perish through the neglect of foreigners!<sup>2</sup> Yet poetry (like the laden camel) stirs from side to side, and strives to rise with the burden you put on it since you became redresser of wrongs.<sup>3</sup> Did poetry not give to facts a permanent form, men ambitious of glory would never learn whence you obtained your honours."

The same poet made his eulogium in a poem beginning thus:

"Didst thou see the (fair) faces which appeared to us between al-Liwa' and Zarnd?"

And which contains, this elegant thought:

"When God wishes to reveal (to the knowledge of the world) that excellence which remains (modestly) folded up, he allows an envious tongue to attack it. Did fire not

---

1 Thou art all mankind, because thou possessest all their good qualities.

2 This appears to be an allusion to the Turkish officers in al-Mutaṣṣim's service.

3 The burden you put on it is the obligation of celebrating you justice.

4 See note on Liwa', No. 10.

inflammé whatever it approaches, the sweet odour of aloes wood had remained unknown."<sup>1</sup>

The praises of Ibn Abī Duwād were celebrated also by Marwān Ibn Abī 'l-Jannab in the following verses :

"The tribe of Nizār<sup>2</sup> possesses all glory and honour despite its foes! Tell those who pretend to surpass that Nizār from whom spring the tribes of Khindif<sup>3</sup> and Iyād.—Tell them that the Apostle of God and the Khalifs belong to that family which is ours and that Aḥmad Ibn Duwād comes from it also. Until the Day of Judgment,<sup>4</sup> no such persons will ever be found in any family but ours (To it alone belong) a prophet sent by God, the successors in his covenant, and he who is directed and who directs to good."

When Abu Hiffān *al-Muhazzami<sup>5</sup> heard these verses, he pronounced the following:

"Tell those who pretend to surpass the tribe of Nizār, princes in the earth ruling over slaves! Tell them that the Apostle of God and the Khalifs belong to that family which is ours, but that we totally disclaim the pretended descendant of Iyād. Iyād itself shall not be one of our tribes if it admits the pretensions of Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād."

When Ibn Abī Duwād heard these verses, he said : "No one ever gave me so severe a wound as that boy al-Muhazzami* has done : were I not unwilling to show that I pay attention to him, I would inflict on him a punishment such as none ever suffered before! He has gone up to one of my proudest honours

1 Aloes-wood does not emit its perfume till burned.

2 We have seen, by Ibn Abī Duwād's genealogy, that he descended from Nizār.

3 Khindif is the true orthography of the word, not khindik, as given in the Arabic text on the authority of the MSS.

4 Literally: The day when men shall call unto one another. (See Qur'ān, surāt 40, verse 34.)

5 Abu Hiffān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥarb is supposed by the Khatib to have been born at Baṣrah. He dwelt at Baḡhdād, and was considered as possessing great literary acquirements: the celebrated al-Asma'i was one of his masters. (History of Baḡdad by the Khatib, Arabic MS. of the Bib. du Roi, fonds Asselin, No. 541.) The date of his death is not given.

*According to Arabic text it is al-Mahzani.—Ed.

and utterly destroyed it."<sup>1</sup> Ibn Abī Duwād used to recite frequently the following verses, but did not say whether they were his own or another's :

"Thou (O Lord!) art no feeble aid;—and success in all affairs is ensured by powerful aid. To-day we stand in need of thy succour; the physician is only called in when the disease is violent."

Al-Marzubānī has furnished us with some of the preceding anecdotes, but another historian gives the following on the authority of Abu 'l-Aynā: "The khalif al-Mu'taṣim was displeased with Khalid Ibn Yazīd Ibn Miṣyad* al-Shaybānī (whom we shall speak of again in the life of his father Yazīd), and recalled him from his government,<sup>2</sup> that he might appear before him to answer for his inability to make up a sum of money which he was called upon to pay; he had besides to answer other accusations. Al-Mu'taṣim held therefore a sitting in order to condemn him to punishment, and would not listen to the intercession of Ibn Abī Duwād, on whose generosity Khalid had thrown himself. The khalif having taken his seat, the qāḍi Ahmad (Ibn Abī Duwād) went to a place inferior to his own, on which al-Mu'taṣim said: 'Abu 'Abd. Allāh,<sup>3</sup> you are sitting out of your place.' To this the qāḍi replied: 'It is meet I should not sit in my place, but in a lower.' 'Why so?' said the khalif. The qāḍi answered: 'Because the public say that my place is not the place of one who can intercede and whose intercession will be heard.' 'Go back to your place,' said al-Mu'taṣim. 'Shall I go,' said the qāḍi, 'as one whose<sup>o</sup> intercession has been heard or as one whose intercession has been rejected?' 'Nay,' replied the khalif, 'go as one whose intercession has been heard.'

1 Literally: Undid it button by button. عروة means a loop or button hole.

2 Khalid had obtained from al-Mamūn the government of Moṣul. (See the life of Yazīd.)

3 The khalif here addresses him by his surname, which was a mark of great friendship.

*M. de Slane gives Muṣyad.—Ed.

Ibn Abi Duwād went up therefore to his place, and, when seated, said: 'The public will not be aware that the Commander of the Faithful has pardoned him, unless he receive a robe of honour.' The ḵhalif ordered him to be clothed in a robe of honour. Abū Duwād continued: 'There is due to him and his people six months' salary, which must be paid them, so if thou givest orders that they receive it now, it will serve instead of the (customary) present.' The ḵhalif said: 'I shall order it to be done.'—(The historian continues to relate) that when Ḵhālīd went forth in his robe of honour with the money borne before him, the people were waiting in the streets to witness his punishment, and one of them called out to him: "Praise be to God for thy escape, O prince of Arabs!" to which Ḵhālīd replied: "Silence! by God! the prince of Arabs is truly Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād!"—Great jealousy and mutual dislike existed between the qāḍī Aḥmad and the vizīr Ibn al-Zayyāt; so much so, that the latter refused to receive the visits of a friend of the qāḍī's specially commissioned by him to direct his affairs: the qāḍī on hearing of this went to the vizīr, and said: "I assure you that I do not come to you (as others do), to obtain from you either augmentation of slender means or exaltation from lowly rank: but the Commander of the Faithful has placed you in a post which obliges me to visit you: when I do so, it is on his account; and when I remain absent, it is on yours." He then rose up and retired. He was indeed possessed of such noble and honourable qualities as surpassed description. * [A poet composed a satire of seventy verses against the vizīr Ibn al-Sayyāt; when the qāḍī Aḥmad heard of it, he pronounced these verses:

"Better than a satire of seventy verses, is their purport condensed into a single verse. How much the state requires a shower of rain, to wash away that filthy stain of oil!"<sup>1</sup>

When Ibn al-Zayyāt heard of this epigram, he composed the following, in which he alluded to the profession of one of the qāḍī Aḥmad's ancestors, who was reported to have been a seller of pitch:

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibn al-Zayyāt means son of the oilman.

* [ ] From "A poet" to "our oil" on page 132 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

"O thou who vainly thinkest to stirize us, thou exposest thyself to death in attacking me. Our honour cannot be diminished by the mention of oil; the reputation of our family is too well known. 'Tis you who defiled the state with your pitch, and nothing could clean it till we washed it with our oil."]

Ibn Abī Duwād lost the use of his side the 6* of the Second Jumada, 233 (January, A. D. 848)†, a hundred and some days after the death of his enemy the vizīr, some say forty-nine‡ or fifty days only: the date of the vizīr's death shall be given in the letter M.<sup>1</sup> When the qāḍī received his paralytic stroke, he was replaced by his son Abu 'l-Walīd Muḥammad, who did not however fulfil the duties of his place to general satisfaction, having incurred the blame of many and merited the praise of a few only; so much so, that Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣālī, whose life has been already given, composed against him these lines:

"The faults which appear in you so plainly have effaced (the memory of) the virtues which your father left you as a legacy. By him you surpassed the sons of honourable men, as by yourself you have surpassed the sons of the vile."§

In which verses, I must say that the poet has gone to the extremes of eulogium and blame: the idea is quite novel.—Muḥammad continued to fill the places of qāḍī and inspector of wrongs for the army till the year 237 (A. D. 851), when al-Mutawakkil, being displeased with him and his father Aḥmad, ¶[ordered his lands to be sequestered; this happened on the 24 Ṣafar of the above year; he then deprived him of his place as inspector of wrongs, and afterwards, on Thursday, 5 of the First Rabi', he dismissed him from his place of qāḍī] and took from him a sum of one hundred and twenty thousand

<sup>1</sup> Ibn al-Zayyāt died A. H. 233.

*M. de Slane gives 7.—Ed.

†17.—Ed.

‡According to Arabic text it should be "forty-seven".—Ed.

§ The last hemistich should be rendered: "as by you he has surpassed the fathers of the vile".—Ed.

¶[ From "ordered" to "qāḍī" is not in the autograph.—Ed.

dīnārs,<sup>1</sup> with precious stones to the value of forty thousand dīnārs, after which he sent him away *from Baghḍād to Sarr-man-ra'a. The place of qāḍī was then entrusted to Yaḥya Ibn Akṭham al-Ṣayfī (whose life shall be given in the letter Y).—At the time when Ibn Abi Duwād incurred the displeasure of the khalīf so far as to be deprived of his landed property, witnesses had been examined to prove the crime he was accused of, and a great number of them and other persons were present in court; there was one of those witnesses in whom the qāḍī, during his administration, had placed little confidence, and who now stood up and said: "Call on us to witness in your behalf<sup>2</sup> according to what is written in this instrument; on which the qāḍī answered: "No! no! no! that is not your place;" and turning round to the other witnesses, he said: "Bear ye witness for me;" on which the man sat down abashed, and the public were filled with admiration for the firmness of the qāḍī and his strength of mind.<sup>3</sup>—The qāḍī Aḥmad Ibn Duwād died of his palsy in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 240 (June, A. D. 854), and it is stated on his own authority that he was born at Baṣrah in 160 (A. D. 776-7): he was, it is said, about twenty years older than the qāḍī Yaḥya Ibn al-Akṭham, but this is in contradiction with what is mentioned by me in the life of Yaḥya; I have, however, written it down here as I found it given, and God knows best whether it be correct or not.—Muḥammad, son of Ibn Abi Duwād, died in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijja, twenty days before his father. †[Al-Marzubānī, in his book above-mentioned (the Murshid), notices great variations in the dates of Ibn Abi Duwād's and his

1 The dinar of that time would now have an intrinsic value of about eleven shillings British.

2 The verb شهد على signifies : bear witness against or for a person. It is used with the latter signification in the Qur'an, surat 5, verse 48. As a legal term, it means : bear witness in respect to a person or thing.

3 Ibn Abi Duwād had so unfavourable an opinion of this person, that he would not allow him to give evidence even in favour of himself.

*According to Arabic text it means : sent him to Baghḍād from Surr manra'a.—Ed.

†[ ] From "Al-Marzubānī" to "sonumerous" on page 135 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

son's death; so I prefer giving here all he says on the subject: "Al-Mutawakkil appointed Muḥammad, son of Ibn Abī Duwād, to act in the place of his father as qādī and inspector of wrongs for the army; he then dismissed him from these places on Wednesday, the *19 Šafar, 240 and sequestered the landed property of the father and son, but this business was settled by a fine of one million of dinars. Abu 'l-Walīd Muḥammad, son of Aḥmad, died at Bagḥdād in Dhu 'l-Qa'da, 240, and his father died twenty days after. Al-Šūlī states, however, that the anger of al-Mutawakkil against Ibn Abī Duwād took place in 237." Al-Marzubānī says farther on: "The qādī Aḥmad died in Muḥarram, 240, and his son died twenty days before; some say that the death of the son occurred towards the end of year 239, and that they both died at Bagḥdād; some again state that the son died in Dhu 'l-Hijja, 239, and the father on Saturday, 23 Muḥarram of the year 240, at about a month's distance. God alone knows the truth in all that."—Abn Bakr Ibn Durayd says that Ibn Abī Duwād was full of affability towards men of education, no matter to what country they belonged, and that he had taken a great number of them under his care, treating them as members of his family and defraying their expenses. On his death a crowd of those clients went to the door of his house and cried out: "He is to be buried, that man who was the pillar of generosity and the ornament<sup>1</sup> of literature! of whom it was never said: 'Here he has committed a fault; there his talent has failed him.'" When his bier was borne up, three of them went forward to it, and the first recited these verses:

"To-day is dead the support of the state and of the language; he is dead, the protector whose succour was ever implored in misfortune! The paths of learning are dark since the sun of generosity is hidden by the mist of the winding-sheet."

The second then advanced and said:

"Through humble modesty he sought not the pulpit or the (vizir's) seat; yet, had he wished, the pulpit and the (vizir's) seat were his. Taxes are gathered for another, but for him is gathered a harvest of praises and (heavenly) rewards."

<sup>1</sup> Literally: The date.

*20. Our note about reckoning date has been written elsewhere.—Ed.

Then the third came forward and said :

"It is not the powder of musk which has been used to perfume his corpse, but rather the praises which he left behind. The noise you hear is not the creaking of the bier; it is the sound of hearts which are breaking."

Abn Bakr al-Jurjāni relates having heard Abu 'l-'Ayna al-Darīr (the blind) say : "I never met in the world with a man more polite than Ibn Abi Duwād; he would never say, on my leaving him : Page, take his hand<sup>1</sup>; but, Page, go out with him. I look on this expression as free from alloy, and (though he uttered it), he will not be the poorer<sup>2</sup>; and I never heard it from any other."—We may now conclude, for this article has become rather long, but the honourable actions of Ibn Abi Duwād were so numerous!—Iyādi means belonging to the tribe of Iyād, who was son to Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān.

32. THE ḤĀFIẒ ABŪ NU'AYM AL-ISBAHĀNĪ

The celebrated ḥāfiẓ Abū Nu'aym Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Māsā Ibn Mihrān al-Isbahānī (native of Ispahan), author of the Hilyat al-Awliyā<sup>3</sup>, and one of the principal

1 That is: Take his hand and lead him out.

2 The Arabian critics compare the pure and genuine idiomatic expressions of their language to good coin; indeed the word قد which means to separate good coin from bad, is often used to signify criticism.

3 The Hilyat al-Awliya, or Ornament of the Holy Men, contains the lives of the principal Muslim saints, the relation of their miraculous gifts and actions, etc.

traditionists, was a hafiz of the highest authority<sup>1</sup>: he had studied under men of the first merit, who* themselves received from him useful information. His Hilyat is a very fine book, and his History of Ispahān has furnished me with the life of his father 'Abd Allāh and the genealogy here given. In this life he says that his ancestor Mihrān became Muslim, which indicates that he was the first of them who followed that religion; he also adds that Mihrān was freedman to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mu'āwiya Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far Ibn Abī Ṭālib, of whom we shall again make mention.<sup>2</sup> In the same article, he states that his father 'Abd Allāh died in the month of Rajab, A. H. 365 (A. D. 976). and was buried beside his maternal grandfather. Abn Nu'aym was born in Rajab, 336 (beginning of A. D. 948), or 334 according to some, and died at Ispahān in the month of Ṣafar, 430 (November, A. D. 1038); others placed his death on Monday, 21 Muharram† of that year.—“Isbahan, pronounced Asbahān and Isfahān,<sup>3</sup> is one of the most famous cities in the province of al-Jibāl (or Persian 'Irāq), and was so called from its Persian name Sibāhān, which means collection of troops. It was denominated thus because the kings of Persia, the Khosroes, used to assemble their troops in that place as in the encampments ('askar) of Faris, Kermān, al-Ahwāz. etc. on the occurrence of any serious event. Sibāhān, in Arabic Isbahān, was built by Alexander Dhu 'l-Qarnayn. Such are the observations made by al-Sam'āni.

---

1 The meaning of the word hafiz has already been explained: No. 27, note on hafiz.

2 See d'Herbelot, Scaps fils de Mouyle.

3 The Arabs, not having in their alphabet an equivalent for the letter p are obliged to write Ispāhān with a b or an f.

*The pronoun in اخذوا عنه is not necessarily for his teachers; it most likely means and (many people) studied under him and were profited by him.—Ed.

†30 October.—Ed.

33. AL-KHAṬĪB AL-BAGHDĀDĪ

The ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Thābit Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Maḥdī Ibn Thābit, better known by the name of al-Khaṭīb (the preacher), native of Baḡhdād, composed *a history of that city, and other useful works. He was a ḥāfiẓ<sup>1</sup> of exact knowledge and a scholar of profound learning; had he written nothing but his History, that production would be sufficient for his reputation, as it shows him to have possessed vast information; and yet he is author of nearly one hundred works, and his merit is too well known to require description. He learned jurisprudence from Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Maḥāmili, the qāḍi Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī and other masters, but though a doctor of law, he made the Traditions and history his principal study. His birth took place on †Thursday, 23rd of the latter Jumādā, 392 (May, A. D. 1002), and his death occurred at Baḡhdād on Monday, 7th Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 463 (September, A. D. 1071)‡: al-Sam'ānī says that he died in the month of Ṣḥawwāl. I am informed that Abū Ishāq al-Ṣhīrāzī was one of those who carried his bier, through gratitude for the great service rendered him by the Khaṭīb, whom he had been accustomed to consult on the difficulties in his works. It is a singular coincidence that the death of the Khaṭīb, who was the ḥāfiẓ of the East, took place on the same day as that of Abū 'Umar Yasuf Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, author of the Kitāb al-Ist'āb, who was at that period the ḥāfiẓ

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 27, note on ḥāfiẓ.

*According to the autograph it should be rendered: "He composed many useful books, e. g., History of Baḡhdād and others.--Ed.

†Thursday fell on 21 Second Jumādā corresponding to 7 May according to Edward Mahler's calculation. It should be borne in mind that the day and date are later additions.--Ed.

‡6 September.--Ed.

§In the same year according to the autograph and printed Arabic text. Besides there is distinctly given another date of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr's death which is the last day of Second Rabi' 463 A. H., and Khaṭīb's 7th Dhu 'l-Hijjah 463. Vide No. 808.

of the West<sup>1</sup>: (see the life of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr in the letter Y). Ibn al-Najjār says in his History of Baghḍād that Abu 'l-Barakat Isma'il Ibn Sa'd the Sufi<sup>2</sup> related the following circumstance: "The shaykh Abū Bakr Ibn Zahra the Sufi had a tomb made for himself by the side of Bishr al-Iḥāfi's, and went once a week to sleep in it and read the Qur'ān through; but the Khaṭīb, in dying, had desired to be buried beside the grave of Bishr, for which reason the students of the Traditions* of Ibn Zahra had requested him to give the Khaṭīb the preference, and allow him to be interred in that tomb which he had got made for himself, but Ibn Zahra gave a most determined refusal, and said: 'Must the place I prepared for myself since so many years be taken from me?' On seeing him so resolute, they went to my father Abu Sa'd and told him what had passed, on which he sent for Ibn Zahra and addressed him in these terms: 'I will not ask you to give them up the tomb, but I will propose to you this question: Were Bishr al-Iḥāfi among the living and you seated by his side, and if the Khaṭīb were then to enter and take a place lower than yours, would it be becoming in you to remain seated above him?' 'Certainly not,' replied Ibn Zahra, 'I should rise and give him up my place.' 'So you should do at the present moment,' said my father; and on this the heart of the shaykh Ibn Zahra relented, and he gave them permission to bury the Khaṭīb in his tomb, which was done.—The Khaṭīb was interred by the gate of Iḥarb<sup>3</sup>; during his illness he gave in alms all his riches, which amounted to two hundred dinars, and which he distributed to the traditionists, jurisconsults,

---

1 Northern Africa, Sicily, and Spain are the countries which the Muslims designated by the appellation of the West (al-Maghrib).

2 Lower down the father of the Sufi is named Abu Sa'd, instead of Sa'd as here given: but one of the MSS. has Abu Sa'd in both places, and this is probably the true reading.

3 In the original text this word is incorrectly printed جرب.

اصحاب الحديث means traditionists.—Ed.

and faqirs; he also ordered that the clothes he wore should be 'given in charity and that all his books should be appropriated as a waqf<sup>1</sup> to the use of Muslims. He left no posterity. The number of his works is upwards of sixty. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī was one of those who carried his bier. Some say he was born in *391 (A. D. 1001), but God knows best. There exist relations of holy dreams<sup>2</sup> in which he appeared after his death. He had become chief professor and ḥāfiz of Traditions in that epoch." End of the extract from the work of Ibn al-Najjār.

34. ABU 'L-HUSAYN AL-RĀWANDĪ

Abu 'l-Husayn Aḥmad Ibn Yahyā Ibn Ishāq al-Rāwandī, a celebrated scholar and author of a discourse on †metaphysics, was one of the most talented men of his time: the works he composed amount to about one hundred and fourteen: among them are the Ignominy of the Motazelites, the Crown, the Emerald, the Jewel (al-Qaḥab), etc.; ‡he wrote also an account of his sittings and conversations with a number of learned metaphysicians.§ The doctrines he professed were peculiarly his own, and are to be found stated in the writings of the schoolmen. He died A. H. 245 (A. D. 859), at the place called the Raḥabah of Mālik Ibn Ṭawq **al-Taghlibī<sup>3</sup>; some say at Baghḍād; he was then about forty years of age. In the work called the Bustān<sup>4</sup> his death is placed in 250, but God knows

1 See No. 22, note on waqf.

2 See note on dreams, No. 19.

3 See Abu 'l-Fidā's Geography. Arabic text, page 280.

4 Ḥājji Khālifah. in his Bibliographical Dictionary, notices sixteen works bearing the title of Bustān; the one cited here by Ibn Khallikān is perhaps that composed by Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfarā'īni.

* This year seems to be correct because it was in this year that Thursday fell on 24 of Second Jumādā.—Ed.

† علم الکلام is scholastic philosophy or theology.—Ed.

‡ It should be rendered: "He had sittings and discussions with a number of scholastic theologians.—Ed.

§ Scholastic theologians.—Ed.

**M. de Slane gives "al-Ṭha'labī".—Ed.

best!—Rāwand means native of Rāwand, a village in the dependencies of Qāsān near Ispahān; there is another place called Rāwand outside Naysāpur; this Qāsān must not be confounded with Qāshān, situated in the neighbourhood of Qumm. *[This Rāwand is mentioned by Abū Tammām al-Ḥā'ī in his Ḥamāsah, chapter of Elegies<sup>1</sup>; he says: "They relate that two men of the tribe of Asad went forth to Ispahān, and took there into fellowship as brother a dihqān,<sup>2</sup> who lived in a place called both Rāwand and Khuzāq; they made him their cup-companion, and one of them having died, the dihqān and the other survivor took his tomb for cup-companion, inasmuch as they drank two cups and poured out one upon the tomb; then the dihqān died, and the man of the tribe of Asad who remained drank to the graves of both, and sung these words:

'O my two friends! awake; how long do you repose! Is it then true that your sleep shall have no end? Is it by reason of your lengthened slumber that you answer not him who calleth unto you?—(It would seem) as if a cup-bearer had steeped your senses in wine! Know ye not that in all Rāwand and Khuzāq I have no other friends but you? I shall remain by your tombs, and never quit them during the long course of nights, unless a voice<sup>3</sup> answer from your graves. I will weep over you till the hour of death, but what will give answer to the moans of the afflicted if he weeps your loss? Could one life be given to preserve another, I had offered mine as a ransom for yours. I now pour out wine upon your graves; if it reach

---

1 See Freytag's Hamāsah, page 398.

2 Dihqān is a Persian word, signifying both farmer and historian; it is generally used to designate a person of ancient Persian family, possessing hereditary landed property. See Dr. Mohl's translation of the Shāh Nāmāh, t. I, page 8 of the Introduction.

3 See a curious note on this superstition in M. de Sacy's Anthologie Grammaticale, p. 211.

*[ ] From "This Rāwand" to end is not in the autograph.—Ed.

you not, it will at least moisten the earth by which you are covered.' "

Khuzāq is the name of another village in the neighbourhood of Rāwand.]

35. AHMAD IBN MUHAMMAD AL-HARAWĪ

Abū 'Ubayd Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Abī 'Ubayd al-'Abdī al-Muwaddib (the schoolmaster) al-Harawī al-Fāshānī : such is the genealogy usually given of the author of the Kitāb al-Ḥaribayn. I have however found it stated thus on the title-page of a copy of his work*: Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān.† He was ranked among the men of profound learning, and his book shows him to have possessed no inferior talent; but I have no knowledge of any circumstances of his life deserving mention, excepting the fact of his having been pupil to Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azhārī, the philologist (whose life I intend to give); it was under him that al-Harawī studied and acquired his information. The work which I have mentioned contains the explanation of the uncommon expressions peculiar to the Qur'ān and the traditions of the Prophet: it is a useful book, and copies of it have spread to every country. It is said that the author was fond of loose‡ conversation, that he took (wine) in private, and kept company with men of wit in their parties of pleasure and debauch; God pardon him (for doing so) and us (for mentioning it)! To something of this kind also al-Bākhārzi appears to allude in his biographical notice on some learned men of Khurāsān.§ Al-Harawī died in the month of Rajab A. H. 401 (A. D. 1011): this patronymic is derived

---

*Refers to كتاب الغريبين.—Ed.

†"God knows best" is omitted.—Ed.

‡It is erroneous translation: "البذله" means changing clothes daily. Probably de Slane trusted its variant reading التبدله.—Ed.

§ "God knows best" is omitted.—Ed.

from Herāt, the name of one of the great cities in Khurasān which capitulated to Al-Aḥnāf Ibn Qays (general) under the orders of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Āmir (in the thirtieth year of Hijrah).<sup>1</sup> Fāshān is derived from Fāshān, name of a village in the dependencies of Herāt; it is also called Bāshān according to al-Samānī; mention has already been made of Qāshān and Qāsān.<sup>2</sup> These four names are sometimes confounded one with another, but written as they are here, no mistake can occur.

6.3 AL-KHAWĀFĪ

Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar al-Khawāfī, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī was the most able polemic divine of his time; he had studied jurisprudence under the Imām al-Haramayn,* and was one of his most distinguished pupils. He was qādī of Ṭūs and its environs, and obtained great reputation among the learned by his skill in argument and his ability in silencing an adversary. He was a fellow-student of Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī, and both were equally gifted with great talents, which the former showed in argument, the latter in his writings. Al-Khawāfī died at Ṭūs, A. H. 500 (A. D. 1106). Khawāfī is derived from Khawāf, a canton of Naysāpur, containing many villages.

37. ABU 'L-FUTŪḤ AḤMAD AL-GHAZZĀLĪ

Abu 'l-Futūḥ Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ṭāsī al-Ghazzālī, surnamed Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion), was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, and brother to 1 See note on al-Aḥnāf No. 22. Al-Aḥnāf. had already invaded Khurasān, A. H. 22. See Major Price's Retrospect of Muhammadan History.

---

2 See No. 34.

*M. de Slane has omitted "al-Juwaynī".—Ed.

the imām Abu Ḥāmid al-Ḡhazzālī. He was good preacher, handsome in person, and endowed with the gift of miracles and other signs of divine favour. His ruling passion was making public exhortations, and for this he neglected the law of which he was a doctor; but he gave lectures on this science in the Niẓāmiyah College, when acting as substitute for his brother Abu Ḥāmid, who had ceased to profess from religious scruples. The work written by his brother, and entitled Iḥyāʾ ʿulūm al-dīn (Revival of Religious Sciences) was abridged by him into one volume with the title of Lubāb al-Iḥyāʾ (Pith of the Iḥyāʾ); he was also author of another treatise, named al-Dhāt al-ḥirāt fī ʿilm al-Baṣīrat (the Treasure, treating of the science of vision).<sup>1</sup> He had travelled over many countries, acting as a servant to the Sāfis, and was disposed to solitude and retirement from the world. Ibn al-Najjār relates this anecdote in his History of Baghdad: A person in the presence of Aḥmad al-Ḡhazzālī read out of the Qurʾān this verse: O, my servants! who have transgressed against yourselves, etc.<sup>2</sup> on which al-Ḡhazzālī remarked that God had ennobled them by calling them His servants (which had not been the case, were the possessive pronoun omitted); and he then cited the following verses (in support of his observation):

‘The blame which I incur for loving Laylā<sup>3</sup> bears lightly on me; it pains me little, that my enemies say: “He is an outcast.” When called by my name, I am deaf; but I hear (and answer) when people say; “O slave of Layla!”’

---

1 It is difficult to say what the science of vision may be, but judging from the character of the author, I am inclined to think that this work contains some mystic doctrine.

2 Qurʾān, surat 39, verse 54.

3 I have substituted here the proper name Laylā for the pronoun her, so as to be enabled to render into English the idea which comes in the next verse; as the words. O slave of her would be unintelligible, though a literal translation of the Arabic.

It is thus another poet has said :

"Call me by no other name than slave of Layla, for that is the noblest of my names."

Aḥmad al-Ghazzālī died at Qazwīn, A. H. 520 (A. D. 1126). The patronymic Tāstī is derived from Tās, the name of a place in Khūrāsān composed of two towns, Tāberm and Nawqān, to which appertain more than one thousand villages. Ghazzālī is a derivative from Ghazzāl (cotton spinner), formed after the system generally followed by the people of Khūwarezm and Jurjān, who from Qaṣṣār (a fuller) form Qaṣṣārī, and from 'Attār (a druggist), 'Attārī.<sup>1</sup> Some pronounce Ghazzālī with a single z, deriving it from Ghazzālāh, the name of a village in the dependencies of Tās, but this pronunciation differs from the one in general use, though al-Sam'ānī has adopted it in his Ansīb.—Qazwīn, a large city in Persian 'Irāq, situated near the castles of the Ismā'ilites.<sup>2</sup>

38. IBN BARHĀN AL-'UṢŪLĪ

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Wakīl, generally known by the name of Ibn Barhān, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī and profoundly learned in the dogmas ('uṣūl) of faith and the minor principles of doctrine, as also in those points wherein the four orthodox sects agree or differ. He studied jurisprudence under Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī, Abū Bakr al-Shīrī and Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī; having become master of the subject; he composed the Wajiz, or Brief Exposition of the Principles of Jurisprudence, and professed during

1 The people of Khūwarezm, in so doing, committed a great barbarism, for qassārī and 'attārī, if they had any meaning, would signify a fullerman, a druggistman.

2 The fullest account of the Ismā'ilites is given by M. de Sacy in his History of the Druzes, t. I, Introduction.

less than a month<sup>1</sup> in the Nizamiya College at Baghḍād, where he died A. H. 520 (A. D. 1126).

39. AL-NAHHĀS THE GRAMMARIAN

Abu Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'īl Ibn Yūnus al-Murādī, surnamed al-Naḥḥās, was an eminent grammarian and native of Egypt. Among the instructive works written by him may be reckoned his Commentary on the Qur'ān; a Treatise on the grammatical analysis of the Qur'ān; another on the verses of the Qur'ān which have been abrogated and those which abrogated them; a work on grammar, entitled al-Tuffāha (the Apple); one of Etymology; and Explanation of the verses given as example by Sībawayh in his grammar, being the first work on the subject; the Secretary's Guide; the Kāfi (Sufficient), a treatise on grammar; a treatise* on the ideas usually met with in poetry; the works of ten poets edited and commented by himself; a greater and a less treatise on the Pause and the Commencement of Phrases; a Commentary on the seven† Moallaqas; Lives of the Poets (Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara): etc. His traditionary learning was obtained from Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān

---

1 In the Ṭabaqāt al-Shaṣṣiyyin: شهرًا واحدًا which fixes the sense of دون السحر an expression of very doubtful import. The author of this Ṭabaqāt says: Ibn Barhān was born at Baḥḍād, A. H. 479; he composed the Basīṭ or Detailed treatise on the Law, the Wasīṭ or treatise of Medium extent, and the Wajiz, or Brief Exposition, as also other works. His talent for resolving legal difficulties became proverbial; and though Ibn Khalikān states that he died in 520; it is well known that 518 was the year of his death.

* العاني is that branch of grammar which treats of lucid expressions of one's ideas.—Ed.

† According to the autograph it is nine, probably in addition to the seven famous poems; the commentary included of poems of Nabi' ḥah Dhubyāni and A'shā. Some people reckon it to be 10 and include one by 'Abid also.—Ed.

al-Nasā'ī, whom he gave as his authority when communicating that species of information to others; the grammar he learned from Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Aḥḡaṣḡ, Abū Ishāq al-Zajjāj, Ibn al-Anbārī, Niṣṡawayh, and the first literary men of 'Irāq, having travelled from Egypt to that country for the purpose of studying under them. He was a man of sordid habits, parsimonious and niggardly towards himself; on being given a turban-cloth he would cut it into three out of avarice; what he required for his sustenance, he would buy himself, or else live upon his acquaintances, to whom he became a burden; notwithstanding which he was ardently sought after by numbers, for the profit and instruction which were to be obtained from his lessons. Died at Old Cairo, on Sunday, 5th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijja, 338 (May,* A. D. 950); some say 337. He came by his death in the following manner: he had seated himself on the staircase of the Nilometer, by the side of the river, which was then on the increase, and began to scan some verses according to the rules of prosody, when a common fellow, who heard him, said: "This man is pronouncing a charm to prevent the overflow of the Nile, so as to raise the price of provisions;" he then thrust him with his foot into the river, and nothing more was heard of him.—Nahḡās means a worker in copper; in Egypt this name is given to him who makes vessels in brass.

40. IBN BAQIYYAH AL-'ABDĪ, THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū Ṭalīb Aḡmad Ibn Bakr Ibn Baqiyya al-'Abdī, an able and talented grammarian; he wrote a good commentary on the grammatical treatise compose, by Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī, and entitled the 'Īdāh. The only circumstance of his life which has come to my knowledge is the fact of his having studied grammar under Abū Sa'īd al-Sirāfī, Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Rummānī and Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī. Died on Thursday, 20th Ramadān, A. H. 406

(A. D. 1016). 'Abdi means descended from Abd Qays, who was the son of Afsa' Ibn Du'ma and ancestor of a great and famous tribe.

41. ABU 'L-ABBĀS IBN SAHL THE KĀTIB

The kاتب Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Sahl, author of the Kitāb al-Kharāj.<sup>2</sup> He died A. H. 270 (A. D. 883). Being totally ignorant of the circumstances of his life, I must pass it over in silence; my only reason for mentioning him is on account of his celebrated work, as its readers might wish to know at what time the author lived.

42. THA'LAB THE GRAMMARIAN

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Yahya Ibn Zayd Ibn Sayyār the grammarian, generally known by the name of Tha'lab, was an adopted member of the tribe of shaybān, wherein he had for patron Ma'an Ibn Zā'idā, whose life we shall give in the letter M. Tha'lab was chief grammarian and philologist among the learned men of Kufa<sup>3</sup>; he had taken lessons from Ibn al-A'rabī and al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkar, and his authority was cited by his pupils al-A'ḥfāṣh al-Aṣghar, Abu Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī, Abu Umar al-Zāhid, and others. Complete confidence was placed in the exactness of his traditional information; his opinion was

---

<sup>1</sup> See note on Aksa, No. 19.

<sup>2</sup> This work appears to be a treatise on the revenue arising from the land tax; the author's having been a kātib or writer in one of the government offices appears to confirm this conjecture.

<sup>3</sup> In the early ages of Islamism, the grammarians and philologists who studied at Kufah differed on certain questions from those of Basrah. These two schools are often spoken of.

decisive in doubtful questions; he was a man of virtue noted for his retentive memory, his veracity, his knowledge of the genius of the Arabic language, and his correctness in reciting ancient poetry: even while a youth, he held a high place among the masters in learning. When Ibn al-A'rābī had doubts on any point, he would say to Tha'lab; "Abu 'l-'Abbās! what is your opinion on the subject?" such was the confidence he placed in his extensive information. Tha'lab used to say: I began my travels for the purpose of studying Arabic and philology in the year 216; at the age of eighteen I had read the Hudud by the grammarian al-Farrā, and on completing my twenty-fifth year, I knew by heart (and mastered) every question without exception which al-Farrā had treated. Abū Bakr Ibn Mujāhid al-Muqri relates as follows: "Tha'lab said to me: 'O 'Abū Bakr! the Qurānists were taken up with the Qur'ān and obtained a happy reward; the traditionists were taken up with the Traditions and obtained a happy reward; the doctors were taken up with the law and obtained a happy reward: I have been taken up with Zayd and Amr<sup>1</sup>; O, that I knew what my state will be in the next world! 'After quitting him, I had a vision in my sleep that very night, and I saw the blessed Prophet, who said to me: Give my greeting to Abū 'Abbās and say: Thou art master of the superior science.<sup>2</sup> On this expression the holy servant Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Radbārī<sup>3</sup> observes that the Prophet's meaning was: By this

1 That is: I have been taken up with the study of Arabic grammar, in which one of the most common examples is ضرب زيد عمرا dreams Zayd beat 'Amr.

2 We have here a proof that the study of grammar is not only lawful جائز but praiseworthy محمود. See note on No. 19.

3 Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn 'Ata عطا al-Radbārī was an inhabitant of Tyre and chief of the Ṣūfīs in Syria: he died A. H. 369 (A. D. 979). (Al-Yāfi'i's Annals).—Another celebrated shaykh and Ṣūfī, bearing the same surname as the preceding, Abū 'Alī Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim al-Radbārī, a native of Baḡdhād, but who settled in Egypt, where he became chief of the Ṣūfīs شيخ مصري زمانه. He had studied under al-Junayd and others; and was versed in a great variety of sciences. He is related to have said: My master in Sufism was al-Junayd, in the Traditions Ibrāhīm al-Harbī, in Jurisprudence Ibn Surayj, and in literature Tha'lab. Died A. H. 322 or 323 (A. H. 934-5) (Yāfi'i's Annals, Al-Uthmānīs Ṭabaqāt.)

(science) spoken language is made perfect and discourse becomes connected; all other sciences also stand in need of it. Abū Umar al-Zāhid, surnamed al-Muṭarriz, relates the following anecdote: "I was once at one of Abu 'l-Abbās Tha'lab's literary parties, when a person asked him a question, to which he answered; 'I do not know.' 'How! said the other, you say I do not know, and yet it is to reach you that the camels pant* (in thier hurried march) and towards you that travellers advance from every city.<sup>1</sup> To this Abu 'l-Abbās replied: 'Did your mother possess a daie<sup>2</sup> for everything I do not know, she would be a rich woman.'" Tha'lab is author of the Faṣīḥ (the Pure), a (philological) work, small in size, but of great utility; †[he composed also some poetry: Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī says, in one of his dictated lessons<sup>3</sup>: "Tha'lab recited to me the following verses, but I know not whether they are his or another's:

'Since thou, who art the food of my life, hast abandoned me; how long then will that life endure of which thou wast the food? It will last as long as the desert-lizard<sup>4</sup> can live in water; as long as the fish can live in a verdant plain.'

---

1 This figurative phrase, which means simply that persons came from all parts to consult him, is very frequently employed by Arabic writers.

2 To avoid the coarseness of the original Arabic, the word بعر is here rendered by date; its true signification is a pellet of sheep's or goat's dung. The same anecdote is given by M. de Sacy in his Anthologie Grammaticale, page 123; but he there translates بعر by camels; in this he does not appear to be right.

3 See No 12, note on امالى.

4 The desert-lizard, or dubb; this animal always avoids water. (See Jackson's Morocco, 2nd edition, page 102.) It is about eighteen inches long, and burrows in the sands of the desert; its flesh is eaten by the wild Arabs. Leo Africanus says, in speaking of this animal: Aquam non potat, et si quis aquam in os infundat, Evestigio moritur.

*M. de Slane has read it كبد and the same is given in printed copies. The autograph has كبد which means back of a camel.—Ed.

† [ ] From "he composed" to "for the sake" on page 150, is not in the autograph.—Ed.

On this, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Barā' recited us these additional verses;

" 'Wast thou then deceived in me, because I assumed affected patience, thoug that 'soul of mine had received from thee a mortal wound ? If what I suffer were inflicted 'on the solid rocks, it would overthrow them; if on the wind, the wind would cease to blow, and would remain in a lengthened slumber ! But patience? God may cause us 'to meet again; and then I shall complain to thee of the woes which were caused by 'thee and which I encountered for the sake.' "

Tha'lab was born in the third month of the year 200 (October A. D. 815), according to *Ibn al-Qarāb<sup>2</sup> in his History; but others place his birth in 201 or 204: a circumstance, however, which points out the year 200 is furnished by the following relation given by Tha'lab himself: "I saw the ḵhalīf al-Māman on his return from Ḵhurasān in the year 204; he had just gone forth from the Bab al-Ḥadīd (Iron Gate) on his way to al-Ruṣāfa; the people were drawn up in a double line, and my father bore

1 The qāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Barā' al-'Abdī was native of Baḡhdād and a reader of the Qur'an. Died in Shawwāl, A. H. 291 (A. D. 904) Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā, MS. No. 742. fol. 72).

2 No mention is made of this historian by Ḥājji Ḵhalīfa or the other works I have consulted. Even the true pronunciation of the name is uncertain.—The true reading is perhaps Ibn al-Furāt ابن الفرات; in al-Yaḥyā's Annals, year 384 (A. D. 994) is found the following note: In this year died Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Furāt, native of Baḡhdād. He learned the Traditions from al-Mahāmīlī and many other doctors of that period. The Ḵḥaṭīb says (see his life, No. 33): "I have been told that he possessed one hundred quires (of notes) furnished to him by 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Miṣrī; that he wrote one hundred commentaries تفسير, and the like number of histories: he was an author of authority and veracity.

*Ibn al-Qarrāb because in the autograph it is very clear.—Ed.

†It cannot be ابن الفرات as suggested here because in the autograph it is clearly ابن القراب with تشديد on.—Ed.

me up in his arms and said: 'That is al-Māman, and this is the year four;' which words I have kept in mind up to the present moment; I was at the time four years of age." He died on Saturday, 17* (some say 10†) of the First Jumādā, A. H. 291 (April, A. D. 904) at Baḥdād, and was buried in the cemetery at the Gate of Syria. The accident which caused his death happened in the following manner: he had left the mosque on Friday, when the after noon prayer was over; and some time before he had got a deafness, which prevented him from hearing unless with great difficulty; he was holding a book in his hand and reading it in the street, when a horse knocked against and threw him into a deep pit, out of which he was taken nearly senseless. He was immediately borne to his house, complaining of his head, and he died the next day. Shaybānī means belonging to Shaybān, which is a tribe sprung from Bakr Ibn Wā'il; there were two chiefs of this name: Shaybān, son of Tha'labah, son of 'Ukābah, and Shaybān, son of Dhuhl, son of Tha'labah, son of Ukābah, so the former was uncle to the latter.—Tha'lab composed the following works: the Maṣnūn (Precious, a treatise on grammar); points on which grammarians disagree; on the Idiomatic Expressions peculiar to the Qur'ān; on the faulty Expressions made use of by the vulgar; the differences which exist between the seven readings or editions of the Qur'ān; on the usual Ideas found in the poems of the ancient Arabs; on Diminutive Nouns on Nouns of the first and second declension‡; on those parts of Speech which can, or cannot assume the functions of others; on abnormal Words and Expressions; a Collection of Proverbs; on the Confidence (to be placed in the ancients<sup>1</sup>), on the final Pause and the commencement of Phrases; a Vocabulary; on the Alphabet; a Collection of Sitting, or Discourses; the Awsal, or Grammar of Medium Extent; on the Parsing of the Qur'ān; Question discussed; Iḥadd al-Nahw (the limits of Grammar).§

<sup>1</sup> The Arabic title is Kitāb al-Īmān (Liber Fidei); the subject of this work is doubtful.

*7 April.—Ed.

†31 March.—Ed.

‡Mutable and Immutable nouns.—Ed.

§M. de Slane has omitted etc."

43. THE ḤĀFIẒ AL-SILAFĪ

Abu 'l-Tāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Silafā, native of Ispahān, and surnamed Ṣadr al-Dīn (centre of religion), was ḥāfiẓ of great information, and a follower of the sect of al-Shāfi'i. He travelled to different countries for the purpose of gathering traditions respecting Muḥammad from the great masters in that branch of knowledge, and went to Bagḥdād where he studied jurisprudence under al-Kiyā al-Harrasī, and Arabic under the khaṭīb Abu Zakariyā Yaḥyā al-Tabrīzī the philologist. He taught the Traditions on the authority of Abū Muḥammad Ja'far Ibn al-Sarrāj and other principal doctors; and having passed through many regions and journeyed over many lands, he went by sea from the city of Ṣār (Tyre) to Alexandria, where he arrived in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'da, 511 (March. A. D. 1118). Having fixed his dwelling in that city, he was visited by persons from the farthest countries, who came to attend his lessons and profit by his tuition. Towards the end of his life, he remained without a rival, and, in the year 546 (A. D. 1151), al-'Adil Ibn al-Sallār, vizīr to al-Zāfir al-'Ubaydī, prince of Egypt, founded a college at Alexandria and appointed him its president, which establishment is still called, after him the Silafī College. In my youth, I met, in Syria and Egypt, a number of persons who had been his pupil, and from whom I learned traditions which they authorised me, by a written certificate, to teach on their authority, al-Silafī wrote a great deal, and I extracted from his papers a mass of useful information: among other particulars. I picked out the following verses by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Abbār, a native of Spain:

"Were my mind not wholly taken up with the Emīr and with praise worthy his deserts, I should have sung the charms of my fair Gazelle in a more lengthened strain; but engaged in the description of Majesty, I was forced to lay aside my description of Beauty."<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> In the original Arabic, these two verses are remarkable for the verbal artifice of their construction.

I found also in his handwriting these two verses, composed by Buthaina on the death of her lover Jamīl:

"Never for a single instant have I felt consolation for the loss of Jamīl; that time has not yet come. Whilst thou art absent, O Jamīl, son of Ma'mar! the pains of life and its pleasures are to me equally indifferent."

Al-Silafī used often to recite this verse :

" 'Tis said that the inhabitants of a dwelling are its souls; but you I look on as the soul of souls."

His dictates<sup>1</sup> and notes are in great quantity, but, as concision is to be preferred in such an abridged work as this (I am precluded from extracts).—He was born at Ispahān about the year 472 (A. D. 1079), and died in the frontier city of Alexandria on the morning, or, as some say, on the eve of Friday, 5th of the Second Rabi, 576 (August,* A. D. 1189). He was interred at Wa'la, which burial-place lies within the city walls near the Green Gate (al-Bab al-Akhdar), and contains the tombs of many holy men, such as al-Ṭurṭuṣhī and others. It is said that this cemetery takes its name from 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Wa'la al-Sabā'ī (native of Saba in Yemen), who inhabited Egypt and had studied under Ibn 'Abbās<sup>2</sup>; other derivations

---

1 See No. 12, note on ابالى.

2 Abu 'l-'Abbās 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās (sons to Abbās, uncle of Muḥammad), was born at Mekkah, A.D. 619, three years before the Hijrah. Immediately on his birth he was presented to Muḥammad, who begged of God to instruct him in the knowledge of the divine law and the interpretation of the Qur'ān. The deep learning and piety which Ibn 'Abbās displayed in after-life were attributed by the Muslims to the efficacy of their Prophet's prayers; and when yet a youth, his merit was so generally recognized that the khalifs Abu Bakr, 'Umar and 'Uthmān always yielded him the place of honour in the assemblies. He was considered as the ablest interpreter of the Qur'ān then in existence, and it was said of him that none knew better the traditions the legal decisions of the three first khalifs, the law, the interpretation of the Qur'ān, and the sciences of poetry and arithmetic.

have also been given. * [The date here assigned to his birth is the one I found given by the learned traditionists of Egypt, and among the rest, the ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-'Aẓīm al-Mundhir,<sup>1</sup> the

(Continued from page 153)

Crowds flocked to him from all parts to hear his lectures, and it is related on good authority that he gave regularly public lessons, one day on the interpretation of the Qur'ān; the next, on the law; the third, on grammar; the fourth, on the history of the Arabs أيام العرب; and the fifth on poetry. It was to his efforts that the study of the poems composed before the introduction of Islamism, became of such importance to the Muslims; for the frequently quoted verses of the ancient poets in proof of the explanations he gave of different passages of the Qur'ān, and he used to say; "When you meet with a difficulty in the Qur'ān, look for its solution in the poems of the Arabs, for these are the registers of the Arabic nation." On being asked how he had acquired his extensive knowledge he replied: "By means of an enquiring tongue and an intelligent heart." He was appointed governor of Basrah by the Khalīf 'Alī, and remained there for some time; he then returned to Hijjāz, and died at Taif, A. H. 68 (A. D. 687), aged 70 years. The celebrated Muḥammad Ibn al-Hanafiyyā pronounced funeral prayers over him and said: "To-day is dead the doctor رباي of this people and the sea of learning." He was tall in stature, large bodied, of a clear complexion and remarkable for the beauty of his countenance and his dignified appearance; his hair was dyed with hinna. Towards the end of his life, he lost the use of his sight.—(Tab. al-Fuqahd. Tab. al-Qurra Siyar al-Salaf. MSS. of the Bib. du Roi.)

1 The ḥāfiẓ Zākī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Aẓīm Ibn 'Abd al-Qawī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Salāmī al-Mundhirī was descended from a family which dwelt in Syria, but he himself was born in Egypt, in the month of Sha'ban, 581 (November, A. D. 1185). Having attained a profound knowledge of the Qur'ān, Arabic literature, jurisprudence, and composed a Mu'jam and other important works, he became shaykh of the college for the study of the traditions (Dar al-Ḥadith al-Kamiliyya); this college was founded at Cairo, A. H. 622 (A. D. 1225), by al-Malik al-Kāmil Naṣr al-Dīn Muḥammad, son of al-Malik al-'Ādil. This was one of the only two colleges specially designed for teaching the Traditions; the other was founded at Damascus by al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn Zinkī. During the twenty years of his administration he led a most abstemious, pure, and holy life, and instructed numerous pupils who became first traditionist of his age, but I have since found a different statement in the Zahr al-Ribāʿ, etc. (Meadow Flowers, or Elucidator of the purport and scope (of figurative Expression and Allusions) by Jamāl al-dīn *al-Safrāwī,<sup>1</sup> who says: "My master, the ḥāfiẓ Abn ʿIṣṣah al-Silafī has told me from conjecture, and not from certain assurance, that he was born in 478; this obliges me to conclude that he lived to the age of 98 years." I read also in the History of Baghdād, Muḥibb al-Dīn ʿIbn al-Najjār, § the following passage in confirmation of al-Safrāwī's statement:

(Continued on page 155)

* [ ] From "The date" to "his life" on page 156 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

(Continued from page 154)

later illustrious for their learning. Ibn Kḥallikan was one of the number. He wrote also an abridgement of the imām Muslim's Traditions; a summary of the traditions published by Abn Dawūd; a collection of useful notes on the same work; a valuable treatise entitled Al-Tarḥīb wa 'l-Tarḥīb (Incitement and Determent), the first volume of this work, which contains a collection of Traditions, is in the Bib. du Roi, fond St. Germain, No. 86). etc. He died in Egypt in A. H. 656 (A. H. 1258.—(See Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfiʿiyyin.) It is worthy of remark that the Bib. du Roi is in possession of volume containing a portion of the work of Abn Dawūd (No. 354, ancien fonds), in which is found a number of notes in the handwriting of 'Abd al-Azīm al-Mundird.

I The imām Jamāl al-Dīn Abn 'I-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abn 'I-Faḍl 'Abd al-Majid Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ḥafs al-Safrāwī, doctor of the sect of Malik, was born at Alexandria about the commencement of the year 544 (May, A. D. 1149), and died in 636 (A. D. 1238-9). Besides the Zahr ar-Riyad, he wrote a treatise on the seven editions of the Qur'ān, the title of which is; al-I'tān fi 'l-Qar'at al-Sab'e. (Ṭabaqāt al-Qorru MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds, No. 742, fol. 191.)

*Full genealogy is not given here which is as follows: al-Shaykh Jamāl al-Dīn Abn 'Ibn Qāsim Abdur Raḥman Ibn Abn 'I-Faḍl Abd al-Majid Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ḥafs al-Safrāwī al-Iskandari.—Ed.

†In the opening line he has given correct kunya which is different, i.e., there is definite article expressed there but the same is omitted here. It may be due to the faulty copy at his disposal.—Ed.

‡The name "Muḥammad Ibn Maḥmūd known as" is omitted in it.—Ed.

§"al-Bahgdādī" is omitted.—Ed.

“ ‘Abd al-Ghanī al-Maḡdīsī<sup>1</sup> relates having asked the ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī the date of his birth, and that he received this answer from him: ‘I remember the assassination of Niẓām al-Mulk<sup>2</sup> in the year 485’, and I was then under ten years of age!’ Now, if his birth was in 472, as the people of Egypt state, al-Silafī would not have said: I remember the assassination of Niẓām al-Mulk in the year 485; for it must be concluded from what they say that al-Silafī was then thirteen or fourteen years of age; but it is not the custom for a person (mentioning a circumstance which happened) when he was of that age, to say; I remember such and such an event; it could only be said by one who was then four or five or six year of age. Whence it appears that al-Ṣafrāwī’s statement comes nearer to truth than the other; he was, besides, a pupil of al-Silafī’s and had heard him say: My birth was in 478. Al-Ṣafrāwī is also an author whose word cannot be called into question, and on whose exactness no doubts can be thrown; to which I may add that I have not heard of any person within the last three hundred years, who lived for a century, much less of one who lived for more, the qāḍī Abu ‘l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabari excepted; for he lived to the age of 102 years. as we shall again mention in his life.]—Al-Silafī was so named after his grandfather Ibrāhīm Silafa. Silafa is a Persian word, meaning three lips (seh leb); he received this appellation because of his lips was split and appeared bouble, without counting the other, which remained in its natural state. This word was originally Silaba, but the b has been replaced by f.

1 The ḥāfiẓ ‘Abd al-Ghanī Ibn ‘Abd al-Wāhid al-Maḡdīsī, doctor of the sect of Ibn Ḥanbal, learned the Traditions at Damascus, Alexandria, Baḡhdād, and Ispahān, and became the highest authority on the subject. He composed a number of works, and was remarkable for his piety, his strict observation of the precepts contained in the Sunnah, and the exhortations which he made to induce his hearers to do what was right, and avoid what was forbidden. Died A. H. 600 (A. D. 1203). His life has been written in two volumes by the ḥāfiẓ Dīā al-Dīn (light of religion). Al-Yāfi’s Annals.—The ḥāfiẓ Dīā al-Dīn ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad al-Maḡdīsī, doctor of the sect of Ibn Hambal, was a traditionist of great authority in Syria. The ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī was one of his masters. Died A. H. 643 (A. D. 1245.) (Tab. al-Ḥuffāz.)

2 This event is related in the Annals of Abu ‘l-Fida.

44. SHARAF AL-DĪN IBN MAN'Ā* 'L-IRBILI

Abu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad, son to the learned shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḥḥ Mūsā Ibn †Radi al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍl Yūnus Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Man'ā Ibn Mālīk Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sa'ad Ibn Sa'id Ibn 'Āsim Ibn 'Āid Ibn Ka'ab Ibn Qays Ibn Ibrāhīm, doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and surnamed Sharaf al-Dīn (nobleness of religion), came of an eminent and powerful family, which was one of the first in Arbela. This imām was possessed of great talent and judgment, and to an exemplary conduct he joined a handsome person. He is author of a good commentary on the Tinbīh, a treatise on Muslim Law (composed by Abu Ishāq al-Shīrāzi): two Abridgements of the Iḥyā 'Ulūm al-Dīn by the imām al-Ḡhazzālī, one of them concise, the other more detailed. In the course of his lectures<sup>1</sup> he explained portions of the Iḥyā, which he cited from memory; his mind being richly stored with traditional knowledge and extensive information. His family was noted for its learning, as may be seen hereafter in the lives of his paternal uncle and grandfather; as also of his father, whose plan of study he followed in acquiring his varied information in the science. A great number of pupils finished their education under him and the professorship of the college founded at Arbela by the prince of the city, al-Mālīk al-Mua'zzam Muẓaffar al-Dīn Ibn Zayn al-Dīn, was confided to him after the death of my father. It was towards the beginning of the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 610, that he arrived at Arbela from Mawṣil; my father having died on the eve of Monday, 122nd Shā'bān of the same year. When a boy, I followed his lessons, and never yet heard any one who lectured so well; he did not cease to fill that place until he made his pilgrimage to Mekkah; when he returned, he made a

1 The expression التي الدروس which, though of frequent occurrence, is not to be found in our Lexicons, means to make a course of lectures.

*M. de Slane has unwarrantedly advanced the genealogy by four generations. Man'ā is the name of his great-great-grandfather. —Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Rida. —Ed.

‡6 January, 1214. —Ed.

short stay, and then went to Mawṣil, A. H. 617 (A. D. 1220), where he was appointed president of the Qāhiriya College; he remained in this studying and teaching till his death, which took place on Monday 24th of the Second Rabi', 622 (May,* A. D. 1225): born at Mawṣil, in the year 575 (A. H. 1179). He was the best of men, and when I think of him, the world is of little value in my eyes.—On reflecting, I observe that the life of Sharaf al-Dīn began and ended with the reign of al-Nāṣir lidīn Allāh Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, for this khalif was invested with authority A. H. 575, the year in which Sharaf al-Dīn was born, and they both died at one and the same period. It was at Arabela that Sharaf al-Dīn began to comment the Tanbih, having borrowed a copy of it from me, which contained useful notes written in the margin by a man of considerable talent, and all which I afterwards perceived to have been inserted by him in his commentary. The author of these notes was the shayḥ †Raḍi al-Dīn Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn Ghanim Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm al-Jilī (native of Jilān), follower of the sect of al-Shafi', and muftī of the Nizāmiya College of Baghdād. He was one of the most distinguished and talented men of his age and composed a work on jurisprudence, forming fifteen volumes; he was very religious and had refused to fill every honourable place which was offered for his acceptance.<sup>1</sup> His death took place on Wednesday, 3rd of the First Rabi', A. H. 631 (A. D. 1233),‡ and he was interred in the Shuniziya (a cemetery of Baghdād), having lived upwards of sixty years: it was some time after the year 580 that he left his country to study in Baghdād.—Let us return to Sharaf al-Dīn: this doctor did not quit his native place in furtherance of his studies,

---

<sup>1</sup> He was offered the place of qāḍi at Baghdād, and that of superior of the great monastery (al-Rib'at al-Kabir); his work was entitled the Ikmāl (completion).—(Tab. al-Shāfi'īn.)

*3rd.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Riḍa.—Ed.

‡7 December.—Ed.

but made them at Mawṣil under his father's tuition, and for this reason the jurisconsults used to express their astonishment at his being able to study at his native place and in the midst of his family, holding, as he did, a high rank and being taken up with temporal affairs. He produced, however, what we see; and were I to undertake the description of his excellent qualities, I should be long in finishing; so what has been already said must suffice.

45. IBN 'ABD RABBIH

Abu 'Umar Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Rabbih<sup>1</sup> (son to the slave of his lord) Ibn Ḥabīb Ibn Ḥudayr Ibn Salīm al-Qurṭudī (native of Cordova), was descended from an enfranchised slave of the Spanish Omayyide khalif Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mu'āwīya Ibn Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam. This writer was deeply learned in traditional knowledge and possessed great historical information; his 'Iqd, or Necklace, is a work of much merit and contains something on every subject, and the Diwān, or Collection of his poetical compositions, is very good; the following are specimens of his poetry:

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibn 'Abd Rabbih is now pronounced, according to the vulgar idiom, Ibn 'Abd Rubbuh. In the المتمم بقية (Arabic MS. belonging to the Asiatic Society of Paris; consult on this work Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica, No. 1671), the author states that 'Abd Rabbih was grandfather of our poet and that his father's name was Muḥammad. Besides the 'Iqd or Collar, a work containing much important information on the manners of the ancient Arabs, and of which some extracts have been given by M. Fresnel in his letters, Ibn 'Abd Rabbih composed a great deal of poetry, which he collected into a work entitled al-Maḥasīn; in which every erotic piece was followed by another on morality and devotion; his intention in this was to purify محض (Maḥaṣṣ) the profane ideas of the one by the religious sentiments of the other.

"O thou, on whose face the **idhār*<sup>1</sup> hath traced two lines which excite (my mind to) sadness and anguish! I was not convinced that thy looks were a cutting sword, till thou placed on thy cheeks (the izar as) a baldrick."

He has repeated the same idea in the following lines (which have been attributed, however, to Abū Ṭāhir the kātib,<sup>2</sup> and to Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Abd al-Wahid al-Baḡhdādī):

"There was a youth on whose cheeks the **idhār* had traced its outline with (dark musk, whilst they were dyed with the blood of hearts (wounded by his beauty)). On feeling convinced that the (languishing) narcissus of his eyes was a cutting sword, he took the violet (—Like Izar) for a baldrick."

This idea has been borrowed by Baha al-Din al-Sinjārī,† who says, in one of his poems :

"O sword of his eye, thou art now complete in beauty! Before his izar appeared, thou was without a baldrick."

1 See No. 15, note on 'idhār'.

2 Perhaps Ibn Abī Ṭāhir is the true reading. His life is given in the abridgement of the Khaṭīb's History of Baḡhdād: it runs as follows: The kātib Abū 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfur طيفور came of a family which dwelt at Marw; he was an eloquent man, a poet and a narrator of historical traditions; he possessed also great intelligence, and was celebrated for his learning. He composed a history of the khalifs and their adventures, giving his facts after, Umar Ibn Shabba and others. His son states that he died in 280 (A. D. 893); he was buried in the cemetery near the Gate of Syria (at Baḡhdad). Born at Baḡhdad, A. H. 204 the year of al-Māmūn's entry (to that city; see page 18) (MS. No. 634, fol. 50 verso).

*In the autograph copy the word is "al-Jamāl" meaning beauty; so it should be rendered: O thou, on whose face the beauty hath drawn two lines which . . ."

†In the autograph there is again العذار الجمال for العذار.—Ed.

‡al-Baha As'ad al-Sinjārī is the correct name.—Ed.

By Ibn 'Abd Rabbih :

"She bid me adieu with sighs and embraces, and then asked when we were to meet again: she appeared to me unveiled, and the dawn was lighted up (by that beautiful neck) which tunicks and collars encircled. 'O thou whose looks languish (but not from sickness) whatever place is before thy eyes become the deathbed of lovers. The day of separation is indeed a dreadful day! O ! that I had died before the day of separation.' "

By the same:

"If the fair see that the garment of thy youth is folded up (by approaching age), they will fold up from thee their favours; and when they call thee uncle<sup>1</sup> that name serves only to increase thy disappointment."

The next verses are taken from a long qaṣīdah addressed to al-Mundhir Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ḥakam Ibn Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mu'āwiya Ibn Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān al-Ḥakami the Omayyide king of Spain:

"Spain is covered with glory through al-Mundhir Ibn Muḥammad. Its birds have become tame, and its wild beasts accustomed to man."

On which the vizir Ibn al-Maghribī makes the following observation in his work entitled Adab al-Khawāṣṣ : 'It is related that this poem, on getting into circulation, gave great pain to Abū Tamīm Ma'add al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh, and that he felt much mortified by the falsehoods and misrepresentations which it contained, till an answer was composed to it by his own poet Abu 'l-Ḥasan Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Iyādi of Tunis who wrote, with that intention, a qaṣīdah, in the same rhyme and measure, beginning thus:

---

<sup>1</sup> Uncle and Aunt were the terms made use of in addressing elderly persons; son of my uncle and daughter of my uncle were the titles used between persons of the same age, though strangers to each other.

'The rustic hut where Zaynab passed the spring is in ruins; that dwelling, which before had a voice, is now become silent.'

By Ibn 'Abd Rabbih:

"The raven croaked and I said : That is the greatest liar among birds unless his forebodings be confirmed by the cry of the camel."<sup>1</sup>

In which verse is an allusion to these words of another poet:

"The feet of our camels were worn and wounded by their journey; they could no longer assist (their rider and bear him) towards (the object of his) love: among camels will always be found some lame and some broken-winded. The evil omen consists not in the croaking and foreboding of the raven, the only evil omen is the camel, the male and the female."

There is every abundance of fine ideas, besides the foregoing in the poems of this author. He was born the 10 Ramaḍān, A. H. 246 (November,* A. D. 860); died on Sunday, 18 of the First Jumada, 328 (March,† A. D. 940), and was buried the next day in the cemetery of the Banu 'l-'Abbās at Cordova. Some years before his death, he lost the use of his side from palsy.—Qurṭubi means native of Cordova, which is a great city in Spain and capital of the empire.

---

1 The nomadic poet imagined that the raven foresaw the epoch in which a tribe was to change its quarters; and that it then hastened, with ill-omened cry, towards the spot which was soon to be abandoned, and in which he hoped to have found his mistress still remaining. The 'ṭhurāb al-Bayn, or raven of separation, is often spoken of by poets. Some camels utter loud cries when loading for a journey.

*28.—Ed.

†1st—Ed.

46. ABU 'L-'ĀLA AL-MA'ARRĪ

Abu 'l-'Āla<sup>1</sup> Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Da'ūd Ibn al-Muṭahhar Ibn Ziyād Ibn Rabī'a Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Rabī'a Ibn Anwar Ibn Aṣḥam Ibn Arqam Ibn al-Nu'mān Ibn 'Adi Ibn Ghafafān Ibn 'Amr Ibn Barīḥ Ibn *Judḥaymah<sup>2</sup> Ibn Taym Allāh Ibn As'ad Ibn Wabarah Ibn †Taghlib Ibn Ḥulwān Ibn 'Imrān Ibn Ilḥāf Ibn Quḍa'a al-Tanūkhī al-Ma'arri (native of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān) was a celebrated philologist and poet, profoundly learned in all the various branches of polite literature. He studied grammar and philology under his father at Ma'arra, and Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'ad, the grammarian at Aleppo; his numerous works are well known, and his epistles have been carefully preserved; the Luzūm, or poetical pieces, composed by him on a more strict principle than is required by the usual rules of prosody,<sup>3</sup> are numerous and fill nearly five books; he composed also the Siqṭ al-Zand (Falling Spark of Tinder), with a commentary by himself, and entitled by him, Daw al-Siqṭ (Light of the Spark which falls). I have been told that he is also author of a book on belles-letters, called al-Ayk wal-Ghuṣūn (the Forest and the Branches), and generally known by the title

---

1 The orientalists of the old school pronounced this name Abu 'l-'Ola, but the true pronunciation is Abu 'l-'Āla; M. de Sacy has published some of his poems in the Chrestomathie. This text and Latin translation of two other poems by the same author will be found in M. Vuller's edition of Tarafa's Moallaka.

2 This is the true reading; see Qamūs under ب ر ح.

3 There are some poems in which the final foot of each verse is doubly or even triply rhymed. This is what the Arabic prosodians call Lūẓam ma lu Yalzūm, Ilṭizām or lṭnāt.—See De Sacy's Commentary on Hariri, page 419.

*M. de Slane reads it Khozaima which is supported by Qamūs, but it is doubtful if the reference is to the same Barīḥ.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Tḥalab.—Ed.

of al-hamza wal-Ridf,<sup>1</sup> in about one hundred parts; and I have been informed by a person who happened to read the one hundred and first, that he did not know what could be wanting on the subject after the volume he had read. Abu 'l-Āla was the acromestnd man of the age, and had, among other pupils, Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī al-Tanukhī and the khatib Abū Zakaryya al-Tabrizī. He was born at Ma'arra about sunset on Friday the 27 of the First Rabi', A. H. 363 (December, A. D. 973)*; about the beginning of the year 367; he lost his sight from the smallpox, a white film having covered his right eye, while the left had disappeared completely. (Relative to this) the hāfiz al-Silafī relates the following anecdote: "I was informed by Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Walīd Ibn 'Azīb al-'Iyādī that he went with his uncle to visit Abu 'l-Āla, whom he found sitting on a felt rug, and that he was an old man. 'He prayed a blessing on me,' said he, 'and stroked my head, for I was then a boy. At this moment I think that I still see him and his two eyes, one of which was startling out of his head<sup>2</sup> and the other deeply sunk in its orbit; his face was marked with the smallpox; his body lean.' " When Abū 'l-Āla had finished his al-ūni' al-'Azizī, which is a commentary on the poems of al-Mutanabbī, one of the company happened to read to him some of the descriptive passages composed by that poet, on which Abū 'l-Āla said: "One would think that al-Mutanabbī had looked into futurity and seen me when he pronounced this verse:

'I am he whose Learning is seen by the blind, and whose word causeth the deaf to hear.' "

---

1 This title induces me to think that at least a portion of the work was in verse, having for rhyme a hamza (ء) with a letter of prolongation, which, in that case, is called the ridf by Arabic prosodians.

2 M. de Sacy, in his Chrestomothie, tom. III, page 89, reads in this place نادره for نادره but all the MSS., without exception, and the context of Ibn Khallikān's article are against his opinion.

*25 January, 974.—Ed.

He made a commented abridgement of Abū Tammām's poetical works, and entitled it Zikra Habib (Recollections of a Beloved)<sup>1</sup> another, of the poems of al-Buḥturī, which he name 'Abṭḥ al-Walid (Sport for Children);<sup>2</sup> and a third of al-Mutanabbī's, to which he gave the title of Mu'jiz Aḥmad (*Miracle of *Muḥammad*).<sup>3</sup> In these three works he explained the obscure words and allusions found in their poems, and indicated the ideas which they had borrowed from others, or later poets from them; he also declared himself their champion, in criticizing, however, some passages of their writings, and occasionally, pointing out their faults. He went to Bagdad in the year 398 (A. D. 1007-8) and a second time in 399, when he remained there a year and seven months; after which, he returned to Ma'arra and confining himself to his house, began to compose his works. Numbers then frequented his lessons; pupils came to him from every region; and learned men, vizīrs, and persons of rank became his correspondents. He called himself the doubly imprisoned captive<sup>4</sup> in allusion to his voluntary confinement, and the loss of his sight. During forty-five years he abstained from flesh through a religious motive, as he followed the opinion of those ancient philosophers who refused to eat flesh, so as to avoid causing the death of any animal; for in killing it, pain is inflicted; and they held it as a positive principle, that no hurt should be

---

1 Or Recollections of Habib; Abū Tammām's names was Habib.

2 Or Amusement afforded by Walid; the poet al-Buḥturī was so called.

3 Or Miraculous Excellence of Aḥmad, which was the real name of al-Mutanabbī.

4 Literally: The pledge of the two prisons, M. de Sacy has completely misunderstood this expression.—See Chrestomathie, t. III, p. 90.

*Should be rendered: miracles of Aḥmad.—Ed.

done to any living creature.<sup>1</sup> At the age of eleven years he made verses, and we select following from his Luzūm:

"Seek not to attain superior rank by thy own efforts unless Fortune favour the elegant writer, his pen is as inefficient as a spindle. Two Simāks<sup>2</sup> have their dwelling in the sky; and though one bears a lance, the other is unarmed."

Abu 'l-'Āla died on Friday, 3 of the First Rabi,* some say the 13, A. H. 449 (May, A. D. 1057), and I have been told that, in his will, he ordered the following verse to be written on his tomb:

"I owe this to the fault of my father; none owe the like to mine."

This is also in accordance with the belief of those ancient philosophers who taught that the engendering of a child and the bringing of it into the world is a wrong done to it, for it is then exposed to accidents and injuries. His illness lasted three days, and on the fourth he died, having none near him but his nephews: on the third day, he told them to write down what he was going to say, and they took paper and pens for that

1 The author of a marginal note in the MS. of Ibn Khallikān, No. 93, fonds St. Germain, says: It might be concluded from the words of Ibn Khallikān, that Abu 'l-'Āla continued in these heterodox opinion till his death; but, says he, more than one historian state that he returned to the principles of Islamism.—In the essay on the life and poetry of al-Mutanabbī (quoted page 110, note), it is stated that Abu 'l-'Āla composed a Qur'ān which, as he imagined, was to surpass Muḥammad's influence as it did in style. A short extract of it is then given.

2 The star Acturus is called by the Arabs the Simāk bearing a lance (al-Simāk al-R mih); and spica Virginis bears the name of al-Simāk al-A'azal (the unarmed Simāk). The signification of the word Simāk is doubtful; the Arabic commentator on Ulug Bek says that these stars were so called on account of their altitude (the Arabic verb Samaka means to rise, to be exalted). M. Ideler, in his Untersuchungen über den Ursprung und Bedeutung der Sternnamen, page 51 et seq; has treated this question without obtaining, however, a satisfactory solution.

*2nd seems more probable which is given as an alternative date in the autograph but be it 2nd or 3rd it corresponds to Friday, 9 May.—Ed.

†Cousins is appropriate word.—Ed.

purpose, but he dictated to them observations which were quite incorrect; on which the qāḍī Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh al-Tannūkhī said: "May God lighten your grief! the shaykh is already dead!" The next day, Abu 'l-'Āla expired, and his disciple Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Hammām deplored his death in these lines:

"Though, from religious feelings, you never caused tears* to flow, you now oblige our eyes to shed tears of blood! You have sent abroad a (glorious) reputation (spreading around) like (the odour of) musk, and perfuming the listener and the mouth (of him who speaks your praises).<sup>1</sup> When pilgrims wish to pass the night conversing on your merit, I see the wearer of the iḥram pay (before-hand) a fine to expiate (the sin of being perfumed)."<sup>2</sup>

In the first of these verses the poet makes allusion to Abu 'l-'Āla's religious belief, which forbade the slaying of animals; of this we have already spoken. His tomb is in the court of a house belonging to his family; this court is entered by a little old door; the whole is in extremely bad order from neglect and want of care, for the family do not pay the least attention to it.—Tanukhi means belonging to Tanu'ī, which name was given to a number of tribes that had assembled together, in former

---

1 In interpreting this difficult verse, I have followed al-Yafi, who explains it in his Annals (Arabic MS. No. 644, year 449). This writer quotes the Qur'ān, surat 37, verse 147 to prove that أل takes sometimes the signification of وأل. Al-Yafi attributes to Abu 'l-'Āla some eloquent epistles.

2 The iḥram, or dress worn by pilgrims on entering the sacred territory of Mekkah, consists in two pieces of clean, white, woollen cloth, without seams. When wearing the iḥram pilgrims are not allowed to make use of perfumes.—See D'Ohssons Tableau de 'l-Empire Othoman, tom. III, pp. 64, 68.

*"Blood" according to the autograph and printed text.—Ed.

times, in the province of Bahrain, where they fixed their dwelling, after binding themselves by oath to afford each other mutual assistance. The word **tanukh* means to dwell. This was one of the three Arabian tribes which professed Christianity; the two others were Bahra and Taghlib. — Al-Ma'arrat means belonging to Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, a village of Syria near Ḥamāh and Shayzar; it was called after al-Nu'mān, son of Bashīr al-Anṣārī,<sup>1</sup> who took up his dwelling there. Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān was taken by the Franks from the Muslims in the month of Muḥarram, 492 (December, A. D. 1098), and continued in their possession till the year 529 (A. D. 1134-5), when it was taken by 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī Ibn Āq Sunqur, who generously restored to the (Muslim) inhabitants the property (which the Franks had taken from them).

47. ABŪ 'ĀMIR IBN 'ABD AL-MALIK AL-ASHJA'Ī AL-ANDALŪSĪ

Abu 'Āmir Aḥmad Ibn Abī Marwān 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān Ibn Dhu 'l-Wizāratayn<sup>2</sup> al-Ā'la Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Īsa Ibn Shuhayd al-Ashja'ī, native of Cordova in Spain, was descended from al-Waddāḥ Ibn Razāḥ, who was a partisan of al-Daḥḥāk Ibn Qays

---

<sup>1</sup> See Mishkāt al-Maṣābih, vol. I, page 228, note. To what is there said of al-Nu'mān Ibn Bashīr may be added that his death took place A. H. 64.

<sup>2</sup> Dhu 'l-Wizarat (possessing the double vizirat); a title given to those ministers who were at the same time invested, with civil and military authority: see Mr. Weyyer's work, entitled "Specimen criticum exhibens locos Ibnī Khacanis de Ibn Zeidouno" (page 60, note).

*Transliteration differs, see Tanukh overleaf.—Ed.

al-Fihri at the battle of Marj Rāhiḡ<sup>1</sup> Ibn Bassām mentions al-Ashja'ī in the Kitāb al-Dha'irā, and praises him in the highest terms ; he gives also copious extracts from his epistles and poetical writings, with an account of the principal events of his life. He was one of most learned in Spain, versed in a variety of sciences, and eminent in all the branches of literature ; a written correspondence in a playful style was carried on between him and Ibn Ḥazm the Zahirite, and a number of works of singular merit and originality were composed by him, amongst which the following may be specified : Kashf al-Dakk wa 'Iyḍāh al-Shakk ; al-Tewābi' wa'l-Zawābi' ; Hānūt 'Aṭṭār.<sup>2</sup> To his talents he joined a most noble character, and many anecdotes are related of his generosity. As a specimen of his poetry we give the following beautiful passage from one of his qasidas :

“The vultures know that his warriors are lions when they meet with a warrior's prey ! pinched with hunger, they hover above his head ; but the points of his lances send them to their nests, glutted with food. ”

Though this is a beaten thought, and one in which he was anticipated by a number of poets both before and after the establishment of Islamism, yet he has expressed it most happily and turned it with much elegance. The following verses are specimen of his light and graceful style :

<sup>1</sup> The battle of Marj Rāhiḡ took place in the 64th year of Hijra between the partisans of the K̲h̲alīf Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam and 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr.

Al-Daqqāq fought for Ibn al-Zubayr, and was slain with a great number of his people. In the Ḥamasa are some fragments of poetry relating to the event. Al-Waddāh was made prisoner in that battle by the K̲h̲alīf Marwān, who spared his life. It was from him that the family of the Banu Waḍḍāh in Murcia were descended. (Al-Rushḡti : quoted by the author of the Bugh̲hiyat al-Multamis.)

<sup>2</sup> According to Ḥājji K̲h̲alīfah, the first of these three works is a treatise on legerdemain : the title of the second is rendered Genii et Daemones by Mr. Flügel (see Lex Biblog., No. 3711) and that of the third signifies the Perfumers or Druggists' Shop ; according to the author of the Bugh̲hiyat, this work treats of grammar.

"(My mistress), oppressed with inebriation, yielded to sleep, and the eyes of the (jealous) keepers who guarded her at night were closed in slumber. Though (her dwelling) was remote, I went towards it and drew near gently, as one in quest of an object which he well knows where to find. I glided towards her as slumber glides towards (weary eyes) and I went up to her chamber, as a sigh mounts up (from the bosom): And I passed my night with her in delight, till the mouth of morning smiled: And I embraced the fairness of her neck and sipped kisses from her dark red lips."

How prettily has the same idea been expressed in the following verses composed by Abu 'l-Manṣar Ṣarrdarr:

*[ "How often, during the shades of night, have we arrived, without previous notice, at (the encampment of an Arab) tribe; but found not, by their fire, a person who could direct us to our way.<sup>1</sup> And yet their scouts were not remiss: but we fell in among (gently) as falls the dew."

A number of poets have employed the foregoing thought, but it takes its sources in this verse by Imra'ut 'l-Qays<sup>2</sup>:

"And I mounted up (gently) towards her, after her family had fallen asleep; so mount bubbles in water, one after another."

Most of Abū 'Āmir's poetry is of surpassing beauty: he

---

<sup>1</sup> In the Qur'ān, surat 27, verse 7, is found the following passage: "Remember when Moses said to his family: I see fire from which I will bring you tidings (of your way)."

The Arab tribes used to light fires by night on high places, so that travellers in the desert might be directed towards their hospitable dwellings, and receive information to guide them on their way.

<sup>2</sup> See my edition of Le Diwān d'Amru 'l-Kais, page 34.

*[ ] From "How often" to "one after another" is not in the autograph.—Ed.

was born A. H. 382 (A. D. 992), and died at Cordova, on Friday morning, 30 of the First Jumādā, 426 (April* A. D. 1035): on the next day he was interred in the cemetery of Umm Salma.<sup>1</sup> Mention is made of his father 'Abd al-Malik in the Kitāb al-Silat (by Ibn Bashkuwal). Al-Ashji'i means belonging to Ashja which is great tribe descended from Ashja, son of Raith, son of Ghatafan.

48. IBN FĀRIS AL-RĀZĪ THE PHILOLOGER

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Fāris Ibn Zakariā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabīb al-Rāzī was a deeply learned man in various sciences and in philology especially, having acquired a most exact knowledge of that subject ; his work the Murjmiḥ fi 'l-Lughat, or Collection of Philological Observations, contains, notwithstanding its concision, a great mass of information.<sup>2</sup> He composed also the Hilyat al-Fuḡala (Ornament of Doctors); some beautiful epistles and a treatise on philological questions, which work juriconsults studied with great attention, and from which al-Ḥarīrī took the idea of his Maqāma, entitled al-Ṭaybiya,<sup>3</sup> in which he proposes legal questions to the number of one hundred. Ibn Fāris dwelt at Hamadān and had for pupil Badī al-Zamān al-Hamadāni, the author of the Maqāmas (and whose life shall be given). He composed some good poetry, of which we may give the following passages :

1 Abu 'Āmir, in his latter days, was the standard bearer of poetry and eloquence in his country ; he left none like him, and died childless. He was a man of generous character, and a gay disposition ; he had considerable knowledge in medicine. (Buḥārī at al-Mulāml.)

2 The style of the Mujmil is concise, no doubt; but the work itself, which is an Arabic lexicon, forms two respectable folio volumes. A copy of it is in the Bibliothèque du Roi, fonds. St. Germain, Nos. 194, 195.

3 Tabiya is derived from Tayba, one of the names given to the city of Medinah. The thirty-second Maqāma was so called because towards the beginning of it, mention is made to Tayba. In M. de Sacy's edition, this Maqāma is entitled al-Harbiya.

*Ibn-Khalkān gives Friday, the last day of the month, to which de Slane makes 30. In fact it was 29 corresponding to 11 April.—Ed.

"A (nymph) graceful and slender passed near us, she was a Turk by nature and by name.<sup>1</sup> She looked with a tender, a tempting glance (a glance) as languishing as a grammarian's proofs are slight."<sup>2</sup>

By the same :

"Hearken to the words of a true adviser : a man of good counsel and a friend : Take care ; beware that you pass a single night with your confidence placed in those whose word alone is an authority."<sup>3</sup>

By the same :

"When you have to send a person on business which has engaged your mind, send an agent who requires no prompting, and let that agent be—money."

By the same :

"Though the burnig fire (of indigence) parches my entrails, I will still say : May a shower (of abundance) fall upon Hamadān ! Why should I not offer a sincere prayer for the city where

<sup>1</sup> The Turkoman tribes have always had the reputation 'of being great robbers; this lady was of that race, and sustained the character of her nation by stealing hearts.

<sup>2</sup> Literally (Weaker than the proof a grammarian): It has been already observed, No. 11, note on Arabian taste for ladies' eyes, that in Arabic languishing and weakly are expressed by the same word. (The grammarian's proofs) are those passages, cited by him in confirmation of some general rule.—It would seem that Ibn Fāris, the philologist, had not a very profound respect for grammarians.

<sup>3</sup> This is manifestly directed against those relators of religious and historical traditions, who for their well-known veracity, were dispensed, by public opinion, from naming the persons through whom their formation came. The Arabic name is Thiqat, which means confidence, and is used to signify a man worthy of confidence. The verse literally translated would run thus: Beware that you pass a night with confidence in confidences; but this gives quite a different idea from that intended to be expressed by the author.

I had the advantage of forgetting all that I learned.<sup>1</sup> I have forgotten what I best knew except (the art of getting into debt) for I am now in debt and have not a dirhem in my house."

Ibn Fāris has written a great deal of good poetry ; he died at Ray in the year 390 (A. D. 1000), and was buried opposite to the chapel in which are deposed the remains of the qāḍī 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Jurjānī ; some say however that he died in the month of Šafar, A. H. 375 (June, A. D. 985), at Muḥammadiya, but the first is the more received opinion. Rāzī means belonging to Ray, a well-known city in the province of Daylam : the derivative takes z, in the same manner as Marwāzā derived from Marw.—<sup>2</sup>Ibn Fāris is also author of these verses :

"They asked me how I was ; I answered : 'Well ; some things succeed and some fail : when my heart is filled with cares, I say : One day, perhaps, they may be dispelled. A cat is my companion ; books, the friends of my heart ; and a lamp, my beloved consort'."

49. ABŪ ṬAYYIB AL-MUTANABBĪ

Abū Ṭayyib Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Šamad al-Ju'fī al-Kindī, surnamed al-Mutanabbī, was a native of Kafā ; a different genealogy of this celebrated poet has been given as follows : Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Murra Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār ; but God alone knows which is exact. Al-Mutanabbī came of a family which inhabited Kafāh but he went to Syria in his youth, and travelling over its provinces, studied and attained proficiency in various branches of literature.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The people of Hamadān were proverbial for their ignorance, and Ibn Fāris pretends that their company was contagious; he does not regret, however, the loss of his learning, which he probably prized as little as the science of the grammarians and the veracity of the Thiqat. (See the two preceding notes.)

<sup>2</sup> See No. 3.

<sup>3</sup> As it has already been observed, students, at the age of fifteen or sixteen, went to travel for the purpose of taking lessons from professors in different countries.

"A (nymph) graceful and slender passed near us, she was a Turk by nature and by name.<sup>1</sup> She looked with a tender, a tempting glance (a glance) as languishing as a grammarian's proofs are slight."<sup>2</sup>

By the same :

"Hearken to the words of a true adviser : a man of good counsel and a friend : Take care ; beware that you pass a single night with your confidence placed in those whose word alone is an authority."<sup>3</sup>

By the same :

"When you have to send a person on business which has engaged your mind, send an agent who requires no prompting, and let that agent be—money."

By the same :

"Though the burnig fire (of indigence) parches my entrails, I will still say : May a shower (of abundance) fall upon Hamadān ! Why should I not offer a sincere prayer for the city where

<sup>1</sup> The Turkoman tribes have always had the reputation of being great robbers; this lady was of that race, and sustained the character of her nation by stealing hearts.

<sup>2</sup> Literally (Weaker than the proof a grammarian): It has been already observed, No. 11, note on Arabian taste for ladies' eyes, that in Arabic languishing and weakly are expressed by the same word. (The grammarian's proofs) are those passages, cited by him in confirmation of some general rule.—It would seem that Ibn Fāris, the philologist, had not a very profound respect for grammarians.

<sup>3</sup> This is manifestly directed against those relators of religious and historical traditions, who for their well-known veracity, were dispensed, by public opinion, from naming the persons through whom their formation came. The Arabic name is Thiqat, which means confidence, and is used to signify a man worthy of confidence. The verse literally translated would run thus: Beware that you pass a night with confidence in confidences; but this gives quite a different idea from that intended to be expressed by the author.

I had the advantage of forgetting all that I learned.<sup>1</sup> I have forgotten what I best knew except (the art of getting into debt) for I am now in debt and have not a dirhem in my house."

Ibn Fāris has written a great deal of good poetry ; he died at Ray in the year 390 (A. D. 1000), and was buried opposite to the chapel in which are deposed the remains of the qāḍī 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Jurjānī ; some say however that he died in the month of Šafar, A. H. 375 (June, A. D. 985), at Muḥammadiya, but the first is the more received opinion. Rāzī means belonging to Ray, a well-known city in the province of Daylam : the derivative takes z, in the same manner as Marwazā derived from Marw.—<sup>2</sup>Ibn Fāris is also author of these verses :

"They asked me how I was ; I answered : 'Well ; some things succeed and some fail : when my heart is filled with cares, I say : One day, perhaps, they may be dispelled. A cat is my companion ; books, the friends of my heart ; and a lamp, my beloved consort'."

49. ABŪ ṬAYYIB AL-MUTANABBĪ

Abū Ṭayyib Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Šamad al-Ju'fī al-Kindī, surnamed al-Mutanabbī, was a native of Kafā ; a different genealogy of this celebrated poet has been given as follows : Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Murra Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār ; but God alone knows which is exact. Al-Mutanabbī came of a family which inhabited Kafāh but he went to Syria in his youth, and travelling over its provinces, studied and attained proficiency in various branches of literature.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The people of Hamadān were proverbial for their ignorance, and Ibn Fāris pretends that their company was contagious; he does not regret, however, the loss of his learning, which he probably prized as little as the science of the grammarians and the veracity of the Thiqat. (See the two preceding notes.)

<sup>2</sup> See No. 3.

<sup>3</sup> As it has already been observed, students, at the age of fifteen or sixteen, went to travel for the purpose of taking lessons from professors in different countries.

He had acquired an extensive knowledge of pure Arabic, drawn from the best sources and which he has handed down (in his poetical compositions)<sup>1</sup>; and he possessed so great information on the subject of its idiomatic and obsolete expressions<sup>2</sup> that, when a question was proposed to him, he never failed proving his opinion by citing analogous examples in prose and verse composed by the Arabs of the desert.<sup>3</sup> It is related that the learned Abū 'Alī al-Farīsī, author of the Īyāh and the Takmilah, once asked him how many plural nouns there were of the form fi la, and received immediately for answer Ḥiyla and Ziraba; and Abū 'Alī says that he passed three nights in consulting philological works to find a third plural noun of a similar form, but without success. Such a remark, coming from Abū 'Alī, is quite sufficient to establish al-Mutanabbī's proficiency (in philology). Ḥizla is the plural of Ḥazal (a cock-partridge), and Zirba is the plural of Zaribān, a word pronounced with the same vowels as qaṣīrān, and which serves to designate a small quadruped (emitting a fetid smell). As to his poetry, it is the height of perfection, and it is needless to give specimens here, since it is so well known; I shall merely notice two verses which the shaykh Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī has attributed to him, and are not to be found in his works; the shaykh gives them on the best traditional authority

1 I have here paraphrased the original passage, so as to give a clearer idea of its import.

2 In the Histoire des Sultans Mamlouks, translated from the Arabic of al-Maqrizi by M. Quatremere, that learned oriental scholar renders the word خوشی by bas, rustique (see Preface, page 9, note); this, however, does not appear correct; it would have been no recommendation of al-Mutanabbī's instruction, to say that he had great information in the low or vulgar expressions of the Arabic language. The word خوشی signifies obsolete, gone into disuse, and is used in opposition to مستعمل, in general use; see an example in the Arabic text of Ibn Khallikān, page 137, line 1.

3 The inhabitants of the desert spoke the purest Arabic.

4 Some information on the subject of al-Mutanabbī's poetry will be found in M. de Sacy's Chrestomatie, tom. III, page 27 of the second edition.

remounting to the author, so I insert them here on account of their rarity:

"Was it because you saw me (look up to you) with the eye of one who needs your favour, that you treated me with contempt and hurled me down the precipice? But 'tis I who am to blame, not you; for I had fixed my hopes upon another than the Creator."

When al-Mutanabbī was in Egypt, he fell sick and was visited, during his illness, by a friend; who after his recovery, abstained from going to see him; our poet, in consequence, wrote him this note: "You were a kind companion to me (may God be kind to thee!) when I was unwell, and you have abandoned me on my convalescence; it now depends upon you (with God's assistance), to prevent me from loving sickness, and preserve my health from suffering."<sup>1</sup>—The critics of al-Mutanabbī's poetry may be divided into different classes: some consider him superior to Abū Tammām and his successors: whilst others pronounce Abū Tammām superior to him; and the poet al-Nāmi (whose life comes immediately after) has said: "One single corner of poetry remained unoccupied, but al-Mutanabbī took it up; and I often wished that I had anticipated him in two ideas which he has versified, and which never occurred to any poet before him; the one is contained in these verses:

"Misfortune shot at me with the arrows of calamity, till my heart was covered with them, so that the darts which struck it broke against those which were fixed in it already!"

The other is in the following:

"(He marched) at the head of an army raising a cloud of dust which obscured the sight; and (it seemed) as if the soldiers saw with their ears."<sup>2</sup>

1 In the original, this note has a terseness and concision of which the translation can offer no idea.

2 That is: The dust prevented them from seeing their way, and they were directed only by the commands of their chief; so their ear guided them on their march not their eye.

He had acquired an extensive knowledge of pure Arabic, drawn from the best sources and which he has handed down (in his poetical compositions)<sup>1</sup>; and he possessed so great information on the subject of its idiomatic and obsolete expressions<sup>2</sup> that, when a question was proposed to him, he never failed proving his opinion by citing analogous examples in prose and verse composed by the Arabs of the desert.<sup>3</sup> It is related that the learned Abū 'Alī al-Farīsī, author of the Īyāṭ and the Takmilah, once asked him how many plural nouns there were of the form fi la, and received immediately for answer Ḥiyla and Ziraba; and Abū 'Alī says that he passed three nights in consulting philological works to find a third plural noun of a similar form, but without success. Such a remark, coming from Abū 'Alī, is quite sufficient to establish al-Mutanabbī's proficiency (in philology). Ḥizla is the plural of Ḥazal (a cock-partridge), and Zirba is the plural of Zaribān, a word pronounced with the same vowels as qaṣīrān, and which serves to designate a small quadruped (emitting a fetid smell). As to his poetry, it is the height of perfection, and it is needless to give specimens here, since it is so well known; I shall merely notice two verses which the shaykh Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī has attributed to him, and are not to be found in his works; the shaykh gives them on the best traditional authority

<sup>1</sup> I have here paraphrased the original passage, so as to give a clearer idea of its import.

<sup>2</sup> In the Histoire des Sultans Mamlouks, translated from the Arabic of al-Maqrizī by M. Quatremère, that learned oriental scholar renders the word خوشی by bas, rustique (see Preface, page 9, note); this, however, does not appear correct; it would have been no recommendation of al-Mutanabbī's instruction, to say that he had great information in the low or vulgar expressions of the Arabic language. The word خوشی signifies obsolete, gone into disuse, and is used in opposition to مستعمل, in general use; see an example in the Arabic text of Ibn Khallikān, page 137, line 1.

<sup>3</sup> The inhabitants of the desert spoke the purest Arabic.

<sup>4</sup> Some information on the subject of al-Mutanabbī's poetry will be found in M. de Sacy's Chrestomatie, tom. III, page 27 of the second edition.

remounting to the author, so I insert them here on account of their rarity:

"Was it because you saw me (look up to you) with the eye of one who needs your favour, that you treated me with contempt and hurled me down the precipice? But 'tis I who am to blame, not you; for I had fixed my hopes upon another than the Creator."

When al-Mutanabbī was in Egypt, he fell sick and was visited, during his illness, by a friend; who after his recovery, abstained from going to see him; our poet, in consequence, wrote him this note: "You were a kind companion to me (may God be kind to thee!) when I was unwell, and you have abandoned me on my convalescence; it now depends upon you (with God's assistance), to prevent me from loving sickness, and preserve my health from suffering."<sup>1</sup>—The critics of al-Mutanabbī's poetry may be divided into different classes: some consider him superior to Abū Tammām and his successors: whilst others pronounce Abū Tammām superior to him; and the poet al-Nāmi (whose life comes immediately after) has said: "One single corner of poetry remained unoccupied, but al-Mutanabbī took it up; and I often wished that I had anticipated him in two ideas which he has versified, and which never occurred to any poet before him; the one is contained in these verses:

"Misfortune shot at me with the arrows of calamity, till my heart was covered with them, so that the darts which struck it broke against those which were fixed in it already!"

The other is in the following:

"(He marched) at the head of an army raising a cloud of dust which obscured the sight; and (it seemed) as if the soldiers saw with their ears."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the original, this note has a terseness and concision of which the translation can offer no idea.

<sup>2</sup> That is: The dust prevented them from seeing their way, and they were directed only by the commands of their chief; so their ear guided them on their march not their eye.

The learned have taken much pains in explaining and commenting the poetical works of al-Mutanabbī, and I have been informed by one of the masters under whom I studied, that he met with upwards of forty commentaries, both great and small, on these poems: a mark of popularity such as never was obtained by the works of any other poet. He was without doubt, a highly-gifted man, favoured with the happy talent of expressing perfectly his ideas in verse. The surname of al-Mutanabbī (the pretended prophet) was given him because he had set up for a prophet in the flat country near Samāwa,<sup>1</sup> where he was followed by a great multitude of the Bann Kalb and other tribes; but Lulu, governor of Hims (Emessa) and lieutenant to the Ikhshīd family, having marched against him, took him prisoner and dispersed his partisans; he kept al-Mutanabbī in confinement for a long period and having at length brought him back to the Muslim faith, he set him at liberty: other accounts have been given (of the origin of this surname) but this is the most correct.* Al-Mutanabbī then became follower of the emir Sayf Al-Dawlat Ibn Hamdan; this was in the year 337 (A. D. 948-9); he afterwards left him and entered Egypt in 346 (A. D. 957), where he celebrated the praises of Kāfur al-Ikhshībī and Anājir Ibn al-Ikhshīd<sup>2</sup> and was permitted to stand in the presence of the (minister) Kāfur, with boots on his feet and the loins girded with a sword; when he rode out he was accompanied with two ushers, mamluks of the prince wearing swords and belts. Being afterwards dissatisfied with Kāfur, he composed a satire against him and left him on the eve of the Feast of Sacrifice (9, Dhu 'l-Hijja), A. H. 350 (†January, A. D. 962). On this, Kāfur dispatched camel-riders to different quarters in pursuit of him, but without success. That minister had promised him a government, but on seeing the liberties he took in his poems and his haughty spirit, he became apprehensive of him (and refused to keep his

1 Samāwa is situated on the west bank of the Euphrates, in about the latitude 31°20'.

2 Some details respecting the life of Anājir will be found in the life of Kāfur.

*M. de Slane has omitted to translate: "It is said that he (al-Mutanabbī) said 'I am the first man to divine by poetry'."—Ed.

†19.—Ed.

word). On being reproached with his conduct towards the poet, he said: "My (good) people! would he who claimed the gift of prophecy after Muḥammad's (having fulfilled his mission), not be capable of claiming (a share in) the empire with Kāfir? This reflection should suffice you."—Ibn Jinnī, the grammarian, relates that he studied the poems of Mutanabbī under the author himself, and that he once read to him the qaṣīdah in praise of Kāfir, which begins thus:

"I combat my love for you, but love will vanquish and I wonder at your aversion but your affection would be more worthy of wonder."

On coming to these lines:

"O! that I knew if I shall ever pronounce a poem in which I shall have no complaint to make and no reproach. I suffer from (afflictions), the least of which had driven poetry away; but know, daughter of a (noble) race! that my heart preserves its vigour!"

Ibn Jinnī said to him: "It is painful for me to think that such a poem could have been made in praise of any other than Sayf al-Dawlat;" to which al-Mutanabbī answered: "I cautioned him however and warned him (against neglecting me), but it would not avail; did I not say: 'Brother of Generosity! bestow what you possess; but bestow not on others that which I pronounce.'"<sup>1</sup> "Yet he gave me to Kāfir through his bad management and defective judgment."—Sayf al-Dawlat held an assembly every night to which the men of learning came, and where they conversed together in his presence: (in one of these meetings) a discussion took place between al-Mutanabbī and Ibn Khālawayh, the grammarian, who (at last) sprung upon al-Mutanabbī and, striking him on the face with a key he had about him, inflicted a wound, from which the blood flowed on al-Mutanabbī's garments: the poet, moved with anger, departed for Egypt, where he composed poems in praise of Kāfur: he then travelled to Persia and composed panegyrics on 'Adad al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh al-Daylami, by whom he was generously rewarded<sup>1</sup>; on leaving him, he went to Baghdād, and thence to Kūfah, where he arrived on the 8th Shā'ban (A. H. 354, August,* A. D. 965); he was then attacked by a chief of the tribe of Asad, named Fātik Ibn Abi 'l-Jahl at the head of a troop of partisans: al-Mutanabbī also had with him a number of companions, so a combat took place, in which he was killed along with his son al-Muḥassad and his slave Muflih; this occurred near al-Nu'māniya, at a place called al-Ṣāfiya, or the Mountains of al-Ṣāfiya, in the western part of the Sawad (or province) of Baghdād, at two miles distance from Dayr al-'Āqūl.<sup>2</sup> Ibn Ushḥīq mentions in that chapter of his Umda, which treats of the good and harm done by poetry, that Abū Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī, on seeing himself vanquished, was taking to flight, when his slave addressed him in these terms: "Let it never be said that you fled from combat; you, who are the author of this verse:

<sup>1</sup> That is: Let not other prince obtain from me those praises which are yours by right.—In the Arabic text انت has been put by mistake for لى which is the reading of the best MSS., and confirmed by all the copies in the Diwān of al-Mutanabbī which have been consulted.

‘The horse and the night, and the desert know me (well); the sword also, and the lance, and paper and the pen !’”

Upon this, al-Mutanabbī turned back and fought till he was slain; so it was this verse which caused his death. This event happened in the month of Ramaḍān, 354 (September, A. D. 965): some say, on Wednesday 24 or 27 or 28 of the month; others on Monday 22 or the 25†. He was born at Kūfah in the year 303 (A. D. 915-6), in

---

1 To form an idea of the great sums this poet must have gained, we need only state that 'Adad al-Dawlat is said to have given him thirty thousand dinars, and the vizir Ibn al-'Umayd a like sum. (Yāfi, MS. No. 637, fol. 266 verso). This however appears to be an exaggeration.

2 Dayr al-'Āqūl was situated on the Tigris, about 30 miles below Baghdād.

*9.—Ed.

†According to modern calculation Monday fell on 26 of Rāmaḍān and if the moon was sighted on 30 Shā'abān then it could be 25 corresponding to 25 September. Likewise other dates may be reckoned but it should be borne in mind that Wednesday fell on 27 or 28 corresponding to 27 September.—Ed.

the quarter called Kinda; for which reason only he was surnamed (al-Kindi), as he did not belong to the tribe of Kinda, but to that which sprung from Jufi Ibn Sa'ad al-'Ashīra Ibn Madhhij Mālik Ibn 'Udad Ibn Zayd Ibn Yashjub* Ibn 'Aribī Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlān.<sup>1</sup> The Sa'ad mentioned in the foregoing genealogy, was named Sa'ad al-'Ashira (happiness of relations), because he rode abroad accompanied with, it is said, three hundred sons and grandsons; and when asked who they were, answered: "My relations" (Ashirati); as he dreaded the influence of the evil eye (had he said: They are my children).<sup>2</sup>—Some persons say that al-Mutanabbī's father was a water-carrier at Kafah, and that he afterwards emigrated to Syria with his son, who was brought up there: allusion is made to this circumstance in the following verse, by a poet who lampooned al-Mutanabbī:

"What merit (faql) is there in a poet who from morn to night seeks for reward (faql)? At one time he lived by selling water in Kafah; at another, by selling his prostituted talent."<sup>3</sup>

[In the life of Abū Tammām Ḥabīb, the celebrated poet, will be found some verses (directed against him), by Ibn al-Mu'addal, which contain a similar thought.] The poet Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Muẓaffar Ibn 'Alī at-Ṭabasī<sup>4</sup> composed the following elegy on the death of al-Mutanabbī:

1 This celebrated genealogy is certainly corrupt as here given. Ibn Khaldūn, in his History of the Ancient Arabs, now publishing by Dr. Arri, has treated the subject with his usual learning and judgment.

2 To have had so many male descendants must have excited jealousy, and a glance of a jealous eye might have had a fatal effect upon them. The superstition of the eastern nations on that subject is well known since the publication of Mr. Lane's Modern Egyptians.

3 Literally: By selling the water of the face. The ingenuous blush of a modest and honourable man is called by the Arabs the water of the face, ماء الوجه or ماء المحيا, the poet who has lost all sense of shame, and sells his praises to the most unworthy, has exchanged his honourable character, his modest dignity, for money.

4 This poet lived to be a contemporary of at-Ṭha'ālībī, who in his atimah gives some verses of Abu 'l-Nayf al-Harṭhīmī on his authority.

*M. de Slane reads it Yashjub.—Ed.

M. de Slane reads it Ghāsib.—Ed.

"Cursed be that fortune which has deprived us unawares of so eloquent a tongue.<sup>1</sup> Never will a second al-Mutanabbī be seen; what second can be found to match that faultless pearl.<sup>2</sup> His lofty mind was to him an army, and placed him in the pride of power. In his poetry he was a prophet, and the ideas he has expressed show forth his miraculous powers."

Ṭabasi means native of Ṭabas, which is a city in the desert lying between Naysāpur, Ispahān and Kermān.—It is related that al-Mutamīd Ibn 'Abbād al-Lakhmī, prince of Cordova and Seville, recited one day the following verse from a celebrated (qaṣīdah) of al-Mutanabbī's :

"Our camels, broken with fatigue, receive fresh strength when their eyes obtain a sight of thee."

In his admiration, the prince continued repeating this verse, when Ibn Wahbān,<sup>3</sup> who was one of the company improvised the two following:

'If the son of al-Husayn was skilled in poetry, you also are skilled in making generous gifts! 'tis gifts which open the lips (of grateful poets). Proud of his poetic talent, al-Mutanabbī declared himself a prophet; had he known that you would recite his poems, he had thought himself a god.'

Al-Ifṭīlī relates that al-Mutanabbī, being in the hippodrome (Maydan) with Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān, recited to the prince his (qaṣīdah) which begins thus: Fortune grants to each man that to which he has been accustomed. When Sayf al-Dawlat returned to his palace, he desired the poet to repeat the poem, which he did without rising from his seat; one of the persons present, wishing to beprive al-Mutanabbī, by stratagem (of the honour conferred on him in being allowed to remain seated) addressed him and said: "Abu 'l-Ṭayyib! if you repeat your poem standing, I will be able to hear it, for most of those present do not." To this Abu 'l-Ṭayyib replied: "Have you not heard the beginning of it: Fortune grants to each man that to which he has been accustomed?" which was an excellent repartee.—To sum up his character, we may only say that he was a man of high soul and lofty thought; and that his history is long and his adventures numerous; for which reason we have preferred being concise on the subject.<sup>1</sup>

1 Literally : Haud amplius ad pastum ducat Deus agmen temporis quod nobis incidit, lingue tali (silentium imponens).

2 Literally : The undrilled pearl of the age.

3 Abu Muhammad 'Abd al-Jalīl Ibn Wahbān, a celebrated poet and man of learning was born at Murcia in Spain. In the year 480 (A. D. 1087) he was killed by a troop of Christians as he was travelling from Lorca لورقه to his native place (Baṣṣāyat al-Mulāmanis).

I Al-Ḥusayn, the father of Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbi was generally known by the name of 'Ayd in al-Saqq, or 'Ayd n, the water-carrier, for which reason this poet is sometimes called Ibn 'Aydān or Ibn al-Saqq. When yet a school-boy, al-Mutanabbi composed verses, which are still extant and these essays of his youth announce already that superior talent which shines forth so brightly in the productions of his maturer age. The early part of his life was spent in Syria and among the Bedwin tribes which inhabited the desert to the west of the Euphrates. One of his contemporaries, Abu 'l-Hasan Muḥammad Ibn Ya'ya al-'Alawī, relates that al-Mutanabbi, when a boy, lived in his neighbourhood at Kufah; that he was fond of learning and literature, and that after living for some years with the Arabs of the desert, he came back a complete Bedwin. He picked up the greater part of his learning at 'booksellers' shops, his memory being so tenacious, that he had only to read a book once, in order to learn it by heart. His intercourse with the nomadic Arabs had a powerful influence on the character; from them he acquired that intrepidity which pervaded his future conduct, and that lofty spirit which breathes in his poem; he imbibed also, at the same source, that knowledge of the pure Arabic tongue which excited the admiration of his countrymen and gained the greatest publicity for his verses. It was some time after the three hundred and twentieth year of the Hijrah, that Abu 'l-Ṭayyib asserted his apostolic mission; and persuaded some of the inhabitants of al-Lātaqiyah that he was a prophet sent by God. "I come," said he, "to this generation which erreth and leadeth into error; I come to fill the word with justice as it is now filled with wickedness; I shall reward those who obey God's commands, and strike off the heads of the disbelievers!" He pretended also to possess the gift of miracles, and one of the signs which he gave to confirm his veracity was, that when the rain fell around him in torrents, it did not touch a certain hill on which he stood. This manifestation of his power (which the orthodox Muslim historian attributes to magic art) had the effect of seducing great numbers. Unfortunately for the prophet, the governor of Emessa caused him to be arrested and impris-

(Continued on page 182)

50. AL-NĀMĪ

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Dārimī al-Miṣṣīṣī surnamed al-Nāmī, was one of the ablest and most talented poets

(Continued from page 181)

soned ; and al-Mutanabbī in his cell, with his head and arms confined in a sort of pillory, and his feet in the stocks, had time to reflect on his situation, and renounce the dangerous gift of prophecy. In one of his poetical supplications to the governor, he reminds him the minors should not be punished for schism or heresy, because by law they are not obliged to fulfil the duty of prayer. Having at length obtained his liberty, he remained for some time neglected and in poverty ; but a poem which he addressed to Abu 'l-'Aṣḥā'ir أبو العشائر (an officer of Sayf al-Dawlat's who commanded at Antioch), revealed his superior talent. About that time, Sayf al-Dawlat himself came to Antioch, and was visited by al-Mutanabbī, who recited to him a poem composed in his honour ; and the piece was of such remarkable beauty, that the prince conceived the highest esteem for the author, and offered him his protection. The poet, in accepting this favour, would not, however, sacrifice the feelings of honourable pride by which he was always actuated : he required and obtained the authorisation of being seated in the presence of Sayf al-Dawlat, when reciting to him the poems which he was to compose in his praise ; and he insisted on being dispensed from saluting the prince in the usual manner, which was by kissing the ground in his presence. At the court of Sayf al-Dawlat he met the principal poets of the day, but he surpassed them all by his vigorous and original talent. The celebrated Abu 'l-'Alā used to say: "Abu Nawas expresses himself thus ; al-Buhturī, thus ; Abū Tammām thus ; and the poet (meaning al-Mutanabbī), thus." Avarice was the only fault with which al-Mutanabbī was reproached ; his moral conduct was the more exemplary, as most of his associates were men of pleasure and debauch : and a rigid Muslim remarked, that though he never fasted, nor prayed, nor read the Qur'ān, yet he never told a lie, nor committed fornication. When Sayf al-Dawlat went forth on his military expeditions, he was accompanied by al-Mutanabbī, and on one occasion the prince and the poet had to cut their way through the ranks of the Greeks to avoid being taken prisoners. The fortune of Abu 'l-Tayyib was now too great not to excite jealousy ; his rivals, and al-Nānī among others, succeeded in alienating, Sayf al-Dawlat from his favourite poet. A number of learned men were one day conversing in the prince's presence and the grammarian Ibn Khālawayh was giving his opinion on some question relating to the Arabic language, when al-Mutanabbī said to him : "Silence, fellow ! what hast thou to do with Arabic, thou who art a Persian from Khuzestān ?" This rebuke was answered by a wound in the face, inflicted with a key which Ibn Khālawayh carried in his sleeve. During this scene, Sayf al-Dawlat did not interfere either by word or deed.

(Continued on page 183)

of his time. As an encomiast of Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān, he enjoyed the special favour of that prince, who considered him as second in talent and rank to al-Mutanabbī only. He was a man of great merit and instruction; possessing superior abilities and well informed in philology and literature. There exists

(Continued from page 182)

Al-Mutanabbī continued to perceived other symptoms of his patron's indifference towards him; he remonstrated with him in a noble poem, asserting his right to be respected, and vindicating his character from the attacks of his enemies; but his complaints were of no avail, his expostulations useless; disgusted at length with a treatment he so little deserved, he abandoned the court of Aleppo and retired to Damascus. This city was then in the possession of the Ikhshid family; and its governor, Ibn Mālik, a Jew and a native of Ṭadmūr (Palmyra), was under the immediate orders of Kāfur, the ruler of Egypt. The Jew wished al-Mutanabbī to compose a poem in his honour, but met with a prompt refusal, and the poet, finding his situation most unpleasant, withdrew to Ramlah. The emir of that city, Ibn Ṭuḡḥj, طبع, received him with great honour made him abundant presents, among which were a horse whose trappings were heavy with gold, and a sword richly ornamented. He then passed into Egypt on the written invitation of Kāfur. This able statesman was originally a slave, employed in the most menial duties and treated with the greatest contumely; but the poor negro eunuch, whose prominent belly, splay feet, and perforated lower lip had furnished such subjects for laughter to his fellow-slaves, had now become master of an empire. Such was the person who claimed the praises of al-Mutanabbī; and by means of rich presents, rather than intimidation, he wrung from the poet those measured, and sometimes ambiguous eulogiums which fill the qasīdahs called the Kāfuriyāt. Another person whom al-Mutanabbī saw in Egypt was the celebrated Fātik al-Majnnān, and the noble character of this emir obtained the ready and heart-felt encomiums of Abu 'l-Ṭayyib. In return for the glory which the verses of al-Mutanabbī conferred on Kāfur, demanded the government of Ṣayda (Sidon) but met with a refusal: this with the obligation of praising a negro, excited the indignation of the poet, and though surrounded by spies, who informed Kāfur of all his actions, he succeeded, at length, in escaping from Old Cairo, and after a variety of adventures he arrived at Kūfah, he then visited Bāḡhdād, where al-Muhalab, vizir to Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, received him with eager joy, in hopes of obtaining the praises of so illustrious a poet, but al-Mutanabbī refused to gratify his wishes, on the pretext that he was accustomed to celebrate princes only. This so provoked the vizir that he encouraged all the poetasters of 'Irāq to attack al Muttanabbī, who set out for Arrajān, where he found a protector in Abu 'l-Fadī Ibn al-'Umayd. After spending some time with this vizir he passed to the court of 'Aḍad al-Dawlat at Ṣhīrāz a collection of observations dictated by him (to his pupils) at Aleppo, and in which he cites as authorities (his masters) Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Akḥḡash, Ibn Durustuwayh Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Kermānī,<sup>1</sup> Abu Bakr al-Ṣulī, Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Urūdī and his own father Muḥammad al-Miṣṣīṣī. He himself is cited as authority by (his disciples) Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī 'Usāmah al-Ḥalabī Abu 'l-Ḥusain Aḥmad, brother to the preceding, Abu 'l-Faraj al-Babbaghā, Abu 'l-Kiattāb Ibn 'Awn al-Ḥarīrī, Abu Bakr al-Kiālīdī, and the qādī Abū Ṭāhir Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ja'far al-Hāshimī. The following verses taken from one of his qasīdahs, addressed to Sayf al-Dawlat, are among the finest which he composed :

(Continued o. page 184)

(Continued from page 183)

and was treated most generously by that prince, who gave him upwards of two hundred thousand dirhems (about 8,000 pounds sterling) as a testimony of the satisfaction he received from the praises of the poet. It was on leaving Ṣhirāz to return to Kūfah that he was assassinated. The details of this event are preserved in a letter addressed by a contemporary to the two Khallidites, who were poets at the court of Sayf al-Dawlat. The length of this note prevents me from giving a translation of this letter; I shall only observe that Fātik al-Asadī, by whom he was slain, had a motive for this deed; al-Mutanabbi had satirized his family and particularly his cousin Ḍebbā and Ḍabbā's mother. Fātik had declared his intention beforehand to the writer of the letter, who informed al-Mutanabbi of his danger, and recommended him to take an escort with him; but this advice was rejected by the poet, who replied: "It shall never be said that I sought any other safeguard than my sword!" Persuasion and entreaty were employed to change his determination, but he would not hearken to any advice: the result of his temerity and obstinacy was his death.

The above note is the summary of a number of passages contained in an interesting work, entitled الصبح المنبئ عن حيشته المتنبئ (MS. of the Bib. du Rol, fonds Asselin, No. 705.—See M. de Sacy's opinion of this work in the Anthologie Grammaticale, page 476.)

1 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Musā al-Kermānī (native of Kermān), had a profound knowledge of philology and grammar; he wrote a beautiful hand and was a correct copier, which caused his writings to be in great request. He was a professional copyist, working for hire: he composed also some books the titles of which are given in the Fihrest, from which this notice is taken; the years of his birth and death are not mentioned, but we may conclude from what Ibn Khallikān says, that he was still living at the beginning of the fourth [fifth?] century.

"Illustrious prince ! thy lances gain thee glory in this world and in paradise hereafter. Every year which passes finds thee with the sword in the necks of enemies, and thy steed harnessed with bit and saddle. Time rolleth on and still thy deeds are all for glory; thy words for piety, and thy hands for bestowing gifts."

By the same:

"Is it then true that (the cruel) Zura is the author of my death? The promises which she made me, are they then come to this? I stopped (near her former abode), unable to restrain my grief, and fixed to the spot, I seemed like one bereft of life. Seeing me thus, my censorious foes were perplexed with doubt, and they said to the ruined mansion: which of these two is the pillar (that sustained the rustic hut)?"

Al-Nāmī had some encounters with al-Mutanabbī and sustained contests with him in reciting extemporary verses. It is related by Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn 'Awn al-Ḥarīrī, the poet and grammarian, that he went one day to visit al-Nāmī, and found him seated; his head was white like the thaghāma<sup>1</sup> when in flower, but one single black hair still remained. "Sir!" said Ibn 'Awn, "there is a black hair in your head." "Yes," replied al-Nāmī, "it is the sole remnant of my youth, and I am pleased with it; I have even written verses on it." Then, at the request of Ibn 'Awn, he recited these lines:

"In that head a single hair still appeared preserving its blackness; 'twas a sight which rejoiced the eyes (of my friends). I said to my white hairs which had put it in fear: 'I implore you! respect it as a stranger. A dark African spouse will not long remain in the house where the second wife is white of skin'."

He then said: "O Abn Kḥaṭṭāb! a single white hair spreads terror among a thousand black; what then must be the case with one black among a thousand white?" He is also author of the following verses, which have been erroneously attributed to the vizir Abū Muḥammad al-Muhallabī :

---

<sup>1</sup> The thaghāma is in all probability a species of Artemisia: it must not be confounded with toogama, mentioned by Rauwolf, after Kamfer, as the Arabic name of the palma Christi.

"An enemy whom I called my beloved hastened towards me, arrayed in a red summer dress. The wine sported in her eyes and made her cheeks like a brilliant flame. How, said I, 'hast thou obtained such beauty? Thou comest here in a strange attire. Is it with the redness of your cheeks that thou art clothed, or is your garment dyed with the hearts-blood (of lovers)?'—'It is the wine,' said she, 'which (by its reflexion) makes my tunic seem like the sky at sunset; it cometh near the colour of the wine, which itself approaches to that of my cheeks'."

Al-Nāmī died at Aleppo, A. H. 399 (A. D. 1008-9); others say 370 or 371; aged 90 years.—Dārīmī means descend from Dārīm Ibn Mīlik, a great branch of the tribe of Tamīm.—Miṣṣiṣī signifies native of al-Miṣṣiṣah (the ancient Mopsuestia), a city on the coast of the sea of Rūm (the Levant), near Tarsūs, Sis and other places in the same region. It was built in the year 140 (A. D. 757), by Ṣālih Ibn 'Alī in pursuance of orders given by his nephew, the ḫalīf al-Manṣūr.

51. BADI' AL-ZAMĀN AL-HAMADĀNĪ

The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusain Ibn Yahya Ibn Sa'īd al-Hamadānī, surnamed Badi' al-Zamān (prodigy of the Age), is author of some beautiful epistles and excellent Maqāmāhs,<sup>2</sup> which al-Ḥarīrī took as a model in the composition of his; framing them on the same plan, and imitating the manner of their author, in whose footsteps he walked. In his preface,

1 Literally : And thus my dress, the wine, and the colour of my cheeks are a neighbour to a neighbour of a neighbour.

2 M. de Sacy has given six of these Maqāmāhs in his Chrestomathie, and in the notes he has inserted a very full notice on al-Hamadānī and his writings.

al-Ḥarīrī acknowledges the merit of his predecessor, and admits that he was guided by his example in the path he followed. Al-Hamadānī was eminent for his knowledge of pure and correct Arabic, in which he cited as his masters Ibn Fāris, author of the Mujmil, and others: his epistles are admirable and his poetry full of beauty. He dwelt at Herāt, a city in the province of Khurāsān. The following is a specimen of his epistolary style: "When water has long remained at rest, its noxious qualities appear; and when its surface has continued tranquil, its foulness gets into motion: thus it is with a guest: his presence is displeasing when his stay has been protracted; and his shadow is oppressive when the time for which he should sojourn is at an end. Adieu." Another of his letters runs thus: "(To him whose honourable) presence is a point of union for the needy, not to say the Ka'bah of pilgrims; the station of honour, not to say the station of sanctity (at Mekkah), the desire of guests not to say (the valley of) Minā near (the hill of) Khayf; the source of gifts, not to say the Qiblah of prayer,<sup>1</sup> :— *to him let this be a consolation: death is awful till (it comes, and then) it is found light; its touch seems grating till (felt, and then) it is smooth; the world is so hostile and its injustice so great that death is the lightest of its inflictions, the least of its wrongs. Look then to the right; do you see ought but affliction? Look to the left; do you see ought but woe?"—The verses which follow are taken from a long poem of his composition:

"The gush of the (fertilizing) shower were like thee (in thy liberality), did it, in smiling, pour forth gold. Fortune were like thee, did it not deceive; the sun, did he speak; the lion, were he not hunted; the sea, were its waters fresh."†

The following satirical verses on the city of Hamadān are also attributed to him, but I have since found that they

---

<sup>1</sup> All this, in the original Arabic, is a mere play upon words, and has as little real meaning as the translation here given. The valley of Mina is in the neighbourhood of Mekkah.

* M. de Slane has omitted the words: "This is another letter which is in condolence."—Ed.

† "sweet not saline" should be substituted for "fresh".—Ed.

the eve of Tuesday, 24 Ṣha'bān*: he was interred in the burying-ground reserved for the descendants of 'Alī, and which lies behind the New Muṣallāh<sup>1</sup> at Old Cairo: he was aged 64 years.—His great-grandfather was surnamed Ṭabāṭabā from the circumstance of his pronouncing the guttural q like ṭ: desiring one day his clothes to be brought to him, he was asked by his slave if it was durra, or coat, which he wanted? "No," said he, "a waistcoat, a waistcoat (ṭabā, ṭabā);" wishing to say qabā; and these words became a nickname by which he was afterwards known. Al-Rass is, according to al-Sam'ānī, the name borne by one of the branches of 'Alī's family.

53. ABU 'L-RAQA'MAQ

Abu Ḥāmid Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Anṭākī, surnamed Abu 'l-Raqā'maq, was a poet of repute; al-Ṭha'ālībī, in his Yatimah, speaks of him in these terms: "He was the pearl of his age, the union of excellencies; one of those who managed poetry in its gay and its serious moods, and who gained the prize of excellence; he was a skilful eulogist, an able poet; and was for Syria what Ibn Ḥajjāj<sup>2</sup> was for 'Irāq." Among the most

---

1 The New Muṣllā was built in the Sahra الصحرَاء or Little Qarāfah, by 'Anbasah, عَنْبَسَه, governor of Egypt. The Old Muṣallā, founded by 'Amr Ibn al-Āsī, not being sufficiently large, notwithstanding additions made to it, the New Muṣallā was constructed during the reign of Al-Mutawakkil, A. H. 240 (A. D. 855).—Khīṭaṭ—The use of the Muṣallāh is explained in de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 191.—The 'Anbasah here mentioned was the last Egyptian governor of Arabic descent: his successors were Turks, chosen among the slaves of the khalīfs. 'Anbasah was appointed to that situation, 238 A. H. (A. D. 852), and filled it till A. H. 242 (A. D. 856). His names were Abu Ja'far 'Anbasah Ibn Isḥāq Ibn 'Amr.—(Maqrizi's Khīṭaṭ).

2 The life of Ibn Ḥajjāj will be found in this work: his name was al-Ḥusayn.

*Tuesday 2 December, 956, corresponds to 25 Ṣha'bān.—Ed.

brilliant of his productions are the following verses, in which he extols Ya'qub Ibn Killis, vizir to the Fatimite khalif al-'Aziz Ibn al-Mo'izz al-'Ubaydi, prince of Egypt (the lives of both shall be given) :

"We have heard the excuse (of our beloved), and we have pardoned her fault and her error.—The thoughts (which I here express) are (intended) for the person whom I mean (to praise) ; but I make allusion to thee, fair maid, that dwellest near ; so hearken to my words. Him whom thy smiles seduce thou shalt always see (absorbed in thought and) unmindful of his attire<sup>1</sup> ; He knows that such (love as his) is the punishment which God has destined for those whose eyes contemplate (beauty). God had sent the veil (which concealed thy lover's feelings) ; it is thine to tear off the veil from every dissembler.—The looks of her (I speak of) have fascinated my heart ; 'tis so with every beauty, their looks have a magic power. Would it harm the (cruel fair) who has chosen to show aversion and dislike, did she at length consent to be pleased and to receive (my) visits ? But I must avow my submission to her will, though she has inflicted torment when she avoided (my sight). I have never ceased to hope for her love, and suffer from her dislike ; yet may I never be deprived of such a mistress !"

The verses which follow are taken from that portion of the same poem which contains the panegyric :

"This vizir hath not left on earth an enemy to al-'Aziz, whose ardour he hath not quelled. He wages daily war against the vicissitudes of Fortune and the attacks of adversity, by bestowing abundant gifts. His hand would be covered with dishonour did avarice force it to withdraw ; it is a hand accustomed to renew the charge in the combat of liberality. By its munificence, the number of foes to al-'Aziz has been diminished, and of friends, increased. It is thus that the hand of the superior man worketh, day and night, good (to friends) and evil (to foes).<sup>1</sup> Choose then him for patron; none are safe who seek not his benignant shade—his generous protection. When you see him reflect with downcast eyes, and thoughts directed towards some (lofty) purpose; (know that) his quick and discerning judgment will leave nought in the bosom of futurity unscanned<sup>2</sup>! not a single place upon the earth, of which his mind will not embrace the confines. May God increase the extent of his (power); may he preserve him from even the apprehension of misfortune, and exempt him from the necessity of all precaution.”

---

<sup>1</sup> Such I believe to be the meaning of the verse, which would be altered by rendering more closely the final words : Shakspeare has expressed the same idea, and give nearly a literal translation of the words to which I allude, where he says : "Lord Hamlet, with his doublet all unbraced."

His poetry is in general good, and of the same cast as that composed by Ṣarī‘ al-Dīlā.* He was a long time resident in Egypt, and much of his poetry consists in panegyric on the princes and great men of that country. He composed poems in praise of the Fatimite khalif al-Mu‘izz Abn Tamīm† Ma‘add,‡ of his son al-‘Azīz, and his grandson al-Ḥākim; he celebrated also the praises of al-Qā‘id Jawhar, the vizīr Ibn Killis,§ and other men of rank. (The lives of the persons here named will be found in his work.) The emīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī makes mention of this poet in his history of Egypt, and assigns the year 399 (A. D. 1008-9) as that of his death; another writer adds that he expired on Friday, 22 Ramadān of that year**; while a third

---

1 Such is the characteristic of a perfect man in the opinion of the Arabs, both before and since the establishment of Islamism.

2 Literally: will leave nought unturned in the interior of futurity.

*“al-Qaṣṣār al-Baṣrī” is omitted in translation.—Ed.

†M. de Slane read it Tammām.—Ed.

‡M. de Slane has omitted the genealogy: “Ibn al-Manṣar al-Qā‘im Ibn al-Mahdī ‘Ubaydullāh.—Ed.

§“Abu ‘l-Faraj” the Knyāh of the vizīr is omitted.—Ed.

**20 May, 1009.—Ed.

says that it was in the Second Rabī'. I suppose that he died at Miṣr (Old Cairo). Anṭāki means native of Anṭākiya (Antioch), a city near Aleppo.—Raq'maq is a nickname.<sup>1</sup>

54. JAḤẒAH AL-BARMAKĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far Ibn Musā Ibn Yahyā Ibn Khalid Ibn Barmak, surnamed Jaḥẓah the cup-companion, was a man of talent and master of various accomplishments; he possessed a knowledge of history and astrology; he abounded in repartees, and was an amusing guest at social parties. Abu Naṣr Ibn al-Marzubān has composed the life and collected the poetry of this member of the Barmakide family, who was also one of the wittiest men of his time. The following are specimens of his poetry, which is very fine:

"I am son to those men whose beneficence enriched mankind, and who have become the talk (of the world) for their signal liberality. There was no historian but spoke of their generous action; no book but contained their praise."

"I said to her (I loved). 'Thou art sparing (of thy favours) towards me when (I am) awake; be then kind to thy afflicted lover (and let him see thee) in (his) dreams; She answered: 'Thou also canst sleep, and yet wishest me to visit thee in the dreams!'<sup>2</sup>

"I am among a race who fly from (committing an act of) liberality and who have (therein) inherited the character of their fathers. Fellows who would feel indignant<sup>3</sup> if I tried to obtain

---

1 Raq'maq is not an Arabic word, neither is it, I believe, Persian or Turkish; and I am, therefore, in ignorance of its meaning.

2 That is: since thou canst sleep, why not send thy image to visit me, rather than require mine to visit thee?—(See note on Tayf-al-Khayal, No. 53).

3 Literally: It were as if I wanted to pluck a hair from their noses.

from them a present.—Come, my girl, fill me up an ample (cup) and sing (this air) : The protectors are gone under whose shelter one could live."

"O thou troop,<sup>1</sup> whose departure is an affliction! the lover left behind confides to thee the surest pledge—his heart."

"When she said to me : How wert thou during my absence ? Didst thou wear the raiment of the rich or of the poor ?" I answered : 'Ask me not ! I lived morning and evening in the destitute state of one deprived of all' (not having thee)."

The poetical works of Jahḡzah have been collected and form a Diwān, of which the greater part is good: his adventures are well known. One of his verses currently quoted is the following :

"The sky was so clear that people said : There is a contest between Jahḡzah and the weather."<sup>2</sup>

Jahḡzah was an ugly man, and Ibn al-Rumī (alluding to the circumstance) said :

"I am told that Jahḡzah borrowed his goggle eyes (Juḡḡḡ) from the elephant on the chess-board,<sup>3</sup> or from the crab. O, how his audience are to be pitied ! To please their ears, they must afflict their eyes."

He died at Wāsiṭ, A. H. 326 (A. D. 937-8) ; or 324, according to some ; and it is said that his bier<sup>4</sup> was borne to 1 This is supposed to be addressed by a lover to the tribe of his mistress, on their setting out from their last habitation to some new station in the desert.

2 Such is the literal translation of the Arabic verse ; but it must be observed that the verb رَق which signifies to be clear, means also to be of good humour. By a similar analogy, they saw in German : hellere wetter (clear weather), and ein heiteres Gemuth (a serene of gay mind).

3 In the Chinese, Hindu, and Persian game of chess, that piece bears the name of the elephant, which in the English game is called the bishop.

4 When the bodies of the dead are transported to the cemetery, they are placed on a bier, off of which they are removed on reaching the grave. See Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. II, page 302.

Baḡḡdād.—Jaḥḥāh was a nickname given to him by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'azz; the Khatīb<sup>1</sup> says that he was born in the month of Shābān, A. H. 224 (A. D. 839). The history of Baḡḡdād and the Kitāb al-Aghḡnī make mention of him.<sup>2</sup>

55. IBN DARRĀJ AL-ANDALŪSĪ

Abū 'Umar Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-'Āsī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Īsā Ibn Darrāj al-'Qasṭallī al-Andalusī (native of Spain), kاتب and poet to al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī 'Āmir,<sup>3</sup> is counted in Spain among the good poets and the men eminent for their learning. Al-l'ha'alībī makes mention of him in the Yatimah

1 See his life, No. 33.

2 The manuscript of the Aghḡnī belonging to the Bib. du Roi, makes only incidental mention of Jaḥḥāh but there is reason to believe that this MS. is incomplete. The author of the Fihrest (fol. 196) informs us that Jaḥḥāh had studied under many learned men and rāwīs, or narrators of historical traditions, and that he played on the guitar; he was a man of dissolute life and of little or no religious principle. He composed a book on cookery, a history of celebrated players on the guitar, الطنبورين treatise on the excellence of the ragout called Sikbāj سكباج; Recollections of the khalīf al-Mu'tasim; Recollections of his own time; on Astrologers whose predictions were accomplished. It appears from the same work that he acquired great reputation by his wit, and prompt repartees; in the abridgement of the Khatīb's History of Baḡḡdād (MS. of Bib. du Roi, No. 634, fol. 42, verso; it is stated that he was the first singer of his time. Both authors abstain from speaking of his adventures, on account, it would seem, of their notoriety.

3 Abu 'Āmir Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Āmir surnamed al-Manṣūr (the victorious), was created ḥājib or prime minister of the kingdom of Cordova, A. H. 366 (A. D. 976), on the accession of Hiṣḥām al-Muwayyad Billāh. After achieving successfully more than fifty campaigns against the Christians, he was defeated by Sancho, king of Navarre, in the year 392 (A. D. 1001), and died of grief soon after. Though he made regularly two expeditions every year against the enemy, he found sufficient leisure to patronize men of learning. (Bughyat.—Conde—Abu 'l-Fidā.)

and speaks of him in these terms : "He was for the country of Andalus, that which al-Mutanabbī was for Syria, a poet of the highest order, and equal elegant in what he said and wrote." He then gives some fine passages from his compositions. Ibn Bassām also, in his Dhakhirah, speaks of Ibn Darraj and gives specimens of his epistles and poems. I learn from his collected poetical works, which form two volumes, that al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī 'Āmir ordered him to compose a poem in imitation of the qaṣidah made by Abū Nawās al-Ḥakam in praise of al-Khaṣīb Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, chief of the land-tax office in Egypt<sup>1</sup> the poem by Abū Nawās begins thus :

"O maid that dwellest near our double tent<sup>2</sup> ; thou hast a jealous father ; and the least (favour) one can hope, can hardly be obtained from thee."

In consequence of this order, Ibn Darraj recited to him an elegant qaṣidah, which contains, among others, the following passage :

"Women ! knowest thou not to remain (here) is to die and that the dwellings of the indigent are tombs ? Thou strivest to appal me with the terrors of a lengthened journey, but (know) that (journey) will be the means of (my) kissing Ibn 'Āmir's hand. Let me then drink of the deserts waters, though stagnant : so that I arrive where the waters of Generosity are pure. Though the perils of desert wasot be reserved for him who rides therein, the reward (of his toil will be) great."

In the same poem is this description of his parting from his wife and child.

---

<sup>1</sup> Al-Khaṣīb was appointed to this place by the khalif Ḥārūn al-Rashīd, A. H. 190 (A. D. 805-6), and removed A. H. 191.--(Al-Makin, page 119.)

<sup>2</sup> The dual is here employed for probably the same reason as in the case already noticed, No. 25, note on dual number.

"When she approached to say adieu and already her sighs and lamentations had shaken my fortitude—she conjured me to remember our mutual love ; and there, in the cradle, lay an infant lisping a feeble cry : it was unable to reply when spoken to, but its looks knew well how to touch the tender soul<sup>1</sup>: lodged in the safe dwelling of our hearts, soft arms and bosoms were its bed. She that gave it the breast was one for whose neck and bosom a man would sacrifice his life its nurse was one for the preservation of whose charms prayers would be offered to God: I disobeyed (the smile which was) its intercessor with my soul, and evening and morning led me on, till accustomed to my nightly journeys. The wing of separation bore me away ; and her fluttering heart<sup>2</sup> dismayed at my departure, bore away her (senses in a swoon). If she bade adieu to a jealous husband, he was only jealous of his fortitude (which nearly yielded) to her grief. —Had she then seen me when the ardours of noon were shed upon me, and the trembling mirage waved around; when I bared my face to the meridian fires, and submitted to their force (the evening too were warm); when I inhaled that life-giving breeze which flew across my path as I trod over the burning sands: (and Death wears many shapes in the coward's eye, but Danger is a vain sound to the ears of the brave!)—(Had she seen me then) she had clearly learned that I yield not to the injustice (of Fortune), and that I can bear with firmness the biting of adversity. He that is emir (master) over the terrors of the desert needs only his sword for vizīr, when threatened with danger. Had she seen me with my soul intent on speeding the nightly journey, when my sounding steps held converse with the demons of the waste—when I wandered over the desert during the shades of night, while the roar of the lion was heard from his haunt among the reeds—when the brilliant Pleiades circled (through the heavens), like dark-eyed maids (dancing) in the green woods : and the polar stars were borne round like the wine cups filled by a fair gazelle and circulated by an assiduous attendant;—when the milky way seemed like the gray hairs of age upon the head of

---

1 Literally: The spot where affection touches, or lights on souls.

2 Literally: ribs.

the gloomy night—when the ardour of my resolution and the piercer of the darkness<sup>1</sup> were equally terrible—when languor closed the eyelids of the stars ;—ah! then she had known that Fate itself obeyed my will, and that I was worthy the favour of Ibn ‘Āmir.”

This poem is of considerable length, but the extract we have given is sufficient. Since we have spoken of this qaṣīdah, we must cite also a portion of the one composed by Abū Nawās, and imitated, in its rhyme and measure, by Abū ‘Umar. *Abū Nuwās having set out from Baḡhdād for Egypt, with the intention of eulogizing Abū Naṣr al-Khaṣīb, recited to him the poem we are now speaking of, and in which he named the different places where he stopped on the way : one verse of it has already been given in the life of Abū Ishāq al-Ghazzī<sup>2</sup> and there is no necessity for inserting the whole of it here; it is besides of considerable length; we shall merely quote some select passages:

“When my active camel bore me from her tent, she said: ‘It is grievous for us to see thee going away! Is there not some place nearer than Egypt where riches may be found? There are surely many means of gaining riches.’ I answered, whilst her fair companions were hastening after, and complaining of her speed; and, as they ran, perfumes dropped (from their hair): ‘Let me go, so that the number of those who envy thee may be increased by (the success of) my journey to the city in which al-Khaṣīb is emir. If our camels visit not the country of al-Khaṣīb, to what other generous man can they go? Beneficence went not beyond him, neither did it stop before it reached him; no! wherever he is, Beneficence is there. (He is) the man of noble soul! he buyeth with his wealth a glorious reputation, for he knoweth how the vicissitudes of Fortune revolve.’ ”

“Though others may remain in ignorance of my words, the Commander of the Faithful<sup>3</sup> knoweth them well. Thou

---

1 The piercer of the darkness; the planet Saturn.

2 See No. 17.

3 The poet means the khalīf Harun al-Raṣīd.

*[ ] From “Abū Nuwās” to “are turned” on page 200 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

(O! Khaṣīb) hast not ceased to serve him with good counsel, from the time of (thy) youth till the grey hairs appeared on (thy) cheeks. When an unforeseen event occurred, your prudence released the khalif from all anxiety,<sup>1</sup> or your advice guided him in the choice for a minister."

The poet then enters into the description of the places where he stopped to rest, and he finishes thus:

"In the tumult of battle, al-Khaṣīb shed glory on the sword and the lance; in peace, he gave lustre to the pulpit and the throne.<sup>2</sup> Profuse in his bounty when the hands of others are contracted (by avarice); jealously respectful of female honour! O, khaṣīb! if my (description) attain the height of thy (glory), I shall merit wealth, and thou, that I place my hopes in thy bounty. If thou grantest me thy favour (let it be because) I deserve it; if you withhold (thy approbation), I shall ask (thy) excuse (for my presumption and be grateful)."

Abū Nuwās then celebrated the praises of al-Khaṣīb in a number of other poems, and on his return to Baghḍād he made an eulogium on the khalif<sup>3</sup> who said to him: "What can you say of us, after having said of our lieutenant: "If our camels visit not the country of al-Khaṣīb?" (the khalif here repeated this and the next verse). Abū Nuwās remained for some time with his eyes cast towards the ground, and then held up his head and recited these lines:

"When we praise you with sincerity, you are what we describe and even more; if our words seem to convey the praises of any other, it is thou alone towards whom our thoughts are turned."]

1 Literally: You spared him the trouble of it.

2 As governor, he had the right of pronouncing the khutbah from the pulpit, and of giving public audience from the throne as representative of the khalif. It would appear from al-Makīn, page 114, and Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 659, that in the time of al-Raṣhīd the governor of Egypt was sometimes authorized to collect the revenue. It is necessary to observe, however, that al-Khaṣīb could not have presided at public prayers in Egypt, as he never acted as governor of that province.

3 Probably the Khalif al-Raṣhīd.

From another piece of Abn 'Umar's, we extract the following verse:

"If the valley where thou dwellest be inaccessible (to thy lover), let the place of our meeting be the valley of sleep; there I may chance to find thee."<sup>1</sup>

In this verse, he comes near the following thought of another poet's:

"Is there means of meeting thee in the lonely valley for the grounds reserved by thy tribe are full of spies?"<sup>2</sup>

Abn 'Umar was born in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 347 (A. D. 958), and died on the eve of *Sunday, 15 of the Second Jumādā, 421 (A. D. 1030).—Darrāj is the name of one of his ancestors.—Qaṣṭallī means native of Qastallah,<sup>3</sup> a city in Spain, called also Qaṣṭallah Darrāj (Qastollah of Darrāj): but I know not if it be after the ancestor of Abn 'Umar or some other person that it was so called.

56. IBN ZAYDŪN AL-ANDALŪSĪ

Abu 'l-Walīd Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḡhalīb Ibn Zaydūn al-Maḥẓamī al-Andalusī al-Qurṭubī (descended from the tribe of Maḥẓūn and native of Cordova in Spain): this celebrated poet is spoken of in the following terms by Ibn Bassām in the Dhahīrah: "Abu 'l-Walīd attained the height of

---

1 That is: let us dream of each other.

2 Among the ancient Arabs, the shaykhs reserved for their own use a certain portion of ground near the camp; this was called the Ḥimṛ, or forbidden spot, and no other dare feed his flocks or hunt in it. Later poets designate by this word the spot where the beloved is supposed to reside; and mystic writers call Heaven the Ḥimṛ, because God, the object of love, dwells there.—(See Chrestomathie, tom. III, page 153.)

3 Al-Idrisī places Qas allāh on the sea-coast, fourteen miles east of Tavira; Conde says that it is now called Castellar.

*Sunday 16 is correct reckoning corresponding to 21 June.—Ed.

perfection in prose and poetry, and closed the series of poets sprung from Makhzūm ; he had received from Fortune the best of her favours ; he surpassed (in abilities) every person (of his time), and wielded his authority (as vizir) to the welfare (of friends) and the detriment (of foes) : he was endowed with a great talent for aptly expressing his thoughts in prose and verse, joined to such information in literature as surpassed the ocean by its overflow, and the moon by its lustre ; his poetry had a power which no magic ever possessed, and (an elevation) which the stars could not rival ; and he had received in portion<sup>1</sup> a prose style of a singular and original construction, quite poetic in its terms and ideas. He was the son of one of the first jurisconsults in Cordova and when his learning had attained its height, when his poetic talent had acquired its excellence, when his position (in the world) became eminent and when his tongue was free (to give its mandates uncontrolled), he left his native place and went, in the year 441 (A. D. 1049-50), to al-Mu'taḍid 'Abbād, prince of Seville, who adopted him as one of his privileged friends, admitted him into his intimate society, hearkened to his counsels, and treated him on the footing of a vizir." This author then gives a great number of epistles and pieces of poetry composed by Ibn Zaydān, among others, the following :

"Between me and thee subsists a feeling which, if pleasing to thee, shall never expire—a secret which has remained undivulged, whilst other secrets were revealed. He who would buy the share I hold in thy affections might offer me life itself ; I would not sell my share in thy affections. Let it suffice thee that, although thou hast placed on my heart a burden which the hearts of men could not sustain, my heart sustains it. Be scornful, I shall suffer patiently ; be proud, I shall endure it ; be haughty, I shall be humble ; return, I shall approach ; speak, I shall hear ; order, I shall obey."

---

I In the Arabic text, the word here translated by he had received in portion, is printed* ḥā conformably to the MSS., but it is evident that the true reading is ḥā, and as such it is here adopted.

* in Egyptian edition it is ḥā ; likewise it is ḥā in the autograph.—Ed.

By the same :

"He has bid adieu to fortitude, the lover who bade adieu to thee : it is now betrayed, the secret (of his love which he had) confided to thee (alone). He gnashes his teeth (with regret) that he went not onward some steps more, when he followed thee to say farewell. Sister to the moon in exaltation and in lustre ! may God reserve a time when I shall see thee reappear ! If my nights are long during thy absence, 'tis thou who art the cause ; I pass them in lamenting the shortness of the nights I spent with thee."

He is author also of some high-sounding poems, a portion of which I should give, were I not afraid of being prolix. One of his most brilliant gems<sup>1</sup> is the qasidah which contains these verses :

"Whilst our inmost thoughts conversed with thee (when memory recalled thy image), grief had nearly killed us, did we not assume fortitude. Since thou art gone, our days are become dark, though with thee our nights were bright. Yesterday our separation was not apprehended ; to-day, our meeting again cannot be hoped for."

The poem (from which this passage is taken) is of considerable length, and each of its verses might be selected (for its beauty), but it would divert us from our plan were we to enter into long details. Ibn Zaydun died and was buried at Seville on the 1st Rajab, A. H. 463 (A. D. 1071)*: mention is made of his father by Ibn Baskhuwāl, who speaks highly of him in his Ṣilat, and says : "He was surnamed Abū Bakr ; he died in the year 405 (A. D. 1014-5), at al-Bīrah (Elvira),<sup>2</sup> whence his body was taken to Cordova, where it was interred on Monday, †7th of the Second Rabi' of that year ; his birth was in A. H. 354 (A. D. 965) : he used to dye his hair black."<sup>3</sup>

1 Literally : One of his admirable necklaces.

2 See Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica, t. II, page 247 et seq., and Biographie, Universelle, ZAIDOUN.

3 It was more usual to dye it red ; see No. 19, note on hair dye.

* 4 April.—Ed.

† Monday 6 corresponding to 4 October. The author says "six days of the month passed" but it never means the day following.—Ed.

Ibn Zaydūn had a son named Abū Bakr, who acted as vizir to al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, and was slain on the day in which Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn took Cordova from Ibn 'Abbād and deprived him of his kingdom ; the particulars of which event we shall give in the lives of these princes. Cordova was taken on Wednesday, Second Šafar, 484 (March,* A. D. 1091), and Abū Bakr was killed there. We have already given the true pronunciation of Qurṭubah (Cordova); it is, therefore, unnecessary to repeat it here : it will be found in the life of Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, author of the 'Iqd' ; the Franks took this city from the Muslims in the month of Šhawwāl, 633 (about the 1st of July, 1236).<sup>2</sup>

57. IBN AL-ABBĀR THE POET

Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Khawḷānī, native of Seville in Spain, and surnamed Ibn al-Abbār, was a poet of reputation, and in the different branches of his art, one of the ablest among the poets patronised by the prince of Seville al-Mu'taḍid 'Abbād Ibn Muḥammad al-Lakhmī. He was also a man of learning, having made compilations and composed (some original treatises) ; but he possessed an acknowledged talent, and showed unbounded abilities in his poetical works, from which we extract the following beautiful passage :

"She knew not the lasting passion with which her eyes inspired my soul, nor the anguish which was borne by my

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 45.

<sup>2</sup> For further information respecting Ibn Zaydūn, see M. de Sacy's article in the Biographie Universelle, ZAIDOUN ; the date of the taking of Cordova, A. H. 434 (1042), as there given, is incorrect ; consult also the work of M. Weyers, entitled Specimen criticum, etc. This gentleman informs me that he still intends to publish the celebrated epistle of Ibn Zaydūn, with the commentary of Ibn Nubātah.

* 26 March.—Ed.

heart.<sup>1</sup>— I should lay down my life for that (fair) visitor who sought, but could not approach the (lover) drowned in tears and consumed (with love). Apprehensive of spies she came to me with hurried steps, her neck adorned with no other jewels but its grace and beauty. I handed her the cup, and the wine which it contained blushed (with jealousy) at the fragrance of her lips and the radiance of her teeth.<sup>2</sup> (We drank) till her eyelids yielded to the blandishments of slumber, and the strength of the purple (liquor) subdued her to my will. I wished to give her my cheek for a pillow,<sup>3</sup> but it was too small, and she said : Your arms are for me the best of pillows. She passed the night in a safe, retreat where no fear assailed her ; and I passed the night thirsting (to taste her lips), but I abstained.<sup>4</sup> When this (maid, beauteous as the) moon, approached, the full moon was effaced (by her beauty), and all the horizon became dark with jealousy; the night was perplexed to know where the moon would rise, but the night knew not that I held the moon in my arms."

He has composed a number of pretty little pieces* in the same style, and his Diwān, or collected poetical works are spoken of by Ibn Bassām in the Dhahīrah. Ibn al-Abbār died A. H. 433 (A. D. 1041-2).—Khawlān means descended from Khawlān, son of 'Amr, father of a great tribe, which settled in Syria.—Ishbiliyah (Seville) is one of the largest cities of Spain.

---

1 See No. 52, note on heart.

2 Literally : The honeyed row of teeth and the hailstones to which white teeth are often compared by Arabic poets.

3 The softness of the cheeks, their tenderness and delicacy are common topics with the poets.

4 Literally : Without either returning from the source or going to it. This expression was originally used by the nomadic Arabs in speaking of the power which their camels possessed of enduring thirst.

* For مقاطع "fragments" is an appropriate word.—Ed.

58. AL-MANĀZĪ

Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf al-Salīkī* al-Manāzī, a man of superior talent and distinguished as a poet, was vizīr to Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Marwān al-Kurdī, prince of Mayyāfāriqīn and Diyār Bakr, whose life shall be given later. To his eminent learning and his abilities as a poet, was joined great skill in the management of affairs, and he went a number of times as ambassador to Constantinople. He had collected a great quantity of books, which he made over as a wagf<sup>1</sup> to the mosque of Mayyāfāriqīn and the mosque of 'Amīd, in the libraries of which they are still to be found, and where they are known by the designation of al-Manāzī's Books. He had one time an interview, at Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, with the poet Abū 'l-'Alā, who complained to him of his position, isolated as he was from mankind and badly treated by them; to which al-Manāzī replied: "What can they have to say to you, since you have resigned to them both this world and the next?"<sup>2</sup> "Ah!" replied Abū 'l-'Alā, "and the next also?" repeating the words several times and much offended; he then hung down his head and did not utter another word till (his visitor) went away. In one of his journeys, al-Manāzī passed through the valley of Buzā'a,<sup>3</sup> and, charmed by the beauty of the spot and the feelings it inspired, he made on it these verses:

"A valley sheltered us from the heat of the burning sands, and a dense foliage gave to it a double shelter. We took repose under a tree which soothed us with its sound, as a nurse soothes her child just weaned. Fired with thirst, we drank of a pure spring whose waters were sweeter (to us) than wine to a boon companion. This valley wards off the sun on every point from which he can look towards it; him it excludes, but allows the zephyr to enter. Its (brilliant) pebbles cause the maids adorned with jewels to tremble, and they feel if the knot of their necklaces (be unbroken)."

---

1 Wagf, a concession in perpetuity for pious purposes.

2 This is a sarcastic allusion to Abū 'l-'Alā's heterodox principles; see his life, No. 46.

3 See Abū 'l-Fidā's Geography, page 267 of the Arabic text.

*M. de Slane reads it Sulaykī—Ed.

These verses are quite unique in their class, and have been cited, with others by the same author, in the Zinat al-Dahr, a work composed by Abu 'l-Ma'ālī al-Ḥazīrī among those given by him are the following :

"The boy I have is tall and slender; he is like Euclid's line: without breadth! the sense he possesses is extremely little: it is like the point—having no parts."

A number of his lesser pieces* are to be found in the hands of the public, but the collection of his poetical works is very rare: I have been told that the qāḍī al-Fāḍil commissioned a man of learning, who was on his travels, to procure him a copy; this person, in consequence, made inquiries in every country to which he went, but could gain no information about the book, and he then wrote a letter to the qāḍī, informing him of his want of success; this letter contained some verses, one of which had for second hemistich these words: And the dwellings are not inhabited by the poems of al-Manāzil<sup>1</sup> Died A. H. 437 (A. D. 1045-6). Manāzil means native of Manāzjird, a city near Khartabirt<sup>2</sup> it must not be confounded with Manāzkird, a castle in the dependencies of ḫalāt,<sup>3</sup> of which mention will be made in the life of Ṭaqī al-Dīn 'Umar, prince of Ḥamāh. Khartabirt is the well-known Hisn Ziyād.<sup>4</sup> Burzā'a is a considerable town halfway between Aleppo and Manbij.

59. IBN AL-KHAYYĀṬ THE POET

Abu 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Ṣadaqah, al-Ṭaḥlibī (member of tribe of Tāḡhlib), sur-

1 This hemistich is remarkable only for having the word al-Manāzil preceded by another of nearly the same sound al-Manāzil (the dwellings).

2 In Lapie's map of the Ottoman Empire, the name of this place is written Charpud; it lies about 16 miles east of the Euphrates is 38° 25' latitude north.—See St. Martin's Memoires Sur l'Armenie, t. I, p. 95.

3 Ḫalāt, a city of Armenia, is situated towards the northern extremity of lake Van.—Idem, t. I, p. 103.

4 See Abu 'l-Fida's Geography: Arabic text, page 52.

*For مَقَاتِيع "fragments" is an appropriate word.—Ed.

named Ibn al-Khayyāṭ (son of the tailor), native of Damascus, was a kātib<sup>1</sup> and poet of considerable merit. Having gone to travel, he composed poems in praise of the (eminent) men (whom he saw) in different countries ; and went to Persia, where he also made verses in honour (of its princes). At Aleppo he met with the celebrated poet Abu 'l-Fityān Ibn Ḥayyūs, and presented him with his poetical works, on which Ibn Ḥayyūs said : "This boy has announced to me my death, for it seldom happens in any profession, that a person of superior skill springs up, without its being an indication that the death of the oldest master in that profession is at hand." On coming to Aleppo in very low circumstances and utterly unable to support himself, he appealed to the generosity of Ibn Ḥayyūs in the following lines :

"What remains in my possession would not sell for a *nut, and my aspect may dispense thee from inquiring into my real state. But I have still some honour left<sup>2</sup> ; that I have kept unsold ; and where, where would a purchaser be found ?"

On reading these verses, Ibn Ḥayyūs exclaimed : "Had he said : And thou art surely the purchaser ! it would have been better."—These collection of Ibn al-Khayyāṭ's poems is so common, that it is useless to quote any of them ; most of his qaṣīdāt are of remarkable beauty, and had he composed no other than the one which rhymes in b, that poem alone had sufficed for reputation ; it begins thus :

"Obtain from the zephyrs of Najd,<sup>3</sup> that they grant respite to his heart ; for their perfume has nearly borne his senses away. †[Beware of that zephyr, when it breathes ; the

1 See note on kātib, No. 10; and No. 11.

2 Literally : Some water of the face which I have kept from selling. That is; I have still a feeling of honour which prevents me from prostituting my talent for money, and praising unworthy persons in hopes of being rewarded.—See note on ما الوجه, No. 49

3 The highland of Najd in Arabia is frequently celebrated for its flowers and their perfume; it is the Arcadia of the Arabic poets.

* "Grain" is a better word.—Ed.

† [ ] From "Beware of" to "of beauty" on page 210 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

lightest evil it produces is the pains of love. O, my friends!<sup>1</sup> if you have ever loved, you must know what hold that passion takes of him whose heart is smitten and enamoured : he reflects, and reflection augments desire ; the lover longs, and love deprives of reason the victim to whom it clings. An anxious pain with passionate despair and hope—intense desire, though for the place of rendezvous, or near. In our caravan there is one who encloses in his breast a wasting fire ; and who says to the challenge of love : ‘Here (is thy victim)!’ When a breath (of the zephyr) comes tremblingly from the desert (where his mistress dwells), it bears with it pain to (afflict) him, but (does) not (bear) its cure.<sup>2</sup> (In the caravan) is one whom protecting spears surround ; whose heart is turned away (from me), while in mine (I feel), from her aversion, (pains) like those which her guardian (spears) would cause. If I hear in our encampment a plaintive sigh, I am jealous from apprehension, fearing that it may proceed from love of her.”

The poem from which these lines are taken is of considerable length, but we shall limit our extract to the foregoing citation. Another of his pieces is the following :

“Ask the drawn sword of her glances if there still remains in my heart a drop of blood to supply the sources of my tears. Ah ! there is no protector, none to excuse or sooth (the lover) on the day desire torments (him). She has drawn against us the sharp (sword) of her looks, that nymph with the slender waist. She is a Turk by nation,<sup>3</sup> and the arrow she shoots of commits less ravage than the glances of her eyes. And (let me not forget) the night in which I went to meet her ; when I held converse with sleeplessness and care was the companion of my couch. The dread of her cruelty drove me for protection to her, yet how often do the most forward retreat (before serious danger). The wine-cup had then subdued her native rigour,

1 Literally : O my two friends. See note on two friends, No. 52.

2 Literally : Its companion; the companion of pain or sickness , داء is the cure دواء.

3 Compare this with the verses at No. 48.

and slowly born down her capriciousness ; an embrace was lawfully due, and I then kissed a charming mouth and neck ! Throughout the night my thoughts were at work ; was it a false image which I had met,—the phantom of a nocturnal dream ? How then had her aversion ceased ? how did we meet in love ? My (soul so) proud and (so) humble is the slave of love ; her (body so) full and (so) slight is (the throne) of beauty.”]

In the following, he reproaches his family and friends :

“(O) you (who dwell) at the junction of the two streams, if I have treated you with rigour,<sup>1</sup> my excuse has been already given ; mistake not my (reason for) quitting the place which you inhabit ; the men of noble mind is impatient under injustice.”

By the same :

“Didst thou suppose that I could ever turn my love away from thee ? (Be it known to him) who thinks it should be done, that a thousand reasons are against it.”<sup>2</sup>

*I am much pleased with the two following verses from one of his qaṣīdahs, they are extremely sentimental :

“When I called to recollection the tribe which dwells in the valley, love kills that heart of mine and gives it life. When I was at Raqmatayn,<sup>3</sup> I longed after them, but their tents were in the valley of Ghaḍāya;<sup>4</sup> O, how distant were the objects of my desire !”<sup>5</sup>

1 Literally : If my storm has borne you away.

2 In the Arabic, the relative pronoun in أنا can be referred to two antecedents; the word أنا signifies flight, and joined to the negative particle, necessity; the sense of the verse is consequently very difficult to determine, and the studied obscurity of its construction induces me to apprehend that I have missed the author's real meaning.

3 Ar-Raqmatayn, a valley near Madinah, mentioned by ancient poets; a number of other places in Arabia bear this name.

4 The valley of al-Ghaḍāya is not noticed in the biographical dictionaries of al-Suyūṭī, al-Zamakḥsharī and Yāqut.

5 The meaning of the expression بعد ما is given by al-Zawzānī in his commentary on the 70th verse of Imrau 'l-Qays's Mu'allaqah.

* According to Arabic text it should follow the qaṣīdah and before, “In the following he reproaches,”—Ed.

Ibn al-Khayyāṭ was born at Damascus, A. H. 450 (A. D. 1058) ; he died there on the 11 Ramaḍān, 517 (A. D. 1123)*; another statement, which, however, is not exact, places his death on the 17† Ramaḍān.

60. AL-MAYDĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Maydānī, native of Naysāpūr, was an eminent literary man and a learned philologist. He was the favourite pupil of Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Wāhidī, author of the commentary on the Qur'ān; he then studied under other masters and acquired a solid knowledge of the Arabic language, particularly philology and (the history of) the proverbs current among the Arabs of the desert. He composed on the subject a number of instructive works, amongst others the Book of Proverbs<sup>1</sup> which bears his name and to which no other similar work can be compared. He wrote also the Kitāb al-Sāmī fi 'l-Asāmī (Book of him who aspires after the signification of proper Names), a good treatise of its kind. He had learned by heart and taught (a portion of) the Traditions; and the following verses, which I believe are his own, were often recited by him:

“A hoary dawn broke upon the night of my cheeks, and I said: ‘It may perhaps be satisfied with (turning white) my beard.’ But as it still spread, I reproached it and it answered: ‘Hast thou ever seen a dawn which was not followed by day?’ ”

He died at Naysāpūr, on Wednesday, 25 Ramaḍān, A. H. 518 (A. D. 1124), and was buried at the Gate of Maydān Ziyād (Hippodrome of Ziyād). This Maydān was named after Ziyād Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān, and is one of the quarters of Naysāpūr: from it is derived the surname Maydānī.—Al-Maydānī had a son called

<sup>1</sup> Professor Freytag, of Bonn, has just published a Latin translation of this useful work.

* 2 November.—Ed.

† 8 November.—Ed.

Abu Sa'd Sa'id, who was distinguished for his talents and piety; he wrote a work, entitled al-'Ism fī'l-'Asm (Attainment of the signification of proper Names), and died A. H. 539 (A. D. 1144-5).

61. IBN AL-KHĀZIN

Abu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn 'Abd al-Khāliq, surnamed Ibn al-Khāzin (son of the treasurer), came of a family which inhabited Daynaur, but he himself was born and died at Baḡhdād. This kاتب<sup>1</sup> and poet was a man of merit, and wrote the fairest hand of any in his time; he was father<sup>2</sup> to the celebrated kاتب Abu 'l-Faḥ Naṣr Allāh, who transcribed repeatedly the Maqāmas (of Ḥariri), which copies are still extant, and who collected his father's poems into Diwān: those poems are good, the verses being well turned and the thoughts fine; as, for instance, the following, which contain a very original idea:

"He who acts uprightly is disappointed in his wishes, and he who acts crookedly is successful<sup>3</sup> and attains his end. See the letter alif (ا), it held itself up straight, and missed gaining the diacritical point, which the nūn (ن) obtained by its crookedness."

*[By the same:

"Who will bring me that brunette whom (her jealous relations) have surrounded with (lances) like to her in colour<sup>4</sup> slenderness, and flexibility. Her lover should put on a double breastplate of patience, so as to face the point of the spear and watch when the eyes (of her guardians) yield to slumber. The

1 See No. 10, note on kātib.

2 In the printed Arabic text, the conjunction و is misplaced; it should precede the هو not follow it.†

3 Read بالاسعاف in the printed text.†

4 The spears of the ancient Arabs were made of a sort of yellow cane with knots at intervals (bamboo?), and are frequently named the yellow or brown (sumr) in the metaphorical language of the poets.

* [ ] From "By the same" to "pains of love" on page 213 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

† In printed edition this error has been corrected.—Ed.

wine of youth causes her to falter (in her gait); it is not the breath of the zephyr which bends that flower); she is drunk (with youth), and I am doubly drunk with love. My eyes are as a headstrong, spirited courser; when I slack their bridle, they bear me into trouble."

By the same:

"O! thou who knowest all secrets; thou knowest what feeble resistance I can offer to the deceitful blandishment of her beauty! Let then my love for her (lose its force and) languish as her eyes! Let my consolation for her (loss) be as perfect as her beauty. The weight of mountains is less than what I bear on my heart afflicted by the pains of love."]

The following verses were written by him to Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ahwāzī, a physician who had hurt him in letting blood*:

"God pity the overthrown! Those whom your hands wound are mangled by a lancet.<sup>1</sup> You come upon your bands (of patients) with bandages, which you spread out and fold on one arm and another.<sup>2</sup> You bleed them? by Allah! you mangle them; stabbing with the point of your well-aimed weapons. Is that a lancet case or a quiver of arrows? or is it (the sword) Dhu 'l-Faqār borne by the corpulent bald-head ('Ali!)?<sup>3</sup> Woe be to me! if I meet thee after this, thou stern-faced 'Antar, unless I wear a cuirass."<sup>4</sup>

Another day, this physician, having Abu 'l-Faḍl for guest, treated him with great attention and had him conducted to the

1 This verse and the following contain some meanings and puns which no translation can preserve.

2 This verse has also the following meaning: You come upon the bands with bands which spread out and surround (the enemy, attacking him) hand to hand.

3 See the description of the ḫalīf 'Alī's appearance in Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals, t. I, p. 339. Muḥammad gave him the celebrated sword Dhu 'l-Faqār.

4 This physician, it would appear, shed as much blood as the famous warrior 'Antarah of the tribe of 'Abs ('Absī; which word seems also to mean here stern-looking). In these burlesque verses is found the vulgar pronunciation 'Antar for 'Antarah.

*To be more faithful to the text, the words "by slitting vein" should be added.—Ed.

garden and bath belonging to the house; on this occasion, the poet composed these verses:

"I visited a dwelling where I met no door-keeper but received me with smiles. The pleasure which appeared in the countenance of the servant was a harbinger of the kindest reception from the master.<sup>1</sup> I entered his garden and I visited his bath; and gave grateful thanks to the kindness of their owner."<sup>2</sup>

I have since found that the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn in his Khariḍah, attributes the preceding verses to a physician of Ispahān, named Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Aḥāzī, who, he says, died some years later than A. H. 550 (A. D. 1155): he gives the same lines also in the life of Ibn al-Khāzin, so it is difficult to decide which is the author.—We extract also the following passage from the poetry of Ibn al-Khāzin:

"(I loved) a slender-waisted (nymph), whose language showed that she was an Arab, but whose seducing looks were Indian.<sup>3</sup> I sipped the cup of patience till I stole from her guardians an hour of interview, sweeter than honey. I softened her paternal and maternal uncles, a jealous one excepted, that was on her cheek,<sup>4</sup> and resembled a drop of (black) musk deposited on (red) flower of the pomegranate; it seemed to me as if a violet were growing in a rose."

*[By the same:

"The image came to visit me, and my eyes stole an instant of hurried slumber unperceived by the spies who watched me.<sup>5</sup>

1 Literally: The advances of politeness on the face of the master.

2 This verse is designed to bear a double meaning and may signify: I entered his paradise, and I visited his hell; and thanked Riḍwān (the angel who guards Heaven) and the kindness of Mālik (the angel who guards Hell).

3 That is: They wounded like swords made of Indian steel.

4 The same word which in Arabic means maternal uncle signifies also mole, beauty-spot; this offered too fair an opportunity for quibbling to be neglected by the later Arabic poets.

5 See note on Tayf 'l-ḥay'āl, No. 52; it has been said that the lovers met in their dreams, and of course jealous spies would endeavour to prevent the lover from sleeping, when they had him in their power.—What is here translated by hurried slumber, signifies literally the slumber of the fearful.

* [ ] From "By the same" to "appeared" on page 215 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

My lips had not as yet finished kissing the yielding (beauty); my hands had scarcely pressed the (charms) confided (to them), when I fancied that (my enemies) perceived (me) and that they all said: He had not slept were he not visited by her image.<sup>1</sup>—Then (the pleasing phantom) fled away and vanished; and (when present, the light of its beauty) made me think the morning risen, though it had not yet appeared.”]

The greater portion of his poetry contains fine thoughts.<sup>2</sup> He died in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 518 (A. D. 1124), at the age of 47 years; the ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Jawzī says, however, in his Muntazim, that his death took place in 512. His son, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh was still alive in the year 575 (A. D. 1179), but I have not been able to learn the date of his death.

62. NĀṢIḤ AL-DĪN AL-ARRAJĀNĪ

Abn Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Arrajānī, surnamed Nāṣiḥ al-Dīn (friend of religion), was qāḍī of Tustar and 'Askar Mukram, and composed some extremely beautiful and charming poetry. Mention is made of him by the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn* in his Kharīdah: “In the prime of life,” says he, “al-Arrajānī was in the Nizāmiyah College at Ispahān (the flow of) his poetry commenced some years later than A. H. 480 (A. D. 1087), about the period of Nizām al-Mulk's death, and continued till the end of his life, in the years 544 (A. D. 1149): he did not cease acting as deputy to the qāḍī of 'Askar Mukram, and was highly honoured and respected. His poetry is great in quantity, and the collected portion is not the tenth part of what he composed. Having gone to 'Askar Mukram in the year 549

---

1 A true lover should never sleep but to dream of his beloved.

2 We may judge from the verse just translated what were considered as fine thoughts by Ibn Kḥallikān and his contemporaries.

*To be faithful to the original “al-Dīn” should be replaced by al-Ispahānī (a native of Ispahān).—Ed.

(A. D. 1154), I met there his son, Muhammad Rā'is al-Dīn, who read over* with me several times a large quire full of his father's verses. Arrajān was the native soil of his family tree, and Askar Mukram in Khuzestan the dwelling place of his kindred: though a Persian by birth, he drew his origin from the Arabs; the ancient stock from which he sprung were the Ansārs<sup>1</sup> (a noble extraction) the like of which was never offered by past ages: and he was descended from the tribe of Aws† and the branch of Khazraj; in speech he was a Quss‡<sup>2</sup> and an Iyād<sup>3</sup>; in writing, a Persian and (first) horseman in its hippodrome; in judgment, he was a Solomon and one of those sons of Persia who reached the highest point of knowledge<sup>4</sup>; he united beauty, in external form, to swætness in the perfume (of good character).” I learn from his collected poetical works that he was qāḍī's deputy in Khuzestān; acting sometimes at Tustar, other times at 'Askar Mukram, the qāḍī of which, Naṣr al-Dīn Abū

---

1 Ansārs (aiders); name given to the people of Madinah, who lent assistance to Muḥammad when expelled from Makkah.

2 Quss§ was a bishop of Najrān in Arabia Felix; he lived some years before the introduction of Islamism, and was celebrated for his eloquence.—See de Sacy's Ḥariri, page 276.

3 Iyād was the third in descent from 'Adnān, whose eloquence was proverbial; his talent was inherited by his descendants, of whom Quss was one.

4 Literally: Who attained the knowledge suspended to the Pleiades.

*According to the Arabic text it should be rendered: he loaned me. The some reading is in the autograph.—Ed.

†The sense of this sentence appears to be that 'Arrājani had combined in him the traits of all the four tribes, i. e. Aws, Khazraj, 'Iyād and Qays, and it should be rendered that 'his being one of the tribe of Khazraj based on his being one of the tribe of 'Aws; and (his eloquence) as one of the tribes of 'Iyād had (the pronunciation) of Qays.—Ed.

‡Misreading for Qaysī which means belonging to the tribe of Qays 'Ilān a tribe noted for its nomadic spirit in the days of Ignorance.

After the death of the Prophet they joined the apostatic forces, then they rejoined the fold of Islam and sided with 'Alī in the battles of Jamal and Siffin. Iyād is another tribe, some people of which had been converted to Christianity.—Ed.

§ قيسى is a misreading for قيسى.—Ed.

Muḥammad 'Abd al Qāhir Ibn Muḥammad, he replaced at one period, and at another later, 'Imād al-Dīn Abu 'l-'Alā Rajā; upon this he composed these lines:

"That I should act as deputy in such a profession is one of the turns of fortune. It is a wonder that I can have patience to endure such wondrous changes."

Being both jurisconsult and poet, he alluded to this in the following verses:

"I am without contradiction the most poetic doctor of the age, or (at least) the most learned doctor among poets. When I utter verses, people inscribe them (in their memory) with natural facility, without the trouble of repetition.<sup>1</sup> Like a voice in the shade of mountains, when (my poetry) strikes the ear, it awakens the answer of the echo."

By the same:

"Though you be a man of good counsel, ask advice from others on the day in which evil fortune befalls you. With the eye, you can distinguish far and near, but it you cannot see without a mirror."

By the same :

"I never roamed through distant region without making you (my generous patron!) the special object of my search. My efforts to meet you were earnest, but the only favour you procured me was the persecutions of misfortune. I still draw towards you, through I turn my face away, and my motions are as those of the stars.<sup>2</sup> I go towards the far East that I may find you, though my apparent direction is towards the West."

The following verses were written by him to a man in authority, reproaching him for not asking for him after a period of separation:

---

1 Such appears to be the meaning of the word اللقاء in this verse. The expression التي الدروس (to lecture) has been already noticed, No. 44 : note on التي الدروس.

2 He alludes to the retrograde motion of the planets.

"O my friend, I offer my life in ransom for thine! O thou whom it is my duty to love! why hast thou not reproached me for my neglect? To-day I complain of thy neglect and reproach thee. A proof that thou art tired of me is that I have been absent for some days and none came to inquire for me. When thou seest the slave run away unpursued (know) that it is the master who runs away from him."

By the same, containing a singularly original thought:

"When none had pity on my sufferings, my fleeting image which visited the slumbers of my mistress,<sup>1</sup> and which I in my thinness resembled, had compassion on me. It yielded me secretly its place and I went that night to visit my beloved, who thought she saw me in a dream (not in reality). So we passed a night together unperceived; I being awake under her eyelids, and she, asleep."

In one of his qasīdahs is found the following verse:

"Look at that (charming) mole<sup>2</sup> below her neck and learn how treasures are hid in secret corners."

By the same:

*Canesco et amicus pubescit; reliqui illum et ille me reliquit; quod in me niger erat (scil. barba) album factum est, et quod in illo album (scil. gena) erat, nigrum.

By the same:

"(The lover) asked the groves where was his beloved; he hearkened to obtain an answer from the echo, but it only repeated

---

1 That the reader may understand this little piece, it is necessary to repeat here one of the observations already made on the whimsical idea held by Arabic poets respecting dreams. (See note on Tayf al-Khayāl, No. 52.) They fancy that the lover sees the image of his mistress in a dream, because he is really visited by a phantom which she herself sends to him. The lover too sends his image to glide under the eyelids of his beloved, who then dreams of him. Here the lover was so extenuated, that he took the place of his own image, which very complacently gave it up to him.

2 See note on black moles, No. 14.

*Its English version is as follows:

I have been separated from my friend (for such a long time) that I grew old and he grew beard and (thus) blackness (of my beard) turned grey and whiteness (of his cheek) became black.—Ed.

his words. "Where," said he, "does she now sojourn?" It answered: "Where does she now sojourn?"<sup>1</sup>

By the same;

"If I knew not what I now know my ignorance would give me as much happiness as my knowledge gives me grief. Thus the sparrow ranges unconfined and feeds in the gardens, whilst the nightingale is imprisoned for its talent of song."

Another poet has thus expressed the same idea:

"The woes and evils of the world visit men of talent alone; so the only birds deprived of freedom are those which possess a tuneful voice."

The idea is similar to that which is contained in the following verse, taken from a long poem of Abn Ishāq al-Ghazzī, whose life has been already given (see No. 17):

"My talents, no doubt, have done me harm; the aloes-wood is burned for its sweet perfume."

We shall confine ourselves to the foregoing extracts, as the fear of being prolix hinders us from giving one of his long qaṣīdahs.—By the same.<sup>2</sup>

"I love the man whose face is fair towards his friend and whose heart is free from guile: despite all dangers, his friendship will endure; and tell me, does every man's friendship endure?"

As this second verse, which can be read backwards (in the original Arabic), is to be found in the poetical works of al-Ghazzī, we are unable to decide which of these two poets composed it.—Al-Arrajāni's verses abound in pretty thoughts, and have been collected in a separate volume. He was born A. H. 460 (A. D.

1 Literally: Where is the place in which she has taken the baggage off her camel.—The echo shows, by its answer, that it was as equally desirous as the lover of knowing where the beloved then resided, and consequently could give him no information.

2 It is evident that this has been inserted later, and in the wrong place also. Many examples of similar inattention will be pointed out in the course of the work.

1067-8); died in the month of the First Rabi' A. H. 544* (A. D. 1149), at the city of Tustar, or at 'Askar Mukram according to another relation.—Arrajān means belonging to Arrajān, which is one of the districts of al-Ahwāz in Khuzestān; most persons say that the name of this place is written with a single r, and it is thus that al-Mutanabbī gives it in the following verse:

“To Arjān, my rapid steeds! Such is my firm resolution, which leaves the hostile spears broken behind it.”

Al-Jawharī, however, in his dictionary the Ṣaḥāḥ, and al-Hāzimī in his Synonymes, state that this name takes a double r.—Tustar, called vulgarly Shushter, is a well-known city in Khuzestān. ‘Askar Mukram (the camp of Mukram); people differ respecting this Mukram, but most of the well informed say that he was brother to Muṭraf Ibn Sīdān Ibn ‘Aqīlah Ibn Zikwān Ibn Ḥayyān† Ibn al-Kharzaq Ibn Ghaylān‡ Ibn Ḥāwah Ibn Ma‘an Ibn Mālik Ibn A‘sur§ Ibn Sa‘d Ibn Qays Ibn Ghaylan** Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma‘ad Ibn ‘Adnān: such is the genealogy which I have extracted from Ibn al-Kalbī's Jamharat; the name of Bāhilah is not, however, in this list,<sup>1</sup> though the Mukram above-mentioned is said to be descended from Bāhilah and from Ḥāwah; God knows best the truth! Others say that this Mukram was descended from Ja‘wanah al-‘Āmirī; and some again state that he was freed-man to al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, who posted him in that

---

1 In the life of Qu‘aybah Ibn-Muslim, the author states for what reason the name of Bāhilah is suppressed in the genealogical list remounting from Ma‘an to ‘Adnān.

*Sam‘āni gives A. H. 540 (f. 24 a).—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Hobbān.—Ed.

‡Egyptian edition has ‘Īlān.—Ed.

§M. de Slane reads it ‘Aṣar.—Ed.

**Egyptian edition has ‘Ilān.—Ed.

place for the purpose of waging war against Khurrazād* Ibn Bāris,<sup>1</sup> and for this reason it was called after him.—Khuzestan is an extensive region between Baṣrah and (the province of) Fāris.

(For further reference, see Sam'āni, Ansāb f. 24 a.—Ed.)

63. IBN MUNĪR AL-ṬARĀBULUSĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Munīr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muflīḥ al-Ṭarābulusī (native of Tripoli in Syria), surnamed Muhaddhib al-Dīn (embellisher of religion), 'Ayn al-Zamān (eye of time), was a poet of considerable celebrity, and his collected poetical works are still extant: his father recited poetry and sung in the market-places of Tripoli. The son, as he grew up, learned the Qur'ān by heart, and, after studying philology and literature, commenced reciting verses of his own; he then went to Damascus and settled there; (in religion) he was a Rāfidi.<sup>2</sup> The number of his satires and the causticity of his language were so excessive, that Buri, son to the atābek Ṭuḡhtikīn and prince of Damascus, imprisoned him for some time and intended to have his tongue cut out, but being interceded with, he consented to banish him. Ibn Munīr held a correspondence with Ibn al-Qaysarānī, in which these two poets attacked each other; for they were both residents

---

1 Such also is the account given by Abu 'l-Fidā in his Geography, page 316 of the Arabic text; the adversary with whom Mukram had to contend is there called Kharidah but Ibn Khallikān writes the name in the same manner as the excellent historian, al-Ṭabari. This campaign was made in A. H. 93, and an account of it is given in Major Price's Retrospect of Muhammadan History, vol. I, page 472.

2 The word Rāfi'i (heretic) is generally made use of by the Sunnites to designate a follower of Shi'ite doctrines. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Kharidah (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1414, fol. 1), that Ibn Munīr professed the most exaggerated Shi'ite principles whilst his rival, Ibn al-Qaysarānī, was a devout Sunnite.—For the origin of the Rafidis, see De Sacy's Exposé de la Religion des Druzes, tom. I, p. 48, Introd.

*M. de Slane reads it Khurzād.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads it Muhaddib.—Ed.

of Baghdād, and each jealous of the other, as generally happens with persons who follow the same profession. In one of Ibn Munīr's qaṣīdahs are found these verses:

"When a man of noble mind perceives that he is neglected<sup>1</sup> his resolution should be, to depart for another land. Thus the moon, when waned away, strives to attain to its full, and succeeds by changing its place. Shame on your wisdom!<sup>2</sup> if you consent to drink of a troubled source<sup>3</sup> when the bounty of God fills the very deserts. During the course of your life, you sat (in listless idleness) and rivalled your camels in indolence; why not take them, and pry into the secrets of the desert? Depart and you shall gain lustre, like the sword which, when drawn, shows on each side of its blade the ornaments which were hidden by the scabbard. When life forsakes the body, count it not death; the only death is to live in humiliation. Devote your life to the deserts, not to poverty! As long as God permits you to live, let it suffice you to deserve his favour. Despise the vileness of fortune's gifts, when they draw near to you; (remain not in inglorious ease) but be as the phantom of a vision which appears and departs. Fly, even during the noontide fires,<sup>4</sup> from those on whom you rained honey, and who reaped for you colocynth. Fly the deceitful wretch in whose (heart) the plantations of friendship are badly rooted, and who, if you show him sincerity, will misinterpret (your conduct). Ah, how well I know the world and its people! with them it is a crime for merit to be perfect. They are formed in Nature's basest mould; the best of them, if I* say a word,

---

1 Literally: Perceives that obscureness is become the guest of his dwelling.

2 Literally: Folly to your wisdom!

3 To drink of a troubled source; that is, to live dependent on a mean patron, who troubles the pleasure his gifts might create, by saying how ill they are deserved.

4 These verses contain a number of verble quibbles to which the author in some cases has sacrificed good taste; here, for instance, he has adopted a gross and ridiculous metaphor, pediculos venari (fala) in juba deserti (fala).

5 Literally: Join to the ardent noon flight from those, etc.

*According to the autograph and printed Arabic text in should be rendered in second person thus: if thou sayest a word they will repeat it; and if thou keepest silence, they will report to others what thou never said.—Ed.

will repeat it; and if I keep silence, will report to others what I never said. When Fortune thinks to cast me down, my haughty spirit bears me up even to the stars.* I impress upon my mind the discourse of grave events, though it be darkly uttered; I tend my camels, but I fatigue them also on the failure of herbage.<sup>1</sup> (The) declaration (which I make is plain and clear) as the light of morning; then follows a firm resolution which executes (my will), as the edge of the sword slays the victim which it encounters."

†[One of his best pieces is the qaṣīdah which begins with these verses:

"Who has placed the moon on the point of that spear? Who has imbued with subtle magic the edge of that (sword) of Yemen?<sup>2</sup> Who has sent down the highest luminary to a sphere circumscribed by the folds of a tunic from Khusrowān<sup>3</sup>? Is that a glancing eye or a scabbard from which a sharp sword comes forth? Is that a young beauty whose waist, as she walks, bends gracefully from side to side? Or is it rather the elastic motion of a pliant lance? She has subdued me, I who before was so proud; love makes the lion slave of the covert-seeking gazelle."

From the same poem:

Is it not liquid musk which drops from her locks upon the summit of that pliant reed (her body)? What intoxicating draughts of love, what pearl-like teeth are in the covert formed by those lips of coral! Were the moon, when shining in full lustre, asked

---

1 The meaning of the poet appears to be, that when his camels can no longer find nourishment, he removes them to some distant and more fertile spot. This, however, seems to be only a metaphor, by which he wishes to imply that if his talents are neglected in one country, he travels to another.

2 This verse signifies in plainer language: Who has united that beautiful countenance to a graceful body pliant as a lance? Who has imbued with subtle magic the glances of the native of Yemen?

3 The poet is so dazzled by the beauty of his mistress that he takes her for the sun.

* السمك الاعزل is a star in the Zodiac sign of Virgo and it is the 14th mansion of the Moon.—Ed.

† [ ] From "One of his" to "Companions of Muhammad", on page 225 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

whom she envied, she would reply: Such a one's daughter.<sup>1</sup> she has vanquished me by the variety of her perfections (charms) which consist in the sound of her voice and the aspect of her form, the haughty port of the Persian,<sup>2</sup> the voluptuousness of Syria, glances like those of the maids of 'Irāq, and language (sweet as that) spoken in Hijāj. Wine is not more dangerous for the reason that in the pure eloquence of the desert, uttered with a Turkish pronunciation."

By the same:

"Her eyes denied having shed my (heart's) blood; but she held up her head,<sup>3</sup> and then they acknowledged their guilt. Do not suppose that the mole upon her cheek is a tear of blood, shed by my eyes; it was a burning coal of the fire which consumed my heart; and on being plunged into (the yielding substance of) her cheek, it was extinguished, and then rose to surface."

In one of his qaṣīdahs are found these lines:

"Speak not harshly to me, for the marks of your displeasure are already sufficiently manifest. O, my mistress; where are those smiles which are now replaced by frowns?"

I found the anecdote which follows in the handwriting of the Shaykh *'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhīrī': "I was told by Abu 'l-Majd, qāḍī of Suwaydā,<sup>5</sup> that there were in Syria two poets, Ibn Munīr and Ibn al-Qaysarānī, the former of whom used to taunt the latter (with being so unlucky) that he never accompanied any one without that person's meeting with ill fortune; it happened, however, that a musician sung these verses to the atābek 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, prince of Syria, who was then besieging the castle of Jabar (Qal'ah Jabar)<sup>6</sup>:

1 Daughter ابنة; the reason for so translating the Arabic word may be learned from the observations made in the Introduction.

2 The ancient poets sometimes allude to the proud and stately gait of the Persians; see Diwan d'Amro 'l-Kais, page 46, line 5 of the Arabic text.

3 Literally: Her cheek.

4 See note on dreams, No. 19.

5 Suwaydā is situated at the mouth of the Orontes.

6 See the life of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī.

*Full name Shaykh Ḥāfiẓ Traditionist Zakī al-Dīn 'Abdul 'Azīm Ibn 'Abdul Qawī al-Mundhīrī of Egypt.—Ed.

"What woe I suffer from that coy and froward nymph, when vile informers repeat to her tales completely false. I salute her, and she turns away; curving her arched eyebrows (into a frown), as if I were a wine-cup, and she still suffering from its effects."

"Zinkī applauded the verses and asked who was the author; and on learning that they were composed by Ibn Munīr, who was then at Aleppo, he wrote to the governor of that place with orders to send him the poet with all speed. The very night Ibn Munīr arrived (at the camp), the atābek Zinkī was murdered"—(we shall give the details of this event in his life). "On his death, Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, prince of Emessa, took Nar al-Dīn Maḥmad, son to Zinkī, and, putting himself at the head of the Syrian troops, returned to Aleppo, while Zayn al-Dīn 'Alī, father<sup>1</sup> to Muḥaffar al-Dīn, prince of Arbela, took the command of the troops belonging to the provinces east (of Syria), and went back with them to Mosul, where he joined Sayf al-Dīn Ḡi.āzi, (another) son to Zinkī, and made him master of Mosul. Ibn Munīr went back to Aleppo along with the army, and was accosted in these terms by Ibn al-Qaysarānī: Take that for all with which you flouted me.'"—This same Ibn al-Qaysarānī composed the following lines on Ibn Munīr, who had reviled him in a satire:

"Ibn Munīr! in reviling me, you have insulted a man of learning, who, by the rectitude of his judgment, was beneficial to mankind. But my heart is not oppressed for that; I have before me the model offered to the Companions of Muḥammad.<sup>2</sup>

Ibn Munīr's poetry is eminently refined; he was born at Tripoli, A. H. 473 (A. D. 1080-1); and died in the month of the latter Jumādā, 548 (September, A. D. 1153), and was buried near the chapel at mount Jawshān.<sup>3</sup> I visited his tomb and found these verses inscribed on it:

1 In the Arabic text the word والد is incorrectly printed ولد.

2 This alludes to the following passage of the Qur'ān: "You have in the Apostle of God an excellent example, unto him who hopeth in God and the last day, remembereth God frequently." See sūrat 33, verse 21.

3 According to that author of the Marāʾiṣid al-Itṭilāʾ, Jawshān is a hill near Aleppo.

"Let him who visits my tomb be assured that he shall meet with what I have met with. May God have mercy on him who visits me (here) and says to me: 'May God have mercy on thee!'"

His life is given by the ḥafīẓ Ibn 'Asākir in his History of Damascus, who there says: "Al-Kḥaṭīb al-Sadīd (the able preacher) Abn Muḥammad 'Abd al-Qāhir Ibn 'Abd al-Ẓīz, preacher at Ḥamāh, relates as follows: 'After the death of Ibn Munīr the poet, I saw him in a dream<sup>1</sup>; I was on a lofty hill in a garden and I asked him how he was and told him to come up to me'; and he replied: 'I cannot, by reason of my breath; on which I said: 'Hast thou drunk wine?' 'Something worse than wine, O Kḥaṭīb!' he replied. 'What is it?' said: 'Dost thou know?' said he, 'what befel me on account of those poems in which I reviled people?' 'What befel thee?' 'My tongue,' he replied, 'swelled and lengthened out as far as sight could reach, and each poem recited with it became a dog which clung to it.' I saw that he was barefooted and that his clothes were completely worn out, and I heard a voice over him repeat these words: Over them, shall be coverings of fire, and under them shall be floors of fire.<sup>2</sup> I then awoke in terror."—I have since found in the Diwān of Abu 'l-Ḥakam 'Ubayd Allāh (whose life I intend to give), that Ibn Munīr died at Damascus, A. H. 547 (A. D. 1152); Abu 'l-Ḥakam having composed some elegiac verses on his death, which show that he died in that city. From among those verses we shall quote the following, which are written in the usual ludicrous style of the author:

"They bore him along upon the bier, and washed his corpse on the bank* of the river Qallāt; they warmed the water in a well-tinned cauldron, under which they lit sticks of oak."

In admitting the exactness of the fact (mentioned in these verses), we shall be obliged to combine it with the statement already given, and suppose that he died at Damascus and was then

1 See note on dreams, No. 19.

2 See Qur'ān, sūrat 39, verse 18.

*The word شاطئ in the autograph means two banks.—Ed.

carried to Aleppo for burial.<sup>1</sup> — Tripoli is a city of Syria, situated on the sea-coast and lying near Ba'lbek. In the year 503 (A. D. 1109), it was taken by the Franks from its possessor, Abū 'Alī 'Ammār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ammār, after a siege of seven years: the history of this event is too long to relate.

64. AL-QĀDĪ AL-RASHĪD ABU 'L-ḤUSAYN

Al-Qādī al-Rashīd (the well-guided qāḍī) Abū 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad, son of al-Qādī al-Rashīd Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, son of al-Qādī al-Rashīd Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Zubayr al-Ḥaṣṣānī (of the tribe of Ghassān) al-Aswānī (native of Syene): this qādī belonged to an honourable and influential family; he is author of a work called Kitāb al-Jinān, etc., containing notices on a number of eminent men of talent;<sup>2</sup> his poetical works form a volume, and those of his brother the qādī al-Muḥadḍhib Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan have also been collected into a volume: they were both good writers in prose and verse. The following lines, from a beautiful qaṣīdah by al-Muḥadḍhib, contain an elegant and original idea:

“See the milky way among the stars; it resembles a swollen stream watering meadows. Were it not a river, the constellations of the Fish and the Crab had never swum in it.”

From another qaṣīdah by the same author:

---

1 The author has already stated that Ibn Munīr was buried at Jawṣḥān a hill near Aleppo, but he concludes from the verses just cited that he died at Damascus, since the funeral ablutions were performed on the body near the river Qallāḥ: This river must then be close to Damascus, yet none of the Arabic geographers have mentioned it, nor is it noticed by any of the European travellers whose works I have consulted.

2 The full title of this work is Jin in al-Jan'in wa riyād al-Adh'in; that is, Gardens of the heart and Meadows of the mind: it contains notices on the poets of Egypt, and is intended as a supplement to the Yatimah of al-Tha'alibī.

"I have no thirst for any other water but the Nile's—not even—God pardon me! for that of Zamzam."<sup>1</sup>

The writings of this poet abound in fine thoughts; he commenced making verses A. H. 526, and mention is made of him by the ḵatib 'Imād al-Dīn in his Sayl wa 'l-Dhayl. He possessed a greater talent for poetry than his brother al-Raṣḥīd, but was his inferior in all other sciences. He died at Cairo in the month of Rajab, 561 (May, A. D. 1166). As for the qādī al-Raṣḥīd, he is spoken of in these terms by Abu 'l-Tāhir al-Silafī in one of his ta'liqahs<sup>2</sup>: "In the year 559 (A. D. 1163-4) he was named, against his will, inspector of the government offices at Alexandria; and in the month of Muḥarram, 563 (October, 1167), he was put to death unjustly through the malice of his enemies." The ḵatib 'Imād al-Dīn speaks of him also in the Sayl wa 'l-Dhayl or supplement to his Khariḍah "This overflowing ocean, says he, "this swollen sea has been noticed by me in the Khariḍah, where I have also made mention of his brother al-Muḥadḥḍhib; in the year 563 he was put to death unjustly by Shāwir for leaning towards the party of Asād al-Dīn Shīrkāh. He was black in skin, and lord of the town<sup>3</sup>; he was the pearl of the age for his knowledge of geometry, of the exact sciences, and of those which are connected with the study of the law and of poetry. The emīr 'Aḍad al-Dīn Abu 'l-Fawāris Murḥaf Ibn 'Usāmah Ibn Munqidh' recited to me some poems by this author, and among others, the following, which he says he heard from his own mouth:

---

1 Zamzam: the well in the precincts of the temple of Makkah; its waters are supposed, by the Muslims, to possess extraordinary virtues.

2 See note on Ta'liqah, No. 25.

3 It is difficult to guess at 'Imād al-Dīn's meaning from these words; in his rhythmical prose he has brought in the word balada (town) to rhyme with jalada (skin), from which I am induced to think that here, as in many other passages, he has sacrificed sense to sound. Perhaps he wishes to say that the qādī al-Raṣḥīd was governor or proprietor of his native town Syene.

4 This emīr was probably son to the Osāma whose life is given in this work; the ḵatib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Khariḍah (MS. No. 1414, fol. 117), that he met him at Damascus, A. H. 571 (A. D. 1175-6). He is there called Aḍad al-Dawlat, not Aḍad al-Dīn, as in the MSS. of Ibn Khallikān.

"The woes which afflict me are great, but my courage also is great; and what harm can polishing cause to the cutting steel? (what harm can the rubs of adversity do me?) The vicissitudes of fortune, the changes it brings about may alter the noble character of others, but cannot alter mine. Did fire consume the ruby, the ruby then were as a common stone. Let not the worthless rags which cover me deceive you; they are the shell which encloses a pearl. Think not, when the stars are hidden, that their smallness prevents them from being seen; the fault must be laid upon (the weakness of) your sight."

*[The idea in this last verse is taken from a long and well-known qaṣīdah, composed by Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri, in which that poet says:

"The eye sees the stars and thinks them small, but that smallness is the fault of the eye, not of the star."

The kاتب Imād al-Dīn gives as this poet's<sup>1</sup> the following verses, composed on al-Kāmil, son of (the vizīr) Shāwīr:

"If a man of honourable feelings does not quit the beloved spot in which he is no longer welcome<sup>2</sup> that man has no resolution. Even did he love it to excess, he should know that death will tear him from it in spite of his reluctance."

'Imād al-Dīn relates also that he learned the following verses, at Baḡhdād, in the year 551 from Muḥammad Ibn 'Īsā al-Yamānī,<sup>3</sup>

1 In the Arabic text, a letter has been misplaced; the true reading is وأورد له.

2 Literally: which repels him.

3 The kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn states, in his Khariḍah (MS. No. 1414, fol. 250 verso), that the poet Muḥammad Ibn 'Īsā al-Yamānī (or al-Yamānī as there written), came to Baḡhdād, A. H. 550, and lodged at the house of a Christian physician belonging to the family called Banū Tūma (the sons of Thomas); he was a man of great talent and an able mathematician, and professed to understand the Almagest and the sciences of astronomy and logic. 'Imād al-Dīn was at that time studying Euclid, and he profited by the opportunity to have the difficulties of that author explained to him by al-Yamānī, but was soon disgusted by the self-sufficiency and arrogance of his master. In the year 580, al-Yamānī returned to Baḡhdād, after having been absent for some time; 'Imād al-Dīn had then some scientific discussions with him, after which he lost sight of him and never saw him more.

*[ ] From "The idea" to "on earth" on page 230 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

who said that they had been recited to him by al-Qāḍī al-Raṣḥīd, and that they were composed by him on a person (who had deceived his expectations):

"Though the hopes which I placed in thee were disappointed, when I thought to have found in thee a just man; thou hast, however, conferred on me a service, which deserves my gratitude wherever I may dwell; for thou hast put me on my guard against all my companions, and taught me that no sincere friend exists on earth."]

*The lines which follow were written to Al-qāḍī Al-Raṣḥīd by al-Jalīs Ibn al-Ḥabāb<sup>1</sup>:

"By your absence, our rich store of noble deeds has been impoverished, and the dwelling place of glory is abandoned. When you sojourned with us, the dark clouds (of sorrow) were dispelled, and prosperity followed wherever you passed. In your departure, fortune has committed a crime, which cannot be pardoned but by your return."

†[Al-Qāḍī al-Raṣḥīd was black in colour, and to this allusion is made by the poet and kاتب Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Maḥmūd Ibn Qāḍis in these satirical verses:

"O thou who resemblest Luqmān, but not in wisdom<sup>2</sup>; thou who hast lost thy learning, not preserved it; thou hast stolen everyon'e verses, and mayest be called the black thief".<sup>3</sup>

1 The qāḍī Abu 'l-Mā'ālī 'Abd al-Azīz Ibn al-Ḥasayn Ibn al-Ḥabāb al-Aḡḥlābī (descendant of the Aghlabites) al-Su'ādī, was surnamed al-Jalīs (the companion) because he was admitted into the intimate society of the prince of Egypt; he was a man of talent and a poet. Died A. H. 561 (A. D. 1165-6). Al-Suyutī's Ḥusn al-Muḥāḍira, MS. No. 652, fol. 150).

2 Luqmān, so celebrated by the Arabs for his wisdom, was a black.

3 The black thief (in Arabic, al-Aswad al-Salīkh) is the name of a species of venomous serpent.

*In Arabic text this passage comes after the passage which begins with the word "These" on page 231 and ends on "mentioned".—Ed.

†[ ] From "Al-Qāḍī" to "property" on page 231 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

I am induced to think that the following lines were composed on al-Qāḍi al-Raṣḥīd also:

"If thou sayest: I was formed out of fire, and therefore surpass all men in intelligence, we answer: Thou speakest truth; but what has wasted thee away to a cinder?"

Al-Raṣḥīd, having travelled to Yemen on an embassy, pronounced verses in honour of some of the princes in that country, and amongst others, Alī Ibn Ḥatīm al-Hamdānī, of whom he said:

"Though Upper Egypt be sterile and its people suffer dearth, I shall not feel dearth in the country of Qaḥṭān. Since the land of Ma'rib supplies my wants, I have no regret for Syene. If the vile sons of Kḥindif know not my worth, my merit is appreciated by the princes sprung from Hamdān.

These verses excited the hatred of the missionary residing at Aden, by whom they were transmitted in writing to the prince of Egypt, who was so highly irritated by them, that he caused the author to be arrested and delivered over to them bound and naked, after seizing all his property.]<sup>1</sup> Al-Raṣḥīd remained some time in Yemen, and then returned to Egypt, where he was put to death by Shāwir as we have already mentioned.*--Ghassānī means

---

<sup>1</sup> This adventure is not very intelligibly related, and indeed it cannot be perfectly understood without taking into consideration the following circumstances: 1st, The sulṭān Alī 'Ibn Ḥatīm, prince of Ṣana'a (see Iohannisens Historia Jemenae, p. 145), was descended from Hamdān, one of the posterity of Kahlān, brother to Hīmyār; he was therefore of the purest Arabic race; 2ndly, Kḥindif was a descendant from Ismā'il, and consequently not of true Arabic blood; his sons were Tābikḥah, Qama'a, and Mudrikah, from which last sprung Quraysh and Muḥammad, from whom were descended (according to their own account) the Fātimite princes of Egypt; they were consequently sons of Kḥindif, and it is against them that the poet here aims his satire. 3dly. The missionary here mentioned was the secret agent of the Fātimite government (see note on Muqāṭil, No. 10). The persons to whom al-Raṣḥīd was given up were probably some enemies he had in Yemen.

*Ibn Ḥābab's passage comes here.—Ed.

belonging to Ghassān a great branch of the tribe of al-Azd, whose watering-place was at a fountain in Yemen called Ghassān, and from which they took their name. 'Uṣwān means native of 'Uṣwān (Syene), a town in Upper Egypt: al-Samʿanī pronounces this name Aswān, but the former is the correct pronunciation, according to what I have been told by the ḥafīẓ of Egypt 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundḥiri.

65. AL-NAFĪS AL-LAKHMĪ

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Ghānī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Khalf Ibn Mūsallam* al-Lakḥmī al-Malikī (follower of the sect of Mālik) al-Qutrusī, surnamed al-Nafīs, was a man of considerable literary attainments. He is author of some good poetical pieces, which have been collected into a separate volume, from which I extract the poem composed by him in praise of the emir Shujā al-Dīn (hero of religion) Jaldak† al-Taḳawī (client of Taḳ al-Dīn), and known by the title of Wālī of Damietta; the commencement of this qaṣīdah is as follows:

"Say to my beloved: Thou hast prolonged thy aversion for me, and in that thou hadst in view my death. If thou desirest that I cease to love, restore me my heart which is in thy possession. Thou hast broken thy promises, and hast not even kept that of sending thy image to visit me in my dreams.<sup>1</sup> Yet I still act towards thee according to my compact, though thou hast transgressed that which thou madest to me. O mouth of the beloved! thou didst consume my heart when I tasted of thy cool source: thou didst declare me a transgressor when I wished to obtain from thee thy honey. Dost thou think that I can admire the (pliant) branch of the willow after having seen thy (slender) waist? or that apples can charm my eyes after the sight of thy cheeks? Dost thou think that thy fragrant locks can protect thee from the kisses of thy lover.<sup>1</sup> It shall not be! I swear it by Him who has made love my master, so that I have become thy slave! O, heart of her whose movements are full of (grace and) softness, how hard thou art towards me! Dost thou think me insensible to love, or that I possess such inflexible sternness as thou?"

<sup>1</sup> See note on dreams, No. 62.

*M. de Slane reads Muslim. — Ed.

†M. de Slane reads Jildak. In the last line quoted by the author is clearly written as Jaldak with very clear diacritical marks; likewise in this place the author has given zabar to the first letter. — Ed.

It is a beautiful poem from which this is taken, but we shall confine ourselves to the foregoing quotation, lest this article should become too long. Al-Nafis travelled to many countries, visiting remarkable men and employing his poetic talent as a means of obtaining donations from their liberality. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Khariḍah, and says that he was a doctor of the sect of Mālik, and had some acquaintance with the science of ancients<sup>2</sup> and general literature: he is author of these verses:

"The wealthy may rejoice on a day of festival, but the poor cannot. Can a festival rejoice me whose garments are (as) the people of Saba? Can it give pleasure to me while (the covering) of my head is that of Ibn Jala's."

He means the people of Saba whom we tore asunder and totally disunited (Qur'ān, surat 34, verse 18); Ibn Jala had no turban, and it is to this the poet Suhaym<sup>3</sup> alludes in the following verse:

1 Or more literally: Dost thou think that the myrtle of thy fragrant idhār can protect thee against the approach of him who comes to quench his thirst. See Introduction.

2 The sciences of the ancients; the sciences of logic, philosophy, mathematics, etc., borrowed from the ancient Greeks.

3 The poet Suhaym Ibn Waṭṭīl ar-Riyāḥi was born forty years before the introduction of Islamism; he died A. H. 60 (A. D. 680).—(Ibn Durayd; quoted by al-Suyūṭī in the Sharḥ al-Shawāhid al-Muṭṭalīn, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1238, fol. 105 verso.) This is perhaps the poet who was surmised the slave of the Banu 'l-Ḥāṣṣ; see note on Suhaym, No. 8.

I am Ibn Jalā; I am the surmounter of obstacles when I take off my turban, you may know me".<sup>1</sup>

The kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn speaks of al-Nafīs in his Sayl and says: "He was one of the jurisconsults at Miṣr, and I heard his eulogium made by al-Qādī al-Fāḍil, to whom he wrote a qaṣīdah from Miṣr."—I extract also the following verses from the volume containing his poetical works:

"O, fair traveller who settest out, bearing away with thee all my fortitude! is there any means of meeting thee again? My eyes, though tinged with tears of blood, have not done justice to thy merits; and my heart, though consumed (by its passion), hath not borne thee sufficient love."

His grandfather was (also) called Quṭrus.—Al-Nafīs died at Qūs (in Upper Egypt) on the 24th of the First Rabī; A. H. 603 (A. D. 1206)*; he was at that time upwards of seventy years of age. Lakḥmī signifies descended from Lakḥm, son of 'Adī; the real name of Lakḥm was Mālīk, and 'Amr was that of his brother, who was surnamed Judḥām: these two having quarrelled, 'Amr gave Mālīk a box on the ear (lakḥm), and Mālīk struck 'Amr with a knife and cut off (jadḥam) his hand, whence the origin of their surnames.—I made frequent resarches to find the origin of the word Quṭrusī, but could discover nothing certain, except that he was a native of Miṣr; but I have been since informed by Bahā al-Dīn Zuhayr, the poet (whose life we shall give), that this word was derived from Qutayris†, the name of al-Nafīs' grandfather: Bahā al-Dīn had been his pupil and could repeat some of his poetry.—Abu 'l-Muzaffar Jaldak was freedman to Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar, prince of Ḥamah (whose life shall be given later): he was a man of piety and talent. Died at Cario the 28th Sha'bān, 628 (A. D. 1231),‡ aged upwards of eighty. He had composed some poetry, and related traditions of the authority of al-Silafī the ḥāfiẓ and others. Among the verses quoted as his by Bahā al-Dīn

<sup>1</sup> This verse is quoted by Maydānī in his Proverbs; see Freytag's edition, i. I, p. 46.

*29 October.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads Quṭrus.—Ed.

‡1 July.—Ed.

Zuhayr were the following on a boy who studied geometry and astronomy:

*Ille pure mathematicus, facie venusta praeditus, mihi vitam quotidie rapit et reddit. Facies ejus genera varia pulchritudinis comprehendit, et diceret Euclidem deo disseruisse; nam maxilla ejus est equator,<sup>1</sup> naevus ejus punctum refert, et gena triangulum.

These lines have also been attributed to Abū Ja'far al-Alawī,<sup>2</sup> a native of Egypt.

66. ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AL-SABTĪ

Abu 'l-Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Hārām al-Rashīd Ibn al-Mahdī Ibn al-Mansūr al-Hāshimī, generally known by the name of al-Sabtī, was a devout and holy ascetic. Though he had the means of attaining a high rank in the world, he renounced it while his father was yet alive; he detached his mind from all worldly affairs and made choice of solitude and retirement, though his father was then a powerful khalīf. He was surnamed al-Sabtī because he gained every Sunday† (Sabt) by the labour of his hands, a sum sufficient for his weekly expenses, and during the rest of the time he was exclusively occupied with the practice of devotion: he persevered in this mode of life till he expired, A. H. 184 (A. D. 800), some time before the death of his father.

His history is so well known that it is needless to say more on

---

1 The Arabs call the equinoctial line the line of equality; it here means the dark line which the beard, on its first appearance, forms round the face.

2 This is probably the same person who is called Abu Ja'far Muslim al-Husaynī in the life of Ibn Hinzāba.

*English version: (In love of) him of beautiful features with geometrical face I suffer death every day and come to life again. His face is encircled with figures as if Euclid is talking. His cheek is the equator and his mole is the centre and his temples from a triangle.

In these verses the poet has employed the terms of geometry.—Ed.

†Sabt in Saturday.—Ed.

the subject; besides, he is spoken of by Ibn al-Jawzī in the Shudhūr al-Uqūd and the Ṣafwat al-Ṣafwat; his name is mentioned also in the Kitāb al-Tawwābin (history of those who renounced the world), and the Muntazim.<sup>1</sup>

67. IBN AL-ʿARĪF

Abu 'l-Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Atā Allāh al-Ṣunhājī (belonging to the tribe of Ṣunhāj) al-Marri (native of Almeria) in Spain, and surnamed Ibn al-ʿArif, was a Ṣūfī eminent for his sanctity and piety, and illustrious by his spiritual gifts. He is author of the work entitled al-Majālis (conferences), and other treatise connected with Sufite doctrines; he composed also some good verses on the same subject, among them the following :

"They saddled their camels after accomplishing their wishes at Mina,<sup>2</sup> and they all disclosed the tormenting passion (of their souls which longed after Muḥammad, the object of their love). Their caravan journeyed forth, shedding a perfume around; for in that band were holy men (who diffused an odour of sanctity). The zephyr which fanned the grave of the selected Prophet (Muḥammad) brought joy to their hearts, as often as they drank intoxication from the recital of his virtues.—O, you who arrive at (the tomb of) the Chosen from (the tribe of) Muḍar! you visit (him) in body, but we visit (him) in soul. We remained (where we were) but we had an excuse for force obliged us; and he who remains from a good excuse is as he who makes the journey."<sup>3</sup>

1 The Muntazim is the title of a great historical work by Ibn al-Jawzī; the Shudhūr al-Uqūd and the Ṣafwat al-Ṣafwat are by the same; the Kitāb al-Tawwāqin was composed by the Shaykh Muwaffiq al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh the Hanbalite, native of Jerusalem. This author died A. H. 620 (A. D. 1223) (H̄ẓji Khalifah).

2 It is in the valley of Mina, near Makkah that the Muslims terminate the rites of their pilgrimage.

3 By the Muḥammadan law, the pilgrimage is of general obligation; but it is dispensed with in some particular cases, of which this is one.

His correspondence with the qāḍī 'Iyāt Ibn Māsā is elegantly written. He had a general knowledge of the sciences, and had studied the different systems of reading the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>; he formed also a collection of those traditions which are related differently, and made a particular study of the channels through which each of them was handed down, and of the points in which they agree. The society of Ibn al-'Ārif was much liked by men of holy life and persons who had renounced the world; and an eminent shaykh relates that he saw in his handwriting a notice on Ibn Ḥazm al-Zahirī, in which he said: "The tongue of Ibn Ḥazm and the sword of Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf were *brothers." His reason for making that remark was that Ibn Ḥazm frequently attacked the ancient and modern imāms, scarcely sparing a single one.<sup>2</sup> Ibn al-'Ārif was born A. H. 481 (A. D. 1088), on Sunday morning the 2nd of the First Jumādā,† some time after daybreak, and he died at Morocco in 536 (A. D. 1144), on the evening of Thursday, 22 Ṣafar‡; he was buried the next day. He had been summoned to that city by the reigning prince, in order to answer some accusations and it was on his arrival there that he died; crowds flocked to his funeral, and some miraculous signs appeared, indicative of his great holiness: this caused the ruler of Morocco to repent of having cited so respectable a man before him. The name of this prince was 'Alī and he shall be again spoken of in the life of his father, Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn.—Al-Mariyya (Almeria) is a great city in Spain.

---

1 See note on Qur'an, No. 68.

2 A great number of Muslim doctors were put to death by al-Ḥajjāj.

* "Brothers" does not convey full sense of Arabic. There are three distinct terms شقيقين, shāqiqayn, of the same father and mother, i. e. real brothers, etc.

بنو العلات, Banu 'l-'Allat, children of the same father but of different mothers, i. e. step-brothers, etc.

أخياقي, akhyāfi, children of the same mother but different fathers, i. e. uterine brothers, etc. Here it refers to the first group.—Ed.

† 23 July.—Ed.

‡ 25 September.—Ed.

68. IBN AL-ḤUṬAY'AH AL-LAKHMĪ

Abu 'i-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Hishām Ibn al-Ḥuṭay'ah al-Lakhmī (belonging to the tribe of Lakhm) al-Fāsī (native of Fez), a great and famous saint; and not only full of holiness, but gifted with eminent talents and acquainted with general literature. He was consummate master of the seven different systems followed in reading the Qur'ān,<sup>1</sup> and copied with his own hand numerous works on literary and other subjects: his writing was elegant, and his orthography good; and copies written by him are in high request, for the blessings which they draw down on their owner and for their correctness. He was born at Fez on the eighth hour (after sunrise) of Friday, 17th of the latter Jumādā, 478 (A. H. 1085).* Having made the pilgrimage to Makkah and visited Syria, he went to Egypt, where he obtained great credit among the people by the holiness of his life. He dwelt outside the city of Old Cairo, at the Mosque of Rāshidah,<sup>2</sup> and would neither receive presents, nor take payment for the lessons he gave in the art of reading the Qur'ān. A great famine happening in Egypt, the principal inhabitants of Old Cairo went to him on foot, and asked him to accept some relief, but he refused; they then decided unanimously that one of their number, al-Faḍl Ibn Yahyā al-Ṭāwīl (the tall), who was a notary<sup>3</sup> and draper of Cairo, should ask his daughter in marriage; the marriage having taken place, the husband asked permission for 1 As the Qur'ān was originally written without points to mark the vowels or distinguish certain consonants one from the other, it happened that a considerable number of words could be pronounced in different manners; the absence of punctuation and the different manners of separating the verses contributed also to render the meaning of the text uncertain. From these causes, combined with the use of peculiar intonations and accents founded on tradition, arose seven distinct systems of reading the text of the Qur'ān, all of which are considered as legitimate. Those seven readings, as the Arabs call them, may be looked on in the light of seven different editions. The best commentators, such as al-Bayḍāwī and al-Zamakhsharī are always attentive to point out the words of doubtful pronunciation and mark how they are read in each system.

---

2 M. de Sacy gives an account of this mosque in his life of al-Ḥakīm Bi'amr Illāh; see Exposé de la Religion des Druzes, t. I, p. 301.

3 See Clwestomathie, t. I, p. 40.

*10 October.—Ed.

the mother of his wife to come and live with her, which was granted: their object in this was to lighten Ibn al-Ḥuṭay'a's family expenses. After this, he dwelt alone and gained his livelihood by copying books. He died at Old Cairo towards the end of Muḥarram, 560 (December, A. D. 1164) and was buried in the cemetery called the lesser Qarāfah,<sup>1</sup> where his tomb is still visited by the pious; on the night I went to it, I found there a great number of persons. He used to say that the good fortune of Islamism has been shrouded in the grave-clothes of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb: meaning that during the lifetime of that khalif, Islamism had not ceased to flourish and increase, but that it began, on his death, to fall into trouble and confusion. In the Kitāb al-Du'al al-Munqati'ah,<sup>2</sup> in the life of (al-Ḥāfiẓ lidīn Allāh) Abū Maymun 'Abd al-Majīd, prince of Egypt, it is stated that, in the year 533, the people remained three months without a qādī; then Ibn al-Ḥuṭay'ah was chosen in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'adah, but he would only accept on condition of not judging according to the religious law of the Fātimite dynasty<sup>3</sup>; and as this could not be granted, another person was appointed.—Fāsī means native of Fāz (or Fez), a great city in Maḡhrib near Ceuta, which has produced a number of learned men.

69. IBN AL-RIFĀ'Ī

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Rifā'ī, was a holy man and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. He descended from an Arabian family and inhabited the Baṭā'il, in a village called Omm 'Abīdah: he was there joined by an immense number

1 See No. 24, note on Qarāfah.

2 The work called al-Du'al al-Munqati'ah (History of Independent Dynasties) forms four volumes, according to Ḥājji Kḥalifah, and possesses great merit. It was written by the vizir Jamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abi Manṣūr Ṭāhir 'Azdi, who died A. H. 623 (A. D. 1126).

3 The Fatimites were Shi'ites, and Ibn al-Ḥuṭay'ah appears from what he says of 'Umar, to have been a Sunnite.

of saqirs, who place the greatest faith in his words and became his disciples. The order of dervishes called the Rifā'ī, or the Baṭā'ihī, had him for founder; his followers perform extraordinary actions, such as eating living serpents and going into burning furnaces, of which they extinguish the fire.<sup>1</sup> It is said that in their own country (the Baṭā'ih), they will ride on lions and do other similar feats; they have fixed periods of general meeting, when innumerable faqīrs flock to them, and are then all sustained at their expense. Al-Rifā'ī died without issue, but his brother left posterity who have continued to inherit, till this day; the presidency of the order and the government of that country; but it is needless to expatiate on their history, as it is universally known. The shaykh Aḥmad Ibn al-Rifā'ī, though taken up with his devotional exercises, composed some poetry, from which the following verses are said to be taken:

"When my night is dark, my heart is troubled by the recollection of you; I utter a plaintive cry like that of the ring-dove. Over me are clouds which rain down care and grief, and under me are seas which that grief swells to overflowing. Ask Omm 'Amr how her captive (lover) has passed the night; she frees other captives, but him she leaves in bonds! He does not meet with death, yet in death he would find repose; nor does he meet with pardon, and so obtain his freedom."

Ibn al-Rifā'ī persevered till the last in his holy mode of life: he died on Thursday, 22 of the First Jumādā, 578 (September,* A. D. 1182), at Omm 'Abīdah, aged upwards of seventy years.—I found in the hadwriting of a member of his family that Rifā'ī means descended from Rifā'ah, who was an Arab by nation. Al-Baṭā'ih is the name given to a collection of villages situated in the midst of the waters between Wāsiṭ and Baṣrah: this region is well known in 'Irāq.<sup>2</sup>

---

1 For an account of the extraordinary performances of these dervishes, see Lane's Modern Egyptians.

2 Al-Baṭā'ih (the low grounds or marshes) is the name of an extensive country at the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris.

*23.—Ed.

70. AḤMAD IBN ṬULŪN

The emīr Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Ṭulūn, lord of Egypt, Syria, and the frontier provinces of Asia Minor, was appointed governor of Egypt by the Khalif al-Mu'tazz Billāh (A. H. 254, A. D. 868) and afterwards took possession of Damascus, Antioch, the whole of Syria and the provinces on its northern frontier, during the time that al-Muwaffiq Abū Aḥmad Ṭalḥah, son of al-Mutawakkil (and brother of the Khalif) al-Mu'tamid, for whom he acted as lieutenant, was engaged in war with the (insurgent) chief of the Zanj. Aḥmad was a generous prince, just, brave and pious and able ruler, an unerring physiognomist : he directed in person all public affairs, repopled the provinces, and inquired diligently into the condition of his subjects. He liked men of learning, and kept every day on open table for his friends and the public; a monthly sum of one thousand dinars<sup>1</sup> was employed by him in alms, and having been consulted one day by his intendant, on the propriety of giving anything to a woman who had come to solicit his charity, though she was respectably dressed<sup>2</sup> and had a gold ring on her finger, he returned this answer: "Give to every one who holds out his hand to you." But with all these qualities, he was too hasty in using the sword, and al-Qudā'i relates that he counted the number of those whom Ibn Ṭulūn put to death or who died in his prisons, and that they amounted to eighteen thousand persons. He knew the Qur'ān by heart and was gifted with a fine voice: no one read that book more assiduously than he. "In the year 259 (A. D. 872-3), he built the mosque which bears his name, and is situated between Old and New Cairo." (This additional note is taken from a statement made by al-Farghānī<sup>3</sup> in his History; but al-Qudā'i says in his khiṭat that its construction was commenced in the year 264 and finished in 266 : (God alone knows which is right !)) The building of this edifice cost Ibn Ṭulūn one hundred and twenty thousand dinars, according to Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf, who wrote the history of his life<sup>1</sup> Ṭulun, the father of Aḥmad, was a slave who had been sent with a number of others, by Naḥ Ibn As'ad al-Sāmānī, governor of Buḫārā, as a present to the K̲halīf al-Māman in the year 200.—Ṭulun died A. H. 240 (A. D. 854-5); his son Aḥmad was born at Sāmarrāh, the 23 Ramaḍān A. H. 220, (September*, A. D. 835). Some say that he was only Ṭulun's adopted son: he entered Misr on the 21 or 23 Ramaḍān, 254 (September,† A. D. 868) others say on Monday,‡ 25th of the month; he died of diarrhœa<sup>2</sup> in that city, on Sunday§ eve, the 20, or, according to al-Farghānī, the 10 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 270 (May A. D. 884). I have visited his tomb, which is in an ancient mausoleum, situated near the gate by the castle of Cairo, and on the road leading to the lesser Qarāfah, at the foot of Mount Muqaṭṭam.—Ṭulun is a Turkish name.<sup>3</sup>—Sāmānī means descended for Sāmān, ancestor of the Samanite kings who ruled Transoxiana and Khurāsān. The city of Sāmarrāh was built by al-Mu'taṣim in year 220 (A. D. 835); it is situated in the province of 'Irāq above Baḡhdād. In the lexicon called the Sāḥāḥ under the word rai, al-Jawharī indicates six different manners of pronouncing (and writing) the name of this place, and the above is one of them; but this is not the place for giving all these names; and besides, we have already mentioned them in the life of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī.<sup>4</sup>

1 Abu 'l-Mahāsīn says, ten thousand.

2 Literally: Wearing a veil (iz ir). See Lane's translation of the Arabian Nights, vol. I, page 52.

3 Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Farghānī is author of a supplement to the Chronicle of al-Ṭabari.—(Hajji Khalifah).

71. MU'IZZ AL-DAWLAT IBN BUWAYH

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Abī Shujā' Buwayh Ibn Fan-nāḫkhusrā Ibn Tamām Idn Kūhī Ibn Shīrẓīl al-Aṣghar (the less) Ibn

1 Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn al-Dāyah, الدایه, author of the History of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭulun, died, according to Hājjī K̲halīfah, in 334 (A. D. 945-6).

2 Literally: of looseness in the bowels.

3 This name is sometimes written Ṭaylan, طیلون.

4 See No. 8.

*20.—Ed.

†13 or 15.—Ed.

‡Monday fell on 21 Ramaḍān.—Ed.

§Friday fell on 10 May and 20 was Wednesday.—Ed.

Shirkah Ibn Shīrzil al-Akbar (the greater) Ibn Shīrān Shān Ibn Shīrfannah Ibn Shīstān Shān Ibn Sasan Faru Ibn Sharwazī* Ibn Sasnādī Ibn Bahrām Gār al-Malik (the king) Ibn Yazdegird Ibn Hurmuz Kermān Shān Ibn Sīpār al-Malik Ibn Sīpār Dhu 'l-Aktār<sup>1</sup>; the rest of this genealogical series is known, as it ascends through the Sasanid kings; so there is no necessity for farther details.—Abu 'l-Husayn, surnamed Mu'izz al-Dawlat (the exalter of the empire), was lord of 'Irāq and al-Ahwāz; he had two brothers, whose lives shall be given later, and an uncle called 'Aḍad al-Dawlat, sovereign of Daylam. The name of al-Aḡṭā' (the maimed) was also given to him from his having lost his left hand and some of the fingers of his right under the following circumstances: While he was in the prime of life, he followed the party of his brother 'Imād al-Dawlat, and had gone to Kermān by his direction and that of Rukn al-Dawlat, his other brother. The prince who governed that country, on learning the approach of Mu'izz al-Dawlat, retired to Sijistan without offering any resistance, and left him master of the province. A tribe of Kurds was then in possession of some districts in Kermān, and paid an annual tribute to the ruler of that country, on condition that they should not be obliged to do homage.<sup>2</sup> When Mu'izz al-Dawlat arrived, these people sent him their chief, who obtained from him the promise and firm assurance that he would allow them to act according to their accustomed habits: but Mu'izz al-Dawlat having been advised by his secretary to surprise them in a nocturnal expedition and seize on their flocks and their treasures, acted according to this counsel, and marched towards them during the night by a rugged mountain-path: but the Kurds, being aware of his approach, lay in wait for him at a defile, and when he came up

1 The autograph MS. of Abu 'l-Fada's annals the Turikh Guzdah, and the MSS. of Ibn Khallikan have furnished me with seventeen copies of this genealogy: but they all disagree, either omitting some links of the chain or writing the names differently: the list as here drawn up is probably erroneous, and it may not correspond with that really given by Ibn Khallikan; but this is a matter of trifling importance as the descent of the Buwayh family from the Sasanides appears very contestable.†

2 Literally: To tread his carpet.

*M. de Slane reads it "Sharazil" Ibid Sinsad.—Ed.

†The genealogy given above conforms to Ibn Khallikan's autograph.—Ed.

with his troops, they attacked him on all sides, killing and making prisoners; a few only escaped, and Mu'izz al-Dawlat had his left hand and some fingers of the right struck off, and received so many wounds in the head, and body that he fell stunned among the slain: he got off however with his life, but this adventure is too long to be related here. In the year 334 of the Hijrah, during the khalifat of al-Mustakfi, Mu'izz al-Dawlat set out from al-Ahwāz and entered Bagh̄dād on Saturday, 11th of the First Jumādā, 334 A. H. (December,* A. D. 945), taking possession of that city without resistance.—Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī states in his Shuḥḥur al-'Uqūd, that Mu'izz al-Dawlat began his life by selling firewood, which he carried about upon his head; then he and his brothers became masters of extensive province and their prosperity attained its height. Mu'izz al-Dawlat was the youngest of the three; he governed 'Irāq twenty-one years and eleven months, and died at Bagh̄dād on Mondy, 17th of the later Rabi', A. H. 356 (April,† A. D. 967); he was interred in his place, but his body was afterwards transported to a mausoleum built for its reception in the cemetery of the Quarysh (near Bagh̄dād): he was born in the year 303 (A. D. 915). When on the point of death, he granted liberty to his mamlūks, gave the greater part of his property in alms, and corrected many abuses. Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad al-'Alawī (a descendant of the Ḥalīf Ali) relates as follows: "I was one night in my house, situated on the bank of the Tigris, at the passage called Maṣḥ̄ra'at al-Qaṣab, which leads down to the river; the sky was cloudy, and there was thunder and lightning, and I heard a voice pronounce these words:

'When thou, O Abū Ḥusayn; hadst attained the height of thy desires; when thou wast in safety from the strokes of fortune and hadst warded off its vicissitudes—then the hand of death was stretched forth towards thee, and thou didst take gold from thy treasury (to fill that hand which seemed to thee to solicit thy generosity.)'

"And it was on that very night that Mu'izz al-Dawlat died." He was succeeded by his son 'Izz al-Dawlat Bakhtiyār whose life

---

* 20.—Ed.

† 2.—Ed.

we shall give. The orthography of the names Buwayh, Fannākhusn and Tamām is that which we have here indicated, and were we not unwilling to lengthen this notice, we should mark the manner in which the names of his other ancestors should be pronounced; but, as they are here written correctly, those who quote me have only to follow my orthography.<sup>1</sup>—We shall notice his brothers 'Imād al-Dawlat 'Alī and Rukn al-Dawlat al-Ḥasan.

72. NAṢR AL-DAWLAT IBN MARWĀN AL-KURDĪ

Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Marwān Ibn Dastak al-Kurdī (the Kurd of) al-Ḥumaydi (of the tribe of Ḥumayd), surnamed Naṣr-al-Dawlat (aid of empire), became possessor of Mayyāfāriqīn and Diyār Bakr on the death of his brother Abū Sa'īd Maṣṣūr Ibn Marwān, who was assassinated in the fortress of al-Hattākḥ,<sup>2</sup> on the night of Wednesday*, 5 of the First Jumādā, A. H. 401 (December, A. D. 1010). Naṣr al-Dawlat was a man highly favoured by fortune, and gifted with a lofty spirit; his government was just and his character resolute; the prosperity to which he attained, and the pleasures in which he indulged are beyond the powers of description. Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī (native of Mayyāfāriqīn) says, in his History (of that city), that there is no instance of Naṣr-al-Dawlat's having exacted money from any person excepting one; he then gives an account of the circumstance, but there is no necessity for repeating it here. He relates also that this prince never missed the hour of morning prayer, notwithstanding his addiction to sensual enjoyments; that he had three hundred and sixty concubines, with each of whom he passed a night every <sup>1</sup> See note on "imperfection of Arabic alphabet", No. 19.—Ibn Khallikān could never have suspected the strange alterations made in this very genealogy by the copyists of his work.

---

<sup>2</sup> According to Abu 'l-Fidā, in his Geography, this place is situated in the province of Diyār Bakr.—The rise of the Banū Marwān and the death of Maṣṣūr, surnamed Mumahhid al-Dawlat (regulator of the empire) are related in the Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā, vol. 2, page 569.

*Thursday night according to autograph which fell on 14 December.—Ed.

year, and that it was only on the same night of the following year it fell to the turn of the same person to meet him again. This writer relates also that Naṣr al-Dawlat allotted a fixed time every day to the examination of state affairs, to pleasure, and to the society of his family and friends: he left a numerous posterity. The poets of that time went to see him and celebrate his praises, and they immortalised his glory in their poems. It may be remarked, as an example of the good fortune which attended him, that he had for vizirs two persons who had served khalifs in the same capacity; the one was Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ḥusayn, surnamed Ibn al-Maghribi, author of the Diwān containing poetical writings and prose epistles,<sup>1</sup> and of other celebrated works; he had acted as vizir to the khalif of Egypt, and on leaving him, went to the emir Naṣr al-Dawlat, and was vizir to him twice: the other was Abū Naṣr Ibn Jahūr, who on quitting his service, became vizir at Baḡḡdad. (The lives of these two persons shall be given.) Naṣr al-Dawlat continued in the enjoyment of good fortune and every pleasure till his death, which occurred on the 29th Shawwāl, 453 (November,* A. D. 1061): he was interred in the Mosque of al-Muḥdathah; or, according to another account, in the castle of al-Sidilli, whence his body was afterwards removed to the vault of the Banu Marwān adjoining the Mosque of al-Muḥdathah. He had lived 77 years, fifty-two of which (or by another statement, forty-two) he passed as sovereign. Mayyāfariqin is so well known that it is unnecessary to fix the orthograghy of its name: Al-Muḥdathah is a ribāt<sup>2</sup> outside the city of Moyyāfariqin; al-Sidilli is the name of a dome situated in the castle (of the same city), and built upon

1 Such is the meaning of the expression الديوان الشعر والنشر.

2 The ribāts were fortified barracks situated along the frontiers of the Muslim empire. At an early period, there were not less than ten thousand in the province of Transoxiana alone. Travellers, on arriving at a ribāt, found every accommodation gratis. These establishments were supported by government, and their revenues were increased by the gifts of private individuals, and by waqfs (see No. 21 note on waqf) established in their favour by pious Muslims. Military service in a ribāt was considered as an act of religion.—(For further particulars on the subject, see the extracts from Ibn Ḥawqal, in the Geography of Abu 'l-Fadā, pages 235 and 487 of the Arabic text.)

three pillars; Sidilli is a Persian word signifying three props.<sup>1</sup>—Naṣr al-Dawlat was succeeded by his son Abu 'l-Qāsim Naṣr, surnamed Niẓām al-Dīn.

73. AL-MUSTA'LĪ

Abu- 'l-Qāsim Aḥmad, surnamed al-Musta'li (the aspiring), was son of al-Mustaṣṣir Ibn al-Zāhir Ibn al-Ḥākim Ibn al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī Ubayd Allāh: we shall give the rest of his genealogy and state the nature of the disagreement respecting it when we relate the life of al-Mahdī, in the letter ayn. Al-Musta'li succeeded his father al-Mustaṣṣir in the government of Egypt and Syria: during his reign, the power of that dynasty<sup>2</sup> was impaired and its authority weakened, their political influence<sup>3</sup> having ceased in most of the Syrian cities, and the provinces of that country having fallen into the possession of the Turkomans on one hand, and the Franks on the other; (may God frustrate their projects!) This people entered Syria and encamped before Antioch in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 490 (November, A. D. 1097); they obtained possession of it the 16 Rajab, 491 (20 of June, A. D. 1098); in the following year they took Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, and in the month of Shā'ban of the same year (July, A. D. 1099), they became masters of Jerusalem, after a siege of more than forty days. This city was taken on a Friday morning; during the ensuing week, a great multitude of Muslims perished, and upwards of seventy thousand were slain in the Masjid al-Aqṣā (or Mosque of 'Umar). An immense quantity of gold and

1 In Persian سه دلیله.

2 Ibn Khallikan means here the Fatimite dynasty; but as he does not admit their descent from Fā'imah, daughter of Muḥammad, he refuses them that title.

3 Their political influence, or more exactly, their mission. See note on missinaries, No. 10, and M. de Sacy's Exposé de la Religion des Druzes tom. I.

silver vases were taken from the Ṣaḥḥar<sup>1</sup> (by the invaders). The fall of this city caused an extreme commotion throughout all the land of the Islamism. We shall again touch on this circumstance in the life of al-Afdal Shāhanshāh (see in the letter shin.) This al-Afdal, surnamed (like his father<sup>2</sup>) Amir al-Juyush (commander of the troops) had taken Jerusalem from Sukman Ibn 'Urtuq<sup>3</sup> on Friday, 25 Ramaḍān, A. H. 491,* or (as it stated by some) in the month of Shābān,† 489; he then appointed a governor to rule it in his name, but this person, being unable to resist the Franks yielded the city up to them: had it been in the possession of the 'Urtuq family, it would have been better for the Muslim people! During the administration of al-Afdal, the Franks became masters of many towns on the Syrian coast; they took Caifa<sup>4</sup> in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 493,‡ and Qaisāriyah (Caesaria) in 494. Al-Musta'li did not possess the least authority during the vizirat of al-Afdal. It was in his reign that Nizār, his elder brother, fled to Alexandria: this Nizār was the ancestor of the Ismailites: possessors of al-Alamūt and other castles; his adventures are well known,

---

1 Al-Ṣaḥḥrā (the stone): the chapel situated near the mosque founded at Jerusalem by 'Umar on the site of the ancient temple, is so called from its being built over what the Muslims suppose to be the identical stone which served the patriarch Jacob as a pillow, when he had the vision of the Ladder.

2 "He bore the same titles as his father." نعت بنوعوت أبيه (al-Nuwayri, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 702 A).

3 Jerusalem then belonged to Tāj al-Dawlat Tutush al-Salḡiqi, who had granted it in fee اقتبيل to the emir Ṣukmān. Al-Afdal empowered Iftikḥar al-Dawlat to govern the city, as lieutenant to al-Musta'li.—(Al-Nuwayri.)

4 Caifa is the European pronunciation of the name; in Arabic it is written and pronounced Ḥayfah.

*27 August, 1098.—Ed.

†July-August.—1096.—Ed.

‡August 1100.—Ed.

but too long to be related here.<sup>1</sup> Al-Musta'li was born at Cairo on the 20th of Muḥarram, A. H. 469 (August, A. D. 1076*); he was proclaimed khalif in the year 487 A. H. (A. D. 1094†), on the 1 Al-Nuwayrī gives the history of Nizār in these terms:

"Al-Musta'li was proclaimed khalif on Thursday morning, 18 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 487: it was al-Afḍal Amīr al-Juyūsh who brought this about; for, on the death of al-Mustanṣir Billāh he entered the Castle (of Cairo) in all haste and seated him (al-Musta'li) on the throne of the empire, and sent to his brothers Nizār, 'Abd Allāh, and Imā'il, to inform them of their father's death and desiring them to come quickly. On arriving, they saw their youngest brother seated on the throne of the khalifat, at which they were filled with indignation, when al-Afḍal said to them: "Go forward and kiss the earth in the presence of God and of our lord al-Musta'li Billāh! Do him homage, for it is he whom the imām al-Mustanṣir Billāh hath positively declared as his successor to the khalifat." To this Nizār answered: "I would rather be cut to pieces than do homage to one younger than myself, and moreover I possess a document in the handwriting of my father, by which he names me his successor, and I shall go and bring it. He then withdrew in haste to get the paper, and went to Alexandria: al-Afḍal sent after him to bring him back, but no one knew whither he was gone or how he went. So al-Afḍal was in great trouble. Some relate, however, that when al-Mustanṣir Billāh died, his son Nizār, who was the Wali 'l-'Ahd (or khalif-elect), took his seat on the throne and desired homage to be done to himself; but al-Afḍal refused (to permit this), through dislike to Nizār, and he had a meeting with a number of emirs and men of rank, to whom he said, that Nizār was come to the age of manhood, and they could not hope to escape his severity; so the best thing to be done was to do homage to his youngest brother Abu 'l-Qāsim Aḥmad. This plan was approved of by all except Maḥmūd (Muḥammad?) Ibn Maṣṣāl مصال al-Mālikī, who had received from Nizār the promise of being named vizir and general-in-chief in place of al-Afḍal; in consequence, he informed Nizār of what he was doing; but al-Afḍal hastened to proclaim Aḥmad khalif under the name of al-Musta'li Billāh, and having placed him on the throne of the empire, he himself sat down in the vizir's seat, and having introduced the imām 'Alī Ibn al-Kaḥḥāl chief qāḍi of Miṣr, with the shuhūd (legal witnesses), he caused all the leading men of the empire to take the oath of allegiance to al-Musta'li: he then went to Ismā'il and 'Abd Allāh, who were under arrest in the mosque at the Castle, and informed them that the oath of allegiance had been taken to the ord al-Musta'li, and that he had sent his salutations to them, and given them the choice of swearing allegiance to him or not; to which they replied that they acknowledged his authority, since God had preferred him to themselves. They therefore took the oath, and a certificate to that effect having been drawn

(Continued on page 250)

*24 August.—Ed.

†29 December.—Ed.

festival of Ghādīr Khumm<sup>1</sup> which is celebrated on the 18 of

(Continued from page 249)

up, was read in the presence of the emirs by the sharīf Ṭhanā al-Mulk Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥusaynī, who was a writer in the Chancery Office (see note on Chancery, No. 14.) Nizār and his brother 'Abd Allāh then fled to Alexandria with Maḥmūd Ibn Maṣṣāl; the governor of that city was Nāṣir al-Dawlat Istikīn al-Turkī (the Turk), one of the Mamluks of 'Amir al-Juyūsh (whose life will be found in Ibn Khallikān's work): having been informed by them of the circumstances, and obtaining the promise of the vizirat for himself, he took the oath of allegiance to him (Nizār), and the people of the city did the same; Nizār then received the surname of al-Muṣṭafā li-Dīn illāh (the chosen for God's religion). Then, in the month of Muḥarram, 'A. H. 488, al-Afḍal went forth with troops to attack Nizār, Iftikin, and Ibn Maṣṣāl, who met him as he approached Alexandria, and after a smart contest, put him and his men to flight. He then returned to Miṣr, and Nizār, assisted by a party of (Bedwin) Arabs, laid waste most of the country to the north of Miṣr. Al-Afḍal marched again to Alexandria, and continued to besiege it till the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah. When this unfavourable state of affairs was at its height, Ibn al-Maṣṣāl had a dream, on which he consulted a foreign (astrologer) the next morning: "Methought," said he, "I was on horseback, and al-Afḍal walking in my train;" on which the foreigner remarked, that he who walked on the earth was to possess it. On hearing this, Ibn Maṣṣāl collected his wealth and fled to Lukk, لوك, a village near Barqā, and from that time the power of Nizār and Iftikin declined, and they were obliged to ask al-Afḍal to spare their lives. On his making a promise to that effect, the gates of Alexandria were opened to al-Afḍal who entered it, and having seized on Nizār and Iftikin, he sent them to Miṣr, and Nizār was never seen after: it is even said that al-Afḍal had him shut up between two walls till he died. Nizār was born on the 10 of the First Rabi', A. H. 437.* As for Iftikin, it was afterwards declared to the public that he had been put to death. Ibn al-Maṣṣāl received a letter from Al-Afḍal, inviting him to return to Miṣr, which he did, and was honourably received by him." (Al-Nuwayri MS. of the Bib. du Rol, No. 702 A.)

Compare this passage with the extract of Mirkhond given by M. de Sacy in his Memoire sur les Assassins. Ibn Khallikān says that Nizār was the ancestor of grandfather of the Ismailites or master of the mission; this also accounted for by Mirkhond (see the same Memoire), who states that a chief of the Ismailite dynasty, called Ḥassan, son of Muḥammad Ibn Buzurk-Umid pretended to be descended from Nizār, son of al-Mustansir. M. de Sacy's Memoire sur les Assassins and expose de 'l-Histoire de Druzes furnish every information respecting the Ismailites. These two works cannot be too highly praised.

1 The only Muslim sect which celebrates the festival of Ghādīr Khumm

*25 September, 1045.—Eā.

(Continued on page 251)

Dhu 'l-Hijjah, and he died at Miṣr on the 16 ṣāfar. 495 (December A. D. 1101*).

74. IBN AL-MASHṬUB

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad. son of the emir Sayf al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥayjā' Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Khalil Ibn Marzubān al-Hakkārī, surnamed, 'Imād al-Dīn (support of religion), was generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Mashṭab (son of the scarred): his father being called al-Mashṭab from having a scar on his face. Ibn al-Mashṭab was a powerful emir, greatly respected by (contemporary) princes. and considered as their equal<sup>1</sup>; he was a high-minded man, extremely generous and noble in his conduct, brave. and possessing a lofty spirit, so that those princes stood in awe of him. His enterprises against them are so well known that it is not necessary to give a relation of them here.<sup>2</sup> He was an emir of the empire founded by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. who had conceded to him the revenue of Naplus, after allotting one-third of it to the support of Jerusalem: this happened on the death of Maḥṭab, who held Naplus in fief. Abu 'l-Hayjā', his grandfather. was lord of al-'Imādiyah (Amadia) and a number of (other) castles in the country of the Hakkāis<sup>3</sup> Ibn al-Mashṭab continued in

(Continued from page 250)

(the pond of Khum), is that of the Sh'ites. They relate that 'Alī and Muḥammad being at a place of this name, lying half way between Makkah and Medinah, the Prophet, by a solemn declaration, appointed 'Alī his successor. (See de Sacy's Chrestomathie. t. I. p. 193.—Abu 'l-Fidā. in his Geography. Arabic text, p. 84, fixes the pronunciation of the word Khum.)

1 Syria was at that time in the hands of many feudatory and nearly independent princes.

2 For the indication of the principal events of his life. I shall refer the reader to M. Hamaker's work. entitled: Expeditionum a Graecis Francisque adversus Dimyatham narratio. pp. 95 and 99. in the notes.

3 The Turkoman tribe of Hakkār possessed the country to the north-east of Mosul.

*11 December.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Ḥalil.—Ed.

high power and honour till the year in which the Franks arrived at Damietta<sup>1</sup> when he acted in the manner which is publicly known, and which I shall give an account of in the life of al-Malik al-Kāmil.<sup>2</sup> He then quitted Egypt, and was reduced to such a strait, that in the month of the Second Rabi', he was besieged in the castle of Tall Ya'fur,<sup>3</sup> situated between Moṣal* and Sinjār: the history of this circumstance is well known.<sup>4</sup> Then the emīr Badr al-Dīn Lālū, Atābek and lord of Moṣal, entered into correspondence with him, and having succeeded in allaying his apprehensions by deceitful promises, prevailed on him to surrender, and swore to observe the conditions which he had offered. In consequence of this, Ibn al-Maṣḥṭab went to Moṣal, but was not there long when Badr al-Dīn arrested him; this was in the year 617 (A. D. 1220); he then sent him to al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf Muẓaffar al-Dīn hoping to gain his favour by this action, as in the last case, it was against him that Ibn al-Maṣḥṭab had revolted. Al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf sent his prisoner to the castle of Ḥarrān where he was put into close confinement in a narrow dungeon, and chained with heavy fetters and handcuffs: it is reported that (in this wretched state) his beard and clothes swarmed with vermin; so I was told when a boy, and he yet alive. I have been informed that a person who had been in the service of Ibn Maṣḥṭab, wrote in his behalf the following distich and sent it to al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf:

"O thou, whom the revolving spheres favour with continued happiness; thou art not a king (malik), but an angel (malak). Thy mamlūk Ibn al-Maṣḥṭab is dying in prison; set him free, for thou alone canst do it, or God."

1 Literally: The year of Damiettea, which was the 615th of the Hījah (A. D. 1218).

2 Ibn al-Maṣḥṭab wished to depose al-Malik al-Kāmil, suṭṭān of Egypt, and place a brother of that prince, al-Malik al-Fā'iz, on the throne.—(See the Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā.)

3 The name of this castle is also written Tall Ya'far, يعفر, Tall A'afar, اعفر, and al-Tall al-A'far. It lies between Moṣal and Sinjār; is built on an isolated hill, and possesses a spring of unwholesome water. (Marāṣid al-Iṭṭā'il.)

4 See Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals, year 617.

*M. de Slane gives Muṣul.—Ed.

Ibn al-Maṣḥṭub continued in bondage till his death, which took place in the month of the Second Rabi', A. H. 619 (April, A. D. 1222). His daughter built him a mausoleum at the gate of Rās 'Ayn, to which city his corpse was transported from Harrān, and there buried: this tomb I have myself seen.—During his confinement, the following distich was addressed to him by a literary man:

"O Aḥmad; thou hast never ceased to be 'Imād al-Dīn (the support of religion). O bravest of those who ever wielded lance! despair not! though thou liest in their prison; (the patriarch) Joseph remained in prison for years."

This thought is taken from the following verses, which form part of a poem composed by al-Buḥturī:

"Is not the example of God's Prophet, Joseph, a sufficient consolation for him who, like thee, is imprisoned on an unjust and false accusation? He long remained in bondage with patient resignation, and patient resignation made him master of an empire."

The emīr 'Imād al-Dīn was born about the year 575 (A. D. 1179); and I read in a letter written by al-Qāḍī al-Fāḍil, that al-Maṣḥṭub wrote to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, informing him of the birth of this son, and that another of his wives was pregnant. The answer to this letter was drawn up by al-Qāḍī al-Fāḍil, who wrote as follows: "The Emīr's letter, announcing two children, has been received; up to the present moment circumstances have been aided by divine favour, and as for the (child) which cometh, may God write that it speed its way in safety! We are rejoiced by the star which hath risen from behind its veil; and we hope for joy from the fruit still remaining in the bud."<sup>1</sup> As for Sayf al-Dīn al-Maṣḥṭub, father of 'Imād al-Dīn, he and Bahā al-Dīn Qarāqush (whose life shall be given later) were stationed in Acre by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, when the enterprises of the Franks excited his apprehensions for the safety of that city. Al-Maṣḥṭub remained there till the Franks laid siege to it and took it. Having escaped,<sup>2</sup> he joined Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn at Jerusalem, on Thursday, 1st of the latter Jumādā, A. H.

<sup>1</sup> Literally: In its spathe; a metaphor taken from the date-tree.

<sup>2</sup> Al-Maṣḥṭub and the troops which defended Acre had been made prisoners of war; Richard Cœur-de-Lion caused the garrison to be put to death.

(Continued on page 254)

588.* Ibn Shaddād says (in his history)<sup>1</sup>: "The sultān was with his brother al-Malik al-ʿĀdil when al-Mashḥūb entered unexpectedly; he rose up and embraced him with extreme joy, and, having caused the others to withdraw, he continued in conversation with him for a long period." Al-Mashḥūb died at Naplus on Thursday, 26 Shawwāl, A. H. 588 (November, A. D. 1192†); such is the date given by ʿImād al-Dīn al-Ispahānī in his work entitled al-Barq as-Shāmī; but Ibn Shaddād says, in his history of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, that his death took place at Jerusalem, on Sunday, 23rd Shawwāl‡ of that year‡. He was interred in (the court of) his house, after funeral prayers had been said over him in the Great Mosque (al-Masjid al-Aqṣā). None of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's emīrs were on an equality with him, nor even approached him, in rank and influence. They used to call him the grand emīr, this being the title by which he was known, and which was borne by no other. I found the following note in the handwriting of al-qāḍī al-Faḍīl: "News has been received of the death of Sayf al-Dīn al-Mashḥūb, emīr and prince of the Kurds: he died on Sunday, 22 Shawwāl§ of this year, at Jerusalem. His pay,<sup>3</sup> which was furnished out of the revenues of Naplus and other places, amounted to three hunbut spared some of the chiefs in expectation of obtaining from them a rich ransom.

(Continued from page 253)

1 This is the history of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn published by Schultens, in Arabic and Latin under the title of Saladini Vita et res Gestae; the passage cited here is to be found on page 223.

2 See Saladini Vita et res Gestae, page 268.

3 Literally: His bread. The meaning of this word is perfectly certain. M. de Sacy has noticed it in the Memoires d'l-Institut, tom. 7, pp. 79, 104.

*According to the calendar prepared by Eduard Mahler (a German Scholar) it was Sunday, 14 June, 1192. The name of the day is not clear in the autograph.—Ed.

†5 November.—Ed.

‡1st November. The date is not clear in the autograph but it is probably 22 Shawwāl, otherwise the former date should be advanced by one day and the same is legible in the autograph.—Ed.

§Vide above remarks.—Ed.

dred thousand dinars<sup>1</sup> at the epoch of his death; less than one hundred days elapsed between his escape from captivity and the term of his existence. Glory to Him who liveth and dieth not; who overthroweth the edifices of man! Time is a judge exempt from blame!" I may observe that the expression, who overthroweth the edifices of man, is analogous to one which occurs in a verse given in the Ḥamāsah<sup>2</sup> :

"The death of Qays is not the death of a single man; it is the edifice of a people which has been overthrown."

This verse forms part of an elegy composed by 'Abadah Ibn al-Ṭabīb on the death of Qays Ibn 'Āṣim al-Tamīmī; the same who came from the desert to the blessed Prophet with the embassy of the Banū Tamīm, in the ninth year of the Hijrah, when he became a Muslim. The Prophet then said of him: "This is the chief of those who dwell in tents."<sup>3</sup> He was a man of intelligence, and celebrated for his prudence and authority (among the tribes). The manner of parsing the preceding verse is a subject of discussion for the learned in the Arabic language, but this is not the proper place for entering into that subject.<sup>4</sup> Abū Tamīm gives this verse along with two others in his (Ḥamāsah) chapter of elegies; they run thus:

"On thee be the blessing of God, O Qyas, son of 'Āṣim! On thee may his mercy alight, as long as he may deign to show mercy; such is the salutation of one who is the target of adversity; of one who, coming from afar to visit thy country, salutes thee still. The death of Qays is not the death of a single man; it is the edifice of a people which has been overthrown."

Qays Ibn 'Āṣim was the first person, who anterior to the introduction of Islamism, buried alive his female children (he was

1 The Ayyubite dinār would now have an intrinsic value of from 13 to 14 shillings sterling.

2 See Freytags Ḥamāsah, page 367.

3 Literally: Of the camels'-hair people. The Bedwins still cover their tents with a sort of black cloth made of camels' hair.

4 Al-Ṭabrizī, in his commentary on the Ḥamāsah, notices this point of discussion; it is simply this: the word هلك (death), is in the nominative or accusative case?

induced to do so) through jealousy (for their honour), and because pride would not allow him to give them in marriage.<sup>1</sup> This (in human practice) was followed by the rest of the nation, till abolished by the Muslim religion. The emir Badr al-Dīn Lālā died on Friday, 3rd Shā'bān, A. H. 657 (July, A. D. 1259*), in the citadel of Moṣāl, and was buried there in a chapel; he was then about eighty years of age.

1 "Cais fils d'Acem issu de Mancar issu de Sa'd fils de Zeidmenat fils de Temim, poète et guerrier illustre, vécu du temps de l'idolatrie et de l'islamisme. Il était un de ceux qui enterraient leurs filles vivantes. Il se fit musulman, et survécut a Mahomet. Son prénom était Abou Ali. Moucharmradj المشرح, de la tribu de Yechkor. dans une incursion contre les banou Sa'd, enleva une femme nommée Ramim رميم بنت أحمد qui était niece, par sa mère, de Cais ben Acem. Celui-ci alla la redemander a Moucharmradj en lui proposant une rançon. Moucharmradj dit a Ramim de choisir si elle voulait rester auprès de lui ou retourner dans sa famille. Elle préféra rester. Cais, indigné contre les femmes, revint a sa tribu, et en arrivant il enterra vivantes ses filles, et s'imposa la loi de traiter le même toute fille qu'il aurait a l'avenir. Les Arabes imitèrent cet exemple; les principaux et les plus nobles d'entre eux enterraient leur filles, de peur qu'elles ne fussent faites prisonnières et que leurs familles ne furent deshonorées a cause d'elles."—Aghāni, t. III, pp. 235—6—Une autre version de ce fait se trouve dans Meidani, au proverbe اضل بن مودة.

"Cais fils d'Acem a pu propager par son exemple et rendre plus commun parmi les Arabes l'usage d'enterrer les filles vivantes, mais cet usage existait déjà avant lui, ou du moins on tuait d'une manière quelconque des filles au moment de leur naissance. Car on lit dans la vie du poète Amrou fils de Colthoum (Aghāni, II, 361), que Mohalhīl, frère de Colaib, ordonna a sa femme Hind, lorsque'elle accoucha de Leila, de tuer cette fille. Hind, au lieu d'exécuter cet ordre, cacha Leila, qui depuis fut mère d'Amrou ben Colthoum. Mohalhīl est antérieur de 40 ou 50 ans a Cais ben Acem. Après avoir embrassé l'islamisme, Cais entrant un jour chez Mahomet le trouva tenant entre ses bras une petite fille qu'il baisait. Il lui dit: Qu'est-ce que cette petite brebis que tu flaires?—C'est ma fille, répondit Mahomet.—Par Dieu! poursuivit Cais, j'en ai eu beaucoup comme cela, et je les ai toutes enterrées, sans en flaire aucune.—Il faut que Dieu, répliqua Mahomet, ait privé ton cœur de tout sentiment d'humilité." (Aghāni, III, 236.)

"Cais renia l'islamisme après la mort de Mahomet, et crut a la prophétesse Sedjah et a Mossailama. Khalīd fils de Wālid, dans son expédition du Yemāma, où Mossailama fut tué, fit prisonnier Cais ben Acem, qui n'échappa a la mort qu'en jurant qu'il n'était venu auprès de Mossailama que pour lui redemander un de ses fils qu'il lui avait enlevé." (Aghāni, III, 239.)

*25 July.—Ed.

75. ṢALĀḤ AL-DĪN AL-IRBILĪ

Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Sayyid Ibn Shā'bān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Jābir Ibn Qaḥṭān al-Irbilī (native of Arbela), surnamed Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (welfare of religion), belonged to a great family of Arbela, and was ḥājib<sup>1</sup> to Muzaffar al-Dīn Ibn Zayn al-Dīn, lord of that city. Having incurred the displeasure of his master, he was imprisoned for some time; and on his liberation, in the year 603 (A. D. 1206-7), he left Arbela and proceeded to Syria in company with al-Malik al-Qāhir Bahā al-Dīn Ayyūb, son of al-Malik al-'Ādil. He then entered into the service of al-Malik al-Mughīth (another), son of al-Malik al-'Ādil, who had known him at Arbela, and now treated him with great kindness. On the death of Mughīth, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn passed into Egypt and was attached to the service of al-Malik al-Kāmil; the esteem in which he was held by this prince became so great, that he entered into higher favour with him than any other had hitherto been able to effect; he was specially chosen as the companion of his private moments, and raised to the rank of emīr. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was a man of superior merit and possessed considerable information in different sciences; I have been informed that he knew by heart (Abū Ḥamid) al-Ghazzālī's treatise on jurisprudence, entitled Al-Khulāṣah; he wrote also some good poetry and composed elegant distichs, by which talent he gained the favour of these princes. In the month of Muḥarram 618 (March, A. D. 1221), when al-Malik al-Kāmil was at al-Manṣurah to oppose the progress of the Franks, his favourable dispositions towards Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn were altered, and having caused him to be arrested, he sent him to the castle of Cairo, where he remained in close confinement till the month of the

(Continued from page 256)

"Abda, ou Obda fils d'Attabib, dont le véritable nom était Yezid fils d'Amrou issu d'Abd Taim (designation) qui s'appliquait aux banou Temim parce qu'ils adoraient une idole nommée Taim تيم, poète du temps de l'ignorance et de l'islamisme. Il était dans l'armée de Noman ben Moucrin النعمان بن مقرن qui combattit les Persans à Medain. Asmai disait que le plus beau vers élégiaque ازئي بيت qu'il connaissait, était celui qui faisait partie de l'élégie d'Obda sur la mort de Cais ben Acem."

For this note, I am indebted to the kindness of M. Caussin de Perceval.

1 See Bibliothèque Orientale, HAGEB.

Second Rabī', 623; having then composed a distich* and taught it to a musician, by whom it was sung in the presence of al-Malik al-Kāmil, the prince found it so beautiful, that he asked who was the author; and on learning that it was written by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, he ordered him to be set at liberty. The distich is as follows:

"Thy wanton cruelty towards him who loves thee cannot remain hidden; thou hast caused my life to pass away in sorrow and in suffering. Thy anger is not proportioned to my fault; thou hast been too severe, and thy sole intention was to cause my death."

Some state however that the distich which was the cause of his liberation ran thus:

"Do as thou wilt; thou, thou art my beloved; I have not committed a fault, but, as thou hast said, many faults. Wilt thou ever grant that we pass our nights together, so shall my heart be freed from its rust; thou shalt pardon and I return (to my love)."

On coming out of confinement, he got into higher favour than before.—Al-Malik al-Kāmil, having been displeased at one of his brothers, whose name was al-Malik al-Fā'iz Sābiq al-Dīn Ibrāhīm, the latter went to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and asked him to effect a reconciliation; Ṣalāḥ in consequence wrote these lines to al-Kāmil:

"It is an essential rule for him who is lord of Egypt, that he imitate Joseph in kindness towards his brethren. They acted wrongly, and he met them with pardon; when they departed,† he was bounteous towards them, and restored them his affection."

When the emperor (Frederic the Second), lord of Sicily, landed in Syria, A. H. 626 (A. D. 1229)<sup>1</sup>, al-Malik al-Kāmil sent him Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn as his ambassador; and the articles of a treaty having been adopted and confirmed by the oath of the emperor, Ṣalāḥ wrote the following lines to al-Kāmil:

---

<sup>1</sup> See Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. LIX, and M. Reinaud's Extraits des Historiens arabes relatifs aux Croisades, page 428; a very correct and useful work.

*For dubayt, qurain is a proper term.—Ed.

†وَفَقَّرُوا means were in need.—Ed.

"The emperor has taken an engagement any given his word that we shall have a lasting peace. He was obliged to confirm it by oath, and if he attempt to break it, may he devour the flesh of his left hand."<sup>1</sup>

The following verses are by the same:

"When you look on your children, know that when they came to you, they were merely forerunners of death.<sup>2</sup> Children arrive to the stations of their fathers, and the fathers make preparations for departure."

One of my friends recited me these verses, and attributed them to the same author:

"The day of resurrection shall be full of terrors, as you have been told; be therefore in dread of it. Let it suffice you to know that you cannot conceive its terrors, till you taste of death in your (earthly) journey."

The poet Ibn 'Unayn wrote a letter from Damascus to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn in Egypt: (I have been informed by my master 'Afīf al-Dīn Abu 'i-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Adlān, the grammarian and interpreter, native of Moṣul, that this letter was in the handwriting of Ibn 'Unayn himself and contained his dying injunctions); it began thus:

"I reveal to you the treatment which I received from Fortune, whose vicissitudes have already cut my wings; how can a sick man, who is oppressed by afflictions, recover, as long as he does not see the face of health (or the face of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn)?"

---

1 This silly stuff could only be tolerated in the original language, as its quibbles and double meanings are lost in the translation. The first verse may signify: The vaunting emperor has pretended, etc., or, The emperor prince has said. The second verse signifies literally: He has drunk the oath (or drunk his right hand), and if he attempt to break it, may he eat the flesh of his left (through disappointment and rage). The expression to drink an oath has its equivalent in English, and might be rendered by to swallow an oath, that is, to take it by compulsion. A verse of the Qur'ān, the 87th of the second sūrah, has given rise to this expression; it is there said that they (the children of Israel) were made to drink down the calf into their hearts: an allusion to Exodus, XXXII. 20. See also al-Ḥarīrī, page 99.

2 That is: Children and death come to man, but children arrive first, having outrun, or cut the way of death; as the original expresses it.

The poetical pieces of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and his distichs have been collected into separate volumes.—He continued in the enjoyment of high dignity and honour under al-Malik al-Kāmil and the other princes (of the family); but having accompanied al-Kāmil in an official capacity on his expedition to Asia Minor, he fell sick at the army, near the town of Suwaydā,<sup>1</sup> and was therefore transported to al-Ruhā (Edessa), but died before his arrival; this took place on Saturday 20, or on the 25 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 631 (September, A. D. 1234*); he was buried without the walls of Edessa, in the cemetery at the Ḥarrān Gate. His son had his body removed later to Egypt and interred in a mausoleum at the lesser Qarāfah; this was towards the end of the month of Shahbān, A. H. 637 (March, A. D. 1240); I was then at Cairo.—Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was about sixty years old when he died. Since (writing the above), I discovered the date of his birth; it took place in the month of the Second Rabi', 572 (October, A. D. 1176), at Arbela.—Irbil (Arbela) is a large city near Moṣul, and lying to the east of it.

76. 'AZĪZ AL-DĪN AL-MUSTAWFĪ

Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamid Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Maḥmūd Ibn Habat Allāh Ibn Aluh al-Ispahānī, surnamed 'Azīz al-Dīn (great in religion), al-Mustawfī<sup>2</sup> was uncle to 'Imād al-Dīn al-Ispahānī, whose life shall be given in this work. 'Azīz al-Dīn filled several elevated and influential situations at the court of the Seljuq princes, and was always in high favour:

---

<sup>1</sup> Suwaydā is situated at the mouth of the Orontes.

<sup>2</sup> At the court of Arbela, under the government of Zayn al-Dīn and his son Abū 'l-Muẓaffar Kukuburi the Mustawfī, or secretary of state, took rank immediately after the vizir.

* 16 or 21 September.—Ed.

the needy flocked to him for assistance and poets came to praise him and were richly recompensed. The celebrated poet Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Jakīnā of Baghdād, makes the following allusion to him in one of his qaṣīdahs.<sup>1</sup>

“Let us then rein our camels towards Irāq and a rich meed shall be measured to us from the wealth of al-‘Azīz.”

His praises were celebrated also by the qāḍī Abū Bakr al-Arrajānī, whose life has been already given; among other eulogiums on him, he composed the long qaṣīdah from which are extracted the verses there mentioned, and which rhyme in B.<sup>2</sup> His nephew ‘Imād al-Dīn often expressed his pride in possessing such an uncle, and he makes frequent mention of him in his works. Towards the end of his life, ‘Azīz al-Dīn was treasurer to Maḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malikshāh Ibn Alp Arslān al-Saljuqī; this Sultān had married the daughter of his uncle, the sultān Sinjar Ibn Malikshāh; on her death, his uncle required him to deliver up the marriage gift which she had received from her family, consisting of a variety of precious and rare articles, such as were not to be found even in the treasuries of kings: Maḥmūd refused acceding to this demand, and being apprehensive that ‘Azīz al-Dīn would give his testimony respecting the property she had brought with her (and which was well known to him in his capacity of treasurer), he caused him to be arrested and sent him to be confined in the castle of Takrīt, which was at that time one of his possessions.<sup>3</sup>

---

1 It appears from this, and from a passage in the life of al-Ḥarirī, that Ibn Jakīnā was living at the close of the fifth century of the Hijrah. ‘Imād al-Dīn al-Ispahānī gives some specimens of his poetry in the Kharidah, and praises the author most highly, but does not furnish the least information respecting him. (See Kharidah, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds No. 1447, fol. 30 verso).

2 See No. 62. The extract commences thus: I never roamed through distant regions, etc.

3 The principal cities of Syria, Mesopotamia and the neighbouring states, were at that time held as fiefs by a great number of nearly independent emīrs, who were almost always embroiled in war with each other; so that many of these cities, and Takrīt among the rest, were frequently changing masters.

he afterwards put him to death, towards the beginning of the year 525 (A. D. 1130-1). His nephew 'Imād al-Dīn states in the Khariḍah, that he was born at Isphāhān, A. H. 472 (A. D. 1079-80), and was put to death at Takrīt in 526 (A. D. 1131); it was at Baghḍād that he was arrested. The same writer says that when his uncle was slain, the emīrs Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, father of the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn, and his brother Asad al-Dīn Shīrkāh were both in the castle, of which they were then governors; and that they endeavoured to save 'Azīz al-Dīn, but without success—Aluh is a Persian word, the Arabic equivalent of which is 'Uqāb (eagle).—Isphāhān has been already explained.<sup>1</sup>

7. ARTUQ IBN AKSUK*

Artuq Ibn Aksuk, ancestor of the Artuqide princes, was a Turkomān who had got possession of Hulwān and al-Jabal (Persian 'Irāq); he afterwards went to Syria, having left the service of Fakhr al-Dawlat Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Jahīr †[through fear of the sultān Malikshāh<sup>2</sup> this was in the year 478 or 479.<sup>3</sup> He

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 32.

<sup>2</sup> The printed text, in conformity with the MSS., names this sultān Muḥammad son of Mālikshāh. This extraordinary mistake I have suffered to remain the duty of an editor being to respect even the errors of his author.*

<sup>3</sup> §Such is the correct date; it is singular that Ibn Khalikān should assign this event to the year 448 or 449, which incredible error I have allowed to subsist in the Arabic text through respect for the unanimity of my manuscripts. Ibn al-Aṭhīr places this event in the year 479. It was in A. H. 477 that Fakhr al-Dawlat, general of Malikshāh, having under his orders Artuq Ibn Aksab, marched against Sharaf al-Dawlat Muslim Ibn Quraish, and besieged him in 'Amid, Sharaf al-Dawlat escaped however from the city, having bribed Artuq to let him pass. It was therefore, for a good reason that Artuq apprehended the anger of Malikshāh, and fled to Syria.

*M. de Slane reads it Ortuk Ibn Aksab.—Ed.

† [ ] From "through fear" to "479" not in the autograph.—Ed.

*This passage is not in the autograph.—Ed.

§This passage is not in the autograph.—Ed..

then governed Jerusalem in the name of Tutush,<sup>1</sup> a prince of the Seljuq family, whose life shall be given. Artuq having died there in the year which we shall mention further on, his two sons, Sukmān and 'Īl-Ghāzī, became governors of the city, and continued in the exercise of power till the month of Shawwāl, 491 (September, A. D. 1098); when al-Afdāl Shahanshāh Amīr al-Juyush marched from Egypt with an army and took Jerusalem from these two princes. They then retired to Mesopotamia and obtained the government of Diyār Bakr, and the present lord of the castle of Māridīn is one of their descendants. In the year 501, Najm al-Dīn, 'Īl-Ghāzī became lord of Māridīn; the sultān Muḥammad had before that appointed him as his resident agent<sup>2</sup> at Baghdād. Artuq's other son, Sukmān, died of a quinzey in the year 498 (towards the end of A. D. 1104), at a place between Tripoli and Jerusalem.<sup>3</sup> Artuq possessed a penetrating mind; he was a man

1 In the Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā, Reiske writes this name Tanush, but Ibn Khallikān gives its true pronounciation.

2 Resident agent, شحنة, which is a Persian word; the charge itself was called شحنه when the Seljuq dynasty flourished, the khalifs of Baḡhdād exercised only a spiritual authority over the provinces of the Muslim empire; even in that city, which was under their immediate government, they were frequently obliged to submit to the influence of the sultān, who usually resided at Ispahān or Hamadān. Those princes kept a resident agent at the court of Baḡhdād, and were thus enabled to control the khalifs in the very seat of their dominion. When the Moḡhuls overran Persia, Mesopotamia, and Syria, they abstained from placing garrisons in the cities which had surrendered, being averse to enfeebling the active force of their army: they merely left resident agents in the places which had acknowledged their authority, after making all the inhabitants responsible for their safety. (See Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals, year 651; see also M. Reinauds Extraits d'Auteurs arabes relatifs aux Croisades, page 126.)

3 Abu 'l-Fidā says, after Ibn al-Aṭṭār, that he died at Qaryatayn on his way to Damascus, to which city he was travelling in all haste, that he might defend it against the Franks. This induces me to think that the word الغزاة in the printed Arabic text is a fault, though it is so written in the manuscripts; the true reading is probably الغزاة, and the passage will then signify that he died between Tripoli and Jerusalem as he was journeying to war against the infidels.

*In printed text it is الفرات, al-furāt.—Ed.

of resolution and activity, and was highly fortunate in all his enterprises: died A. H. 484 (A. D. 1091). The word "Aksuk" is sometimes written "Aksab."

78. AL-BASĀSĪRĪ

Abu 'l-Hārith Arsilān Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Basāsīrī al-Turki (the Turk), general of the Turkish troops at Baghḍād,<sup>1</sup> is said to have been a mamlūk belonging to Bahā al-Dawlat Ibn 'Aḍad al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh. It was he who revolted at Baghḍād against the khalīf al-Qāim bi'amr illāh, who had placed him at the head of all the Turkish troops, invested him with sovereign authority, and ordered his name to be mentioned in the khutbah<sup>2</sup> from all the pulpits of 'Irāq and Khuzistān. His power had thus become very great, and all the (neighbouring) princes stood in awe of him; but he then revolted against the imām al-Qā'im, and having expelled him from Baghḍād, caused khutbah to be said in the name of the (Fatimite khalīf) al-Musta'ṣir al-'Ubaydī, lord of Egypt. Al-Qā'im then fled for refuge to the emīr of the Arabs,<sup>3</sup> Muḥī al-Dīn (reviver of religion) Abu 'l-Hārith Muḥārish

---

1 It appears from al-Mas'adi's Murūj al-Dhahab, that al-Murtaṣim was the first khalīf who had body of Turks in his service: their number was at first four thousand, and they were distinguished from the other troops by their rich dress and accoutrements, which were of silk and gold.

2 Khutbah is the name given to the sermon pronounced on Fridays from the pulpits of the great mosques in all Muslim countries: it begins by a declaration of God's attributes and unity, and an invocation of his benedictions upon the Prophet, his family, and successors: then follows a prayer for the reigning khalīf and for the prince who exercises civil power in the state. The right of being named in the khutbah and that of coining money are two of the principal privileges possessed by the temporal sovereign, and the special marks of his legitimacy. (See D'Ohsson Empire Ottoman, tom. II, page. 204 et seq.; and d'Herbelots Bibliothèque orientale).

3 The emīr of the Arabs under the khalīfs appears to have filled the same functions as the Ghassanide princes did under the Greeks of the Lower Empire, and the princes of Ḥirah under the Persians: they were phylarchs or controllers of the nomadic tribes.

Ibn al Mujallī al-Uqaylī, lord of al-Ḥadīthah and 'Ā'nah,<sup>1</sup> from whom he obtained everything necessary for his maintenance during an entire year, when Tuḡhrulbek the Seljūqide came to his assistance, and having attacked and slain al-Basāsīrī, reinstated al-Qa'im in Baghḍād. The khalif made his entry to that city precisely one year after leaving it, and by a remarkable coincidence, on the anniversary of the day in which he had quitted it: the history of this circumstance is well known.<sup>2</sup> Al-Basāsīrī was killed at Baghḍad by the soldiers of the sulṭān Toghrulbek, on Thursday, 15th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, or, according to Ibn al-'Aẓīmī,<sup>3</sup> in his history, on Tuesday, 11 Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 451 (January, A. D. 1060*). His head was borne in parade through the city, and his body attached to a gibbet opposite to the gate of Nabā.—Basāsīrī means native of Basā, a town in the province of Fārs; this name is pronounced in Arabic Fasā, and, in that case, the relative adjective derived from it is Fasawī. The grammarian Abn 'Alī al-Fārisī, author of the 'Iqdāh, was a native of this place; he was also surnamed al-Fasawī; but the Persians employ Basārīr, a word of irregular formation. Arsilān's master was a native of Basā, for which reason it was that he himself was named al-Basāsīrī. The preceding observation is made by al-Sam'ānī, on the authority of the learned Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Babah al-Qābisī. This word contains additional letters to those which form the root form which it is derived.—The emīr Muḥārīsh died in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 499 (October, A. D. 1105),

---

1 These are the names of two cities in the Mesopotamia.

2 See 'Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals, year 450.

3 Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-'Aẓīmī is author of a chronicle and a history of Aleppo, his native place. (Ḥājjī Khalīfah, Nos. 2258. 2205.)

*Tuesday 11 corresponding to 18 appears to be more correct. Since on Thursday it was 13 and it was 15 on Saturday, i. e. the date and day do not tally.—Ed.

aged upwards of eighty. His genealogy is as follows: Muhārish Ibn al-Mujallī Ibn 'Akīth Ibn Qabbān Ibn Shā'b Ibn al-Muqallad Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Muhannā; the rest of the series will be found in the life of al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab.

(For further reference, see Sam'ānī, Ansōb, f. 80 a.—Ed.)

79. NŪR AL-DĪN ARSILĀN SHĀH

Abu 'l-Hārith Arsilān Shāh Ibn 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd Ibn Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd Ibn 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī Ibn 'Āq Sunqūr, lord of Moṣul, and generally known by the appellation of Atābek,<sup>1</sup> bore the title of al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn (the just prince, light of religion): (the lives of a number of persons belonging to the same family shall be given under their respective letters). Nūr al-Dīn obtained the government of Moṣul on the death of his father, in whose life is mentioned the date of that event.<sup>2</sup> This prince was a man of acute mind and skilled in the management of state affairs: he passed over the sect of al-Shāfi'ī and was the first of his family who professed the doctrines of that imām<sup>3</sup>: a college of extraordinary beauty was founded by him at Moṣul for the Shafites. He died on Sunday evening, 29 Rajab, 607 (January, A. D. 1211*), (as he was making an excursion) on the Tigris<sup>4</sup> in a shabbārah or barge<sup>5</sup> outside of Moṣul. (The species of boat which the people of that country call shabbārah bears in Egypt the name

1 See d'Herbelots Bib. Orient. Atābek.

2 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd died A. H. 589 (A. D. 1193).

3 I believe that his family were Hanīfites. It is certain that the celebrated Nūr al-Dīn Ma'mūd, his grandfather's brother, was of that sect. See M. Reinauds Extraits, etc., page 156.

4 In the neighbourhood of Moṣul, the Tigris bears the name of al-Shātī (the river); it is a word of frequent occurrence with this signification.

5 M. de Sacy, in his translation of 'Abd al-Latif, page 309, hesitates respecting the right orthography of this word; but al-Yāfi'ī, in his Annals, year 607, fixes it as it is here given.

*16 January, but M. de Slane gives 28 Rajab.—Ed.

of ḥarrāqah.)<sup>1</sup> His death was kept secret till he was borne to the palace at Moṣul: he was buried in a mausoleum erected in the college just mentioned. He left two sons, al-Malik al-Qāhir 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd and al-Malik al-Manṣūr 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī; for information respecting these princes, the reader is referred to the life of their grandfather Mas'ūd. As we have there stated, it was his son al-Malik al-Qāhir by whom he was succeeded. Al-Malik al-Qāhir was master of (the mamlūk) Badr al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍā'il Lulū, who gained possession of Moṣul towards the end of Ramaḍān, A. H. 630 (July, A. D. 1233). He had been lieutenant-governor of that city and then declared himself independent. Mention has been already made of him in the life of Ibn al-Maṣḥūb.<sup>2</sup>

80. AZHAR IBN AL-SAMMĀN

Abū Bakr Azhar Ibn Sa'd al-Sammān was a native of Baṣrah (al-Baṣrī) and adopted member of the tribe of Bāhilah; he taught the Traditions on the authority of Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl,<sup>3</sup> and the people of Irāq, who had received them from him, transmitted them on his authority. He was a companion of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr before that prince obtained the *kh*alifat, but having gone

---

1 The word ḥarrāqah signifies a boat or barge. See M. Reinuad's Extraits, etc., page 415, note.

2 See No. 74.

Here again for I am seldom sick on this Azhar went away, but returned.

3 Abū 'Ubayda Ḥumaydh Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥman al-Baṣrī, a Ṭābi'i of the highest authority, was a client of the celebrated Ṭaḥat al-Qudā'i. He was surnamed al-Ṭawīl (the long or the tall), because one of his neighbours, who also bore the name of Ḥumayd, was of a low stature and was called Ḥumayd the short (al-Qaṣīr). Some say that he received the appellation of the long, on account of the length of his arms; as with one hand he could reach to the edge of the pulpit whilst he touched the ground with the other. He expired suddenly as he was saying his prayers. His death took place towards A. H. 143 (A. D. 760). (Al-Yāfi'i, Ṭab. al-Fuqaha.)

afterwards to congratulate him on his accession, was refused admittance by al-Manṣūr's orders; he, therefore, waited for a day of public audience, and then made him his salutation, on which the khalif said to him, "What has brought you here?" He replied: "I come to congratulate you on your accession to the supreme authority." On this, al-Manṣūr said: "Give him one thousand dīnārs and say to him: 'You have now fulfilled the duty of congratulation, so come not to me any more'." Azhar then retired, but returned the ensuing year, and admittance having been denied to him, he entered on a day of public audience as before, and saluted the khalif, who said: "What brings you here?" The other answered: "I was told that you were sick, and therefore came to visit you." "Give him a thousand dīnārs," said al-Manṣūr, "and tell him that he has fulfilled the duty of visiting the sick, so he must not return here again for I am seldom sick," on this Azhar went away, but returned the following year at a similar audience. "What brings you?" said the khalif. "I heard you utter an invocation," replied Azhar "and am come to know what you desire." "Know, fellow!" retorted al-Manṣūr, "that my invocation has not been heard: every year I pray God to keep you away from me, and yet you still come." The adventures of Azhar and the stories told of him are well known<sup>1</sup>: he was born A. H. 111 (A. D. 729), and died in 203 (A. D. 818-9) or, some say, 207.—Azhar is (here) a proper name (not a surname) sammān means one who sells or carries butter (samn).—Al-Baṣrī or al-Biṣrī signifies native of Baṣrah, which is one of the most famous cities of 'Irāq; it was founded after the promulgation of Islamism; (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb having caused it to be built in the fourteenth year of the Hijrah by 'Utbah Ibn 'Ghazwān.<sup>2</sup> Ibn Qutaybah says, in that

---

1 None of the historians whom I have consulted relate any anecdotes respecting Azhar except the one just given. Al-Yāfi'i, who places his death in the year 203 says that al-Māmun's liberality in this case was very singular and his patience the more extraordinary, as he was of a violent character; and that if the same thing had happened to al-Ḥajjāj, he would have put the author of it to death or inflicted on him a severe punishment.

2 See Ibn Qutaybah's account of the founding of Baṣrah in Abu 'l-Fadl's Annals, vol. I, note 91.

chapter of the Secretary's Guide, where he treats of the alterations which have taken place in the name of countries, that baṣrat (as the name of this city is written in Arabic) means one soft stone, and on suppressing the final letter, it must be pronounced biṣra, and for this sole reason it is that the word biṣrī, is allowed to be employed (with the signification of native of Baṣrah.) The word biṣr also means a soft stone according to (al-Jawhār) in his lexicon, the Shihāh.

(For further reference, see Tahdhib, vol. I, p. 202.—Ed.)

81. 'USĀMAH IBN MURSHID

Abu 'l-Muẓaffar 'Usāmah Ibn Murshid Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Muqallad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh<sup>1</sup> al-Kinānī al-Kalbī al-Shayzarī (member of the tribe of Kinānah which descends from that of Kalb, native of Shayzar), and surnamed Muwayyad al-Dawlat Majd al-Dīn (strengthened in empire, glory of religion), was one of the most powerful learned, and intrepid members of the Munqidh family, lords of the castle of Shayzar. He composed a number of works of different branches of general literature, and is highly spoken of by Ibn al-Mustawfī* in his history of Arbela, who mentions his name in the list of the remarkable men who visited that city; he gives also some extracts from his poetry. The kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Kharidah, and, after making his eulogium, says: "He dwelt at Damascus,† but that city became repulsive to him, as the house (in which merit is not acknowledged)‡ becomes repulsive to a man of a generous mind; he therefore passed into Egypt and remained there with the rank of emīr and

<sup>1</sup> This name is generally written in the MSS. thus, مُنْقِد, but the correct orthography is مُنْقِذ with a point on the letter dal.§

*M. de Slane reads it "Mastawfī."—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Baḡhdād.—Ed.

‡To me it appears that it is repulsive not because merit is not acknowledged but because in one's straitened circumstances one cannot do justice to one's magnanimity.—Ed.

§In the autograph and printed text it is the latter.—Ed.

honoured with public respect, till the period of Ibn Ruzzik's administration, when he returned to Svria* and sojourned at Damascus. The fortune cast him into Ḥiṣn Kayā, where he remained till Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, on gaining possession of Damascus (in A. H. 570), called him (to his court): he was then upwards of eighty years." Another writer says that 'Usāmah went to Egypt in the reign of al-Zāfir, who had then for vizīr al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār: this vizīr treated him generously, but he was assassinated through his machinations, as shall be related in the history of his life. Since (transcribing the foregoing passages) I found a note in the handwriting of 'Usāmah addressed to al-Rashīd Ibn al-Zubayr, that he might insert it in his Kitāb al-Jinān; that note is dated Miṣr, in the year 541.† This is a proof that he came to Egypt during the administration of Ibn al-Sallār<sup>1</sup>; and he remained there till the assassination of that vizīr, for no one contests that he was in Egypt when the murder was committed. His collected poetical works form two volumes and are in every person's hands; I have seen a copy of them in his own handwriting and extracted from it the following passages:

"Assume not a borrowed insensibility when abandoned by those you love; for your force will fail under their protracted aversion. Know that thy heart will return to them either of its own accord or despite its reluctance."

On Ibn Ṭulayb‡ of Miṣr, whose house was burnt down:

"See how the progress of time constrains us to acknowledge that there is a destiny; Ibn Ṭulayb never lit a fire in the house (through avarice), yet by fire it was destroyed."

A similar circumstance to this befell al-Wajih Ibn Ṣarah, a bookseller<sup>2</sup> at Cairo: he had in that city a house noted for its

1 It is rather a proof that he came before the appointment of that vizīr, whose nomination only took place A. H. 543 or 544. The Arabic text says: In the days of Ibn al-Sallār.

2 Or rather a book-broker; his employment being to find purchasers for other people's books.

* "He returned to Syria" supports the above reading.—Ed.

† In the autograph there is an addition: 'And Ḥāfiẓ died in the year 44.'—Ed.

‡ M. de Slane reads it Ṭalib.—Ed.

elegance, and which was burned down; this gave rise to the following lines, composed by Nashw al-Mulk (rise of the empire) Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Mufarrij,* surnamed Ibn al-Munajjim (son of the astrologer), who was a native of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, but lived and died in Egypt:

"On looking at Ibn Ṣarah's house, in which the fire burned with a clear and ardent flame, I said: 'Thus it is with wealth gained by iniquity; in a little time it is hurled to ruin. This man was in fact a long-lived infidel; but Gehennam came upon him whilst he imagined that it would yet be tardy in its progress towards him'."

The second of these verses is taken from an expression of the blessed Prophet, who said: "If a man gain wealth by iniquity (mahawish), God will send it to ruin (nahābir)."<sup>1</sup> The word mahāwīsh means whatever is forbidden, and nahābir signifies precipices. As for al-Wajih (Wajih al-Dīn, respectable for religion), generally known by the name of Ibn Ṣarah, the following was his real name; Abu 'l-Futaḥ Nāṣir Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Kḥalaf al-Anṣārī; he was a book-agent of extensive business in Miṣr, and used to sit in the vestibule of his house for the purpose of exercising his profession, and offering books for sale to men of rank and learning; as they were accustomed to assemble there every Sunday and Wednesday, and remain till the hours of sale were over. On the death of al-Silafī, he travelled down to Alexandria for the purpose of buying his books. He died at Miṣr on the 16 of the latter Rābi', 607 (October, A. D. 1210)†, and was buried in the Qarāfah<sup>1</sup> near that city. A piece of Ibn Munqidh's contains the following verse, in which he describes his enfeebled state:

"Strange, that my hand should be too weak to hold a pen!
that hand which used to break lances in the breasts of lions."

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 24, note on Qarāfah.

*M. de Slane reads it Mufrij.—Ed.

†7 October.—Ed.

I extract also from his collected poetical works the following lines, which he wrote in answer to some verses addressed to him by his father:

"I complain not of the faithlessness of those whom I loved; yet, had complaints availed, I should have given them utterance. I was fatigued with reproaching them, and, in despair, I left them; never shall they be of those in whom I will place my hopes. When their sarcasms cut me to the heart, I stifled my anguish and concealed the pain they caused; and I went to meet them with smiles, as if I had nothing heard nor seen. They accused me of crimes which my hands did not commit; which I had neither commanded nor forbidden. No, by Allah! I have never harboured nor meant such perfidy as they openly manifest. On the Day of Judgment we shall meet again; and the volume (in which are inscribed the actions of mankind) shall then reveal what crimes are theirs; what, mine."

The two verses which follow in the same rhyme and measure as the preceding, and were inserted by him in a letter to one of his relations; they are the height of tenderness;*

"Men before me have complained of the pains of separation; the living and the dead (when in this world) have felt the affliction caused by the absence of friends; but (grief) such as fills my bosom, I never heard of nor witnessed."

One thing brings on another<sup>1</sup>: Abu 'l-Hasan Yahyā Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Miṣrī, surnamed al-Jazzār<sup>2</sup> recited to

1 This anecdote is not in its place; it should follow that which relates to the burning of Ibn Ṣurat's house, see page 270; the author must have written it in the margin of his own copy, and the transcriber of that copy inserted it in the text, but in a wrong place.†

2 Al-Jazzār was in great reputation at that time as poet and a man of society. Ibn Khallikān was one of his protectors. Born A. H. 601 (A. D. 1204). —(From the Supplement to Ibn Khallikān's Biographical Dictionary by al-Ṣaḡā'ī الصقاعي MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 732.)

* "And elegance" should be added according to the autograph and printed text.—Ed.

†In the autograph it is the part of the text and it does not appear to be out of place. Ed.

me the following verses, which he had composed on another literary man at Cairo, far advanced in age, who being attacked by a cutaneous eruption, anointed himself with sulphur:

"O, learned master (hearken to) the demand of a friend devoid of sarcasm: Thou art old, and of course art near to the fire (of hell); why then anoint yourself with sulphur?"

I found the following verses in the handwriting of 'Usāmah Ibn Munqidh; they were composed by himself on having a tooth drawn, being then, as he relates, under the walls of **Khalāt*<sup>1</sup>; the idea of the verses is original, and they might pass as a riddle on the word tooth:

"I had a companion of whom I was never tired, who suffered in my service and laboured with assiduity; whilst we were together I never saw him; and when he appeared before my eyes, we had parted for ever."

The kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn said: "I was always longing to meet him, and I watched from afar the lightning which foreboded the rain (of his liberality); at last I saw him in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 751, when I asked him the date of his birth; to which he replied 'Sunday, 27 of the latter Jumādā, 488 (July, A. D. 1095†)." He was born at the castle of Shayzar, and died at Damascus on Tuesday† night, the 23 of Ramadān, 584 (November, A.D. 1188**), and was interred the next day at the east side of Mount Qāsiyān; I entered his mausoleum, which lies on the

---

1 This was probably during Ṣalāh al-Dīn's expedition there, A. H. 518. (See Schulten's Vita et res gesta Saladini, p. 61.)

*M. de Slane reads it Khalat.—Ed.

†4 July, but according to Edward Mahtar it was Wednesday which, if correct, leads to conclude that either he forgot the day or the date else the year because in 489 A. H. day and date tally.—Ed.

‡M. de Slane gives Monday.—Ed.

**15 July.—Ed.

northern bank of the river Yazīd, and read a portion of the Qur'ān over his grave, and prayed God to have mercy on him.—His father, Abn' Usamah Murshid, died A. H. 531 (A. D. 1136).—Shayzar is the name of a castle near Ḥamah (Epialhamia); it is also called the castle of the Munqidh family: mention shall be again made of it in the life of his grandfather, 'Alī Ibn al-Muqallad.

(For further reference, see Sam'āni, Ansāb, f. 346a.—Ed.)

82. IBN RĀHAWAYH

Abu Ya'qub Iṣḥāq, native of Marw al-Shāhjan, and surnamed Ibn Rāhawayh, was descended from Ḥanzalah by the following line: his father Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibrāhīm was son of Maḥlad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maṭar Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ghālib Ibn 'Abd al-Wārith Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Aṭīyyah Ibn Murrah Ibn Ka'b Ibn Hammām Ibn Asad Ibn Murrah Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ḥanzalah Ibn Mālik Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Murrah. Ibn Rāhawayh was one of the great doctors of Islamism; he was equally as learned in the Traditions and the law as distinguished for his piety: al-Dāraquṭnī mentions him among those who related tradition on the authority of al-Shāfi'i, and al-Bayhaqī counts him among al-Shāfi'i's disciples. He had once an argument with al-Shāfi'i concerning the legality of the sale of such houses as are situated in Makkah,<sup>1</sup> and this discussion has been fully stated by Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, in his work entitled Merits of the imām al-Shāfi'i. When the superior talent of Ibn Rāhawayh became generally known in Egypt, his works were (frequently) transcribed and his treatises collected (with care); the imām Ibn Ḥanbal said of him: "We consider Ishāq as an imām among the Muslims; an abler jurisconsult than Ishāq never passed the bridge.<sup>1</sup>" "I know by heart," said Ishāq "seventy thousand Traditions; I have read one hundred thousand, and can recollect in what work each is to be found.<sup>2</sup> I never heard anything once without learning it by heart, nor learned anything by heart which I afterwards forgot." He composed a well-known Musnad<sup>3</sup> after travelling to Ḥijāz 'Irāq Yemen, and Syria, and learning Traditions from Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah and others of the same period; Al-Bukhārī, Muslim and al-Tirmidhī were among his disciples. Ibn Rāhawayh was born A. H. 161 (A. D. 777-8); some say 163 or 166: in his latter days he inhabited Naysāpur, where he died on the eve of the 15 of Sha'bān (which was a Thursday, or according to others a Sunday or a Saturday), A. H. 238, (January, A. D. 853*), or 237.—Rāhawayh was a surname given to his father Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibrāhīm because he was born on the road to Makkah (rāh in the Persian means road, and waiḥ, found; as it might be said that he was found on the road). This word is also pronounced Rahayah. Ishāq himself relates that 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, emīr of Khurāsān, asked him why he was called Ibn Rāhawayh, what was the meaning of the word, and if he did not dislike such an appellation? To which he answered: "Know, O emīr! that my father was born on the road, and the people of

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibrāhīm al-Ḥalebī's Multaqal 'l-Abḥur, a celebrated treatise on Muslim Law, contains the following article in the chapter on sale: "The sale or lease of ground situated in the Sacred Territory of Makkah is blamable." On which the commentator makes the following observations: "Unless in a case of absolute necessity. As for the buildings, they may be alienated without scruple, as is done with buildings on lands conceded in perpetuity to pious uses (waqf)."(See D'Ohsson's Tab. gen. de l'Empire Othoman, t. vi. p. 82) A precisely similar doctrine is held by Quṭb al-Dīn in his history of Makkah.

1 Probably the bridge which united the suburb of Karkh to Baḡhlād.

2 Such is the signification of the verb ذاکر joined to the preposition ب. Al-Dhahabī, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuḡfāz, life of Ibn Rāhawayh, relates the same saying in clearer terms, as in place of إذا کر بمایه "الف حدیث کالی انظر إليها" he has اعرف مکان مایه "الف حدیث کالی

3 Musnad means a collection of authenticated Traditions, each of them preceded by the names of those Traditionists who had transmitted it successively one to another, and the last of whom taught it to the author of the work.

*Sunday 29. In 237 it was Thursday, 11 February, 852.—Ed.

Marw named him Rāhawayh for that reason; my father disliked, being so called, but I do not." Ḥanzalah, son of Mālik, gave his name to a great branch of the tribe of Tamīm.

(For further reference, vide Tahdhib al-Tahdhib, vol. 1, p. 216, No. 408.—Ed.)

83. ABŪ 'AMR AL-SHAYBĀNĪ

Abū 'Amr Ishāq Ibn Mirār al-Shaybānī, the grammarian and philologist, was a native of Ramādāt al-Kufah<sup>1</sup> but inhabited Baghdād. He was a mawlā,<sup>2</sup> and had lived under the protection of the tribe of Shaybān, for the purpose of acquiring a correct knowledge of the Arabic language, and it was for this reason that he was surnamed al-Shaybānī. Philology and (Arabic) poetry were the special objects of his studies, and in these two branches of science, his authority is of the highest order. He learned and transmitted a great number of traditions; the utmost confidence was placed in his veracity; and his merit is extolled by the higher class of learned men and narrators of traditional information, though it is depreciated by the generality of them because he used to drink wine (nabīdh*) openly. A number of eminent men got from him (a portion of their knowledge); among them were the imān Ibn Ḥanbal, al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, and Ibn al-Sikkīt, the author of the Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq, who states that Abū 'Amr lived one hundred and eighteen years, and wrote with his own hand up to his death. "Sometimes," says this author, "he would borrow my book from me when I was a boy studying under him and copying

---

1 In the Marāṣid al-It̤ ilā' and the Muḥtarik, a number of places are noticed which bear the name of Ramādah, but the Ramādah of Kufah is not mentioned by them; it is manifest, however, that this place was near the city of Kufah.

2 The word mawlā has different signification; among others, those of enfranchised slave and client; the latter is probably the meaning it bears here.

*For nabīdh "beverage" is the correct word.—Ed.

his works." Ibn Kāmil<sup>1</sup> relates that Ishāq Ibn Mirār died at Baghdād, A. H. 213 (A. D. 821-2), aged one hundred and ten years; and the latter is certainly correct. Abū 'Amr composed a number of works, amongst others a treatise on the Horse, one on the Dialects, generally known by the title of Kitāb al-Jim or Kitāb al-Ḥurūf; the Great Collection of Anecdotes, a work of which he made three editions; Explanation of obscure words occurring in the Traditions; a treatise on Bees; another on Camels; and a work on the Nature of Man. He read the diwāns, or collected works of the (ancient) poets, under the direction of al-Mufaḍḍal; but the principal object of his studies were the anecdotes, rare expressions, and extemporary poetry of the nomadic Arabs. His son 'Amr relates of him, that he collected and classed the poems of more than eighty Arabic tribes, and on finishing with each tribe, he published the result, and made a copy of it, which he deposited in the mosque of Kūfah: he thus wrote with his own hand upwards of eighty volumes.—The meaning of the word Shaybāwī<sup>2</sup> has been already explained.—Some say that he died on Palm-Sunday,* A. H. 210 (the beginning of which year corresponds to the 24 April, A. D. 825).

84. ISHĀQ IBN IBRĀHĪM AL-MAWṢILĪ

Abū Muḥammad Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Māhān Ibn Bahman Ibn Nusk, a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Tamīm, and

---

<sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Kāmil learned Traditions from al-Ṭabari, the celebrated historian (Hamakers Specimenecatal, etc., page 26, line 3); he wrote a history of those q'is who were also poets, and died A. H. 350 (A. D. 961). Flügel's Ḥājjī Khalifah, No. 216.)

<sup>2</sup> Palm Sunday, الشَّعَانِين (al-Sha'ānīn)*. See M. Reinaud's Extraits, etc. p. 402.

*In the autograph it is السَّعَانِين; both the words mean the same thing, i.e. Sunday before passover.—Ed.

born at Arrajān, is generally known by the name of Ibn al-Nadīm al-Mawṣilī (son of the social companion from Moṣul). As his father's life has been already given (see No. 9), with an account of his family and the origin of his surname Tamīmī, it is unnecessary to repeat what has been there said. Ibrāhīm was a constant companion of the khalifs in their parties of pleasure, and bore a high reputation for refined taste; his festive humour and talent as a singer were peculiarly his own. He was well acquainted with pure Arabic (ancient) poetry, the history of the poets, and the adventures of the desert tribes. As a traditionist, his authority is cited by Muṣ'ab Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zubayrī<sup>1</sup> Ibn Bakkār, and others; he was (indeed) deeply learned in the Traditions, the law, and dogmatical theology. *[(Relative to this) the following anecdote is narrated by the poet Muḥammad Ibn 'Aṭīyah al-'Aṭawī<sup>2</sup>: "I was present at one of the qāḍī Yahyā Ibn Akṭham's assemblies,<sup>3</sup> when Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī entered and commenced, with the theologians who were present, a discussion in which he was completely successful; he then treated with ability a point of jurisprudence, maintaining it by direct proofs and analogical cases; after which, he discoursed on poetry and the Arabic language and excelled all the company: he then turned to the qāḍī Yahyā and said: May God exalt the qāḍī! have I committed any faults in

1 Abu 'Abd Allāh Muṣ'ab Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muṣ'ab Ibn Ṭhābit Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwām al-Asadī al-Zubayrī (descended from the celebrated 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr) and uncle to al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkār, was the genealogist of the tribe of Quraysh; he was also a ḥāfiẓ, a jurisconsult, and a historian; these talents, with his noble birth and manly character, obtained for him the highest esteem and respect; his only fault was hatred to the memory of the khalif 'Alī. Born at Medinah, A. H. 156 (A. D. 773); died A. H. 236 (A. D. 850-1).—(See Ibn al-Aṭḥir and al-Yāfi'i, in the year last mentioned.)

2 Abu 'Abd al-Raḥmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Aṭīyah an enfranchised slave of the tribe of Layṭh Ibn Bakr Ibn 'Abd Manāt, grew into eminence as a kātib and poet under the Abbasides. He was born and brought up at Baṣrah, and had for protector the qāḍī Ibn Abī Duwād (see his life, No. 31), whose death he lamented in a number of elegies.—Aghāni, tom. IV, fol. 319-321).—Communicated by M. Caussin de Perceval.)

3 See No. 31, note on vizirs' assemblies.

* [ ] From "(Relative to this)" to "As a singer he was without a rival" on page 281 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

the discussion which I have maintained and the passages which I have quoted, or can any objection be made to them?" "No," replied Yahyā. "How then," said he "does it happen that I, who treat all those sciences with as much ability as the persons who profess them, should be only known as a master of one single art?" meaning music. On this the qādī turned towards me and said: "It is for you to answer that."—(Al-'Aṭawī was an able dialectician.) "Yes, qādī," I replied, "may God exalt you ! it is for me to answer." I then addressed Ishāq and said: "O, Abū Muḥammad, as a grammarian are you equal to al-Farrā and al-Akhfash?"—"No."—"In philology and acquaintance with poetry are you equal to al-Aṣma'ī and Abū 'Ubaydah?"—"No."—"In dogmatical theology are you equal to Abū 'l-Hudhayl al-'Allāf and al-Nazzām al-Balkhī?"—"No."—"In jurisprudence are

---

1 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Sayyār سيار (not Baschar, as D'Herbelot has it in the Bib. Orient., article NADDHAM' nor yet Yesār, as M. de Sacy writes it in the Histoire des Druzes, introduction, page 42); Ibn Hānī, native of Baṣrah and sister's son to Abū 'l-Hudhayl, was a celebrated scholastic theologian and author of a number of works and pieces of poetry on that subject. He received the surname of al-Nazzām (the stringer of pearls) because he strung and sold pearls in the bazar at Baṣrah, or, as some say, because he strung brilliant ideas on the thread of his discourse. In his youth, he was suspected of partiality towards the doctrine of dualism, and at a later period he was known to have adopted the principles of the Greek philosophy. His speculations on religious subjects were pushed so far, that pious Muslims looking on him as an infidel. An offset of the Mutazelite sect, was named Nazzamiyah after its founder al-Nazzām. Many learned men of that time asserted that this doctor denied the divine mission of the prophets, and that dread of the sword was the only motive which prevented him from openly professing his subversive opinions. The great majority of the Mutazelites accused him of infidelity, and as a proof of his corrupt morals, they mention his passion for wine. He died A. H. 231 (A. D. 845-6). (Ibn Shākir's 'Uyūn al-Tawṛīkh. Al-Shahrestānī. Al-Maqrizī's Khitāt. The Khāṭib's History of Baghdād, fol. 648.)—It may be observed that Ibn Khallikān has mentioned the name al-Nazzām al-Balkhī (native of Balkh), who might therefore be thought a different person from him who is here spoken of; but in another part of his work (see page 540 of the Arabic text) may be found the following passage, which decides the question:—"Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Sayyār al-Balkhī, surnamed al-Nazzām, the celebrated theologian." His family was probably from Balkh, and he himself born at Baṣrah, which may account for the two patronymics. The life of Abū 'l-Hudhayl is given by Ibn Khallikān. Al-Shahrestānī states the principal points of al-Nazzām's doctrine.

you equal to this qāḍī?" (pointing to Yaḥyā.)—"No."—"In poetry are you equal to Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah and Abū Nuwās?"—"No."—"It is for these reasons, therefore, that you are known as a master of an art in which you stand without a rival, for in the other sciences you are inferior to those who hold the first rank in them." Ishāq laughed on hearing this, and rising from his place, withdrew. The qāḍī then said to al-'Aṭawī: "You have proved your point perfectly well, and yet done little wrong to Ishāq who is a man almost without a rival."—My master, Ibn Baṭīsh<sup>1</sup>, says, in his work entitled al-Tamyiz wa 'l-Faṣl,<sup>2</sup> that Ishāq al-Mawṣilī's conversation was elegant and full of originality, his taste refined, and his talents of superior order. He wrote the traditions under the dictation of Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, Mālik Ibn Ans. Huṣḥayn

1 Abū al-Majd Isma'īl Ibn Hibāt Allāh Ibn Sa'id Ibn Bāṭish, surnamed 'Imād al-Dīn (column of religion), was a native of Moṣul, and one of the most learned Shāfites of that city. He was born in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 475; and in his youth travelled to Syria, that he might acquire information in the Traditions and jurisprudence from the celebrated professors who taught at Baḡhdād, Damascus and Aleppo. He then became professor and mufti in his turn, and composed a number of works, the most important of which are said to be the following: Ṭabaqāt, etc. or list of Shāfite doctors, Muṣṭabih al-Nisab (doubtful patronymics), al-Mughni, etc., or Explanation of the difficulties found in the Muḥadḍḥab (of Abū Isḥāq al-Shīrāzī). It is stated that in this last work he is frequently mistaken in his explanations. He died at Aleppo, A. H. 655 (A. D. 1257) aged eighty,—(Ṭab. al-Shaf.—Ṭab. al-Fuqahā.—Buḡiyyat al-Ṭalab.)—This was one of Ibn Khallikān's professors.

2 The Tamyiz wa 'l-Faṣl, or al-Fayṣal (Distinction and Discrimination), is cited as a geographical work by Abū 'l-Fidā in his Geography, page 2 of the Arabic text. The same author mentions another work of Abū al-Majd, entitled Muzil al-Irtiyāb al-Muṣṭabih al-Intisāb (the dispeller of the uncertainties concerning doubtful patronymics). This is probably the same as the Muṣṭabih al-Nisab (see note 1 above.) Those two works treated probably of Traditionists, their patronymics, and the countries to which they belonged.

Ibn Buṣḥayr,<sup>1</sup> and Abū Mu'āwiyah al-Ḍarīr<sup>2</sup>; he studied philology under al-Aṣma'ī and Abū 'Ubaydah, and attained the highest eminence as a musician. It was to this art that he devoted his principal attention, and by it he acquired his reputation. The khalifs treated him with honour and admitted him into their intimacy, and al-Māman used to say: "Were Ishāq not so publicly known and spoken of as a singer, I should have appointed him to the place of qāḍī; he is more deserving of it than the qāḍīs we now have, and he surpasses them all in virtuous conduct, veracity, piety, and honesty; but people know him only as a singer, and that talent, though the least of those which he possesses, has eclipsed the rest." As a singer he was without a rival], and as a poet he possessed considerable abilities; his poems have been collected, and form a diwān, from which we extract the following verses addressed to Harnn al-Raṣḥīd:

"When she told me to be thrifty, I replied: 'Cease your counsels, thy command is impossible; I see that all are friends to the generous man, but the miser has not a friend in the world; I see that avarice is discreditable, and I respect myself too much to deserve the name of miser. Know, that the greatest pleasure a noble mind can feel, is to give with liberality. From honourable pride, the presents which I made are such as the rich bestow, though my means, as thou knowest, are but small. Yet why should I apprehend poverty or remain deprived of wealth, when the Commander of the Faithful looks on me with favour?'"

---

1 Abu Mu'āwiyah Huṣḥaym Ibn Abū Khazim Buṣḥayr, native of Wasit, but descended from a family of Bal'ḥ, was a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Sulmah. He had studied the Traditions under many eminent masters, and acquired a high reputation at Ba 'ḥdād by his knowledge of the subject. He knew by heart twenty thousand of them. Died A. H. 183 (A. D. 799), aged 79 years. Tab. al-Muḥaddithin, MS. No. 736. Al-Yāfi'ij.

2 Abu Mu'āwiyah Muḥammad Ibn Khazim (خازم) al-Ḍarīr (the blind), adopted member of the tribe of Minqar (المنقرى بالولا), which descends from that of Tamīm through the tribe of Sa'd, was born at Kufah, A. H. 113 (A. D. 731); he studied the Traditions under Hishām Ibn 'Urwah and al-A'maṣh. Died A. H. 195 (A. D. 811). Tab. al-Muḥaddithin. He was probably nephew to the Huṣḥaym mentioned in the preceding note.

Ishāq wrote a great deal; Tha'lab relates that he saw upwards of one thousand quires in his handwriting, and containing expressions, all of which he had heard from the Arabs of the desert. "I never saw," said he, "in the house of any person more philological works than in the house of Ishāq and, after his, in Ibn al-A'rābi's." From among the anecdotes which Ishāq used to relate, I shall select the following: "We had a neighbour called Abū Ḥafṣ and nicknamed al-Laṭī; one of his neighbours having fallen sick, he went to see him and said: 'How are you? do you not know me?' To which the sick man answered with a feeble voice: 'Yes, I do; you are Abū Ḥafṣ al-Laṭī!' 'O' said the other, 'you pass the bounds of civility; may God never raise you from your bed!'"<sup>1</sup>—(The khalif) al-Mu'taṣim said of him: "Ishāq never yet sung to me without my feeling as if my possessions were increased."—The anecdotes related of him are numerous; he lost his sight two years before his death. Born A. H. 150 (A. D. 767), the same year as the imām al-Shāfi'ī; died of diarrhoea in the month of Ramaḍān, 235 (beginning of April, A. D. 850); but some say in the month of Shawwāl, 236; the first is, however, the more general opinion. According to another statement, his death took place on the afternoon of Thursday, 5 Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 236* One of his friends composed the following elegy on that event:

"It is now covered with the dust of the earth, that pleasure which had taken its residence in the dwelling of our (departed) friends!—(it is in mourning) since al-Mawṣilī is gone; since social joy is ruined and the meetings of gaiety suppressed. The instruments of music weep in sorrow for his loss; love also weeps and the clear liquor (of the wine-cup). All the apparatus<sup>2</sup> of our pleasant parties is in grief, and the lute sympathizes with the dulcimer."

1 Literally: Thou hast passed the limit of acquaintance, may God never raise your side. The point in this anecdote depends on a certain double meaning contained in the last word, but which it is impossible to explain. It can be only observed that the expression Abū Ḥafṣ made use of proved sufficiently that he deserved the nickname of al-Laṭī (pathicus).

2 The apparatus of social parties: cushions, perfumes, flowers, musical instruments, and wine.

*11 June A. D. 851.—Ed.

It has been stated, but erroneously, that this elegy was composed on the death of his father Ibrāhīm.

85. ISHĀQ IBN HUNAYN

Abū Yaqūb Ishāq Ibn Hunayn Ibn Ishāq al-'Ibādī, a celebrated physician, was the most eminent man of his time in the science of medicine. * [As a translator, he attained the same superiority as his father, and equalled him in the knowledge of different languages, and the faculty of expressing his thoughts in them with precision. He translated into Arabic (a number of) the philosophical works written in the language of the Greeks; his father also had done the same, but there exist more translations by him<sup>1</sup> of philosophical writings (such as the treatises of Aristotle and others),<sup>2</sup> than of medical works. He was patronised by the same khalifs, and great men who had his father in their service, but he afterwards attached himself exclusively to al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh<sup>3</sup> (vizir to the khalif al-Mutaḍid Billāh, and became so intimate with him that this vizir made him his confidant and communicated to him the secrets which he concealed from all others. Ibn Buṭlān<sup>4</sup> relates in his Da'wat al-Aṭibb (requisite qualities for a physician?) that the vizir al-Qāsim, having heard that Ishāq had taken a laxative medicine, wrote him the following verses to rally him on the subject :

---

1 By him; that is, I believe by the son. The same equivocalness exists in the original.

2 Consult on this subject Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica, tom. I, page 304, et. seq.

3 Ibn Khalikān mentions a number of particulars respecting this vizir in the life of Ibn al-Rūmī.

4 Al-Muḥtār Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abdūn, surnamed Ibn Buṭlān, was celebrated Christian physician of Baḡh Jād. He died in a convent at Antioch in A. H. 444 (A. D. 1052.) Some information will be found respecting him in the Historia Dynastarum. His life is given also in the Tārīkh al-Hukamā.

* [ ] From "As a translator" to "your letter to the closet" on page 284 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

"Tell me how you passed the night, and in what state you were and how often your camel bore you towards the solitary mansion."<sup>1</sup>

On which Ishāq wrote him in answer :

"I passed a good and pleasant night, my body and my mind at ease; but as for journeys, camels, and solitary mansions, my respect for you, who are the object of my hope, has caused me to forget them all."

I met with the same anecdote in the Kitāb al-Kināyāt,<sup>2</sup> but according to that work, Ishāq's answer was as follows:

"I write you this to avoid wearing out my shoes by a fatiguing walk. If you intend to answer me, direct your letter to the closet.]"

Ishāq and his father Ḥunayn (whose life shall be given later) composed a number of useful treatises on medicine; towards the end of his life he lost the use of his side from palsy: he died in the month of the Second Rabī', A. H. 298 (December, A. D. 910) or 299.—'Ibādī means, related to the 'Ibād' of Ḥīrah, who were a number of Christian families from different (Arabic) tribes which had settled there; the surname of 'Ibādī was borne by many persons, amongst others 'Adī Ibn Zayd al-'Ibādī, the celebrated poet.<sup>3</sup> Al-

1 The vizir's meaning is sufficiently obvious, but it may be observed that in the last lines he has given a burlesque application to a very common poetical idea.—In the beginning of most qasīdahs, the poet represented as arriving, after a long journey, at the mansion of his mistress, which he finds desolate solitary.

2 This is apparently a treatise on metonymical expressions.

3 Among the works composed by Ishāq may be reckoned a treatise on Simples A Kunūnāsh, or Pandects, and a History of Physicians. (Tārīkh al-Hukamā', MS. of the Bib. du Roi, Supplement, No. 105.)

4 The primitive signification of the word 'Ibād is servant; but in some cases this word is employed to denote the Nestorian Christians.

5 'Adī Ibn Zayd lived before the promulgation of Islamism. His life, translated from the Arabic of the Kitāb al-Aghānī has been given in the Journal Asiatique for November, 1838.

Tha'labi<sup>1</sup> says in his commentary on the Qur'ān, when explaining the following passage in the Sūrat al-Mumintn:<sup>2</sup> Shall we believe in the two men like to ourselves, and whose people are servants (‘ābidān) to us? “The word ‘ābidūn, signifies obedient, subjected; and the Arabs of the desert call him who serves a king ‘ābid (subject); for this reason it was that the people of Ḥirah were called ‘Ibād, because “they were obedient to the king of Persia.”—Ḥirah is the name of an ancient city which belonged to the Mundhir family, and the other Arab princes, their predecessors; ‘Amr Ibn ‘Adl al-Lakhmi for instance, the ancestor of the Mundhirs, who was succeeded by his sons<sup>3</sup>; before him Ḥirah was possessed by his maternal uncle Jadhīmat al-Abrash al-Azdi, him who had the adventure with al-Zabbā.<sup>4</sup> Ḥirah having gone to ruin, the city of Kāfah was founded outside of it after the promulgation of Islamism; seventeenth year of the Hijrah (A. D. 638), by order of ‘Umar Ibn al-Khattāb.

86. AS‘AD AL-MĪHANĪ

Abu ‘I-Faṭḥ As‘ad Ibn Abi Naṣr Ibn Abi ‘I-Faḍl al-Mihani, surnamed Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion), was a follower of the sect of al-Shāfi‘ī, and a doctor of high eminence in the science of jurisprudence and controversy, on which subject he composed a well-known Ta‘liqah.<sup>5</sup> After studying the law in the city of Marw, he went to Ghaznah, where he acquired an extensive reputation by his superior talents, and obtained the praises of al-Ghazzālī (see his

<sup>1</sup> See his life, No. 30.

<sup>2</sup> Qur‘ān, surat 23, verse 49.

<sup>3</sup> See Pocock’s Specimen Hist. Ar. 2nd edn., page 68.

<sup>4</sup> The details of this adventure are to be found in Schultens’s Meidanī Proverb. Arab. Pars, page 83; and Freytag’s edition of the same work, t. 1, p. 424.

<sup>5</sup> See note on ‘al-Muzani, No. 24.

life, No. 17). From that he travelled to Baghḍād, and was twice appointed professor at the Nizāmiyah College in that city: he was nominated, the first time, in the year 507 (A. D. 1113-4), and was removed from his place on 18 Shābān, 513*; he was afterwards reinstated in Sha'bān, 517†, and in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah in the same year he set out to join the army,<sup>1</sup> leaving his place to another. A great number of pupils studied under him and profited by his lessons and the knowledge which they acquired of his system of controversial reasoning. The ḥāfiẓ Abn Sa'd al-Sam'ānī speaks of him in the Dhayl‡ and says: "When we were at Marw, he came there as ambassador from the Seljuq Sultān, Maḥmūd; he afterwards went in the same capacity from Baghḍād to Hamadān,<sup>2</sup> and died there A. H. 527 (A. D. 1132-3). I was told by Abn Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Umar al-Khaṭīb that a jurisconsult of Qazwīn (who took care of As'ad at Hamadān, when he was drawing towards the end of his life) related to him the following circumstance: 'We were together in a room about the time in which his ecstatic fit<sup>3</sup> usually took him, and he ordered us to retire, on which we withdrew; but I stopped at the door to listen, and I heard him strike his face with his hand and say: O what grief is mine for my negligence in the service of God!'—He then wept and struck his face again, and continued repeating these

1 This was probably the army sent by the khalif al-Mustarshid against Dubays Ibn Ṣadaqah.

2 The first embassy was probably in A. H. 513 (A. D. 1119-20) when the Sulṭān Sinjar was on ill terms with his nephew the Sulṭān Maḥmūd. At the epoch of the second, Ma'ad was Sulṭān at Baḥḍād, and his brother Tuḡhril at Hamadān.

3 In Arabic حال, state, which word is employed by the Sufis; in their technical language, to signify a periodical fit of excitaton or of mental abstraction, to which their devotees are subject, and which is produced by a long continuance of their religious exercises. During its continuance, their souls are supposed to be absorbed in the Divinity.—(See M. de Sacy's Memoir on Sufism in the Notices et Extraits, etc., tom. 12.)

5 Qur'ān; surat 39, verse 57.

*24 November, 1119.—Ed.

†October-November, 1123.—Ed.

‡According to the autograph it should be Muadhhyal.—Ed.

words till he expired.'-Abū Bakr told me the above, or the substance of it, as I have written it down from memory (and not from his dictation)! Mihanī means belonging to Mīhanah, a village in the dependencies of Khābarān, which place is near the towns of Sarakhs and Abīward in Khurāsān.

87. ABU 'L-FUTŪḤ AL-'IJLĪ

Abu 'l-Futūḥ As'ad Ibn Abi 'l-Faḍā'il Maḥmad Ibn Khalf Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-'Ijlī, surnamed Muntakhib al-Dīn (selected for religion), was a native of Ispahān and a follower of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. This preacher and eminent jurisconsult was in high reputation for his learning, self-denial, piety, devotion, and frugality; eating of nothing but what he had gained by the labour of his hands and supporting himself by copying and selling (books). He learned the Traditions in his native city from Umm Ibrāhīm Fātimah al-Juzdānīyah,<sup>1</sup> daughter of 'Abd Allāh, the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl, Abu 'l-Wafā Ghānim Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Jalādī, Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Abd al-Rahīm Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Baghḍādī, Abu 'l-Muṭahhir al-Qāsim Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn 'Abd al-Wahīd al-Ṣaydalānī, and others. He then went to Baghdād in the year 557 (A.D. 1162), and learned also Traditions from Abu 'l-Faḥḥ Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī, surnamed Ibn al-Baṭṭī, and others; he received also certificates from Zāhir al-Shahāmī<sup>1</sup>* Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ismā'īl Ibn al-Faḍl al-Ikhshīdī,<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Mubārak 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Muḥammad al-Azdī, and others, authorizing him to teach in their name the Traditions which he had learned from them. He then returned to his native city, and, after studying deeply, he acquired surpassing information and attained celebrity. A number of works were composed by him, among others, an explanation of the obscurities met with in the Wasiṭ and Wajiz of (Abū Ḥamid) al-Ghazzālī, containing, besides, extracts from the books in which the doctrines stated in these two works are more fully stated. He wrote also a supplement to the supplement<sup>3</sup> composed by Abu Sa'd al-Mutawallī. His legal decisions as a muftī were considered of the first authority at Ispahān. He was born in that city in one of the months of Rabī', A. H. 514 or 515 (A. D. 1121); he died in the same city on Wednesday† night, 22 Safar, A. H. 600 (October, A. D. 1203§). 'Ijlī means belonging to 'Ijl Ibn Lujayn, a famous branch of the tribe of Rabī'at al-Faras. ††['Ijl was son of Lujaym Ibn Sa'b Ibn 'Alī Ibn Wā'il. Abu 'Ubaydah' says that this 'Ijl was counted by the Arabs among their celebrated idiots; he had an excellent horse, and someone said to him: "Every courser has a name; what is the name of yours?" "I have not named him yet" replied 'Ijl. "You should give him a name,"

---

<sup>1</sup> Juzdān according to the author of the Marāṣid, is a large village near Ispahān; the people of that city call it Luzadān.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl, one of the first traditionists of his time, was born at Ispahān, A. H. 457 (A. D. 1065); died A. H. 535 (A. D. 1141). He composed, among other works, a commentary on the Qur'ān, and an explanation of the Traditions of Bukhārī and those of Muslim. The people of Baghdād said of him that since the time of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, he was the most talented man and the most learned traditionist that ever entered their city.—His life (in Arabic) is given in Meursinge's Soyūti Liber de Interpretibus Korani, Lugd. Bat. 1849.

1 According to Ibn al-Aṭḥir, in his Kāmil, Zāhir al-Shahāmī was born A. H. 446 (A. D. 1054), and died 533 (A. D. 1138-9).

2 Ikhshīdī, I believe to be the true reading, not Ikhshīd, as is printed in the Arabic text. It is singular that not one of the above-named traditionists should be noticed in the Tabaqāt al-Muḥaddithīn; but Ibn Khallikān here supplies the most requisite information respecting them, namely, the time and the place in which they lived.

3 Tatimmat al-Tatimmat (Completion of the Completion) see Flugels, Hājji Khulifāh, ABANAT, No. 3.

4 The life of the celebrated grammarian and philologist, Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar Ibn al-Muḥannā, is given by Ibn Khallikān.

*Abu 'l-Qāsim Zāhir Ibn Tāhir al-Shahāmī according to the autograph and new Egyptian edition.—Ed.

†This word is not in the autograph. The full sentence from وله إجازة to وغيرهم is omitted.—Ed.

‡According to the autograph and new Egyptian edition it should be Thursday.—Ed.

§30 October.—Ed.

††[ ] From "Ijl was son" to end is not in the autograph.—Ed.

observed the other; on which 'Ijl put out one of his horse's eyes, and said: "I name him al-A'war",<sup>1</sup> on this a poet of the Desert composed the following verses:

"The sons of 'Ijl reproached me with a defect which is, however, the very defect of their father. Does there exist among men a person more foolish than 'Ijl? Did not their father put out the eye of his courser, and become thus proverbial for his stupidity?"]

88. AL-AS'AD IBN MAMMĀTĪ

Al-Qāḍi 'l-As'ad (the most fortunate qāḍi) Abu 'l-Makārim As'ad Ibn al-Khaṭīr Abī Sa'īd Muḥadhdhib Ibn Mīnā Ibn Zakariyā Ibn Abī Malīḥ Mammātī al-Miṣrī (native of Egypt): this poet, who was also a kātib<sup>2</sup> and inspector of the government offices in Egypt, was a man of merit and author of a number of works. He versified the History of the ṣultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn and the book called Kalilah and Dimnah. His poetical compositions have been collected and form a diwān, a copy of which I have seen in the handwriting of his son, and from which I extracted a number of pieces; the following, among other:

"You reproach me (my friendly monitor!) and you tell me to avoid the very objects which people caution you to fly; do you know that these objects are as (dear to me as) my eyes? Nay, I assure you, my eyes have been more fatal to me than they."<sup>3</sup>

1 Al-A'war (blind of an eye); among the Arabs, surnames such as this, derived from a corporeal defect, are still common.

2 See note on *kētib*s, No. 10.

3 Such I suppose to be the meaning of these very obscure verses; the objects which he is cautioned to avoid are the cruel beauties who inflame his heart with love; and yet, says he, my eyes, in contemplating their charms, have been more fatal to me than their cruelty.

He composed the following verses on a heavy fellow whom he saw at Damascus:

"He is like two rivers which none on earth ever resembled; in body he is like Ṭhawrā, and in mind like Baradā."<sup>1</sup>

Ibn Mammātī has taken the idea expressed in the foregoing verses from these lines composed by another poet.

"Ibn Bishrān resembles the city of Jilliq<sup>2</sup>; when their qualities are set forth, both are without a rival. His words are (foul like) Baradā, his body (slow like) Ṭhawrā, and his feeble intelligence (languid like) Yazīd."<sup>3</sup>

In one of Ibn Mammātī's long qasīdahs are found the following verses:

"How brightly his fires burn at night to attract the tardy guest! He who draweth to the light of his fire will not have reason to complain, provided he never received hospitality from the family of Muḥallab."<sup>4</sup>

By the same, on a young grammarian:

"The gait of the slender youth raises my admiration announces the elegance of his mind. His pronunciation is soft as a female's and his eyes are full of languor."<sup>5</sup>

1 See note 3 infra.

2 The Marāṣid says: "Jilliq, with a double L and two i's, is a name given to the Ghāḥ (or valley of Damascus), or else to a village therein; some say it is Damascus itself, and others that it is a statue of a female spouting water from its mouth in one of the villages near Damascus."

3 Or else: The feebleness of his intellect is on the increase.—In translating these verses I have supposed that Baradā, Ṭhawrā, and Yazīd (three of the streams by which Damascus is watered), possessed certain qualities to which allusion is made. It may be, however, that the poet only meant to put upon the words, as Barīl signifies cold; Ṭhawr, a bull; and Yazīd, increases.

4 See No. 48, note on Qur'ān, surat 27, verse 7.

5 All the members of the Muḥallab family were celebrated for their generosity and hospitality.

6 Such is the real meaning of these verses; but persons conversant with Arabic grammar will perceive that the author has expressed his thoughts in words which the grammarians employ as technical terms. They are all to be found in M. De Sacy's Grammaire Arabe.

Three other verses of his will be found in the life of Yahya Ibn Nizar al-Manbijī: there are some good thoughts in his poetry. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn makes mention of him in the Kharidah and quotes a number of passages composed by him: he then gives the life of al-Khaṭīr, Ibn Mammātī's father, with abundant extracts from his poems: the following excellent lines, among others, on keeping a secret:

"I conceal the secret with which I am entrusted, and do not repeat it even to him who confided it to me; but yet I forget it not. For my ear never teaches my tongue the secret of him who has conversed with me in private."

"I met him at Cario," says the kātib; "he was chief of al-Malik al-Nāṣir's army-office; he and his people<sup>1</sup> had been Christians, but they embraced Islamism towards the beginning of Ṣalāh al-Dīn's reign." Muḥaddhib al-Dīn Ibn al-Lakḥmī composed the following satirical verses on Ibn al-Mammātī:

"The new converted Muslim is but a weak proselyte; his smiles betray his fell intent. Had (the grammarian) Sībawayh seen some of his verses, he would have counted him among the signs of the feminine gender."<sup>2</sup>

When the ḥafīẓ Ibn Dihyāh Dhu 'l-Nisbayn<sup>3</sup> arrived at Arbela, and saw how sedulously the sultan of that city, Muẓaffar al-Dīn, was occupied in celebrating, with great pomp, the anniversary of the Prophet's birth as shall be related in his life under the letter K<sup>4</sup>; he composed a work entitled al-Tanwīr, etc. (illumination, in praise of the bright Flambeau), and finishing with a long qaṣidah in praise of Muẓaffar al-Dīn, which commenced thus:

1 Or: His hand.

2 This is perhaps intended as an attack on Ibn Mammātī's moral character: but the verses themselves are so full of quibbling, that it is not easy to guess the author's real meaning. The first hemistich signifies literally: a new (or a tradition) of Islam is a new (or a tradition) weak (in authority).

3 His life will be found among the ʿUmars.

4 The real name of Muẓaffar al-Dīn was Kakubari.

"Were it not for our enemies, those base informer (our friends) would never have suspected us (of ill)."

This book and poem were read to the prince, and I myself (afterwards) heard the work read in his presence in the month of Sha'abān, A. H. 626 (A. D. 1229) and (I remarked that) the qaṣīdah was in it; some time after, however, I found this very poem in a collection of pieces, and there attributed to Ibn Mammātī, on which I said to myself that the editor was probably mistaken. Then, still later, I saw the entire poem in the Divān of Ibn Mammātī's poetical works, and found there stated that it had been composed by him in honour of the ṣulṭān al-Malik al-Kāmil. This confirmed my suspicions, and I then met with the following passage in Ibn al Mustawfī's History of Arbela, where he speaks of Ibn Dīḥyah; "I asked him the meaning which he wished to convey by the following verse (of his poem):"

"We should give our lives for a present offered by one whose hand is Jumādā and Muḥarram."

"As he gave me no reply,<sup>1</sup> I said: 'It is perhaps like the idea which a poet has thus expressed':"

"He is called by the names of the months; thus his hand is Jumādā and its contents Muḥarram."<sup>2</sup>

"On this, Ibn Dīḥyah smiled and said: 'That is what I meant.'" On reading this passage, I became strongly inclined to think that al-As'ad was the author of the poem; for if Ibn Dīḥyah had composed it, he would not have hesitated in returning an answer (to Ibn al-Mustawfī's question); it must, however, be observed that this qaṣīdah was recited (for the first time) to the prince of Arbela, A. H. 606, and that al-As'ad died in that year;

1 It is some consolation to a European student, to find Arabic poets unable to understand verses in their own language.

2 Muḥarram, that is, sacred, none being allowed to touch them. Jumādā means dry month, which name was given to it when the Arabs used the solar year. It is well known that in the metaphorical language of the Arabs, a moist hand means generosity, and of course a dry one must denote avarice.

and moreover, he was then dwelling at Aleppo, and had no connexion whatever with the 'Ādilite dynasty.<sup>1</sup> So, on the whole, God alone knows with certainty which of the two is the real author. Al-As'ad had fled from Egypt secretly through fear of the vizīr* Ibn Shukr,<sup>2</sup> and retired to Aleppo, where he took refuge under the protection of the Sulṭān al-Malik al-Zāhir; he remained in that city till he died, on Sunday the 30 of the First Jumādā, A. H. 606 (November, A. D. 1209†), aged 62 years. He was interred in the cemetery named al-Maqām,<sup>3</sup> by the road side, near the mausoleum of the Shaykh 'Alī al-Harawī.<sup>4</sup> His father al-Khaṭīr died on Wednesday, 6 Ramaḍān, 577 (A. D. 1182‡). His ancestor, Abn Malīḥ, who was a Christian, received the surname of Mammālī from the following circumstance: during a great dearth which happened in Egypt, he distributed alms and provisions in abundance, and especially to the Muslim children; and they, on seeing him, used to cry out Mammālī,<sup>5</sup> so that he came to be known by this appellation. Such is the explanation which I received from 'Abd al-Azīm al-Mundḥarī,<sup>6</sup> (May God preserve him for our advantage !) who then recited to me the following elegiac verses on Abn Malīḥ's death with the remark that they

1 Al-Malik al-Kāmil was son to al-Malik al-'Ādil, the Ayyabite, brother of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn.

2 Ṣafī al-Dīn Ibn Shuqr al-Dammirī الاميرى acted as vizīr to al-Malik al-'Ādil till A. H. 609; he was again appointed vizīr by al-Malik al-Kāmil. (Al-Suyūṭī's Isṣn al-Muḥaṣṣarah, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 652, folio 225, verso).

3 This cemetery lies probably outside the Damascus gate, called by the natives Bab al-Maqām.

4 Ibn Khallikān gives an account of this mausoleum in the life of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Harawī.

5 Mammālī was probably the children's word for mother.

6 'Abd al-'Azīm was one of Ibn Khallikān's professors. See his life, No. 43, note on Abd al-'Azīm.

*Ṣafī al-Dīn the name of the vizīr is omitted.—Ed.

†29 November.—Ed.

‡13 January.—Ed.

were composed, as he believed by Ibn Miknasah al-Maghribī<sup>1</sup>:

"The sky of generous actions and the sun of praise have both disappeared. Where shall my hopes and expectations be placed, after the death of Abu 'l-Maliḥ?"

I then looked out for these verses, and found that they were really his, and that other elegies by the same poet on Ibn Maliḥ were still extant.<sup>2</sup>

89. BAḤĀ AL-DĪN AS-SINJĀRĪ

Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt As'ad Ibn Yahyā Ibn Mūsā Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Wahb Ibn Habbān Ibn Sawār Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Rafī' Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn Habbān al-Sulamī al-Sinjārī (of the tribe of Sulaym and native of Sinjār), surnamed Bahā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), was a poet and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. As a jurisconsult, he had treated controverted points: but poetry was his ruling passion, and he was indebted for his celebrity to the ability which he displayed in that art. He devoted his poetical talent to his service of princes and obtained recompenses from them; he (therefore) travelled over many countries for purpose of celebrating the praises of the great. His poetical productions, both qasīdahs and short pieces, are in the hands of the public; but I have never met with a complete collection of his works, nor do I know if his poems have been gathered into a diwān or not. Since (writing the above), I have found a large volume containing his complete works in the library at the mausoleum of al-Malik al-Ashraf<sup>1</sup> in Damascus, and I extracted from it the following verses of a long qaṣīdah in praise of the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-Ṣhahrazarī<sup>2</sup>:

<sup>1</sup> Al-Qa'id Abū Ṭahir Isma'īl Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed Ibn Miknasah, bore in Egypt the reputation of an eminent poet. 'Imād al-Dīn has inserted in his Kharidah (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1374, fol. 186 et seq.) a number of pieces composed by Ibn Miknasah but does not furnish much information respecting the author. It only appears that his attachment to Abū Maliḥ, and the elegies which he composed on his death, subjected him to the displeasure of the vizir of Egypt, Badr al-Jamālī.—Now this vizir was nominated A. H. 467: consequently Ibn Miknasah must have lived till some time later.

<sup>2</sup> They are not to be found in the Kharidah (see the preceding note); and this was probably the work which Ibn Khallikān consulted.

‘I swear by the love I bear thee that indifference has never entered the heart of thy lover, and well thou knowest the state of lover in which he is. If a delator tell thee that thy lover has forgot thee, know that this delator is the very person who blamed him for loving thee. The state of thy afflicted lover does it not bear witness for itself? Does it not suffice to dispense with thy asking how he feels? Thou hast renewed the garment of his malady; thou hast rent the veil which concealed his passion, and thou hast broken the tie which bound thee to him. Has a fault escaped him by inadvertence? or (hast thou rejected him for) the levity and presumption<sup>3</sup> to which thou hadst accustomed him? It is strange that a prisoner should lay down life and fortune for one who is free (from love). I should give my parents in ransom for that archer who shoots with his eyes, and the point of whose arrows no armour can withstand! He is filled with the sap of youth; his cheeks are saturated from the same pure source. (Admiring) eyes embark in (the contemplation of) his charms, and risk being drowned in the ocean of his beauty. Nothing is wanting to his perfection, and that extreme perfection screens Kamāl al-Dīn from the evil eye.<sup>4</sup> The ‘idhār traces the letter nun (ن)

1 Al-Malik al-Ashraf died at Damascus, A. H. 635. His life will be found in this work.

2 It was at first my intention to modify the ideas contained in the singular extract which follows, but on further consideration, I preferred given the real sense of the verse, and referring the reader to what I have said on the subject in my Introduction.

3 Presumption, دلال : This, although the ordinary signification of the word, is not given in the lexicons.—See the Diwān d. ‘Amro ‘l-qais, p. 11, note.

4 عين الكمال ; Oculus ejusdam Arabis Kemal dicti, qui homines aspectu necabat. (Meninski’s Lex.) This expression is generally employed to denote the influence of the evil eye, which affects more particularly those favoured by fortune or beauty,—The verse itself is a specimen of the taste for quibbling which has pervaded Arabic poetry from the third century of the Hijrah.

upon his face, and the mole on his cheek forms the diacritical point. The darkness of his tresses is like (gloomy) night of his aversion; and the brightness of his forehead resembles the (clear) day of his friendship."

Were it not my desire to avoid prolixity, I should give the entire poem, but what is here inserted is the portion more generally remarked. Two verses more are sometimes joined to the preceding, but I have omitted them from my inability to establish their authenticity. *[The following extract is taken from one of his qaṣīdahs:

"And that nymph with the slender waist, so sweet in character and whose glances are so tempting; who sometimes consents, sometimes refuses! Wine mantles on her lips,<sup>1</sup> and is transuded by her (rosy) cheeks. Her charms have closed on lovers the path of consolation; for them to consolation there is no approach."

From another qaṣīdah by the same:

"The zephyrs awoke at dawn and perfumes<sup>2</sup> spread around them; and I said: 'when they passed through the valley of G̃haḍā: 'Whose sweet breath is that?'"

When I was at my native place in the year 623 (A. D. 1226), we were visited by Jamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Muẓaffar 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad, a native of Wāsiṭ, and generally known by the name of Ibn al-Sunaynirah; he took up his abode at the Muẓaffariyah college<sup>3</sup> with us. This shaykh, who was one of the first poets of the age, had travelled over many countries, reciting to princes his eulogistic poems, and receiving from them gifts of great value. When he received company<sup>4</sup> he was visited by all those who were occupied in literary pursuits, and an agreeable conversation and discussion took place. He was then advanced

1 See not on honeyed lips, No. 6.

2 Perfumes; literally, grey ambergirs.

3 This college was founded by the prince of Arbela, Muẓaffar al-Dīn Kākubārī. His life is given in this work.

4 In Arabic qāḍ means to sit, to hold a sitting, and to receive company.

* [ ] From "The following" to "are wonderful" on page 298 is not in the autograph.—Ed.

in years, and he related one day the following anecdote: "I once had Bahā al-Dīn al-Sinjārī for companion in a journey which I made from Sinjār to Rās 'Ayn," (or else "from Rās 'Ayn to Sinjār,") and we halted at a spot on the way; Bahā al-Dīn had with him a boy named Ibrāhīm, whom he treated with affection, and who then happened to be at a distance from us; so his master rose up to look for him, and called out repeatedly, 'Ibrāhīm! Ibrāhīm!' but the boy was too far off to hear him. Now there was an echo in that place, and as often as he shouted out 'Ibrāhīm,' it answered by repeating the word; on which he sat down for a moment and then recited to me these verses:

"My life for a friend who is cruel, although attached to me! who is far from my sight, though near (to my heart)! The very rock which forms the echo of the valley answers when I call him, but he answers not (although my friend)."

Bahā al-Dīn al-Sinjārī had an acquaintance to whom he was greatly attached, and whom he met frequently; but a dispute having one day occurred between them, his friend discontinued seeing him. On this Bahā al-Dīn sent to complain of his absence, and the other wrote him in reply the two following lines of al-Harīrī's, which he has inserted in his fifteenth Maqāmah:<sup>1</sup>

"Visit him whom you love but once each month, not oftener. It is only for one day in the month that the moon is looked at,<sup>2</sup> and then eyes are no more turned towards her."

To this Bahā al-Dīn answered by these verses in the same measure as the foregoing:

"When thou art sure of thy friend's affection, visit him and fear not to be tiresome. Act as the sun which appears daily; not as the new moon which visits us only once each month."

The following verses of his are frequently quoted:

<sup>1</sup> See M. de Sacy's edition of al-Harīrī, page 154.

<sup>2</sup> This happens at the beginning of Ramaḍān,* as the Muslim fast commences when the new moon of that month makes its appearance.

*The sighting of crescent marks the beginning of each month, and if any particular crescent is in mind it must be Shawwāl's.—Ed.

"How happy the days I spent at Rāmah! how sweet the hours I passed at Ḥājir.<sup>1</sup> They fled so quickly, that the first moments seemed to touch the last."

In one of his qaṣīdahs, containing the description of wine, is found the following pretty thought:

"We nearly flew with gaiety, and the wine also had flown, were it not detained by the net which the bubbles formed on its surface."

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn makes mention of him in the kitāb al-Sayl 'wa l-Dhayl, and says, "He recited me these verses of his own:

" 'Tis wonderful that I should sail on the ocean of wealth, and yet die of thirst; but the ways of the ocean are wonderful." ]

He composed many fine pieces. His birth was in the year 533 (A. D. 1138-9); his death occurred at Sinjār about the beginning of the year 622 (A. D. 1225).

90. AL-MUZANĪ

Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'īl Ibn Yahyā Ibn Ismā'īl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Muslim* al-Muzanī, disciple of the imām al-Shāfi'ī and a native of Egypt, was a man of austere life and great learning, a mujtahid,<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Rāmah is situated, according to the Marāṣid, on the road from Makkah to Baṣrah, and Ḥājir is a village in Hijaz (see Ibn Khallikan, Arabic text, page 557); these two spots have been celebrated by some of the Arabian poets. Bahā al-Dīn, in choosing these names, wished to show that he made good classical studies.

<sup>2</sup> The term mujtahid is employed in Muslim divinity to denote a doctor who exerts all his capacity for the purpose of forming a right opinion upon a legal question. This title was very frequent in the first ages of Islamism, but the principal points of law having been fixed by the doctors, and more particularly by the founders of the four orthodox sects, the exercise of private judgment in legal questions ceased soon after to be recognized. Some later doctors, al-Syūṭī for instance, claimed the title and the right, but both were refused to them by public opinion.—For further information, see M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. I, p. 169, and the works there mentioned.

*M. de Slane gives Ishāq; a name which is struck off in the autograph.

Ed.

an able reasoner, and a profound thinker.<sup>1</sup> He was the imām of the Shafites, and the first among them by his acquaintance with the legal system and juridical decisions of their founder, and by his knowledge of the Traditions, which he transmitted on the authority of his master. He composed a great number of works, among others, a great and a small collection (al-Jāmi') of Traditions, the Abridgment abridged,<sup>2</sup> al-Manṭḥūr, or loose notes, al-Rasā'il al-Mu'tabarāh (the esteemed Treatises), the Incitation to Learning, and the Kitāb al-Waḥ'id.<sup>3</sup> Al-Shāfi'ī said, in speaking of al-Muzanī, "He is the champion of my doctrine. As often as al-Muzanī decided a question and inserted the result in his Abridgment,<sup>4</sup> he would rise, and turning towards the Mihrāb<sup>5</sup> say a prayer composed of two rak'ahs<sup>6</sup> in thanksgiving to Divinity. It was said by Ibn Surayj that the Abridgment would go out of the world unblemished.<sup>7</sup> This work is the basis of all the treatises composed on al-Shāfi'ī's system of legal doctrine, the authors either imitating its arrangement, or explaining and developing its text. When Bakkār Ibn Qutaybah, the Hanafite doctor (whose life shall be given later) went from Baghdād to Egypt, where he had been appointed qāḍī he hoped to meet al-Muzanī and continued for some time in fruitless expectations; one day, however, they were both present at a funeral service, and Bakkār said to one of his disciples: "Ask al-Muzanī some question, that I may hear him speak." This person said in consequence to al-Muzanī: "O, Abn Ibrāhīm! some of the Traditions contain a prohibition of 1 Literally: A diver for subtle ideas.

2 This is one of the most celebrated treatises on the legal doctrines of the Shafite sect: Hajji Khalifah says that al-Muzanī was the first who wrote on the subject, in which case it is difficult to explain the title of his work.

3 This is perhaps a treatise on bonds.

4 In the Arabic text, for مختصرة read مختصره.

5 See No. 16. note on mihrāb.

6 The word rak'ah is written incorrectly rika by European authors, designates a certain number of prostrations and prayers; the ṣalat, or legal prayer, is composed of two, four, six, or more rak'ahs.* See D' Ohsson's Empire Othom. t. II, p. 82; Hamilton's Hedayah, preliminary discourse, p. 53.

7 Literally: An unblemished virgin.

* The five daily obligatory (farḥ) prayers are composed of two, four, four, three and four rak'ahs.—Ed.

the liquor (nabidh),<sup>1</sup> and others permit its use; why therefore have you (doctors) preferred the prohibition to the permission?" To this al-Muzanī replied: "None of the learned have ever maintained that nabidh was forbidden before the promulgation of Islamism, and authorised after; and the unanimous opinion is, that it was lawful (in the former time); this therefore confirms the authenticity of the Tradition which forbids its use."<sup>2</sup> Ibn Bakkār approved his reasoning, and it is, certainly, a decisive argument, Al-Muzanī was extremely careful in avoiding the least infringement of the law, and his precaution went so far that, in every season of the year, he drank out of a brass vessel,<sup>3</sup> and he replied when spoken to on the subject: "I am told that they make use of dung in the fabrication of pitchers, and fire does not purify it."<sup>4</sup> It is related that when he missed being present at public service in the mosque, he repeated his prayers alone twenty-five times, in order to regain the merits attached to those which are said with the congregation: in this, he founded his opinion on the authority of the following declaration made by Muḥammad: "Prayers made with the congregation are five and twenty times better than prayers said by one of you when alone."<sup>5</sup> * [He lived in the practice of severe and rigid self-mortification (his

---

1 Nabidh, a sweet and slightly fermented liquor made with dates or raisins.—See the authorities cited by M. de Sacy in his Chrestomathie, tom. 1, p. 403; and Mishkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, vol. 2, p. 339.

2 The point of al-Muzanī's argument is this: it is unanimously allowed that nabidh was lawful before Islamism, so an order of Muḥammad to authorise its use would have been unnecessary and unmotivated; the tradition which contains such an order is therefore to be rejected, more especially as it is in contradiction with another to which a similar objection cannot be made.

3 Water contained in a brass vessel does not cool in summer, for which reason they prefer putting it into a porous earthen decanter, in which it speedily acquires a lower temperature by evaporation.

4 In the Muslim law, there is a section which treats specially of purification. See D'Ossons Emp. Othom., tom. 1, and Hamilton's Hedāyah, preliminary discourse, p. 53.

5 See Matthew's Mishkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, vol. I, p. 224, where the meaning of this tradition is, however, totally misunderstood.

* [ ] From "He lived" to "God's creation" on next page, not in the autograph.—Ed.

sanctity was so great that) he obtained the fulfilment of his prayers, and not one of al-Shāfi'i's disciples ever hoped to surpass him in any point. It was he who washed the corpse of al-Shāfi'i (previous to its internment); some say, however, that he was aided in that office by al-Rabī' (al-Murādī). Ibn Yānus makes mention of him in his History (of Egypt), and gives his names in full, but his ancestor Iṣḥāq is there called Muslim; he then says, "the disciple of al-Shāfi'i" and mentions the date of his death, which accords with what is stated above<sup>1</sup>; he says also: "He had the talent of explaining the Traditions; and he<sup>2</sup> was eminently trustworthy in their transmission, as the most acute doctors unanimously allow; he led an austere life, and was one of the best of God's creation:] his merits were abundant." He died at Miṣr on the 24 Ramaḍān, 264 (A. D. 887*), and was buried near the mausoleum of the imām al-Shāfi'i, in the Lesser Qarāfah<sup>2</sup> at the foot of Mount Muqaṭṭam, where I visited his tomb. Ibn Zulaq says, in his Lesser History, that he was aged 89 years, and that funeral prayers were said over him by al-Rabī' al-Murādī.—Muzani means belonging to Muzaynah, a great and well-known tribe, which was so named after Muzaynah, daughter of Kalb.

(For further reference, see Ansāb, f. 527 a.—Ed.)

91. ABU 'L-'ATĀHIYAH

Abū Iṣḥāq Ismā'il Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Suwayd Ibn Kaysān al-'Aynī, member by adoption of the tribe of 'Anazah, and surnamed Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah, a celebrated poet, was born at 'Ayn al-Tamr, a village situated in the province of Hijāz, near Madīnah, or, according to some, in the regions which are irrigated by the Euphrates; Yāqut al-Ḥamawī says, however, in his Muṣhtarik, that it lies near Anbār; but God knows best. He was brought up <sup>1</sup> It may easily be perceived that this passage has been added in the margin later, and afterwards inserted in the wrong place; it should have been placed lower down.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 24, note on Qarāfah.

* 30 May.—Ed.

at Kafah, and then settled at Baghdād; the surname of al-Jarrār was given to him because he sold earthen jars.<sup>1</sup> His passion for 'Utbah, a slave belonging to the khalif al-Mahdī, is well known, and it was to celebrate her charms that he composed the greater part of his amatory pieces, such as the following :

"I informed 'Utbah that for her sake I was on the brink of perdition: bathed in tears, I complained of the woes I underwent (from affection) towards her. Fatigued at length by my lamentations, doleful as those of a wretch reduced to penury, she said: 'Is any one aware of what you tell me?' And I answered: 'Every person knows it'."<sup>2</sup>

He wrote also to al-Mahdī these lines, in which he intimated his wish to obtain her from him:

"There is one thing on earth to which my soul is attached, and the fulfilment of my wishes depends upon God, and al-Mahdī the maintainer (of his order). I despair of success, and then your contempt for the world and worldly goods revives my hopes."

It is related by al-Mubarrad, in his Kāmil, that Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah, having obtained permission to offer a present to the khalif on the festivals of the new year and the autumnal equinox, brought him, on one of these anniversaries, an ample porcelain vase containing a perfumed garment of delicate texture, on the border of which he had inscribed the verses just given. On this, the khalif had some intention of bestowing 'Utbah upon him, but she recoiled with dislike, and exclaimed: "Commander of the Faithful! treat me as becomes a female and a member of your household.<sup>3</sup> Will you give me up to a nasty man who sells jars and gains his livelihood by verses?" By this appeal, the khalif was 1 Earthen jars, in Arabic jirār, sing. jarrīh; the French jarre is manifestly derived from the same source.

2 The poet thus confesses his indiscretion in divulging the name of his mistress.

3 Or more literally: Respect my rights as a member of your harem and a person in your service. In this phrase, the word ارع, imperative of the verb ورعى to have consideration for, to respect, is understood.

induced to spare her such an affliction, and he ordered the vase to be filled with money and given to the poet. Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah then said to the accountants charged to pay him: "It was gold pieces which he ordered me;" but they replied: "So much we shall not give you; but if you choose, you may have it filled with silver pieces." They then waited till he declared his choice, and he balanced (between the two conditions) during a year (before coming to a decision). 'Utbah, on learning this, said: "Were he in love, as he pretends, he would not have spent his time in balancing the difference between pieces of gold and pieces of silver; he has totally ceased to think of me."—The following is one of his eulogistic passages:

*["O, emīr ! I am sheltered from the vicissitudes of Fortune, when moored under thy protection.<sup>1</sup> Were it possible for men to pay thee fitting honour, they had given the tender skin of their cheeks to make thee sandals.] Our camels complain of thy cruelty: they cross desert wastes and sands to reach thee; and when they bear us to thee, they are lightly laden:—but when they depart with us, their burden is heavy."<sup>2</sup>

†[These verses were addressed by him to 'Umar Ibn al-'Alā,<sup>3</sup> who rewarded him with 70,000 (dirhims), and clothed him with so many robes of honour, that he was unable to rise. This liberality having excited the jealousy of the other poets, 'Umar assembled them and said: "It is strange that you poets should be so jealous of each other. When one of you comes to us with a qaṣīdah composed in our praise; he employs fifty verses to celebrate the charms of his mistress, and he does not begin to mention us till the sweetness of his praises is exhausted, and the brilliancy of his verses faded: but Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah celebrates his beloved

<sup>1</sup> Literally: When I have attached cords to the emīr.

<sup>2</sup> By the presents you have made us.

<sup>3</sup> 'Umar Ibn al-'Alā was governor of Ṭāberistan in A. H. 167 (A. D. 783-4).—(Ibn al-Aṭḥir.)

*[ ] From "O Emīr!" to "thee sandals" not in the autograph.—Ed.

†[ ] From: "These verses" to "with a recompense" on page 305. not in the autograph.—Ed.

in a few verses and then says: O, emīr! I am sheltered from the vicissitudes of Fortune."—('Umar here repeated the lines which have been just given.)—"Why, then, are you jealous?"—This emīr having waited for a short time before giving to Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah mark of his generosity in recompense for this eulogium, the poet wrote to him these lines complaining of the delay:

"An evil eye has disappointed our hopes, O 'Umar! by shedding its influence on thy generosity; and we require amulets and charms to annul its effects. We shall exorcise thee with verses till they weary out (and expel) thy illness; and if thou dost not recover, we shall exorcise thee with surats (of the Qur'ān).<sup>1</sup>

The celebrated poet Ashja' al-Sulamī<sup>2</sup> relates the following anecdote: "The khalif al-Mahdī having given permission to the public to enter into his presence, we went in, and he told us to sit down, and it happened that Bashshār Ibn Burd sat down beside me. The khalif then kept silence, and the public also kept silence. Then Bashshār heard the sound of a voice, and he said to me: 'Who is that?' I replied: 'Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah.' 'Do you think,' said he, 'he will dare to recite in this assembly?' 'I think he will,' said I. Then al-Mahdī ordered him to recite, and he commenced thus:

'What is the matter with my mistress? what is the matter? she is haughty, and I support her disdain.'

"Here Bashshār pushed me with his elbow and said: 'Did you ever see a more audacious fellow, to dare to pronounce such a verse in such a place?' The poet then came to these lines:

---

<sup>1</sup> See Lane's Modern Egyptians.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Walid Ashja' Ibn 'Amr al-Sulamī was born at Raqqah الرقة in Mesopotamia. Having terminated his studies in belles-letters, he went to Baḡhdād and gained admittance into the society of the Barmakides, one of whom, Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā, favoured him with his peculiar patronage and introduced him to Hārūn al-Rashīd. The year of his death is not given in the Khaṭīb's abridged History of Baḡhdād, from which the above particulars are taken. (See MS. No. 634, fol. 74) Some verses of Ashja''s are to be found in the Ḥamāsah, and his life, with copious extracts from his poetry, given in the Buṭūḥ al-Talab; MS. No. 726, fol. 143.

"The khalifah advanced to him in pomp<sup>1</sup> and submitted to his will. It alone was fitted for him, and he alone for it. If any other aspired after it, the earth had shook (with horror). If our inmost thoughts disobey him, our good deeds will not be accepted by God."<sup>2</sup>

"Here Bashshār said: 'Look, Ashja'! and see if the khalif do not spring (with delight) from his cushion?' The fact was that Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah was the only man who retired from the assembly with a recompense." ] Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah composed many verses on ascetic subjects; he was one of the principal among those poets who flourished in the first ages of islamism,<sup>3</sup> and he ranked in the same class with Bashshār, Abn Nuwās, and that party. He composed a great deal of poetry; he was born A. H. 130 (A. D. 747-8), and died at Baghdād on Monday, 3 or 8 of the latter Jumādā, 211 (September, A. D. 826*), or 213 according to some. His tomb is on the bank of the river 'Īsā,<sup>4</sup> opposite the bridge of the Oilmen (Qanṣarat al-Zayyātin). When on the point of death, he expressed the desire that Mukhāriq<sup>5</sup> the singer should come and sing, close by him, the following verses, which belong to a poem composed by himself:

"When the term of my existence expires, the grief of the females who mourn me will be short. My friend will cease to think of me; he will forget my love, and find a new friend after losing me."

1 Or more literally: Sweeping the ground with its train.

2 Allusion to the maxim, that the act is to be judged after the intention.

3 Arabian critics divide poets into several classes: the Jāhālī was one who lived before the promulgation of Islamism; the Mukhaṣṣam (مختصم) lived both before and after that epoch, and the Muwallad (مولد) came next in order, his birth having taken place after Muḥammad had announced his mission.

4 The river or canal of 'Īsā branched off the Euphrates, and flowed into the Tigris at Baghdād.

5 This Mukhāriq, whose name has been already given, but incorrectly, in the life of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī (see No. 8), was one of the first singers of his time. He once sung in the presence of the khalif al-Rashīd, who was so delighted that he caused the curtains usually placed between himself and the musicians to be removed, and ordered him to draw near and sit on the throne by his side. Mukhāriq was afterwards attached to the service of al-Māmūn and accompanied him to Damascus. He died A. H. 230 (A. D. 844-5) at Sarra-man-ra'a. He was surnamed Abu 'l-Hinā الحنا. — (Abu 'l-Mahāsīn's Nujūm al-Zāhirah MS. No. 659, fol. 191.)

*On 3 Jumādā 211, corresponding to 10 September, 826, it was Monday, and on 8/15 it was Saturday and in 213 on 3 Jumādā/19 August it was Wednesday and on 8 it was Monday, 24 August, 828.—Ed.

By his last will, he ordered this verse to be inscribed on his tomb:

"Life which ends in death is a life soon embittered."

It is related that he once met Abū Nuwās, and asked him how many verses he composed in a day, to which the other answered. One or two. "But I," said Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah, "can make one or two hundred in a day". "Yes," replied Abū Nuwās, "because you make verses such as this:

"O, 'Utbaḥ! What is the matter with thee and me? O, that I had never seen thee!"

"Now if I chose, I could make one or two thousand such. But I compose verses like this:

*'A manu mulieris in vestimento hominis, cui duo sunt amotores, paedico et scortator*.*<sup>1</sup>

"If you tried to make a verse such as that time would fail you."—The following verses of his are elegantly expressed:

"I loved thee, and my passion was so excessive, that my companions, when they approached, smelled off my clothes the fire which consumed me."

‡[Among the verses which he composed on 'Utbaḥ, the slave of al-Mahdī, are the following:

"Brothers ! love is causing my death: announce to the tomb<sup>2</sup> the approach of a hastening traveller. Blame me not for submitting to love; know that my occupation is most serious."<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> He probably cites this abominable verse on account of its extreme energy, which is here purposely softened, even in the Latin translation. Its import I judge to be satirical.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: To the shrouds.

<sup>3</sup> That is: I am preparing for death, which is rendered inevitable by the cruelty of my mistress.

*Its English version:

In male attire she is intimate with sodomite and adulterer.—Ed.

‡[ ] From "Among the verses" to 'Fortune had long continued" on page 311, not in the autograph.—Ed.

This piece also was written by him on 'Utbah:

"For 'Utbah my eyes shed floods of tears; who has ever seen, before, a victim weep like me from excessive love for his assassin. I have held forth my hand to implore your favour, what give you then to him who solicits? If you refuse him, grant him a kind word instead. If you this year withhold from him (your love) encourage him to expect it the next.

The philologist Sa'id relates, in his Kitāb al-Fuṣūṣ, that Abu 'l-ʿAtāhiyah visited one day Baṣṣhār Ibn Burd, and said to him: "I admire these verses of yours, in which you give an excuse for shedding tears:

"How often has shame induced me to conceal my tears from a friend, who would perceive them, however, and blame my weakness, and then my answer was: 'I am not weeping, but I struck my eye with my cloak as I was going to put it on'."

To which Baṣṣhār replied: "It was from your sea, O ṣhaykh! that I drew that idea, and from your quarry<sup>1</sup> that I shaped it out; did you not anticipate me when you composed these lines:

"They said 'Thou weepst,' and I answered, 'No; the man of firm never weeps under affliction; but a sharp splinter of wood has struck the pupil of my eye!' 'Why then do both eyes shed tears? did a splinter wound them both?'"

On this, Sa'id observes that they had been anticipated in this idea by al-Ḥuṭay'ah<sup>2</sup>, who says:

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: your undressed, or unfinished arrow.

<sup>2</sup> Le nom de Hotaya, sous lequel ce poète est devenu célèbre, est un sobriquet qui lui fut donné à cause de l'exiguïté de sa taille. Son véritable nom était Djarwal (جرول) et son prénom Abou Moulaica (أبو مليكة). Sa naissance était illégitime et sa généalogie incertaine. Il passait pour être le fils d'un certain Aus, de la tribu d'Abs. Au reste, quand il était fâché contre les banou Abs, il se disait issu des banou Dhol ben Chaibar, et quand il se brouillait avec les banou Dhol, il rapportait son origine aux banou Abs.

"When a tear flows from my eye, I say: 'It is a mote which makes it weep.'"

(Continued from page 307)

Hotaya a vecu dans le paganisme et l'islamisme. Il se fit musulman, ensuite il abjura, puis il embrassa de nouveau la foi mahometane. C'est un poete du premier merite; mais il etait avare, laid, mechant, impie, treshards a demander, et tres-ardent a satiriser ceux qui ne lui donnaient rien; ce qui le faisait beaucoup redouter. Plusieurs connaisseurs disaient: De tous les poetes, Hotaya est celui dont les vers offrent le moins de prise a la critique. On cite avec estime, comme renfermant une pensee vraie et bien exprimee, ce vers de Hotaya:

من يفعل الخير لم يعدم جوايزة لا يذهب العرف بين الله والناس

"Celui qui fait le bien est sur d'en trouver la recompense; entre Dieu et les hommes le bienfait n'est jamais perdu."

Hotaya etant devenu ennemi de Zibrican fils de Badr, par suite d'une aventure qu'il serait trop long de raconter, fit une satire contre ce personnage. Zibrican alla se plaindre au calife Omar, qui, pour punir Hotaya, le fit jeter dans une fosse-fosse. Hotaya resta plusieurs jours; ensuite il adressa au calife une piece de vers touchante qui flechit sa colere. Omar le fit tirer de la fosse et amener en sa presence; puis il lui dit: "Garde-toi désormais de satiriser qui que ce soit.—C'est pourtant la satire qui m'a fait vavre jusqu'a ce jour" dit Hotaya.—Garde—toi, ajouta Omar, de dire: Un tel vaut mieux qu'un tel, cette famille est meilleure que cette autre.—Cette defense, repliqua le poete, est une satire des hommes en general plus piquante que je n'en pourrais faire (car la consequence qui en resulte est que tous les hommes sont egalement mauvais).—Si je ne craignais d'etablir un usage funeste, dit Omar, irrite de ces reponses, je te couperais la langue, Va, te appartiens maintenant a celui que tu as insulte. Zibrican! prends-le et fais-en ce que tu voudras." Zibrican! passa son truban autour du col de Hotaya et l'emmena. Des personnage de la tribu de Bakr-wail le rencontrerent trainant son captif et lui demanderent sa grace. Zibrican la leur accorda, et remit Hotaya entre leurs mains.

Hotaya vivait encore sous le calife Moawia; il a compose des vers a la louange de Said ben Nassi, gouverneur de Medine du tems de Moawia. Dans la suite, Ayar fils de Hotaya rencontrant un jour Khalid fils de Said, lui dit: "Mon pere est mort apres avoir reçu du tien 20 mille pieces d'argent, en recompense de ci'q poemes qu'il avait faits en l'honneur de Said. Ce que vous nous avez donne est dissipe aujourd'hui, et ce que mon pere vous a donne reste entier.—C'est vrai, 'repondit Khalid, c'est nous qui vous devons de la reconnaissance."—(Aghani, I. f. 9499. IV. f. 13.)

For this curious note, I am indebted to the friendship of M. Caussin de Perceval.—Reiske, in his edition of Abu 'l-Fida's Annals

(Continued on page 309)

Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah once renounced poetry,<sup>1</sup> and he related the following circumstance (resulting from that determination): "As I persisted in my refusal to compose verses, the khalif al-Mahdī ordered me to be put into prison.<sup>2</sup> "On entering, I shuddered at the sight of an object which appalled me and I looked about for a place of refuge, when I found the cause of my terror to be an elderly man of respectable appearance, with goodness marked on his countenance. I therefore went over to him and sat down without saluting, for I was troubled in mind, and confused and absorbed in thought. I remained thus for some time, when the man pronounced these verses:

'I accustomed myself to the touch of misfortune till it became familiar to me, and my resignation under grief conducted me to patience. My despair in mankind has made me confident that the bounty of God will come from some quarter which I know not.'

"I admired these verses, and was consoled by them; my reason also returned to me, and I said: 'May God exalt you! have the kindness to repeat them.' To this he aswered: 'Unfortunate Isma'īl! how little politeness you possess; how weak your mind! how faint your courage? On entering, you did not salute me as one Muslim should do to another, neither did you ask me the question which one just arrived addresses to him who has sojourned for some time; but when you heard two verses of poetry (which is the sole good, and accomplishment, and means of livelihood granted thee by God), you begin by asking me to recite, as if we were acquaintances, and

(Continued from page 308)

(tom. I, page, 78 adnot.), gives some other anecdotes respecting the poet al-Ḥuṭayyah.

1 In the Arabic text, for الشاعر * read الشعر. It would seem, from the khatib's History of Baḡhdād, that he renounced poetry from religious motives.

2 In the Arabic: To be put into the prison for crimes سجن الجرائم. This place of confinement was probably so called to distinguish it from the Maṭbaq,† or state prison of Baḡhdād.

*Cairo edition (1948) has the correct word.--Ed.

†Correct pronunciation is Muṭbiq.--Ed.

united by friendship sufficiently old to render reserve unnecessary; neither did you mention what has happened to yourself, nor make an excuse for your unpoliteness at first.' To this I replied: 'Have the kindness to excuse me, for less than what I undergo would suffice to disorder the senses.' 'And for what reason,' said he, 'have you renounced poetry, which was the cause of the high honour in which those people<sup>1</sup> held you, and the means by which you acquired their favour? You must continue to make verses, if you wish to obtain your liberty. As for me, I shall be soon called forth and questioned respecting 'Īsā Ibn Zayd, son of the blessed Prophet<sup>2</sup>; and if I discover to them where he is, I shall have to answer for his blood before God, and the Prophet will be my accuser; and if I refuse, I shall be put to death; so it is I, rather than you, who should be dejected, and yet you see my firmness, resignation, and self-command.' These reproaches put me to shame, and I said to him: 'May God deliver you?' He replied: 'I shall not join a refusal to my reprimand: listen to the verses.' He then recited them to me several times till I got them

---

1 Those people, a disrespectful manner of alluding to the Abbaside family: the speaker was a partisan of the descendants of 'Alī.

2 This is certainly a mistake, no such person as 'Īsā, son of Zayd, son of Muḥammad* is noticed by historians, as having lived under the reign of al-Mahdī; and Zayd Ibn Hārithah, the adopted son of Muḥammad, could he have had a son living at the time of al-Mahdī's accession (A. H. 158), since he was slain at the battle of Mutaḥ, in A. H. 8. It is true that among the descendants of 'Alī and Fā'imah, daughter of Muḥammad, there was a Zayd, son of al-Ḥasan, son of 'Alī' who had two sons, Yaḥyā and al-Ḥasan, the latter of whom was governor of Madinah for al-Manṣūr, and died A. H. 168. It is not, however, possible to suppose that the author was mistaken in the name, and meant to say al-Ḥasan Ibn Zayd; for Abu 'l-Maḥasin states, in his History of Egypt, that al-Ḥasan Ibn Zayd, who was noted for his piety, had been deprived of his place by al-Manṣūr, and was then imprisoned by his orders and deprived of his property; but that al-Mahdī, on his accession to the Khalifat, set him at liberty, restored him his wealth, reinstated him in his place, and continued invariably to treat him with the greatest favour. Al-Ḥasan Ibn Zayd died A. H. 168 (A. D. 784-5). The author of the Genealogy of the descendants of 'Alī, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 853, says that the death of al-Ḥasan took place at Ḥajir (حاجر), a place situated between Makkah and Madinah.

*The descendants of 'Alī by Fā'imah were attributed to the Prophet.—Ed.

by heart and he and I having been then called forth, I said to him: 'May God exalt you! who are you?' He answered: 'I am Ḥaḍīr, the friend of 'Īsā Ibn Zayd.' We were then conducted into the presence of al-Mahdī, and as we stood before him, he said to the man: 'Where is 'Īsā Ibn Zayd?' The other answered: 'How should I know where is 'Īsā Ibn Zayd?' You pursued him, and he fled from you into some country, and you put me in prison; how then could I hear of him?' 'Where' said al-Mahdī, 'was he concealed? where did you last see him? in whose house did you meet him?' 'I did not meet him,' answered Ḥaḍīr, 'since his concealment, and I know nothing of him.' 'I swear by Allāh,' said al-Mahdī, 'if you do not direct us where to find him, I shall strike off your head on the spot.' 'Do as you please,' replied the prisoner; 'I shall not direct you where to discover the son of the Apostle of God; as I should then have to answer for his blood in the presence of God and his apostle: were he even between my clothes and my skin, I should not discover him to you.' 'Strike off his head!' said al-Mahdī; and it was done.<sup>1</sup> He then called me forward and said: 'Choose either to make verses or to be sent after him.' 'I shall make verses,' I replied. 'Let him go,' said he; and I went forth free."—The qāḍī Abū 'Alī al-Tannūkhī mentions a third verse, besides the two given in the preceding narration: it is as follows:

"Were I not resigned to bear with the afflictions which Fortune forces me to undergo, my complaints against Fortune had long continued."]

The anecdotes related of Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah are very numerous. —'Anazī means descended from 'Anazāl, who was son of Asad Ibn Rabi'ah 'Aynī means belonging to 'Ayn al-Tamr, the village before mentioned.

(For further reference, vide Ansīb, f. 404b.—Ed.)

---

<sup>1</sup> The Arabic text runs thus: "He said: Strike off his head! and he gave orders concerning him, and his head was struck off." This tautology must be attributed to the inattention of the author.

92. ABŪ 'ĀLĪ AL-QĀLĪ

The philologist Abū 'Alī Ismā'īl al-Qālī was son of al-Qāsim Ibn 'Aydūn Ibn Hārūn Ibn 'Īsā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Salmān; his ancestor Sa'mān was an enfranchised slave of the Omayyide khalīf 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. Abū 'Alī surpassed all his contemporaries by his extensive acquaintance with philology, poetry, and the grammatical doctrines established by the learned of Baṣrah. He received his philological information from Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd, al-Azdī,* Abū Bakr Ibn Al-Anbārī, Niṣṭawayh, Ibn Darastawayh† and other masters, and he had for pupil in that science Abū Bakr al-Zuhaydī al-Andalusī, author of the Abridgment of (al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad's Arabic dictionary, entitled) the 'Ayn. Al-Qālī is author of a number of fine works, such as the kitāb al-Amālī (book of dictation)<sup>1</sup>; the kitāb al-Bārī, which is a treatise on philology, arranged in alphabetical order, and filling five thousand leaves; a treatise on the short and the long Alif; another on camels and their propagation; a treatise on the external characteristics of man; one on the horse and his different colours; a comparative essay on the first and fourth forms of the Arabic

---

1 A copy of the Amālī is in the Bib. du Roi, fonds Asselin, No. 493. It contains a number of Traditions relative to Muḥammad; an immense quantity of notes respecting the ancient Arabs, their proverbs, language, and poetry; anecdotes of the poets who lived under the early khalīfs; pieces in prose and verse preserved by tradition, and which the author learned from the lips of his master, etc. He says in his preface, that he had long treasured up this precious information and concealed it from the profane; that he had sought a person worthy of receiving it and capable of appreciating its value; and having heard of the glorious reign of the Commander of the Faithful, 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad, he faced the dangers of land and sea and went to Spain, where he received the greatest encouragement from that khalīf, and was induced to publish his work by dictating it from memory at Cardova, and in the great mosque of al-Zahrā.—It is a curious book and furnishes much information on Arabism (عربية), or the philology of the ancient Arabic language; it fills 338 folio pages very closely written.

*Al-Azdī is omitted by de Slane—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Durustuya.—Ed.

verb; a history of the combats in which the (most celebrated ancient Arab) cavaliers met their death; and an explanation of the Mu'allaqāhs. In his travels through various countries, he visited Baghḍād in the year 303 (A. D. 915-16), and stopped at Moṣul, to learn the Traditions delivered by Abū Ya'la al-Mawṣilī; in 305 he returned to Baghḍād, and remained there till 328; when in that city he wrote down the Traditions. On leaving Baghḍād, he went to Spain, and entered Cordova on the 26 Sha'bān, 330.* He continued to dwell in that capital till his death, and it was there that he taught by dictation his kitāb al-Amālī, and most of his other works. Yūsuf Ibn Hārūn al-Ramādī, whose life shall be given in the letter Y, composed an elegant qaṣīdah in praise of Abū 'Alī al-Qālī, a portion of which the reader will there find inserted. Al-Qālī died at Cordova on Friday† evening, 6 of the Second Rabī' (some say the First Jumādā), A. H. 356 (March, A. D. 967); he was buried in the cemetery of Mat'ah, outside Cordova, and funeral prayers were said over him by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Jubayrī. He was born in the Second Jumādā, A. H. 288 (June, A. D. 901), at Manāzjird in Diyār Bakr, of which place mention has already been made in the life of al-Manāzī.<sup>2</sup> The reason of his being surnamed Qālī was, that in going to Baghḍād, he travelled with people from Qālī Qalā, in consequence of which he was called Qālī (or native of Qālī Qalā) ever after. Al-Sam'ānī says that the place is in the territory of Diyār Bakr, but I read in the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn's History of the Seljuqs that Qālī Qalā is

1 The ḥāfiẓ Abū Ya'la Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Muḥannā al-Tamīmī is the author of a well known Musnad, or collection of authenticated Traditions, which he received from a great number of persons of the highest credibility: he composed also some works on ascetic devotion and other subjects. He was remarkable for his humility, mildness of temper, amenity of manners and veracity. Born at Moṣul. A. H. 210 (A. D. 326); died A. H. 307 (A. D. 919-10).—(Al-Dḥahabī's Tarīkh al-Islām MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 646).

2 See No. 62.

*It should be 27 corresponding to 17 May, 941.—Ed.

†Saturday, not Friday, is correct. In the month of First Jumādā Saturday fell on 6 Jumādā/20 April.—Ed.

the same town as Erzerum.* Al-Balādhurī<sup>1</sup> says, in his kitāb al-Buldān, or History of the Victories of Islamism, in treating of the conquest of Armenia: "At one time the Greek empire was broken up, and several princes governed the provinces with nearly absolute authority; one of them was called Arminiacos and was succeeded on his death by his wife Qālī; it was she who built this city, and gave it the name of Qālī Qālah which means the goodness of Qālī; this word has been altered by the Arabs to suit the genius of their language, and they said Qālī Qalā. The image of this princess is engraved on one of the gates of the city."<sup>2</sup>

93. THE ṢĀḤIB IBN 'ABBĀD

The Ṣāḥib Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'īl Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Abbād Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abbād Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Idrīs al-Ṭālaqānī, was the pearl of his time, and the wonder of his age for his talents, his virtues, and his generosity. He acquired his knowledge of pure Arabic from Ibn Fāris, author of the Mujmil, Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Umayd and others. Al-Ṭha'ālibī, in his Yatīmah, speaks of him in these terms: "I am unable to find expressions sufficiently strong to satisfy my wishes, so that I may declare to what a height he attained in learning and philological knowledge; how exalted a rank he held by his liberality and generosity; now far he was placed apart by the excellence of his qualities, and how completely he united in himself all the various endowments which are a source of just pride to their possessor<sup>3</sup>; for my words aspire in vain to attain a height which may accord with even the lowest degree of his merit and his glory, and my powers of description

---

<sup>1</sup> The life of Aḥmad Ibn Yahyā al-Balādhurī has been given by M. Hamaker in his Specimen Catalogi cod., page 11.

<sup>2</sup> Or: "Is over one of its gates."

<sup>3</sup> I have been here obliged to paraphrase the original, in order to render its full sense.

*Arzan al-Rum.—Ed.

are unequal to the task of portraying the least of his noble deeds, the lowest of his exalted purposes." He then cites examples characteristic of his noble mind, and gives some account of his life.—Abn Bakr al-Khuwārezmī<sup>1</sup> makes mention of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād in the following terms: "He was brought up in the bosom of the vizīrat; that was the nest in which he crept and from which he sprung,—the nurse with whose milk he was suckled even to the last drop; he received the vizīrat as an inheritance from his father." Such also has Abn Sa'īd al-Rustamī<sup>2</sup> said of him in these verses:

"The vizīrat passed as an inheritance from one ancestor to another, and was successively sustained by able pillars of the state.<sup>3</sup> 'Abbād received the vizīrat from 'Abbās, (as a tradition is received), and Ismā'īl then received it from 'Abbād."

This was the first vizīr who bore the title of Ṣāhib (companion); he was so denominated because he had been the companion of Ibn al-'Umayd, and was then known by that designation, which got into such general use, that on his accession to the vizīrat, it continued to be employed as his real name. Al-Ṣābī says, in his kitāb al-Tājī,<sup>4</sup> that Ibn 'Abbād was entitled al-Ṣāhib because he had been the companion of Muwaiyad al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh from his early youth, and as this prince gave him that epithet, it continued to be the name by which he was known, and

1 The life of Abn Bakr Muhammad al-Khuwārezmī is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 Abn Sa'īd Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Rustam al-Rustamī, a native of Ispahān, was originally a mason, صنّاء, but he displayed such talent in the composition of the verses, that he came to be ranked among the first poets of the time, and gained the favour of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, who acted towards him as a generous benefactor, and used to say, "al-Rustamī is the ablest poet of the day." At the approach of old age, al-Rustamī renounced poetry from conscientious motives. The date of his death is not given in the Yatimah, but some of his poems are preserved in the work, with a notice on their author, the summary of which is here given.—(See the Yatimah, fol. 312.)

3 In this verse the author had a double meaning in view: It signifies also that the vizīrat was successively transmitted (like a tradition) from one good authority to another. The same idea is continued in the next verse.

4 See No. 14.

became the title of succeeding vizīrs. Ibn 'Abbād was at first vizīr to Muwaiyad al-Dawlat Ibn Rukn al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, having replaced Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Umayd, of whom mention shall be made in the life of his father Muḥammad.<sup>1</sup> On the death of Muwaiyad al-Dawlat at Jurjān, in the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 373 (January, A. D. 984), his brother Fakhr al-Dawlat Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī got possession of the empire, and confirmed Ibn 'Abbād as vizīr. Under this prince, he enjoyed high favour, honour, and authority.—Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Za'farānī<sup>2</sup> recited to him one day a piece of verses rhyming in n, and containing the following passage:

“O, thou whose gifts enrich the hands of him who is far away and him who is near! You have clothed those who dwell by you and those who come to visit you, with raiment which we thought unequalled; and all the slaves of thy palace go about in silks except myself.”

On this, the Ṣāhib said: “I have read in the life of Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah al-Shaybānī, that a man came to him and said: ‘Give me whereon to ride, O-Emīr!, on which he ordered him a camel, a horse, a mule, and an ass<sup>3</sup> and then said: ‘If I knew that God had created any other animal fit for riding, I had given it to you. Now I order you silk enough for a coat, a shirt, turban, a waistcoat, trousers, a handkerchief, a vest, a cloak, a robe, leggings, and a purse; and if I knew of any other garment which could be made of silk, I should give it to you.’”—The number of poets who flocked to him and celebrated his praises in splendid qaṣīdahs, surpassed that which assembled at the court of any other. His repartees were very good; the coiners of the mint presented to him a memorial in which they complained of some injustice done them, and which was headed by the words al-Ḍarrābān; he wrote

1 Muḥammad was Ibn al-'Umayd's real name.

2 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Umar Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Za'farānī was a native of 'Irāq, and one of those literary men who were admitted into the society of the Ṣāhib; he was also a favourite of 'Aḍad al-Dawlat.—(Yatīmah, fol. 327.) Some of his poems are to be found in that work.

3 One article [i.e. female slave] in the list I have omitted; decency requiring its suppression.

underneath in form of decision, On cold iron.<sup>1</sup> A person once addressed him a memorial in which he inserted some passages and expressions stolen from epistles composed by himself, on which he wrote underneath in answer to the demand: This our property hath been returned unto us.<sup>2</sup> He accused one of his revenue collectors to be imprisoned in a narrow yard near his dwelling, and having one day gone up to the (flat) roof of the house, his prisoner saw him and called upon him with a loud voice, on which he looked down and perceiving him suffering tortures like those of hell, he said: Back to hell ! speak not unto me!<sup>3</sup> Numerous anecdotes of the kind are related of him.—He wrote a philological work in seven volumes, entitled the Muhtāṣ (comprehensive), which he arranged in alphabetical order, giving (the explanation of) a great number of words, but citing very few examples; it contains a considerable portion of the (words composing the) language; he is also author of the Kāfi (sufficient), treating of epistolary writing, the kitāb al-A'yād (book of Festivals), a treatise on the excellence of new year's day; another on the rank of imām, in which he states the merits of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and maintains that the (three khalifs) who preceded him were legitimate imāms<sup>4</sup>; the Book of Vizirs; a work entitled: Exposure of the faults in al-Mutanabbī's poetry, and a treatise on the names and attributes of God. He composed also some elegant epistles and good poetry, of which we shall give the following extracts:

"My description cannot paint that nyph who is a very gazelle in beauty. She wished to kiss my hand. and I said: 'Kiss my lips.' "

---

1 The word al-Ḍarrabūn signifies literally the beaters, and is used to designate the money-beaters or coiners by the addition which the vizir made, he gave them to understand that it was useless for them to complain; that they, the beaters, struck on cold iron, which is labour in vain. This is a common Arabic proverb, somewhat analogous to the English one: Strike when the iron is hot.

2 This is a passage of the Qur'ān, taken from surat 12, verse 65.

3 This is also a passage of the Qur'ān: see surat 23, verse 110.—Al-Ṭha'ālībī did not probably know this trait, when he made his pompous eulogium of the Ṣāhib.

4 Here the word imām means the possessor of spiritual and temporal authority.

On clear-coloured wine:

"The glass is clear, and the wine is clear; one is so like the other, that they can hardly be distinguished. One you would think wine, not glass,—the other glass, not wine."

He composed these elegiac verses on the death of the vizīr Abū 'Alī Kathīr Ibn Aḥmad<sup>1</sup>:

"They told me of Kathīr's death; it was a heavy loss for me, and I said: "Let me and Glory weep together, for the like of Kathīr (abundant) is rare among mankind."

It is related by the grammarian Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Fārisī<sup>2</sup> that Nuḥ Ibn Maṣṣūr, one of the Samanide princes, wrote privately to the Ṣāḥib, inviting him to become his vizīr and direct the administration of his kingdom; but he refused the offer, and one of the reasons which he gave in excuse was, that it would require four hundred camels to transport his books only; think then of the furniture which he must have possessed in the same proportion! We shall limit the account of his life to the foregoing particulars, which may suffice. He was born on the 16 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 326 (September, A. D. 938*) at Iṣṭakḥar, or, according to another account, at Ṭālaqān, and died on Friday night 24 of Ṣafar, 385 (March, A. D. 995†), at Ray, from which city his body was transported to Ispahān, and interred in a vault situated in the quarter of Bāb Dazih‡: his tomb is still kept in good order, and his daughter's descendants have it whitewashed

1 It would appear from Khaundenir's Tarikh al-wuzarā, that Kathīr was vizīr to one of the Daylamite princes.—(De Hammer's Handschriften, No. 238.)

2 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Fārisī, a grammarian of considerable reputation and sister's son to the celebrated Abu 'Alī 'l-Fārisī, under whom he studied, was one of those literary men whom the Ṣāḥib admitted into his intimacy. He possessed a talent for poetry, and some of his pieces are preserved in the Yutimah; the author of which work, al-Ṭinā'libī, says that at the time he was writing, Abu 'l-Ḥusayn was still alive and dwelling at Jurjān.—( Yatimah, No. 1370, fol. 488.)

*14 September.—Ed.

†29 March: M. de Slane has given Thursday evening.—Ed.

‡Mr. Muḥī al-Dīn, editor of the Egyptian edition, observes that it should be Darih.—Ed.

regularly. The poet Ibn Abi 'l-'Alā*<sup>1</sup> narrates as follows: "I had a dream in which I heard a voice say: 'Why did not you, who possess such a talent for poetry, compose an elegy on his death?' To which I replied: 'The number of his good qualities forced me to refrain, for I did not know with which to begin; and I was apprehensive of my inability to treat the subject suitably, although people supposed me capable of doing it full justice!'"

The voice here said: 'Add a second hemistich to those I pronounce' 'Speak!' and the voice said:

'Generosity and the best of patrons repose together in the same grave.'

And I rejoined:

'So that each of these brothers may keep the other company!'

The voice:

'They were inseparable when alive, and now they embrace—

I:

'On a funeral couch near Bāb Dazih!'

The voice:

'Whilst other inhabitants shall quit their dwellings—'

I:

'They shall remain in theirs till the day of resurrection.' "

This piece is given by al-Bayyāsī<sup>2</sup> in his Ḥamāsah.—I have read the following observation in the History of the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād: "None ever enjoyed the same popular favour after their death as during their life,"<sup>3</sup> the Ṣāḥib excepted; for on his decease, the gates of the city of Ray were closed (in sign of mourning), and the people assembled at the door of his palace, where they waited

---

1 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ghānim Ibn Abi 'l-'Alā, a native of Isphān, was another of the Ṣāḥib's favourite poets. Some of his pieces are to be found in the Yatimah, fol. 319.

2 Abu 'l-Hajjāj Yūsuf Ibn Maḥammad was a native of Bayāsah in Spain, whence his surname of Bayyāsī. His life is given by Ibn Kullikān. —There are seven works in Arabic which bear the title of Ḥamās: 5.

3 Literally: No one was ever favoured after his death as he had been during life.

*"al-Isbahāni" is omitted.—Ed.

all his bier was brought out; and Faḥr al-Dawlat, the prince whom he served," (and whose name has been mentioned in the beginning of this notice), "was present with all the officers of high rank in mourning dresses<sup>1</sup>: when the bier appeared, the people raised one simultaneous cry and prostrated themselves on the ground; Faḥr al-Dawlat, and the rest marched in procession before the corpse, and for some days after, he held public sittings to receive visits of condolence.<sup>2</sup> His death was lamented in these terms by Abn Sa'īd al-Rustamī:

"Now, that Ibn 'Abbād is departed, shall ever the expectant traveller hasten to undertake the nightly journey? shall ever liberality be solicited? God hath willed that the hopes of the needy and the gifts of the generous should perish by the death of Ibn 'Abbād, and that they should never meet again till the day of resurrection."

His father, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abbād died A. H. 334 or 335 (A. D. 946); he had been vizīr to Rukn al-Dawlat, father of Faḥr al-Dawlat and 'Aḍad al-Dawlat Fannākhusrū, whom al-Mutanabbī has celebrated in his poem.—Faḥr al-Dawlat died in the month of Shābān, A. H. 387 (August, 997); he was born in 341 (A. D. 952).—Tālaqānī means native of Tālaqān: there are two cities of this name, one in Khurāsān, and the other in the dependencies of Qazwīn: the latter was the native place of the Sāhib.

94. IBN KHALAF AL-SARAQUSĪ

Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ismā'īl Ibn Khalaf Ibn Sa'īd Ibn 'Imrān al-Anṣārī<sup>3</sup> al-Andalusī al-Saraqusī (native of Saragossa in Spain) was a grammarian and teacher of the reading of the Qur'ān.

1 Literally: Having changed their dress.

2 The Arabic says simply, that he sat for consolation.

3 Al-Anṣārī is the title given to descendants from the Anṣār. See No. 62. note on Anṣār.

He was master of the branches of general literature and versed in the sciences connected with the Qur'ān.<sup>1</sup> He is author of the 'Unwān fi 'l-Qar'āt'<sup>2</sup> (Outlines of the different readings of the Qur'ān), which work is considered of the very first authority by those who cultivate that branch of knowledge; he composed also an Abridgment of the Kitāb al-Ḥujjah<sup>3</sup> by Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī, Ibn Baṣṭikāwāl praises him highly in the Ṣilat, and makes an enumeration of his merits. He continued to pursue his studies and communicate his information to the public up to the day of his death: he expired on Sunday, the first of Muḥarram. A. H. 455 (January, A. D. 1063.)* Saraqusṭī means native of Saraqusṭah<sup>4</sup>, a very fine city in the eastern part of Spain, which has produced a number of learned men. It was taken from the Muslims by the Franks (under the orders of Alphonso, king of Arragon), in the year 512 (A. D. 1118).

95. AL-MANṢŪR IBN AL-QĀ'IM IBN AL-MAHDĪ

Abū 'l-Ṭāhir Ismā'īl, surnamed al-Manṣūr (the victorious), was son of al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī, prince of Ifrīqiyah (Africa Propria): the remainder of his genealogy will be found in the life of his grandfather al-Mahdī 'Ubayd Allāh: the life of al-Mus'a'li, one of his descendants has been already given.<sup>5</sup> Al-Manṣūr received the oath of fidelity from his subjects on the day wherein his father

1 Ḥājjī Khalifah gives a list of these sciences in the introduction to his bibliographical dictionary.—See page 37 of Flügel's edition.

2 In the Arabic text, this word is incorrectly printed القرآن.

3 This work treats of the different readings or editions of the Qur'ān.

4 Saraqusṭah is an alteration of Caesar Augusta, the ancient name of the city of Saragossa.

5 See No. 73.

* 5 January.—Ed.

al-Qa'im died; (we shall speak of this event under the letter M). He possessed the talent of expressing his ideas with precision and elegance, and he pronounced his ḥuḥbahs without previous preparation. Abū Ja'far al-Marwarradī narrates the following anecdote (of his ready genius): "I went forth with al-Manṣūr on the day he defeated Abū Yazīd<sup>1</sup>, as I accompanied him, he dropped from time to time one of the two lances which he bore in his hand; so I (picked it up and) wiped it, and gave it to him, pronouncing it to be a good omen, and quoting to him the following verse:

'She threw away her staff, and a distant land became the place of her abode. (yet, she felt) as the traveller on his return, when his eyes are delighted (by the sight of home).'<sup>2</sup>

On which he replied: 'Why did you not quote what is better and truer than that: And we spake by revelation to Moses, saying, Throw down thy rod. And behold, it swallowed up that which they had caused falsely to appear. Wherefore the truth was confirmed, and that which they had wrought vanished. And they were overcome there, and were rendered contemptible.'<sup>3</sup> To this I said: 'O, my lord! you, who are the son of God's Apostle, utter knowledge of which you are the (sole) possessor.'—*[One of the best anecdotes of this kind is that which al-Taymī<sup>4</sup> thus relates in his life of al-Ḥajjāj: "Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān ordered the construction of a gate at Jerusalem, on which his name was to be inscribed, and al-

<sup>1</sup> The author relates this event farther on.

<sup>2</sup> The expression لأعين signifies to refresh or delight the eye, to rejoice.—This verse is frequently met with in Arabic writers, and Abū 'l-Fidā says, in his Historia Antisemita, page 187, that mention is made of its author; Muqir Ibn Himar al-Bāriqī, in the Kitāb al-Aghānī; this name is not, however, to be found in the manuscript of that work preserved at the Bib. du Roi.—The expression to throw away one's staff is quite proverbial in Arabic; it means to give up travelling.

<sup>3</sup> This is a passage from the Qur'an, sura 7, verses 114, 115, and 116.

<sup>4</sup> The historian al-Taymī is better known as Abū 'Ubaydah Ibn al-Muthannā.

[ ] From "One of the best" to "this letter" on page 323, not in the autograph.—Ed.

Ḥajjāj obtained from him permission to erect another; and it so happened that 'Abd al-Malik's was struck by lightning and burned, while that of al-Ḥajjāj remained uninjured. 'Abd al-Malik was much troubled in consequence, but al-Ḥajjāj wrote him this letter: 'I am informed that fire has come down from heaven and burned the gate of the Commander of the Faithful, without burning that of al-Ḥajjāj; in this we resemble perfectly the two sons of Adam, when they each made an offering, and it was accepted from one and not from the other.'<sup>1</sup> 'Abd al-Malik's uneasiness was dispelled by the perusal of this letter.'] Al-Manṣūr was charged by his father (al-Qā'im) to wage war against Abū Yazīd, who had revolted against his authority. Abū Yazīd Maḥlād Ibn Kaydād belonged to the sect of Ibādites<sup>2</sup>; he made an outward show of rigid devotion, but was in reality an enemy to God; he never rode but on an ass, nor wore any dress but woollen. He had already fought al-Manṣūr's father in many engagements, and got into his possession all the towns in the dependencies of Qayrawān; al-Mahdiyyah was the only city which remained in the hands of al-Qā'im. Abū Yazīd then took up his position against al-Mahdiyyah and blockaded it; and al-Qā'im died during the siege. Al-Manṣūr then assumed the direction of affairs, and continued to maintain the contest, but concealed the death of his father; he persevered in his resistance till Abū Yazīd retired, and went to blockade Snsah. Then al-Manṣūr left al-Mahdiyyah, and having given Abū Yazīd battle at Snsah, put him to flight; he then defeated him in a number of successive combats, and at length took him prisoner on Sunday, 25 Muḥarram, 336 (August, A. D. 947*). Abū Yazīd died of his wounds after a captivity of forty days: his body was skinned by al-Manṣūr's orders; the skin was then stuffed with cotton, and exposed on a cross. It was on the spot in which this battle was fought, that al-Manṣūr built the city which he named al-Manṣuriyah after himself, and in which he fixed his residence. He was courageous, firm-hearted, and eloquent, pronouncing the ḥuṭbah without previous preparation. In the month of Ramaḍān, 341 (A. D. 953), he went from al-Manṣuriyah to Jalnā on a party of pleasure, accompanied by his concubine Qaḍīb, of whom he was passionately fond; when God poured down on them heavy showers of hail and gave a storm power over them. Al-Manṣūr turned back, therefore, to al-Manṣuriyah, but he suffered so much from cold, that he lost his strength, and most of those who accompanied him perished. On his arrival, he fell sick, and died on Friday, 29 Shawwāl, A. H. 341 (March, A. D. 953†). ‡[His illness originated in the following manner: when he arrived at al-Manṣuriyah, he took a bath against the orders of his physician, Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Isrā'īlī,<sup>1</sup> the consequence of which was, loss of natural heat, and inability to sleep; on which Ishāq came and treated him, but the sleeplessness continued. Al-Manṣūr at last grew impatient, and said to one of his slaves: "Is there no physician in Qayrawān who can deliver me from this." The answer was: "There is here a young man just grown up, called Ibrāhīm." He ordered him to be called and acquainted with his state, and complained to him of what he was suffering; on which Ibrāhīm took some soporiferous drugs and put them in a glass phial on the fire, prescribing to his

<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān, sur. 5, v. 30.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Fida, in his Annals, year 333, gives some account of Abū Yazīd's revolt, defeat, and death. The MS. of that work in the Bib. du Roi, which has been corrected by the author himself, writes كندااد (Kndaād), with the vowel points, as the name of that rebel's father. Abū Yazīd was surnamed the master of the ass, Ṣāhib al-Ḥimār, because he never rode anything else.—(Ibn al-Abbār.) The sect of the 'Ibādites (Ibādiyyah) had for author 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Ibād al-Tamīmī, who revolted at Tabalah in Yemen during the reign of Marawān Ibn Muḥammad, the last of the Omayyides who reigned in the East. It appears from al-Nuwayrī, that this sect existed in Ifriqiyah at an early period, and gave some trouble to the Aghlabite princes.—Al-Jurjānī, in his Ta'arīfāt (Notices et extraits des man. de la Bib. du Roi, tom. 10, page 19), says: These sectarians considered as infidels all those who did not believe as they; they taught that the Muslim who commits a grievous sin is a unitarian, but not of the faithful, because works are a part of faith; and they declared 'Alī and a great number of Muḥammad's companions to be infidels. A fuller account of their doctrines is given by al-Shahraṣṭānī.

<sup>1</sup> The life of Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān will be found in M. de Sacy's 'Abd-Allaṭif, p. 43.

*15 August.—Ed.

†18 March.—Ed.

‡[ ] From "His illness" to "he was dead" on page 325, not in the autograph.—Ed.

patient to smell them. Al-Manṣūr, after smelling them for a considerable time, fell asleep; and Ibrāhīm retired, rejoicing in what he had done. When Ishāq returned, he went to enter the patient's chamber, but was told that he slept, on which he said: "If anything has been done to him to make him sleep, he is now a dead man." They then entered the room, and having found that he was dead, they wanted to kill Ibrāhīm, but Ishāq said: "He is not to be blamed, as he treated him in the manner which physicians teach; but he was unacquainted with the cause of the disorder, and you did not inform him. As for me, I treated him with the view of fortifying the natural heat, so as to cause sleep, and on learning that he was treated in a way to extinguish that heat, I knew he was dead." He was interred at al-Mahdiyyah; born at Qayrawān, 302 (A. D. 914), or 301; his reign lasted seven years and six days.—Ifrīqiyah is the name of an extensive country in Maghreb; it was conquered in the khalfat of Uthmān; Qayrawān was then the capital, as Tunis is now.

96. AL-ZĀFIR AL-'UBAYDĪ

Abu 'l-Manṣūr Ismā'il, surnamed al-Zāfir (the conqueror), son of al-Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Mustanṣir Ibn al-Zāhir Ibn al-Ḥākim Ibn al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qāim Ibn al-Mahdī. In the article which precedes, we have given the life of his ancestor al-Manṣūr. On the death of al-Ḥāfiẓ, his youngest son, al-Zāfir was immediately proclaimed as his successor, in conformity to his father's last orders, and on the same day he received the oath of fealty from his subjects. This prince was addicted to pleasure and frivolous amusements, passing his time with his concubines, or listening to vocal music. He was assassinated by his favourite, Naṣr, son of his vizīr 'Abbās (of whom we shall again speak in the life of al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār), who having invited him one night to come secretly to his father's palace (which is now the Hanefite College, and is called the Suyūfiyah),<sup>1</sup> murdered him there and concealed his death. This well-known event took place on the 15, or, according to some, on Thursday night, 30 of Muḥarram, A. H. 549 (April, A. D. 1154*). He was born at Cairo, on Sunday, 15 of the Second Rabi' (some say the First) A. H. 527 (A. D. 1133†); he was a very handsome man. On perpetrating this murder, Naṣr went, the same night, to his father 'Abbas, and informed him of what he had done. It was by his father's orders that he had acted; for his extreme beauty had induced the public to suspect that his intercourse with al-Zāfir was of an improper nature, and in consequence (of these rumours), his father had said to him: "You are ruining your reputation by keeping company with al-Zāfir; your familiarity with him is the subject of public talk; kill him then, for it is thus that you will vindicate your honour from these foul suspicions. The next morning, 'Abbas went to the door of the castle, and asked admission to al-Zāfir, saying that he had business of importance to transact with him. The slaves having sought their master in the places where he usually passed the night, and not finding him, told 'Abbas that they did not know where he was. On this the vizīr dismounted, and entered the castle with some trusty attendants; he then ordered the slaves to bring forth Jibrīl and Yūsuf, the two brothers of him master; then he questioned respecting him; but they told him to ask his own son, for he knew better than they. On this, he caused their heads to be struck off, and said: "These two are his murderers."—Such are the main circumstances of the event, which is related more fully in the life of al-Fā'iz 'Īsa, son of al-Zāfir.—The mosque al-Zāfirī, which is inside the gate of Zawilah at Cairo, was so called after him, as he was its founder, and had settled upon it *waqf*s<sup>1</sup> to a great amount.

<sup>1</sup> The Suyūfiyah College at Cairo was so called, because it was close to the Sword-cutter's Bazār (Sūq al-Suyūfīn).—(Al-Maqrizī.)

---

1 See No. 29. note on waqf.

* M. de Slane gives Wednesday which is an error: the dates correspond to 1 or 16 April, the former was Thursday and the latter Friday. In Arabic the word سلك (Salkh) means the last day of the month and it should be 29 when day and date tally.—Ed.

† The 15 of the First Rabi' fell on Tuesday, 24 January and 15 of Second Rabi' fell on Thursday, 23 February.—Ed.

97. ASHHAB AL-QAYSI

Abū 'Amr Ashhab Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Dāwūd Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Qaysī al-Ja'dī (member of the tribe of Qays and of the family of Ja'aah), a doctor of the sect of Mālik and native of Egypt, studied jurisprudence under the imām Mālik, and afterwards under the doctors of Madinah and Miṣr. The imām al-Shāfi'i said of him: "I never saw an abler jurisconsult than Ashhab, were he not so precipitate." A rivalry subsisted between him and Ibn al-Qāsim,<sup>1</sup> whom he afterwards replaced as chief of the Malikites in Egypt. Ashhab was born in Egypt, A. H. 150 (A. D. 767), or in A. H. 140, according to Abū Ja'far al-Jazzār<sup>2</sup> in his

---

1 The life of Ibn al-Qāsim is given in this work: his full name is Abū 'Abd Allāh 'Abd al-Rahmān al-'Utaqī.

2 The physician and historian Abū Ja'far Ibrāhīm Ibn Khālid, surnamed Ibn al-Jazzār, was a native of Qayrawān, where his father and his paternal uncle Abū Bakr practised also the art of medicine. He had studied in that city between A.H. 300 and 320, under Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Isrā'īlī, the physician to Ziyādāt Allāh Ibrāhīm the Aḥḥlabite. As a teacher, a practitioner, and an author, he attained a high reputation, and disdained courting the favours of the great. The only man of rank whom he visited was an old friend of his, Abū Tālib, uncle to the Fatimite prince al-Mu'izz, and him he went to see every Friday. He passed the days of summer, every year, in one of the ribāṭs or garrisons on the sea-coast. According to Ibn Abi Uṣaybi'ah, he died, aged upwards of eighty. Ḥājji Khalifah, in his Bibliography, No. 3090, places his death in A.H. 400, but al-Dhahabī conjectures that it took place before A.H. 350. He was a man of great information in various sciences. The list of his medical works is given by al-Dhahabī and Ibn Abi Uṣaybi'ah, and may be found in Wustenfeld's Arabische Aerzte. His Zād al-Musfir (provisions for travellers) has been translated into Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. His historical works are the Ta'rif Taṣṭiḥ al-Tārīkh (the truth of historical statements), which is a short treatise; and the Akhhbār al-Dawlat (History of the present Empire), containing an account of the rise and progress of the empire founded by 'Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī. He left a fortune of twenty-four thousand dinārs and twenty five hundred weight (qinṭār) of books on medicine and other subjects. (Al-Dhahabī's Tārīkh al-Islām; Ibn Abi Uṣaybi'ah. This last author cites some verses from a poem composed by Kuṣṣājīm in praise of Ibn al-Jazzār.)* history: he died in 204 (A. D. 820), a month (or, as some say, 18 days) after al-Shāfi'ī, whose death occurred on the 30 Rajab of that year. Aṣḥhab died at Old Cairo, and was interred in the lesser Qarāfah;<sup>1</sup> I have visited his tomb, which is near that of Ibn al-Qā'im. Some state that his real name was Miskīn* and Aṣḥhab only a surname, but that is not exact. His veracity is unquestionable in the Traditions, which he gives on the authority of the imām Malik. †Al-Qudā'ī says, in his Khiṭaṭ, that Aṣḥhab was head of the Malikites in the city (of Old Cairo); that he possessed great wealth; and that he was the ablest divine among the Malikites in resolving doubtful questions. Al-Shāfi'ī said that he never saw his equal among the natives of Egypt, but that he was rather rash, ‡[and (we know) that the only doctors of the sect of Malik whom al-Shāfi'ī saw in that country were Aṣḥhab and Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥukm. It is related by the latter that he heard Aṣḥhab pray for the death of al-Shāfi'ī, who, on learning from him the circumstance, quoted the following verses, which he applied to himself :

*(This information is given in Additions and Corrections by de Slane.)

"Some men desire my death, and if die, I shall not be the sole who travelled in that path. Tell him who strives to obtain constant happiness,<sup>2</sup> that he should lay in a store for another, and a future life; then he shall have nearly (gained his wish) " <sup>3</sup>

Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥukm relates also that al-Shāfi'ī, on his death left, among other property, a slave who was purchased by Aṣḥhab, and that he himself purchased that same slave when Aṣḥhab died. Ibn Yunus speaks of Aṣḥhab in his History, and says; "Aṣḥhab was descended from Qays through the tribe of 'Āmir, and sprang from the family of Ja'dah, his surname was Abu 'Amr: he was one of the first jurisconsults of Egypt, and a

1 See No. 24, note on Qarāfa h.

2 Literally: The contrary of that which is transitory.

3 The signification of the words كُنْ اَمْرًا is explained in M. de Sacy's commentary on the Maqāmahs of al-Ḥariri; see page 311 of that work.

* M. de Slane reads it Maskin. Ed.

† Abu 'Abd Allāh is omitted.—Ed.

‡[ ] From "and (we know)" to the end, not in the autograph.—Ed.

man of great judgment; born A. H. 140 (A. D. 757); died on Saturday, 21 of Sha'ban, A. H. 204 (A. D. 820*). He wore his beard dyed (in imitation of the primitive Muslims).<sup>1</sup> Muḥammad Ibn 'Āsim al-Ma'afirī relates that he had a dream<sup>2</sup> in which he seemed to hear a voice say: "O, Muḥammad!" to which he gave answer, and the voice then pronounced this verse:

"They are gone, those friends on whose departure we exclaim: O, that the earth and those which inhabit it were dissolved!"

"At that time," says he "Aḥḥab was sick, and I said: 'O, how greatly I fear that he may die!' and he died of that illness."

For further reference, see Tahdhib al-Tahdhib, vol. I, p. 359, No. 654.)

98. AṢBAGH AL-MĀLIKĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Aṣbagh Ibn al-Faraj Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Naṣī', a doctor of the sect of Malik and a native of Egypt, studied jurisprudence under Ibn al-Qāsim, Ibn Wahb, and Aḥḥab.<sup>2</sup> It was said by 'Abd al-Malik Ibn al-Majīshūn that Egypt never produced the like of Aṣbagh; and when asked if he did not make an exception in favour of Ibn al-Qāsim, he replied: "Not even Ibn al-Qāsim." He was Katīb<sup>3</sup> to Ibn Wahb, and his ancestor Naṣī', who was an enfranchised slave of 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam the Omaiyide, was governor of Egypt.<sup>4</sup> Aṣbagh died on Sunday, 25th of Shawwāl, 225 (A.D. 840), † some state, however, that his death took place in 226 or 220.

1 See No. 20, note on dreams.

2 For the life of the Aḥḥab, see the preceding article; the lives of Ibn al-Qāsim and Ibn Wahb will be found in the letter 'ayn.

3 Katīb, copyist or secretary.

4 'Abd al-'Azīz was appointed governor of Egypt by his father Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam in the year 65 (A.D. 685), and was authorised by him not only to preside at public prayers (which was the prerogative of the governor), but to collect the revenue. He continued in the exercise of these functions till his death, which took place A.H. 85 (A.D. 704).—Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah.

* 11 February.—Ed.

† 29 August.—Ed.

99 'ĀQ SUNQUR THE ḤĀJIB.

Abn Sa'īd 'Āq Sunqur<sup>1</sup> Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed Qāsim al-Dawlat (partner in the empire), and generally known by the title of al-Ḥājib (the chamberlain) was the ancestor of the Atābeks of Mosul, and the father of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī. He and Buzān<sup>2</sup> prince of Edessa, were mamlūks of the Seljuq Sulṭān, Malik Shāh Ibn Alp Arsilān. When Tāj al-Dawlat Tutuṣh Ibn Alp Arsilān obtained possession of Aleppo (in the year 478) (A.D. 1085)<sup>3</sup>, he left 'Āq Sunqur as his lieutenant in that city, thinking that he could place every reliance on one who was his brother's mamlūk. 'Āq Sunqur, however, revolted, and Tutuṣh, who was then master of Damascus, marched against him and gave him battle. in the month of the first Jumādā, A. H. 487 (A.D. 1094); both sides fought with great animosity, and the conflict terminated by the death of 'Āq Sunqur<sup>4</sup>. He was interred in the Zajjājiyah College at Aleppo. When I visited his tomb, I found it surrounded by a great number of persons, who met there every Friday for the purpose of reading the Qur'ān<sup>5</sup>; and I was informed that (in recompense for their services), a large sum, arising from the revenue of a waqf<sup>6</sup> founded for that purpose, was distributed among them; but I do not know by whom that waqf was established. I have since discovered that it was established by Nur al-Dīn Mahmūd, grandson of 'Āq-Sun-

1 'Āq Sunqur is a Turkish name; it means white falcon.

2 This Buzān assisted 'Āq-Sunqur in his revolt against Tutuṣh, and was taken prisoner and beheaded by that prince, A.H. 487. (Zuhdat al-Ḥalab.) The analysis of this work is given by professor Freytag in his Selecta ex Historia Halebi.

3 It appears from a passage in the life of Tutuṣh, that this date should have been inserted in the Arabic text. It is omitted in most of the manuscripts.

4 A more full account of 'Āq-Sunqur's revolt and death is given by Abu 'l-Fidā in his Annals. Kamāl al-Dīn 'Umar Ibn al-'Adīm says, in his Zuhdat al-Ḥalab, that the troops of 'Āq-Sunqur did not resist an instant, and that he himself was taken prisoner after the battle and beheaded by Tutuṣh.

5 The merits and spiritual recompenses attached to the reading of the Qur'ān are transferable to the dead when this act of piety is performed on their account and in their name.

See note on waqf No. 21

qur; I shall give his life later, and shall narrate also, in the life of Tutuṣh, some particulars respecting 'Āq Sunqur, which are in contradiction to the foregoing statement.<sup>1</sup> The Zajjājiyah College was built by Abu 'l-Rabi' Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Urtuq, prince of Aleppo.<sup>2</sup> 'Āq Sunqur was at first buried at (Mount) Qarnebiye, but his son Zinkī, on obtaining possession of Aleppo, had his body transported to the Zajjājiyah, and introduced it into the city by hoisting it over the wall.<sup>3</sup> 'Āq Sunqur was slain at a village called Ruḡān, which is situated near Sab'in<sup>4</sup> in the dependencies of Aleppo, according to Yāqut (in his Mushtarik).

100. 'ĀQ SUNQUR AL-BURSUQĪ

Abn Sa'īd 'Āq Sunqur al-Bursuqī al-Ghāzī (the warrior), surnamed Qāsim al-Dawlat Sayf al-Dīn (partner in the empire and sword of religion), was prince of Mosul, Raḥabah, and the neighbouring countries. He got possession of these places on the death of the Ispāsālār<sup>5</sup> Mawdūd, who governed them and the Syrian provinces in the name of the Seljuq prince Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh (whose life shall be given in this work). Mawdūd was murdered on Friday, 12th of the second Rabi', A.H. 507 (September, A.D.

<sup>1</sup> This is an oversight of the author; nothing of the kind is to be found in the life of Tutuṣh.

<sup>2</sup> Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār was lieutenant of 'II Ghāzī in Aleppo. (Zubdat al-Ṭalab.)

<sup>3</sup> When the Atābek Zinkī transported the corpse of his father to the college situated in (the quarter of Aleppo called) al-Zajjājan (the glassblowers), he did not bring it through any of the city gates, but had it hoisted over the wall; for it would have been considered as an unlucky omen to introduce a dead body into the city. (Bu ḥiyat al-Ṭalab; Ms. No. 726, fol. 180) Kamāl al-Dīn, the author of this work, states that 'Āq Sunqur governed Aleppo with great justice, and that, under his excellent administration, the revenues of the city amounted to fifteen hundred din-ars per diem. (Fol. 178, v.)

<sup>4</sup> The author of the Mar'at al-Ḥitā' says that Sab'in is a village at the gate of Aleppo, but Abū 'l-Fidā in his history t. III, p. 290, places the field of battle at Tall al-Sulṭīn, on the river Sab'in, at six parasangs from Aleppo.

<sup>5</sup> This word, which is written اسميسلار and اسميسلار signifies commander of the troops.

1113)*: by a gang of Batinites, <sup>1</sup> who attacked him in the great mosque of Damascus. 'Āq Sunqur was then acting as Shahnah <sup>2</sup> at Baghdād, to which post he had been appointed in the year 498 (A.D. 1004-5), by the sultān Muḥammad, who had become master of the empire by the death of his brother Barkyāruq. In the year 499, 'Āq Sunqur was directed by the sultān Muḥammad to lay siege to Tikrīt, which was then in the possession of Kayqubād Ibn Hazāraṣb the Daylamite, who was reported to be a partisan of the Bātinite doctrines. In pursuance of his orders, 'Āq Sunqur made preparations for the expedition, and having set out in the month of Rajab of that year, he besieged Kayqubād till Muḥarram, A.H. 500. When on the point of taking the city, Sayf al-Dawlat Ṣadaqaḥ came up, and was put in possession of it <sup>3</sup> and then returned to Ḥillah, accompanied by Kayqubād, who took with him his treasures, but died on arriving. The sultān Muḥammad, on being informed of Mawdūd's assassination, ordered 'Āq Sunqur to set out for Mosul, and make preparations for attacking the Franks in Syria. On arriving at Mosul, he established his authority in the city, and then made an expedition against the Franks, whom he forced to raise the siege of Aleppo, which was closely pressed by them; he then returned to Mosul, and continued to inhabit it till his death. He was one of the greatest and most celebrated amīrs under the Seljukides. It was in the mosque of Mosul, on Friday, 9th of Dhū'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 520 (November, A.D. 1126),† that he met with his death by the hands of some Batinites. ‡ Ibn al-Jawzī says, in his History, that he was slain in the Maqsūrah <sup>4</sup> of the Mosque

---

1 The Batinities are the same as the Ismailians: they are better known in Europe as the Assassins الحشيشية See M. de Sacy's Memoire sur la dynastie des Assassins et sur l'etymologie de leur nom, and his Histoire des Druzes.

2 See no. 77, note on Shahnah.

3 This was a concerted plan between Sadaqaḥ and Kayqabad, and must have caused great disappointment to 'Āq Sunqur, who had the promise of the sultān to be allowed to retain Tikrīt as a fief after he had captured it. (Ibn al-Aṭhīr's Kamil).

4 In the great mosques, a railed enclosure or pew, called the. Maqsūrah is reserved for the sultān or his lieutenant.

* 26 September.—Ed.

† 26 November.—Ed.

‡ From 'Ibn al-Jawzī' to 'Power' not in the autograph.—Ed.

of Mosul, A.H. 519, whilst the Katib 'Imād al-Dīn states that it happened in 520; the latter writer says: "The assassins, who were sitting in the mosque, in the dress of Sūfīs, sprang upon him as he was retiring from prayers, and stabbed him in many places. This was in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah. Their enmity had been excited against him, because he had persecuted and slain them in great numbers, with the intention of eradicating their power."] The government of 'Āq Sunqur passed to his son 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, whose death took place on Tuesday, 22nd of the latter Jumādā, 521 (July, A.D. 1127)* 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī (son of the 'Āq Sunqur whose life is given in the preceding article) was his successor.--The derivation of Bursuq was unknown to me, and al-Sam'ānī makes no mention of the word; but I have since discovered that it comes from Bursuq, the name of a Mamlūk belonging to the sultān Muḥammad Ṭughrulbek, whose life we intend to give. This Bursuq held a high rank under the Seljuq dynasty, and was one of their most remarkable and ominent amīrs.

---

* 5 July.—Ed.

A

- 'Ā'shah (widow of Muḥammad), 46.
 'Āsim, 52.
 Ibn 'Abdah, 109n.
 'Abbād (al-Mu'taḍid), 202, 204.
 'Abbād Abul Ḥasan, 320.
 Ibn 'Abbād (al-Mu'tamīd), 204.
 Ibn 'Abbād, the Ṣāhib, 314-315, 318, 319n, 320.
 Ibn al-Abbār, 68n, 72n, 79n.
 Ibn al-Abbār (Abū Ja'far Aḥmad) Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḳhawlanī, 204-205, Abbās, 315.
 Al-'Abbās (Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib), 62n.
 Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf, 67, 68, 71.
 Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Māmūn, 65.
 Abul 'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Sahl Kātib, 147.
 Abu'l 'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī, Ibn Bābah al-Qābisi, 265.
 Ibn 'Abbās (Abu'l-Abbās 'Abd Allāh, 19, 31, 153, 153n.
 *Al-'Ābbasah, 96n.
 'Abadah Ibn al-Ṭabīb, 255.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amir Ibn Karīz, 105, 106, 142.
 'Abd Allāh (Brother to Nizār) 249n, 250.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, see Ḥanbal.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī al-'Abbāsī, 72.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 136.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aṭā, 8.
 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 71.
 'Abd Allāh, 100.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Salamah, 75n.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, 275.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī'ah, 25.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak, 111.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh, the son of al-Muḥtadi, 112.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn Qāsim al-utaqi, 327n.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad. Ibn 'Alī al-'Azimī, 265n.
 'Abd 'l-Barr, 137n, 138.
 'Abd al-Laṭīf, 27.
 'Abd Munāf, 94, 95.
 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhārī, 293.
 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn al faql, 76.
 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān, 17, 76n, 229.
 'Abd al-Ḥukm Ibn al-Ḳhaṭīb, 56, 57.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Muḥammad, 152.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Sulaymān, 330.
 'Abd al-Karīm, 115n.
 'Abd al-Laṭīf, 266n.
 'Abd al-Malik, 171.
 'Abd al-Qāhīr Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz (Abū Muḥammad), 226.
 'Abd al-Qāhīr Ibn Muḥammad, 217.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 79n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad, 312.
 Abrahām, 84, 95.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Nūr al-Laznī, 88.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Aḥmad, the 'Alide, 63n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abdūs, 75n, 116, 145.
 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 100.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qurayshī, 85n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn wa'lah al-Sabā'i, 153.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 211.
 Ibn 'Abd Rabbīh, 159-162.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Wāhid, al-Baghdādī, 160.
 'Abd Bani'l-Ḥaghās Suhaym, 64.
 'Abdah Ibn al-Ṭabīb, 255.
 Ibn 'Abdah al-Abbādānī, 108n.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Isfār, a'nī, 111.
 Al-'Abdī Ibn Baqiyyah, 146-147.
 Al-'Abdī Qāḍī, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Al-Barā, 150n.
 Ibn 'Abdūs, 75n.
 Abū Bakr, 287.
 Abū Bakr (Ḳhalīf) 7, 40, 46n, 101, 153n.
 Abū Bakr al-Ḳhuwārazmī, 315.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Zaydūn, 204.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Mujāhid al-Muqrī, 148.
 'Abu 'l-Fidā, 22, 24, 26, 41, 62, 64, 80, 85n, 96, 97n, 99, 105, 111, 121, 139, 156, 196, 206, 207, 221, 243, 252, 308, 342.
Adab al-Ḳhawāṣṣ, 161.
 'Aḍad Al-Dawlat (Fennā' ḥurū) Ibn Buwayh, 58, 81, 178, 183n, 228, 243, 316.
 Adam, 323.
 Aden, 231.
 'Āderbijān, 55.
 Aḡḡanah, 104.

- 'Adi, 234.
 'Adnān, 216n.
 Abū 'Adīnah, 15.
 'Adī Ibn Zayd al-'Ibādī, 284.
 Ibn 'Adī Abū 'Abd Allāh al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sattār, 152, 270.
 'Ādil Ibn Ziyād, 284n.
 Ibn al-'Adīm Kamāl al-Dīn 'Umar, 15.
 Ibn 'Adlān, 259.
 'Adnān, 220n.
 Al-'Afḍal Shāhanshāh Amīr al-Juyūsh, 248, 249n, 250n, 263.
 'Afīf al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Adlān, 259.
 Africa, 138.
 Afṣā, 97, 147.
 Al-Afshīn, 122, 123.
 Al-Aghānī (Abul Farj Ispahānī), 16, 64, 67, 68n, 70, 196, 256, 284.
 Al 'Aqr, 72.
 Aḥkām al-Qur'ān, 108.
 Aḥmad, see Ḥanbal.
 Aḥmad, see al-Mutanabbī.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Abī Duwād, 122, 130, 131-132.
 Aḥmad Ibn Abī Khālid al-Aḥwal, 65.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ṭulūn (Abū 'l-'Abbās, 108n, 241, 242.
 Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 141.
 Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf, 242.
 Al-Aḥnaf, Ibn Qays, 105n, 106n, 142.
 Al-Aḥwal, see Aḥmad.
 Al-Ahwāzī, 136, 220, 243, 244.
 Al-Ahwāzī 213.
 Ibn al-Ahẓam, 75n.
 'Ayyak (Ḥusayn Ibn 'Ayyak), 11.
 'Ayn al-Tamar, 301.
 'Aynī, 311.
 Ayyar Ibn Ḥuṭaiyah, 307n.
 Al-Akhfaṣh al-Aṣghar Abū Ḥasan 'Alī, 146, 147, 184, 279.
 Ibn Akḥī 'l-'Ilm, 56.
 Aksab, 264.
 Aksuk, 262.
 'Āq Sunqur al-Bursuqī, 331-333.
 'Āq-Sunqur the Ḥājib, 329-331.
 Al-Aqṭa', 243.
 Abū 'l-'Alā al-Mu'arri, 7, 34, 166, 167n, 182, 206.
 Ibn Abī 'l-'Alā, 319n.
 Ibn al-'Alā 'Umar, 303n.
 Al-'Alamūt, 248.
 Al-'Alawī Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad, 181n.
 Al-'Alawī Abū 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad, 244.
 Al-'Alawī Abū Ja'far, 235.
 Aleppo, 2, 15, 24, 61, 207, 225, 227, 280n, 293, 329, 330, 331, 332.
 Alexandria, 49, 59, 152, 153, 155n, 156n, 184, 228, 248, 249n, 250 n, 271.
 'Alī (Prince), 237.
 'Alī Abū 'l-Ḥasan, 85.
 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 109, 111n.
 'Alī Ibn Abī 'l-Faḍl Ibn 'l-'Umayd Abul-Faṭḥ, 316.
 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭalīb (Khalīf, 13, 46n, 63n, 72n, 116, 117, 154n, 188, 191, 213n, 216n, 151n, 278n, 310, 317.
 'Alī al-Harawī Shaykh, 293.
 'Alī Ibn Mufarrij, 271.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad 'al-Miṣri, 150n.
 Abū 'Alī Kathīr Ibn Aḥmad, 318.
 Abū 'Alī al-Qālī, 312, 313, 314.
 Al-māriyayh, 96.
 Alūh, 262.
 Ibn Alūh, 260.
 Amālī (Qālī), 16, 75, 312.
 Al-A'maṣh, 281n.
 Amid, 206, 262.
 Ibn al-'Umayd Abū 'l-Faḍl, 183.
 Al-'Amīdī, 93.
 Abū 'Āmir, 170, 171n.
 Ibn 'Āmir 'Abd Allāh, 106n.
 Ibn 'Āmir al-Marwarrūdhī (Qāḍī Abū Ḥāmid Aḥmad), 49.
 Ibn 'Ammār, Abū 'Alī, 227.
 'Ammār Ibn Shadhī Aḥmad, 66.
 'Amr Ibn 'Adl al-Lakhīmī, 285.
 'Amr, 205, 234.
 Abū 'Amr, 75n.
 Abū 'Amr al-Shaybānī, 276, 277.
 Āmul, 54n, 104.
 'Anazī, 311.
 Anbār, 301.

- Al-Anbārī (Abu 'l-Barakāt 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Muḥammad), 60, 146.
 Ibn al-Anbārī Abū Bakr, 147, 149, 312.
 'Anbasah Ibn Ishāq Ibn 'Amr Abū Ja'far, 191n.
 Andolus, 84, 89, 90, 197.
 'Ānah (city), 265.
 'Antarah, 213n.
 Antioch, 283.
 Anmūdhaj, 84.
 Al-Anmāṭi (Abu 'l-Qāsim), 101.
Ansālb al-'Arab, 97.
Al-Ansāb (Sam'āni) 55, 102n, 118, 119, 144, 266.
 Anṣārī, 168.
 Anṭākī, 194.
 Anṭākiyah, 194.
 Anūjūr, 176n.
 'Āq-Sunqur al-Bursuqi Abū Sa'id, 329n, 330, 331, 332, 333.
 Al-'Aqabah, 121.
 Al-'Arab, Umm, 95.
 Ibn al-'Arabī, 80, 147, 148, 282.
 Arbela, 7, 10, 61, 157, 158, 225, 257, 260, 291, 292, 296.
 Al-Arbali (see Irbili).
Arabian Nights, 241.
 Ardshir, 30.
 Al-Ardebili (Tāhir al-Dīn), 147.
 Ibn al-'Arif Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad al-Sunhāji, 236, 237.
 Aristotle, 283.
 Arsīlān, 265.
 Al-Arrajān, 69, 183n, 216, 219, 220, 278.
 Al-Arrajāni Abū Bakr (qāḍī), 261.
 Al-Arrajāni (Nāṣih al-Dīn), 215, 221.
 Arri Dr., 179n.
 Armenia, 207n, 314.
 Arsīlān Shāh Nūr al-Dīn, 266, 267.
 Artuq Ibn Aksuk, 2, 263, 262, 264.
 Asad, 64n, 140, 178, 293, 311.
 Al-Asad al-'Ijlī, 287-289.
 Al-Asad al-Mihāni Abū'l-Faṭḥ, 285-287.
 Al-As'ad Ibn Mammāti, 289-294.
 Ibn 'Asākir, 117, 226.
 Aṣbagh al-Mālikī, 328, 329, 330.
 'Aṣhā, 145n.
 'Āshir, 97.
 Aṣḥab al-Qaysi, 327, 328.
 Al-Aṣḥabi, 90n.
 Abul'l-Aṣḥā'ir, 182n.
 Aṣḥab al-Qaysi Abū 'Amr, 327, 328.
 Aṣḥja' son of Rayṭh son of Ghatafān, 171.
 Aṣḥja' al-Sulamī, Abū 'l-Walid, 304, 305.
 Al-Aṣḥja'i al-Andalusī, 168-171.
 Assyria, 39.
 'Āsim, 52.
 Ibn 'Āsim al-Ma'āfiri, 328.
 'Askari, 136.
 'Askar Mukram, 215, 216, 220.
 'Asqālān, 94.
 Al-Asqlāni, 108n, 109n.
 Al-Aṣma'i, 80n, 129, 257n, 279, 281.
 Astarābād, 28.
 Abū 'l-Aswad al-Duwalī, 19.
 Atābek Zankī, 221, 224, 225, 252, 331.
 Alṭha'ālibī, 314.
 Ibn 'Aḍā Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad'184n, Abū'l-'Atāhiyah, 68, 280, 301-302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308n, 309, 310, 311.
 Ibn 'Aṭīyah al-'Aṭawi, 278, 279, 280.
 Ibn al-Aṭḥir I, 11, 22, 63, 72, 262n, 263, 278, 288, 332.
 'Aydān al-Saqqā, 181.
 'Aydmor 'Izz al-Dīn, 8.
 Al-Ayk wa 'l-Ghuṣūn, 162.
 Al-A'war, 289.
 Ibn 'Awn al-Ḥariri, 185.
 Aṣṣaf, 114, 151.
 Ayar Ibn Ḥuṭaiyah, 307n.
 Abū 'l 'Aynā, 121, 122, 130, 135.
 'Ayn al-Tamar, 301, 311.
 'Ayn al-Zamān, 221.
 Al-Azd, 110, 232.
 Al-Azdi, Jamal al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Mansūr Tāhir, 239n.
 Al-Azdi, Abū 'l-Mubarak 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Muḥammād, 288.
 'Aziz Ibn al-Mu'izz al-'Ubaydi, 192, 193.
 Al-'Aziz Nizār, 31.
 Azhar Ibn al-Sammān Abū Bakr, 267, 268, 269.
 Ibn 'Azib, 164.
 Ibn al-'Azīmi, 265n.
 Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqi, 245.

B

Al-Babbaghā Abū'l-Faraj, 184.

- Bāb Dazlī, 318, 319.
 Bāb al-Maqām, 293n.
 Ibn Bābah al-Qābisi, 265.
 Bābek, 122.
 Badī' al-Zamān al-Hamudānī Abul-'l-
 Faḍl Ahmad, 186-188.
 Badr al-Dīn Abū Faḍā'il Lūlū, 256, 267.
 Badr al-Jamālī, 294.
 Badr al-Dīn al-Sinjārī, qāḍī, 8-9.
 Baghdād, 25n, 48, 50, 51, 53n, 54, 55,
 56, 59, 60, 62, 63, 64, 68, 75, 78, 80, 81,
 83, 90, 93, 95, 97, 99n, 102, 105n, 106,
 107, 109n, 110, 111, 112, 113n, 114,
 118, 126, 129n, 133, 134, 137, 139, 143,
 145, 148, 150, 152, 155, 156n, 158,
 160n, 165, 178, 183n, 196, 199, 200,
 212, 222, 229, 242, 244, 246, 264, 265,
 269, 275, 276, 277, 280n, 281n, 283,
 286, 287, 302, 304, 305, 309, 313.
 Al-Baghdādī, Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Umar
 Khaṭīb Abū Bakr Ahmad, 21, 24, 28,
 54n, 59, 107, 111, 112, 114, 118, 129n,
 137, 138, 139, 150n, 160, 196n, 208, 226,
 286.
 Bahā al-Dīn al-Sinjārī Abū 'l-Sa'ādāt
 As'ad Ibn Yahyā, 294-298.
 Bahā al-Dīn Zuhayr, 234.
 Bahā al-Dawlat Ibn 'Aḍad al-Dawlat
 Ibn Buwayh, 264.
 Bahā al-Dīn Qarāqūsh, 253.
 Bāhilah, 220, 267.
 Al-Baḥr al-Zākhir, 13.
 Bahrā, 168.
 Bahrayn, 25n, 168.
 Al-Bākhārī, 141.
 Bakhtyār 'Izz al-Dawlah, 81.
 Bakkār ibn Qutaybah, 229.
 Ibn Bakkār, 300.
 Bakr ibn Wā'il, 151.
 Abū Bakr al-Khaṭīb, 286.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd al-Azdi, 312.
 Al-Balādhuri, Ahmad ibn Yahyā, 314.
 Balḫ, 7, 24, 49, 94, 106n, 227, 279n.
 Balansiyay (Valencia) Spain, 89.
 Banu 'l-'Abbās, 162.
 Banu 'l-'Allāt, 237.
 Banu 'l-Ḥashās, 64, 233.
 Banū Kalb, 176.
 Banū Marwān, 245n.
 Banū Tamīm, 255.
 Banū Tūma, 229n.
 Banū Waḍḍāh, 169.
 Ibn al-Baqīyah al-'Abdi, 146-147.
 Al Barā al-'Abdi, 150.
 Baradā, 290.
 Kitāb al-Bārī, 312.
 Bariḥ, 163.
 Ibn Barmak, 7.
 Barmakide, 123.
 Barqā, 250n.
 al-Bāriq al-Shāmī, 254.
 Al-Bāriqi, 322.
 Al-Berzali, Abū Muḥammad, 10.
 Basā (town), 265.
 Al-Basāsiri Abū 'l-Hārith Arsilān Ibn
 'Abd Allāh al-Turki, 111n, 264-266.
 Būshān, 142.
 Baṣṣir, 168.
 Baṣṣhār Ibn Burd, 304, 305, 307.
 Ibn Bāssam, 84, 85, 87, 169, 197, 205.
 Ibn Baṣṣuwal Abū Bakr, 171, 203, 321.
 Baṣṣit, 145n.
 Baṣrah, 22, 24, 25, 54, 105, 106n, 108n,
 125, 129, 133, 147n, 154n, 221, 240, 267,
 268, 278, 279n, 298, 312.
 Al-Baṣri, 268.
 Baṣā'ih, 239, 240.
 Ibn al-Baṣṣi, Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad
 Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī, 87n, 287.
 Baḥḥā, 57.
 Ibn -Bāṣṣh Abu 'l-Majd Ismā'il Ibn
 Hibat Allāh Ibn Sa'id, 280.
 Ibn Bāwak, 7.
 Bayyāsah, 319n.
 Al-Bayyāsī, 319.
 Baydā, 54n.
 Al-Bayḍāwī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 54, 238n.
 Al-Bayḍāwī, Abū 'l-Khayr, 54.
 Al-Buhturi 34, 66, 165, 182n, 253.
 Bawāzīj, 60.
 Bayhaq, 115.
 Al-Bayhaqī Abū Bakr Ahmad
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd
 Allāh Ibn Mūsā, 50, 86, 114, 115.
 Al-Bayḍāwī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 54n.
 Al-Bayḍāwī, Abū al-Khayr, 54n.
 Ibn al-Bayy' Ḥakīm Abū 'Abd Allāh, 114.
 Bāyazīd Sulṭān, 14.
 Bedwīns, 255n.

Bijāyah, 97.
 Bilāl Ibn Abi Burdah, 31.
 Bilbais, 96n.
 Biographical Dictionary, 1.
 Al-Birah, 203.
 Ibn Bishrān, 290.
 Bishr al-Ḥāfi, 98, 99, 138.
 Bughiyah, 304.
 Bughiyat al-Multamis, 169n, 171n, 180, 196n.
 Bughiyat al-Ṭalab, 15, 280n.
 Buḥārā, 31, 242.
 Al-Buḥārī, Maḥammad, 18-98, 275, 287n.
 Būrān, Daughter to al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, 78.
 Bustān, 139.
 Buḥaynah, 153.
 Ibn Buḥlān, 283n.
 Buwayh, 81.
 Ibn Buwayh, Mū'izz al-Dawlat, 242-245.
 Ibn Buwayh, Muwayyad al-Dawlat, 315.
 Buzā'ū, 206, 207.

C

Caifa (Ḥayfah), 248n.
 Cairo, 8, 24, 29, 31, 39, 44, 55, 56, 59, 95, 109, 116, 146, 154n, 183n, 191, 194, 228, 234, 238, 239, 241, 242, 249, 257, 260, 270, 273, 291.
 Cana'an, 86n.
 Cais fils d'Acem, 256n.
 Casiri 12.
 Caussin M., 278n.
 Ceuta, 96, 239.
 Chancery, 250n.
 Charpud, 207n.
 Conde, 201n.
 Conspectus operis Ibn Challikani, 4.
 Constantinople, 206.
 Cordova, 79, 80, 122, 162, 168, 180, 201, 203, 204, 312.

D

Dabbā, 184n.
 Damietta, 232.
 Abu'l-Dann, 112.
 Al-Daqqāq, 169n.

Dār al-Ḥadīth al-Kāmiliyah, 154n.
 Al-Dārakī, Abu'l-Qāsim, 54n, 107, 111.
 Dārim Ibn Mālik, 186.
 Al-Dāraqūṇi, 51q, 113, 274.
 Al-Dāraqūṇi Abu'l-Ḥasan, 116, 117.
 Ibn Darastawayh, 312.
 Abu'l-Dardā, 31.
 Al-Darir, Abū Mu'āwiyah, 135, 281n.
 Ibn Darrāj, 196, 197, 201.
 Al-Darrābūn, 317n.
 Damascus, 7, 8, 24, 27, 29, 31, 90, 116, 117, 121, 154n, 156n, 183n, 208, 211, 221, 226, 227n, 228n, 241, 259, 263, 269, 270, 273, 280n, 290, 293, 295, 305.
 Ibn al-Dāyah, 242n.
 Daylam, 173, 243.
 Daylamite, 81.
 Daynaur, 212.
 Dayr al-'Āqūl, 178.
 Da'wat al-Aṭibhā, 283.
 Al-Dhahābi, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 24, 28, 41, 275, 312.
 Al-Dahlak Ibn Qays al-Fihri, 168.
 Al-Dhakhīrat fi 'Ilm al-Baṣīrat, 143.
 Dhakhīrah, 85, 87, 197, 205.
 Dhayl (Muadḥayyāl), 286.
 Dhuhl, 151.
 Dhul Qarnayn (Alexander), 49, 136.
 Dhul Qarnayn Ibn Ḥamadān, 189.
 Dhul Riyāsatayn, al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, 72.
 Diyā' al-Dīn Ḥāfiḡ, 156n.
 Di'bil Ibn 'Alī al-Khuzā'i, 64, 73, 121.
 Ibn Dihyah Dhul-Nisbayn Ḥāfiḡ, 291, 292.
 Ibn Dinār, 'Abd Allāh, 63.
 Druzes, 144n.
 Diyār Bakr, 206, 245, 263, 313.
 Dīwān Amro 'l-Qais, 224, 295n.
 Dīwān of Ibn Mammāṭi, 292.
 Dīwān of al-Mutanabbī, 177n.
 D'oḥsson, 264n, 274n.
 Al-Duw'al al-Munqaṭi'ah, 239n.
 Dubayas Ibn Ṣadaqaḡ, 286n.
 Al-Dubbi, 114.
 Ibn al-Dubayṭhi, 59.
 Abū Dalaf, 122.

Du'luj. Abū Muḥammad, 51.
 Ibn Du'mā, 147.
Al-Durr al-Naẓīm, 29n.
Durrat al-Aslāk fī Dawlat al-Atrāk, 2.
 Ibn Durayd, Abū Bakr, 134.
 Ibn Durustūwayh, 184.
 Ibn Dust, 188.
 Ibn Abī Duwād, Qāḍī, 27, 76,
 155, 278n.

E

Edessa, 260.
 Edward Mahlar 137, 254n, 273.
 Egypt, 2, 9, 20, 29, 30, 40, 49, 53n, 55,
 57, 59, 94, 95, 107, 108n, 110, 140,
 145, 146, 148n, 152, 153, 154n, 155n,
 156, 176, 178, 183n, 188, 190, 192, 193,
 197, 199, 200n, 224n, 227n, 230n, 231,
 234, 235, 238, 239, 241, 246, 247, 252,
 257, 258, 259, 260, 263, 264, 266,
 269, 270, 271, 275, 289, 293, 294, 299,
 301, 310.
 Emessa, 223.
 Erḍe Rūm, 314.
 Euphrates, 207n, 240n, 301.

F

Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī', 128.
 Al-Faḍl Ibn Yahyā, 238.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl, 213.
 Abū Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn Abī Ṭayfūr, 160n.
 Al-Fāḍil Qāḍī, 207, 234, 253, 254.
 Al-Fāḍil Ibn Yahyā, al-Ṭawīl, 238.
 Al-Fā'iz, 'Isā Ibn Zāfir al-'Ubaydī, 5.
 Fakhr al-Dawlat Abū Naṣr, Muḥammad
 Ibn Jahīr, 262, 320.
 Fakhr al-Dīn, 66n.
 Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, 274.
 Al-Fakīk, 'Abd al-'Azīz, 85.
 Fannā Khusrū, 245, 310n.
 Al-Faramā, 95.
 Al-Faraḍī, Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣṭafā, 13.
 Ibn al-Fariḍ, 34.
 Al-Farghānī, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd
 Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, 241 n, 241, 242.
 Abu 'l-Faraj Ispahānī, 67, 193n.
 Faras, 106n.
 Al-Fāriqi, 245.
 Ibn Fāris, 173, 187, 314.
 Al-Fārisī Abū 'Alī, 79, 146, 174, 265, 321.

Al-Fārisī, Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-Ghāfir
 50, 119, 318.
 Al-Farrā', 48, 279.
 Fārs, 265.
 Al-Fasawī, 265.
 Al-Fāshān, 142.
 Al-Fāshānī, 141.
Faṣīh, 149.
 Fāṭik al-Aṣudī, 184n.
 Fāṭik al-Majnūn, 183n.
 Fāṭik Ibn, Abī 'l-Jahl, 178.
 Fāṭimāh, 274n, 310n.
 Fāṭimah al-Juzdāniyah, 287.
 Fayrūr, 72.
Fawāt al-Wafayāt, 12.
 Fayrūzābādī, 23.
 Faz (Faz) 31, 96, 238, 239.
 Firūzābād, 52, 54, 55.
 Fityān, Abek, 208.
Fihrist (Kitāb al), 3, 8n, 25, 71n, 83, 184n.
 Franks, 252, 253.
 Freyag, 285n.
 Florus, 22.
 Flugel, 169n, 277n, 288.
 Frederic II, 258.
 Ibn al-Furāt Waizir, 71n.
 Al-Furāt, Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad,
 150, 263.
 Al-Furawī Muḥammad, 115.
Kitāb al-Fuṣūṣ, 307.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijlī, 287-289.

G

Gaza, 94.
 Gazas, 95.
 Ghadāyā, 210.
 Ghadir Khumn, 250.
Gharīb al-Muṣannaf, 80.
 Ghāsib, 179n.
 Ghassān, 232.
 Ghassanide (princes), 264n.
 Ghānim Ibn Abī 'l-'Atā, 319n.
 Ghaylān, 89.
 Gehinnam, 271.
 Ibn Ghāzī, 263.
 Ghazzāh, 13, 94,
 Ghazzālī, 144.
 Al-Ghazzālī, Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad
 103, 104, 143, 144, 157, 257, 288.

Al-Ghazzālī, Abū 'l Fath Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad, 142-144
 Al-Ghazzī, 'Alī iAbū 'Umar, 75n.
 Al-Ghazzī, Abū Ishāq, 199, 219.
Ghaznah, 285
 (Kitāb al-Ghilmān, 82.
Ghūṭah, 290n
 Gibbon's Decline and Fall, 86n, 258n.
 Greeks, 264n.

H

Ibn al-Habāb, 231.
 Ibn Ḥabīb Shaykh Nūr al-Dīn Ḥasan, 2.
 Ḥabīb see Abū Tammām.
 Ibn Ḥabīb al-Ḥalabī, 2.
 Al-Hādī, 68n.
 Al-Hāfiz li-Dīn Allāh, Abū Maymūn 'Abd al-Majid, 239.
 Abū Ḥafṣ al-Lūṭī, 282.
 Ibn Hajar 'Asqalānī, 47n.
 Ibn Ḥajjāj al-Husayn, 191, 268n.
 Al-Hajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, 220, 237 319, 322
 Ḥājī Khalīfah, 11, 12, 21, 47, 71, 77n, 80n, 84, 90, 100, 103, 108n, 139n, 150n, 154n, 169n, 236n, 239, 241n, 242n, 265n, 277, 288n, 299.
 Ibn Ḥājib, 29.
 Ḥājir, 95, 298,
 Al-Hākīm, 'Ubaydī, 31, 193, 238n.
 Al-Hākīm, (Ibn al-Baṭṭī) 29.
 Al-Ḥalabī, Abū 'l-Qāsim, 184.
 Al-Hallāj, History of al Hallāj, 24.
 Ḥalīl, 251n.
 Ḥamadān, 171, 172, 187, 231, 263n. 286
 Al-Hamdānī, 'Alī Ibn Ḥatīm, 231.
 Al-Hamādānī, Badī' al-Zamān, 171, 187.
 Ḥamāh, 168, 207, 234, 274.
 Abū Ḥamid, al-Isfarā'nī, 111, 113.
Ḥamāsah, 16, 73n, 74, 92, 93, 140, 169, 255, 319.
 Ibn Ḥamdūn (Sayf al-Dawlat), 176.
 Ḥammād Ibn Maslamah, 24.
 Ḥammer, M. de, 12, 36n.
 Al-Ḥamzī, 96.
 Ibn Ḥanbal, 26, 97, 98, 99, 100, 117, 126, 156n. 275, 276, 287.
 Abū Ḥanīfah, (imām) 7, 24, 26, 27, 48, 107, 108, 118.

Ibn Hānī, 279.
 Ḥanzalah (son of Mālik), 274, 276.
 Ibn Ḥarb, 129n.
 Ḥarb Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 98, 138.
 Ibn Harbawayh, 109.
 Al-Ḥarbī, Ibrāhīm, 99n, 148, 148n.
 Ḥarrān, 53n, 72, 80n, 252, 253, 260.
 Al-Harrāsī, Abū-'l-Ḥasan al-Kiyā, 144.
 Al-Hariri, 45n. 163n. 171, 186, 187, 216n. 259n. 261n, 297.
 Al-Hariri, Abū-'l-Khattāb, Ibn 'Awn, 184, 185.
 Abū 'l-Nāsr al-Harthīmī, 179n.
 Al-Harawī, Abū 'Ubayd Aḥmad, 141, 142.
 Ḥarūn al Rashīd, 61, 67, 104, 179n, 199n, 281, 304n, 305.
 Herāt, 187, 188.
 Abū al-Ḥasan Ibn Zayd, 310n.
 Abū-'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Hammām, 167.
 Abū-'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al Harawī, 293n.
 Abū-'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al Fakik, 85.
 Abū-'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā al-Alavī, 181.
 Al-Ḥasan Abū Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, Ibn Jakīnā, 261.
 Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Buzurk Umlid 250n.
 Ḥāshim, 61, 94, 95.
 Al-Hattāk (Diyār Bakr), 245.
 Hawāzin, Ibn, 115n.
 Ibn Hawqal, 246n.
 Ḥayder Ibn Kā'ūs, 122n.
 Abū-'l-Hayzā 251.
 Ḥayyūj, 121.
 Ḥayyān, 99.
 Abū-'l-Hayyān 'Alī, 105.
 Ibn Ḥayyūs, 208.
 Al-Ḥazīrī, 207.
 Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhiri, 169, 237.
 Al-Ḥazāimī, 69, 220.
 Herāt, 49, 53n, 106n, 142.
 D. Harbelot, 279n.
 Abū-'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh, 214.
 Abū Hifān al-Mahzamī, 129.
 Ḥijāz, 27, 53d, 107, 114, 275, 298, 301.
Ḥilyat al-Awlyā, 135, 136.
Ḥilyat al-Fuqaha, 171.

- Himyar, 86n, 231n.
 Ibn Hinzaba, 235.
 Hilarah 264n, 284, 285.
 Ibn Hisham, 22.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 31n.
 Hishām al-Muwayyad Billāh, 196n.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān (Khalif), 159.
 Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, 281n.
 Hishan Kayā, 270.
 Hishn Ziyād, 207.
History of Arbela, 269, 292.
History of Aleppo, 21, 265n.
History of Baghādād, 21, 24, 118, 129, 138, 196n.
History of Islāmism, 22.
 History of Ispahān, 136.
 History of Nayshapūr (Hākim), 24.
 Hobbān, 220n.
 Hadhaige, 279n.
 Hudhayl, Allah, 211n, 279.
Kitāb al-Hujjah, 321.
 Ibn al-Hulay'ah, 239.
al-Hullat al-Siyara, 68n, 72, 79n, 85n.
 Hulwān, 262.
 Humayd al-Tawil, 267.
 Abu 'l-Hudhayl al 'Allāf, 211, 279.
 Al-Humaydi, 54.
 Husn al Muḥāqarah, 28n, 29, 30, 230n, 293n.
 Ibn Husūl, Abu'l-'Alū Muḥammad, 188.
 Al-Husayn Ibn Naṣr, Qāḍi Abū 'Abd Allāh, 60.
 Abu 'l Husayn Ahmad al 'Alawī, 244.
 Al-Husayn (Imām), 188n.
 Al-Husayn father of Mutanabbi, 180, 181n.
 Al-Husayn Ibn Hajjāj, 191n.
 Al-Husayn, Ibn Mālik, 7.
 Al-Husayn Ibn al-Dahḥak, 125.
 Al-Husayni, Sharif Thanā al Mulk, 250n.
 Hushaym Ibn Bushayr, 280.
 Al-Huṣrī, 84, 86.
 Al-Huṭayyah, 307n.
 Ibn al-Huṭayyah, 238, 239.
 I
 'Ibādī, 284.
 Ibrāhīm, 297.
 Ibrāhīm, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 75.
 Abū Ibrāhīm, 299.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās, 132.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān al 'Urūdī, 184.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Abi Bakr, 43.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥasan, 121.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī, 60, 68, 242, 305.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥalebī, 274n.
 Ibrāhīm al-Kalbī, 47-48.
 Ibrāhīm al-Nadīm al Mawṣilī, 67-69, 278, 280, 281, 282.
 Ibrāhīm Nākha'i, 47.
 Ibrāhīm, al-Shīrāzī, 51, 52, 53, 55, 83, 100, 104, 107, 111, 113, 137, 139, 157.
 Ibrāhīm Silafī, 156.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, 99.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ṣulī, 71, 72, 73, 74, 79.
 'Idāh, 146, 174, 265.
 Idem, 207n.
 Idrīs, 83.
 Al-Idrīsī, 201.
 'Ilān, 220n.
 Al-Ilālī, 79-80, 180.
 Ifranjah (France), 90.
 Ifriqiyah, 72, 85, 86.
 Ifriqush, 86n.
 Ifṭikhār al-Dawlat, 248n.
 Ifṭikīn, 250n.
Ihyā 'Ulūm al-Dīn, 143, 157.
 'Ijl Ibn Lujayn, 288, 289.
 Al-'Ijlī, Abū Dulaf, 122.
 Al 'Ijlī, Abū 'l-Futūh, 287-289.
 Ikhshid. 176-183.
 al-Ikhshidī, 288.
Ikhṭilāf al-Ulāmā, 108.
Ikmāl, 158n.
 'Imād al-Dīn (Ibn Bātiṣh). 280n.
 'Imād al-Dīn (Rajā), 217.
 'Imād al-Dīn al-Ispahānī. 254, 260, 261.
 'Imād al-Dīn (Jibril), 59.
 'Imād al-Dīn, Kātib, 61-85n, 88, 91, 214, 215, 221, 228, 229, 233, 234, 253, 261, 262, 269, 273, 291, 294, 298.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn al Maṣṣūb, 251.
 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī 168, 224n, 267.
 Al-'Imādiyah, 251.
 Imām al-Haramayn, 115, 142.
 Imāmāh, 76.

- Ibn al Mubārak, 25.
 Imra' al-Qays, 15, 68n, 88, 170, 189, 210.
 'Irāq, 27, 48, 51, 55, 60, 66, 106n, 107, 108, 114, 118, 136, 144, 146, 183n, 191, 224, 240, 242, 244, 261, 264, 267, 268, 275.
 Al-'Irāqī, 'Abdal Raḥmān Ibn Ḥusayn, 11.
 Al-'Irāqī, Khatib Abū Ishāq, 55, 56.,
 Irbil, 60, 260.
 Irshād, 108.
 'Isā Ibn Zayd, 310, 311.
 Al-Iṣbahānī, Abū Nu'aym, 28, 116, 135-137, 319n.
 Iṣḥāq, 205.
 Iṣṭakhr, 49, 54.
 Iṣṭakharzi, 49.
 Ibn Ishāq, 22-24, 94.
 Ishāq al-Mawṣilī, 277-283.
 Ishāq, 298.
 Ishaq ibn Hunayn Abu Ya'qūb, 283-285.
 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Sayyār, 279n.
 Ishāq, Ibn Rahawayh, see Ibn Rahawayh
 Ishāq Ibn Mirār, 277.
 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm, 59.
 Abū Ishāq, 29.
 Abū Ishaq (Ibn Khafājah), 89.
 Isfarā'īn, 50, 112.
 Abū Ḥamid al-Isfara'īni, 51, 54, 101, 110-113, 118, 139.
 Al-Iṣfahānī, Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq, 116.
 Ismā'il, 249n.
Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq, 276.
 Al-Ismā'īl Asmā, 212.
 Ispahān, 31, 53n, 100, 135, 136, 140, 152, 156n, 180, 214, 215, 262, 263, 287, 288, 318, 319.
 Al-Ispahānī, 215.
 (Nāṣir al-Dawlat) Iftikīn al-Turkī, 250n.
 'Iqd, 159-204.
 Ismā'il al-Fāriqī, 9.
 Ismā'il, 315.
 Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad, 10.
 Ismā'il Ibn Sa'd, 138.
 al-Ismā'īlī Abū Baksr, 50, 51, 95, 96.
 Ismā'il, Abu, Sa'd, 28.
 Ismā'il Abū'l-Qasim, 287.
 Ismā'il (Prophet), 231.
 'Iyād, 129, 135, 216.
 Al-Iyādī, 135.
 Al-Iyād Abu 'l-Ḥasan, 135, 161.
 Al-Iyādī Abū Muḥammad, 164.
 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, 266n, 267, 333.
- J
- Ja'bar (Qal'ah), 224.
 Jacob, 248n.
 Jaḍhimat al-Abrash al-Azdi, 285.
 Abū Ja'far al-'Alawī, 235.
 Abū Ja'far Ibn Abī 'Imrān, 107, 109.
 Ibn Ja'far, 7.
 Ja'far Ibn Yahyā, 304.
 Ja'far Ibn al-Sarrāj, 152.
 Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfah, 56.
 Jahazah al-Barmakī 194, 196.
 Al-Jāhiz, 123.
 Ibn al-Jahm, Barmakide, 123.
 Ibn Jakīnā, 261.
 Ibn Jalā, 233, 234.
 Jald, 47.
 Jaldak al-Taḡawī, 232, 234.
 Al-Jabidī, 287.
Jamharat al-Nisab, 47, 220.
Jāmi', 25, 104.
Jāmi' al-Jalī, 50.
Jāmi' Ṣaḥī, 51ḡ.
 Jamāl al-Dīn, 296.
 Jamīl, 153, 216.
 Ibn Jarir al-Ṭabarī, 27, 40, 86.
 Ibn al-Jarrāb, 71, 73n.
 Al-Jarrār, 302.
 Ibn al-Jawazī, 22, 25ḡ, 54, 98, 107-215, 222, 236, 244.
 Ibn Jibrīl, 'Imād al-Dīn, 56.
 Jaysh, 108ḡ.
 Japhet, 90.
 Jazīrah, 84, 89ḡ.
 Al-Jazzār, 272.
 Jerusalem, 24, 236ḡ, 247, 248, 251, 253, 254, 322.
 Jewish, 27.
 Al-Jilī Shaykh Raḍī al-Dīn, 158.
 Jilliḡ, 290.
Al-Jinān, 13.
Jinān al-Janān wa Riyāḍ al-Aḡḡān, 227ḡ.

Ibn Jinni, 177.
 Jasn (Surnamed al-Nakha), 47.
 Jawhar al-Qā'id, 193.
 Al-Jawhari, 66, 69, 220, 242.
 Jawzajān, 106n.
 Ja'wanah al-ʿĀmirī, 220.
 Al-Juwaynī, 142n.
 Jawshān (Hill), 225, 227n.
 Jibāl, 114, 136.
 Al-Jili, 158.
 Jirjis, 86n.
 Jones (Sir William), 1.
 Jošua, 86n.
 Joseph, 9, 253, 258.
 Jubayr Abū 'Abd Allāh, 313.
 Judham, 234.
 Ju'f, 179.
Jumal, fi'l(Nahw), 9.
 Ibn al-Jumayzī, 10.
 Al-Junayd, 148n.
 Jūr, 55.
 Ibn Jurayj, 24.
 Jurjān, 70n, 71, 72, 144, 316.
 Al-Jurijānī, Abū Bakr, 86n, 135-173.
 Justin, 22.
 Juzdān (Ispahān), 287n.

K

Kāfi, 145, 317.
Kāfiyah, 29.
 Kāfur al-Ikhshīdī, 176, 177, 178, 183n.
 Ibn al-Kahhāl, 'Alī, 249n.
 Kahlāq, 23n.
 Kalb, 301.
 Al-Kalbi Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān, 124.
 Al-Kalbi al-Ghazzi, 90, 96, 220.
 Al-Kalbi Ibrāhīm, 47, 48.
 Ibn al-Kalbi, 47, 86, 87n.
 Ibn al-Kall Baghdādī, 55.
Kalilah wa Dimnah, 289.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Mūsā Ibn Yūnus, 89.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-Shahruzari, 295.
 Al-Kāmil, Ibn Shāwir, 229.
Kāmil (Mubarrad), 302.
 Ibn Kāmil Abū Bakr Aḥmad, 277.
 Karkh, 275n.
 Karm Ibn al-Karm, 10.
 Kashf al-Dakk wa-ʿIdāh al-Shakk, 169.
 Kathir Ibn Aḥmad, 318.
 Kermān, 91-102, 136, 180, 182n, 243.
 Al-Kermānī Ibn Mūsā, 184n.
Khābarān, 287.
 Ibn Khacanis, 168n.
 Ibn Khafājāh al-Andalusi, 87-90.
 Abū Khalf, 118.
 Ibn Khakaf al-Saraqustī, 320-321.
 Khakaf al-Aḥmar, 15.
 Khalf Ibn Ayyūb, 7.
Khālāt, 207.
 Ibn Khālawayh, 75, 177, 182n.
 Ibn Khaldūn, 27, 72, 85n, 86, 87n, 102n, 109n, 179.
 Ibn Khālid, 7.
Khālid, 47n.
 Khālid Ibn Yazīd, 130, 131.
 Ibn Abi Khālid Aḥmad, 66.
 Al-Khālidī Abū Bakr, 184.
 Khalil Marwan, 169n.
Khallidites 184n.
 Ibn al-Khall, 56.
 Ibn Khallikān, 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 9, 11, 12, 25n, 34, 37n, 38, 39, 41, 44n, 45, 46, 47, 66, 68, 69n, 73, 75n, 79n, 81n, 82, 85, 86, 92, 94, 95, 97n, 103, 105n, 121n, 127, 139n, 145n, 155n, 164, 166n, 171n, 174n, 215n, 221n, 228n, 243n, 245, 247n, 250n, 262n, 272, 279n, 280n, 283, 288n, 293, 294, 298, 319.
 Al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad, 312.
 Kharidah, 61, 85, 91, 214, 215, 221n, 225, 229, 233, 261, 262, 291, 294.
Khartabirt, 207.
Khayālī, 117.
 Al-Khaṣīb, Abū Naṣr, 95, 197, 199-200.
 Al-Khāsir, 68.
 Al-Khatan Abū 'Abd Alīh, 103.
 Khaṣīb, Abū Ishāq al-Iraqī, 55.
 Khaṣīb, see al-Baghdādī.
Khaṣīb's History of Baghdād, 279n.
 Al-Khaṣir, 291, 293.
 Abū Khaṣīb, 185.
 Khawāf, 142. Abu'l
 Al-khaswāfi, Muffzar Aḥmad, 142.
 Khayf, 187.
 Khawlan, 205.
 Ibn Khayyāt, 207-211.
 Ibn al-Khāzin, 212-215.
Khazraj, 29.

Khindif, 129, 231.
 Al-Khulūṣāh, 257.
Khumārawayh, 108n.
Khurāsān, 25, 49, 62-63, 71, 90, 91, 94,
 104, 105, 106, 112, 114, 117, 119, 124,
 125, 141, 142, 144, 150, 187, 275, 320.

Ibn Killis, 193.
 Kindah, 16, 179.
 Al-Kindī (Mutanabbī), 179.
 Al-Kindī (Philosopher), 27.
 Al-Kindī, (Taj al-Dīn), 174.
 Kitāb al-Amālī, 313.
Kitāb al-A'yād, 317.
 Kitāb al-Buldān, 3, 114.
Kitāb al-Dhakhīrah, 169.
Kitāb al-Duhal al-Munqatiyah, 239.
Kitāb al-Hurūf, 277.
Kitāb al-Imān, 151n.
Kitāb al-Arā'is, 119.
Kitāb al-Isṭi'āb, 137.
Kitāb al-Janān, 69n, 85, 270, 277.
Kitāb al-Kharāj, 147.
Kitāb al-Kināyāt, 284.
Kitāb al-Maṣūn, 84.
Kitāb al-Sāmi fi' Asāmi, 211.
Kitāb al-Ṣilāt, 171.
Kitāb al-Sulūk, 96.
Kitāb al-Sayl wa Dhayl, 298.
Kitāb al-Tajī, 315.
Kitāb al-Tawābīn, 236.
Kitāb al-Tuḥwān, 236n.
*Kh*itāf, 29n, 241-179n, 241.
 Al-Kiyā al-Harrasī, 152.
Khurrazad Ibn Baris, 221.
Khurzād, 221n.
Khursroes, 106n-136.
Khusrüjerd, 115.
 Al-Khusrüjerdī, 114.
Khusruwān, 223.
Khwarezm, 106n, 144.
 Al-Khwarezmi, Abū Bakr, 118.
 Al-Khuza'i, Matrūd Ibn Kaab, 90.
Khuzaq 140, 141.
 Ibn Khuzaymab, 119, 163.
Khuzestan, 216, 220, 221, 264.

Kufah, 22, 24, 25n, 31, 46, 67, 68, 75,
 113, 147, 178, 179, 181, 183n, 184, 276,
 277, 281n, 285, 302.
 Kurds, 243.
 Al-Kurdi, Abū Nasr, 206.

L

Lakhm, 234.
 Al-Lakhmī 'Abbād Ibn Muḥammad
 204, 234.
 Al-Lakhmī Ahmad, 238-239.
 Lāmi, 23.
 Al-Lami 'al 'Azizī, 164.
 Lanes, Mr., 179.
Lajāif al-Ma'arīf, 76.
 Al-Lataqiyah, 181n.
 Layth Ibn Bakr, 278.
 Al-Lazni, 88.
 Lāzūn Ibn Ismā'il, 124.
 Lujaym, 288.
 Livey, 22.
 Liwa, 69.
 Lorca, 180.
Lubāb al-Ihya, 143.
Lubāb, 113.
 Lūlū, 176.
Luma', 52.
 Luqmān, 230.

M

Al-Ma'afrii, 328.
 Abū'l Ma'ālī al-Aghlabi, 207, 230n.
 Al-Abū'l-Ma'aliki Mujalli, 55.
 Moallaqas, 145.
 Ma'an, 220.
 Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah, 147, 316.
Ma'āni 'Aṭhar, 108.
*Ma'āni Ahl'al-Bayān min wafayat Ibn
 Khallikan*, 2.
 Ma'arraḥ, 163, 164, 165.
 Al-Ma'arri, Abul 'Alā, 163, 164, 168, 229, 236.
 Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, 163, 147, 168, 271.
 Mada'in, 25n.
 Madhbiq, 47.
 Maghreb, 57.

- Al-Magħribī al-Wazīr, 15.
 Ibn al-Magħribī Abu'l Qāsim al-Husyn, 146, 161.
 Magħzī, 24.
 Al-Maḥāmīlī Abu'l Ḥasan, 113, 114, 150n.
 Al-Mahdī, 'Abbasi, 61, 65, 66, 67, 68n, 302, 304, 306, 311.
 Al-Mahdī, 'Ubayd Allāh, 247.
 Al-Mahasat, 159n.
 Abu'l-Maḥāsin, 4, 18, 24, 25, 200n, 241n, 310n.
 Mahmūd Ibn Maṣṣāl al-Malīki, 249n, 250.
 Mahmūd al-Saljuqi, 261.
 Mahmūd Sulṭān, 28.
 Al-Mahzami, 129.
 Al-Majalis, 236.
 Abu'l Majd, 224, 280n.
 Majmu'ah, 113.
 Al-Makin, 105n, 196, 200.
 Makhzum, 201, 202.
 Al-Makhzumī 'Abdul Ḥamid, 11, 31.
 'Abd al-Malik, 323.
 'Abd al-Malik, Ibn al-Māji Shūn, 328.
 Abū Malik, Ibn Malīh, 293, 294.
 Ilā Malīk, 7, 183.
 Malīk Ibn Anas, 24, 27, 31, 233, 286.
 Al-Malik al-'Adil Nur al-Dīn, 154n, 234, 254, 257, 266.
 Al-Malik al-Aḥraf, 252, 295.
 Al-Malik al-Fā'iz Sābiq al-Dīn Ibn Malik al-'Adil, 252n, 258.
 Malik al-Kāmil, 252, 254n, 257, 258, 260, 292, 293n.
 Al-Malik al-Muazam Muzaḥfar al-Dīn 157.
 Al-Malik al-Mughlīh 257.
 Al-Malik al-Nāṣir, 291.
 Al-Malik al-Qāhir Bahā al-Dīn Ayyūb, 257, 267.
 Malikshah, 262.
 Malīk Ibn ṭawq al-Tagħlībī, 139.
 Al-Malik al-Zāhir, 293.
 Malekite, 26.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, 312.
 Ibn Mammāṭ, 290, 291, 293.
 Al-Māmūn, al-Rashīd, 62, 63, 64, 65n, 70, 78, 104, 109, 121, 122, 125, 126, 130, 150, 151, 160n, 242, 262n, 281.
 Ma'mar, 24, 153.
 Manāzjird, 207, 313.
 Al-Manāzi, 206, 207.
 Manbij, 207.
 Al-Manhal al-Sāfi wal Mustawfi ba'd al-wāfi, 4, 13, 24, 29.
 Al-Manṣurah, 257.
 Manṣur, 109.
 Al-Manṣūr, Abu Ja'far, 72, 98, 112, 118, 186, 267, 268, 310.
 Al-Malik al-Manṣūr, 267.
 Al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī, 321-325.
 Abū Manṣūr al-Azhari, 141.
 Abū Manṣūr Ṣarradarr, 170.
 Al-Manṣūr Ibn Abi 'Āmir, 196n, 197, Al-Manṭhur, 299.
 Manṣūr Ibn Marwān Abū Sa'id, 245.
 Manṣūr Ibn Ismā'il al-Ḍarir, 110.
 Ibn al-Manṣūr al-Qā'im, 193n.
 Maqqari, 32n.
 Al-Maqdīsī Diyā al-Dīn, 156n.
 Al-Maqdīsī, 'Abd al-Ghani, 156.
 Al-Maqdīsī, Naṣr, 90.
 Al-Maqrīzī, 30, 174n, 279.
 Maqrīzī (history of the Mamluk Sultans, 4, 53n, 96, 191n).
 Maraṣid, 41, 287, 290, 298.
 Marāṣid al-Iṭtilā, 252n, 252n, 276n.
 Mārib, 231.
 Martin, St, 207n.
 (Abū Ja'far) al-Marwarrūdī, 322.
 Al-Maqūm, 293.
 Māridah, 67.
 Māridīn, 263.
 Māriq, 64.
 Al-Mariyyah, 64-96, 237.
 Marj Rāhiṭ, 169n.
 Al-Marwah, 116.
 Marwān Ibn Abi 'l-Janūb, 129.
 Marw al-Rūd, 49.
 Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam, 169n.
 Marwarrud, 105.
 Marw al-Shahjān, 94, 106, 160n, 173, 274, 276, 285.
 Ibn Marwān al-Kurdī, 245-247.
 Al-Marwarrūdhi, Abū Ḥamid, 104, 106.
 Al-Marwarrūdhi, Abū Jafar, 322.
 Marwazi, 105, 173.
 Al-Marwazi, Abū Ishāq 48, 49, 106.

- Al-Marwazī, Naṣr, 114.
 Marwī, 49.
 Ibn al-Marzubān, Abū Ḥasan, 111.
 Al-Marzuban Abū Naṣr, 194.
 Al-Marzubanī, 120, 121, 130, 133, 134.
 Maṣṣa'at al-Qaṣab, 244.
 Maṣḥarīq al-Anwar, 96.
 Ibn al-Maṣḥūb, 251-256, 267.
 Al-Masjid al Aqṣa (Mosque of 'Umar), 247, 254.
 Masālik al-Aḥṣā, 96.
 Masālik wa Mamālik, 19.
 Ibn Maṣṣāl, 250n.
 Al-Maṣṣisah, 104, 186.
 Maṣ'ūd, 'Izz al-Dīn, 333.
 Ibn Maṣ'ūd, 46n.
 Al-Maṣ'ūdi, 84n, 264n, 267.
 Matālī' al-Anwar, 96.
 Māwāqit, 103.
 Mawsil, 157, 158, 159.
 Al-Mawṣilī Abū'l 'Atāhiyah, 68, 282.
 Al-Maydānī Abū'l Faḍl, 211, 212, 234.
 Al-Maydānī, Abū Sa'd, 212.
 Mayyāfariqīn, 24, 206, 245, 246.
 Māẓenderān, 104.
 Medinat al-Zahrā, 79n.
 Madīnah, 24, 106n, 121, 124, 171n, 210n, 216n, 251n, 256n, 278n, 301, 310.
 Makkah (Mecca), 19, 20, 24-31, 47, 51n, 57, 63, 106n, 109, 112, 116, 117, 124, 153n, 157, 167n, 187, 216n, 228, 236n, 238, 251n, 274n, 275, 298, 310.
 Makkī, Shykh, 60.
 (History of) Mekkah, 274n.
 Methuselah, son of Idris, 83.
 Memoire, 15.
 Medain, 257n.
 Mesopotamia, 15, 84, 123, 261, 263, 265n, 304n.
 (Abu Sa'd) al-Mutawallī, 288.
 Miṣṭāḥ, 103.
 Al-Mihani, 287.
 Ibn Mihrān, 119, 136.
 Ibn Minkasah al-Maghribi, 294.
 Minā, 87, 236.
 Mira'dt al-Jānān, 51n.
 Mir'dt al-Zamān, 122.
 Mirkhond, 250n.
 Mishkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, 83n, 98n, 99n, 114n, 168n.
 Miṣr, 116, 117, 194, 234, 242, 249n, 250n, 251, 270, 271, 281.
 Al-Miṣrī, 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, 40, 150n.
 Al-Miṣṣinsh, 186.
 Al-Miṣṣisi, Muḥammad, 184.
 Mohalhil, 256n.
 Mosul, 59, 60, 61, 225, 251n, 252, 256, 259, 260, 266, 267, 278, 280n, 313n.
 Muḥi al-Dīn Abdul Ḥameed, 47n.
 Mohls, Dr. 140.
 Mopsuestia, 186.
 Morocco, 149, 237.
 Moses, 170n.
 (Abu Ishāq) of Mosul, 59.
 Muazilites, 139.
 Moucharmradj, 256n,
 (Mount), Muqatṭam, 59, 301.
 Ibn al-Mu'aḍḍal, 179.
 Al-Muadird, 155n.
 Mu'awiah Ibn Abī Sufyān, 13, 85n, 116.
 Al-Mubārrad, 77, 302.
 Ibn al-Mubārak, Abul Ḥasan, Muḥammad, 55.
 Mudhyyal, 286n.
 Mudrikah, 231n.
 Al-Mufaḍḍal, 277.
 Mufliḥ, 178.
 Al Muḡhni, 280n.
 Muḥāḍarāt al-Aw'ail, 17.
 Muḥādhḍhab (of Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzi, 280n.
 Muḥādhḍhab al-Dīn Ibn al-Lakhmī, 291.
 Al-Muḥādhḍhab Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan, 52, 55, 104, 227, 228.
 Muḥādhḍhab al-Dīn Ibn Munīr al-Tarabulusi, 221.
 Muḥārish (emir), 264, 265, 266.
 Muḥallab, 183, 290.
 Al-Muḥallabi, Abū Muḥammad, 186.
 Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn al-Najjar, 155.
 Abū Muḥammad, 152.
 Muḥammad, 15, 16, 17, 19, 22, 25, 27, 29, 40, 42, 43, 46, 51, 60, 61, 83, 84, 94, 96n, 98n, 100n, 115, 117, 121, 123, 132, 152, 153, 159n, 166, 177, 188,

- 213, 216, 223n, 225, 231n, 236-247n, 251n, 300, 310, 316.
- Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 163.
- Muhammad Abū 'Abd Allāh, 29.
- Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn Abi Duwād, 127, 133, 134.
- Muhammad Ibn 'Alīyyah al-'Atawī, 278.
- Muhammad (Sulṭān), 263.
- Muhammadan History*, 221n.
- Muhammad Ibn Buzurk Umid, 250n.
- Muhammad Ibn al-Hanafīyah, 154n.
- Muhammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ḥanafī, 101.
- Muhammad Ibn Ibrāhīm, 7.
- Muhammad Ibn Isā, 129.
- Muhammad Ra'īs al-Dīn, 216.
- (Abu'l Faḍāl) Muhammad, 160.
- (Abu'l Faḥ) Muhammad, 287.
- Muhammad son of Malikshāh, 262n.
- Muhammad Ibn al-Muzaḥḥar, 113.
- (Abu Faḥ) Maḥmūd Ibn Qādūs, 230.
- Muhammad Ibn al-'Umayd, 316n.
- Muhammad Ibn Zayd, 76.
- Al-Muḥassad, 178.
- Al-Muḥazzamī, 129.
- Al-Muḥtadī, 112.
- Al-Muḥdāḥḥ, 246.
- Al-Mu'izz Abū Tamīm Ma'add, 193.
- Mu'izz al-Dawlah, 81n, 244.
- Ibn Mujāhid, 75n.
- Al-Mujallī, 265.
- Mu'jam*, 10, 51, 154.
- Mujmil fi'l Lughah*, 171-187, 314.
- Mu'jiz Ahmād*, 165.
- Al-Mukhtār, Emīr, 190, 193.
- Mukhtaṣar*, 104, 107, 110, 118.
- Mukhtaṣar Tārīkh al-Khatīb*, 99n.
- Mukram, 221n.
- Mukhāriq, 64, 105.
- Al-Muktafi, 77, 79, 244.
- Mulaykah, 46.
- Mumahhid al-Dawlat, 245.
- Ibn Munir al-Tarābulusī, 221-227.
- (Abu 'Ubaydah) Ma'mar Ibn al-Muḥannā, 288n.
- Ibn al-Munajjim, 271.
- Mūnis, 71n.
- Munḥir, 285.
- Al-Munḥirī, 'Abd al-'Azīm, 154, 224, 232.
- Ibn Munqidh, 269, 271, 274.
- Muntaẓim*, 215, 236.
- Ibn al-Muqaffa, 17.
- Al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab, 266.
- Muqātil Ibn Ḥakīm al-'Akkī, 72, 231n.
- Muqīrr Ibn Ḥimār, 322n.
- Al-Muqallad, 274.
- Muqni, 113.
- Al-Muqri 'Ibn Mujāhid, 75, 148.
- Muqaṭṭam (mount), 56, 59, 242.
- Murcia, 180.
- Murhaf Ibn 'Usāmah, 228.
- (Abu' Usāmah) Murshid, 274.
- Ibn Murshid, 269-274.
- Murūj al-Dhahab*, 264n.
- Ibn Muṣ'ab Nūr al-Dīn, 9.
- Mus'ab Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zubayrī, 278.
- Al-Musabbihī, 190, 193.
- Musallā, 191.
- Muslim, 275.
- Muslim Ibn al-Walid, 70, 73.
- Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, 98, 155n.
- Musnad* (Ibn Rahawayh), 275n.
- Muṣṭabih al-Nisabālī, 280n.
- Al-Mushakfī, 79n.
- Al-Musta'li Billāh, 247, 248, 249, 256.?
- Al-Mustāfa li Dīnillāh, 250n.
- Al-Mu'tasim, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 65, 66, 74, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 126, 128n, 130, 196, 242, 264n, 282.
- Al-Mustansir al-'Ubaydī, 264.
- Al-Mustarshid (Khalīf), 286n.
- Al-Mustawfī, 260, 262.
- Al-Mustanṣih Billāh, 247, 205, 249n.
- Ibn al-Mustawfī, 269, 292.
- Al-Mustawfī, 260, 262.
- Al-Mutadid Billāh, 283.
- Al-Mu'taqid, 77n, 202, 204.
- Muṭahhir, 287.
- Al-Mu'tamid, 241.
- Muṭaraf, Ibn Sīdlān, 220.
- Mutallimun, 125.
- Al-Mutalaf wal Mukhtalaf*, 93.
- Al-Mū'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 204.
- Al-Mutanabbī, 10, 17, 34, 40, 43, 79, 122, 132, 165, 166, 173, 181, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 182n, 183, 184n, 185, 197, 220, 241, 253, 317.

- Ibn Mu'tazz, 71n, 75n.
 Al-Mu'tazz Billāh, 241.
 Ibn al-Muṭṭahannā, 28.
 Al-Muṭi Lillāh, 81n.
 Al-Mutawakkil, 126, 127, 132, 134, 241.
 Al-Muwaffiq, 241.
 Muwaffiq al-Dīn, 236n.
 Muḥyad al-Dawlat, 315, 316.
 Muwaffā, 24.
 Muḥyad al-Mulk, 55.
 Muḥyad al-Dawlat, Majd al-Dīn, 269.
 Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, 183, 242, 245.
 Ibn al-Mu'izz 'Abd Allāh, 196.
 Al-Muzaḥḥar al-'Abbāsī, 179.
 Muzaḥḥar al-Dīn Ibn Zayn al-Dīn, 257.
 Abu'l Muzaḥḥar Kukubri Mustawafī, 260n.
 Abu'l Muzaḥḥar, 234.
 Ibn al-Muzaḥḥar Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad, 113n.
 Muzaḥḥariyah College, 296.
 Muzaḥḥar al-Dīn Kukuburi, 225, 291, 296n.
 Al-Muzani, 48, 100, 104, 107, 108, 110, 285n, 298, 299, 300, 301.
 Muḥayyirah, 301.
 Muḥal al-irtiyāh al-Muḥṭabih al-Intisāh, 280n.
- N
- Nābiḥah, 88n, 105n, 145.
 Nablus, 24.
 Ibn al-Nadīm al-Baghdadi, 83.
 Ibn Nadīm al-Mawṣilī, 67, 69.
 Ab'ul Naḍr, 24n.
 Nāfi, 329.
 Al-Nafīs-al-lakḥmī, 232, 235.
 Nahḥās, 146.
 Al-Nahḥās Abu Ja'far, 145, 146.
 Njd, 208.
 Najrān, 216n.
 Najm al-Dīn, 263.
 Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, 262.
 Najm al-Dīn Khubūshānī, 30.
 Ibn Najjār, 90.
 Ibn al-Najjār Muḥibb al-Dīn, 53, 139, 143.
 Nakḥḥā'i 'Al-Aswad, 46n.
 Nakḥḥā'i 'Alamah, 46n.
 Al-Nakḥā'i Ibrāhīm, 46, 47.
 Al-Nāmi, Abu'l 'Abbās Aḥmad, 175, 182, 185, 186.
 Naplus, 251, 254.
 Naqica, Ibn Nasā, 117.
 Al-Nasa'i, 116, 117, 146.
 Nāṣih al-Dīn, al-Arrajāvi, 215, 221.
 Nāṣir al-Dīn-Mukram, 91.
 Al-Nāṣir, li-Dīn Allāh, 158.
 Nāṣir al-Marwazī, 114.
 Nasr al-Dawlat, al-Kurdi, 245, 247.
 Naṣr Ibn 'Abbās, 325.
 Abū Naṣr-Ibn Ja'hīr, 246.
 Abu'l Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh, 212, 215.
 Nasr al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad, Qāḍi, 216.
 Abu Naṣr 'Abd al-Wahab, 29.
 Nasr al-Maqdisi, 90n.
 Navarre, 196n.
 Nawfal, 112.
 Nawqan, 144.
 Nayshāpūr, 10, 24, 28, 49, 50, 53n, 106n, 112, 115, 118, 119, 140, 180, 211, 275.
 Nayshāpūri, 119.
 Al-Nāẓim, 279.
 Niṣṭawayh, 7, 75, 76, 146, 312.
 Nihāyah, 103.
 Nile, 59, 146, 228.
 Nizām al-Dīn Naṣr, 247.
 Nizām al-Mulk, 28, 29, 31, 32, 50, 52, 55, 156, 215.
 Nizamiyah College, Baghḍād, 60, 90, 143, 145, 158, 212, 286.
 Nizār (tribe), 129.
 Nizār son of Almustansir, 248, 249n, 250n.
 Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān, 135.
 Noah, 90.
 Noman bin Mancrim, 257n.
 Abu Nu'aym, 136 (see al-isbahane)
 Ibn Nubātāh, 99n, 204n.
 Nūh Ibn Asad, 242.
 Nuḥ, Ibn Maṣṣūr, 318.
 Nuḥ al-Zahrah, 13, 25n.
 Al-Nu'mān Ibn Baṣṣār, 168.
 Al-Nu'māniyah, 178.
 Nūr al-Dīn Arsīlān Shāh, 266, 267.
 Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, 225, 266n.

- *Abū Nawās, al-Hakam, 95, 127, 128,
182n, 197, 199n, 200, 280, 305, 306.
Al-Nuwayri, 248, 249.

O

- Ortuk Ibn Aksab, 262n.
Osrushtrana, 122.
Oghoman Empire (d. Ohsson), 274n.

P

- Parisi, 87n, 159n.
Palastine, 94, 117.
Persia, 136, 178, 285.
Persian, 144.
Pococke 1, 285n.
Poeseos Asiaticae Comment artum, 1.

Q

- Qāḍizādah, 14.
Al-Qaffāl, 114.
Qāhiriyāh College, 158.
Qaḥṭān, 231.
Al-Qā'id Abu Ṭahir Isma'il ibn Muḥammad (Surnamed) Ibn Miknasah, 26,
29n.
Al-Qāim, 111n, 264, 265, 322.
Qaysariyah, 248.
Ibn Qalāqis, 65.
Qal'ah Bani Ḥammād, 97.
Al-Qali, 'Abū Ali, 16, 75, 79, 312, 313,
314, 318.
Qallūt (River), 226, 227n.
Qama'ah, 231n.
Qāmus, 23, 41, 103.
Qantarāt al-Zayyātīn, 305.
Ibn al-Qarāb, 150.
Qarāfah, 239, 242, 260, 271, 301.
Qaryatayn, 263n.
Al-Qaṣab, 139.
Abu'l Qāsim al-Ahwāzī, 213.
Abu'l Qāsim 'Abd al-Rahmān, 78.
Abu'l Qāsim 'Aḥmad, 249n.
Abu'l Qāsim, 190.
Al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isā, 123.
Al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, 276.
Al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 77, 283.
Ibn al-Qāṣṣ, 103, 104.
Qāsān, 140, 142.

- Qaṣṣār, 144.
Al-Qaṣṣār al-Baḡri, 193n.
Al-Qaṣir, 267n.
Qaṣṭallah, 201.
Qāsiyun (mount), 8.
Ibn al-Qaṭṭā', 86.
Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, 106, 107.
Al-Qaynī, Abu'l Tamahān, 93.
Qayrawān, 31, 84, 85, 86.
Qays, 255.
Ibn Qays, 86, 147, 216n, 255.
Ibn al-Qaysarānī; 221, 224, 225.
Qazwin, 144, 108.
Qinnisrin, 120.
Quatremere, 4.
Al-Quḍāf, 108.
Al-Qurudī, 111, 117, 118, 241.
Qumm, 140.
Ibn Qunber, 70n.
Qunbul, 75n.
Qur'an, 15, 16, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 31,
32, 33, 42, 47, 53n, 54n, 68, 75, 76,
77, 81, 82, 88n, 94, 96, 98, 114n,
118, 119, 125n, 126, 133, 138, 141,
143, 145, 148, 150, 151, 153, 154n,
167, 170n, 182n, 211, 221, 225n,
233, 237, 238, 241, 259n, 274, 285,
287 n, 304, 317, 320, 322n.
Quraysh, 15, 84.
Ibn Qurqūl, 96, 97.
Qurṭubah, 204.
Qurṭubī, 162.
Quṣayr, 96.
Qushayri, al-Ḥusayn, 10.
Al-Qushayri 'Abd al-Munim, 115.
Al-Qushayri, Abū'l Qasim, 50, 119.
Quss, 2:6, 234.
Ibn Qutaybah, 268.
Qutaybah Ibn Muslim, 220n.
Quṭayris, 234.
Quṭb, al-Din, 9, 274n.
Quṭrus, 234.
Al-Quṭrusi, 232.

R

- Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 36, 159, 161, 162, 204.
Al-Rabī', 48.
Al-Rabī' al-Muradi 301.
Rabī'ah Ibn Kinānah, 93n.

- Ibn Rabī'ah, 311.
 Rabī'at al-Rā'i, 24.
 Rabī'at al-Faras, 288.
 Rafīdī, 221.
 Raḥabah, 139.
 Ibn Rahawayh, 274, 275, 276.
 Ra'īs, al-Dīn, 216.
 Ra'īs al-Ru'asa, 111n.
 Rajā Abu 'l-'Āla, 217.
 Ramādaht, 276n.
 Ramādat al-Kūfah, 276.
 Rāmāh, 298.
 Ramīm, Bint Ahmad, 256n.
 Ibn Rāmīn, 54n.
 Ramlah, 116, 117, 183n.
 Raqqah, 304n.
 Ar-Raqmatayn, 210.
 Abu'l Raqa'maq 191, 194.
 Rās 'Ayn, 253, 297.
 Al-Rashīd of Egypt, 200.
 Al-Rashīd Abul Ḥusayn Ahmad al-Ghassani al-Qaḍī, 227, 232.
 Al-Rashīd, Hārūn, 67, 68, 72n.
 Al-Rashīd, Ibn Zuhayr Qaḍī, 85, 270.
 Rāshīdah, 238.
 Ibn Rashīq, 84.
 Al-Rass, 188.
 Al-Rassi, 191.
 Ray, 49, 173.
 Rāwand, 140.
 Al-Rāwandī, 139, 140, 141.
 Rāzī, 49.
 Al-Rāzī, 'Alī, 127.
 Al-Rāzī Ibn Fāris, 171, 173.
 Al-Rāzī, Salīm, 90.
 Al-Ribāṭ al-Kabīr, 158n.
 Al-Rida, 62, 92.
 Al-Riyāhī, Suhaym, 253.
 M. Reinauds, 258n, 263, 267n.
 Reiske, 1.
 Rifa'ah, 240.
 Ibn al-Ri'fāi, 259, 240.
 Al-Rudbārī, Abu 'Alī, 148n.
 Al-Rudhbārī, Ahmad, 148n.
 Al-Ruhā, 260.
 Abū Rūh, 10.
 Rukn al-Dawlat al-Ḥasan, 243, 245, 320.
 Rūm, 186.
 Ibn al-Rūmī, 82, 95, 283.
 Rūmīyah, 104.
 Al-Rummānī Abu'l Ḥasan, 146.
 Rusafah, 99.
 Al-Rustamī, 315n.
 Rūyān, 331.
 Ibn Ruzzīk, 7, 270.
- S
- Sa'd al-'Ashīrah. 179.
 Sabā, 233.
 Ibn al-Sabbāgh, Abū Naṣr. 52, 55.
 Sābūr Dhu'l Aktāf. 119.
 Al-Šābi, 315.
 Al-Šābi' son of Mārī, 84.
 Al-Šābi' Abū Ishāq, 80n, 81, 84.
 Al-Sabī, Abū 'l-Alfās Ahmad, 235, 236.
 Sacy, M. D., 1, 15, 27.
 Abū Sa'd Ismā'il, 28.
 Ibn Abī Su'd Sufi, 138.
 Abū Sa'd, 51n.
 Abū Sā'd al-Mutawallī, 55.
 Abū Sa'id Sa'd, 212.
 Sa'd Zayd Maud, 256n.
 Saḍuqah Sayfal-Dawlat, 332.
 Sa'dī, 39.
 Al-Sadīd. 226.
 Šadr al-Dīn, 152.
 Al-Šafā, 116.
 Al-Safadī, 12.
 Al-Šaffāh, *kh*alīf. 72.
 Ibn al-Šaffār, 10.
 Al-Šafiyaḥ, 178.
 Šafī al-Dīn Ibn Shuqr. 293n.
 Šūfis, 143.
 Al-Šafrawī, 155n, 156.
Safwat al-Safwat, 236n.
 The Šahīh Ibn 'Abbād. 314-320.
 Šāhib al-Ḥimār, 323.
Šahīh al-Bukhārī, 10.
 Al-Sahmī, 71n.
 Sa'id (Abū 'l-Naḍr), 24n.
 Sa'id, 307.
 Sa'id bin Nassi, 308n.
 Abū Sa'id Muḥammad. 100n.
 Abū Sa'id 'Abd al-Rahmān, 188.
 Sa'id Ibn al-'As, 105n.
 Sa'id Ibn Abī Urubah, 24.

- Abū Sa'īd al-Širāfi. 146.
 Abū Sa'īd al-Rustamī. 315, 320.
 Sa'īd Ibn-Nassi. 308.
 Šā'igh 'Izz al-Dīn. 8.
 Šā'ih. 96n.
 Al-Sajazir Ibn Ahmad. 51.
 Al-Šakhrāh. 248n.
 Šaāh al-Dīn al-Irbili. 30, 251, 253, 254.
 257, 258, 259, 260, 262, 270, 273, 289.
 291, 293.
 Al-Salamī. 58.
 Šalāh Ibn Ahmad Ibn Hanbal. 100.
 Šālīh Ibn 'Alī. 186.
 Šālīh Ṭalā'ī Ibn Ruzsik. 57.
 Sallim al-Rāzi. 90n.
 Saljūs (Seljuqs). 313.
 Saljūg, Sulṭān Maḥmūd. 286.
 Salim, Sulṭān Kḥān. 14.
 Sallāmiyah. 59, 60, 61.
 Salm al-kḥāsir. 68.
 Salmān. 312.
 Al-Salūki Abu 'l-Ṭayyib. 114n.
 Al-Salūki. Muḥammad. 110n.
 Sāmānī. 242.
 Al-Sam'ānī, Ḥafiz Abū Sa'īd. 24, 53, 55.
 59, 102, 105, 109, 118, 119, 136, 142.
 144, 191, 265, 286, 313.
 Sam'ānī Ansūh. 221.
 Samārrah. 242.
 Samāwah. 176.
 Ibn al-Sammān. 267-269.
 Šana'a. 231n.
 Sāūr, Ibn Ardashir. 30.
 Ibn Saqlāb. 109.
 Al-Šaqqāi. 12, 272.
 Al-Sarrāj. 152.
 Sarakhs. 106n.
 Saraquṣṭah. 321.
 Ibn Abi Sarh. 86n.
 Šarī al-Dilā. 193.
 Šarī al-Ghawānī. 70.
 Sarraman ra'a. 66, 74, 133.
 Sāriah. 104.
 Sawād. 178.
 Šaydā. 183n.
 Šaydalanī. 287.
 Sayf al-Dawlat, Ibn Ḥamūdān. 176, 177.
 183, 184, 253, 254.
 Sayf al-Dawlat Saduqah. 332.
 Sayf al-Dīn Gḥāzī. 225.
 Ibn Sayfī. 86.
 Sayl wa'l Dḥayl. 228.
 Ibn Sayyār, Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm. 279n.
 Schultens Albert. 1. 15. 254n.
 Sadjah. 256n.
 Sevilli. 202, 203, 204.
 Ibn Shaddād. 254.
 Al-Šahljān. 'Marw. 105. see Marw.
 Al-Šāfi'ī (imam). 7, 24, 26, 27, 29, 42,
 47, 48, 50, 54, 59, 75, 100, 101, 104,
 106, 107, 109n, 110, 111, 112, 113,
 114, 115, 152, 158, 239, 266, 274,
 282, 285, 287, 294, 301.
 Al-Šahāmi. Abū'l-Qāsim Zāhir, Ibn
 Tāhir. 115.
 Al-Šahrastānī. 48n, 279n.
 Shakspear. 192n.
 Ibn Shal, al-Kḥatīb. 147.
Shāmīl. 53.
 Shams al-Dīn. 24.
 Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Man'ah. Al-Irbili,
 157, 159.
 Sharafal Dawlat Muslim Ibn Quraysh.
 262n.
 Ibn Shākīr Šalāh al-Dīn. 12.
 Ibn Shākīr. 179n.
 Ibn Shākal. 7.
 Shams al-Dīn. 8.
Shāhnāmah. 140.
Sharḥ Shawāhid al-Mughni. 233n.
 Sharīf al-Raḍī. 83.
 Al-Šāshi Abū Bakr. 144.
 Al-Šaṭṭ. 266n.
 Shāwir. 228, 229, 231.
 Shaybān. 147, 151, 276.
 Al-Šaybānī Abū 'Amr. 68, 80, 130.
 Shayzar. 168, 269, 273, 274.
 Shirāzī. 54, 100, 183n, 184n.
 Shirāzī, Abū Ishāq. 51, 54.
 Shihāb al-Dīn Maḥmūd. 10.
 Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ghawzi. 13
 Shikaah. 62, 64.
 Shirkūh Asad al-Dīn. 225, 228, 262.
Shudhur al-'uqud. 107, 236, 244.
 Shuhbah Ibn qādi. 100n.

- Shujā al-Dīn, 232.
 Ibn Shukr Šafī al-Dīn, 58, 293.
 Shunīzī, 83.
 Shūr (Jazīrah), 89.
 Al-Shurūḡī, Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, 108.
 Shūster, 220.
 Sībawayh, 76, 145, 291.
 Sicily, 138.
 Al-Sidillī, 246.
 Šiffin, 216.
 Sijistān, 51n, 106n, 243.
 (Ibn al-)Sikkī, 276.
 Al-Silafī, 152, 156, 164, 228, 234, 271.
 Silafī College, 152.
 Al-Simak, 166, 167.
 Sindiyah, 60.
 Sinjār, 252, 294, 297.
 Sinjār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Šah, (Sulṭān), 261, 286n.
 Al-Sinjārī Bahā al-Dīn, 160, 294-298.
 Al-Sinji Šaykh Abū 'Alī, 103.
 Siq al-Zand, 163.
 Siyar al-Salaḥ, 154n.
 Slane, M. de, 262n.
 Solomon, 216.
 Spain, 24, 36, 79, 84, 87, 89, 138, 152, 162, 168, 169, 180, 196, 201, 204, 205, 236, 237, 312, 313, 321.
 Subk, 29.
 Al-Subkī, Tāj al-Dīn, 29.
 Al-Subkī, Taqī al-Dīn, 29n.
 Šūfī, Abū Sa'd, 138.
 Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, 275, 280.
 Sufyān, al-Thawrī, 25, 27.
 Suhaym Ibn Wāḥilāh al-Riyāḥī, 64, 233.
 Sukmān, 248, 263.
 Sulmah, 281n.
 Al-Sulamī, Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 31.
 Sulaykī, 206.
 Al-Sulī, Abū Bakr, 74, 77, 132, 134, 184.
 Sulṭān 'Alī Ibn Ḥatīm, 231.
 Šul, 72.
 Al-Sulamī Hayyūs Ibn al-'Alā, 121.
 'Āq Sunqūr al-Bursuqī, 331-333.
 'Āq-Sunqūr al-Ḥājib, 329-331.
 Šūr, 152.
 Ibn Šūrah, 271.
 Ibn Surayj Abū 'l-'Abbās, 48, 100, 103, 106, 148n, 299.
 Ibn Surayj, (Ibn Dawūd), 76.
 Šul Takīn, 69, 71.
 Ibn al-Sunaynirah, 296.
 Surayj Ibn Yunys, 102, 103n.
 Suwaydā, 224, 260.
 Suwayqat Ghālib, 102.
 Syria, 15, 24, 25n, 58, 80, 104, 120, 148, 151, 152, 154, 160, 168, 179, 181, 191, 197, 205, 221, 224, 225, 227, 238, 241, 247, 251n, 257, 258, 261, 262, 263, 270, 275, 280n.
 Al-Sūyūṭī, 17, 22, 28, 29, 41, 210n, 23n, 233n, 287, 293n, 298.
- T
- Tabaqāt, 97, 100, 107, 110, 111, 114, 115, 280n.
 Tabaqāt al-Fuqahā, 31, 46n, 51n, 100n.
 Tabaqāt al-Hanafīyīn, 118.
 Tab al-Ḥifūz, 113n, 156n, 275.
 Tabaqāt al-Kubrā, 29.
 Tabaqāt al-Šughra, 29.
 Tab al-Muḥaddithīn, 281n, 288n.
 Tabaqāt al-Šāfi'ī, 51n, 54, 75n, 90n, 105, 155, 158n.
 Tabaqāt al-Shu'ara, 145.
 Al-Tabaqāt al-Wusṭā, 29.
 Al-Tabarī Ibn Jarir, 22, 36n, 40, 62, 63, 65, 86n, 241n, 277n.
 Al-Tabarī, Abū Tāyib, 22n, 50, 51, 54, 137, 156.
 Al-Tabarī Ibn al-Qāss, 103-104.
 Ibn Tabāḡabā Abū 'l-Ḥasan, 190.
 Ibn Tabāḡabā Abū 'l-Qāsim, 188, 191.
 Tābirī, 46n, 267n.
 Tableau de l'Empire Ottoman, 167n.
 Al-Tabrizī, 73, 152, 164, 255n.
 Tāhūdā, 85n.
 Tūberān, 144.
 Taberestān, 104.
 Tābikhah, 231.
 Tacitus, 22.
 Tadmor, 183n.
 Taghlib, 168.
 Ibn Taghri Bardī, 13.
 Al-Taḡā, 110.

- Al-Ṭahāwī, 107-110.
Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, 47, 48n, 269, 276, 189n, 194.
 Ibn Abi Ṭāhir. 160n.
 Ṭāhir al-Azdī, 239n.
 Abu Ṭāhir Ṣālih, 184.
 Ibn Ṭālib. 270n.
 Ṭāj al-Dīn 'Abd al-Bāqī, 11.
 Taj al-Dīn al-Kindī, 174.
 Ṭāj al-Dawlat, 248n.
Al-Taji, 81.
Takmilah, 174.
 Takrit, 261, 262.
 Ṭālaqān, 318, 320.
 Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥat al-Khuṣṣi. 267n.
Ṭālī, 12.
Ta'liqah, 111, 113, 228n.
Talkhis, 103.
 Tall al-Sultān, 333.
 Tall Ya'fur, 252.
 Ibn Ṭulayb, 270.
 Abu'l Ṭamahān al-Qayni, 93.
 Abū Tammām Ḥabīb, 40, 70, 74, 127, 128, 140, 165, 175, 179, 182n, 193n, 245, 255.
 Abū Tamīm Ma'add, 68, 161, 276, 277, 278, 279, 281n.
Al-Taymīz wa'l-Faṣl, 280.
Tanbih, 52, 157, 158.
 Tanūkh, 167, 168n.
 Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī, 311.
 Al-Tanūkhī, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, 167.
 Tanush, 236.
Al-Tanwir, 291.
 Al-Taḳawī, 232.
 Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar, 207.
 Taqī al-Dīn, 29, 232, 234.
Taqwīm al-Buldān, 41.
Al-Taghrīb wal-Tarhib, 155n.
 Ṭarafah, 163n.
Tārīkh Baglādād, 21.
Tārīkh Qnzidāh, 243.
Tārīkh Haleb, 21.
Tārīkh al-Hukama, 283n, 284n.
Tārīkh al-Islām, 313n.
Tārīkh al-Khamis, 106n.
Tārīkh al-Wuzarā, 318.
 Ṭarsūs, 104, 186.
 Tartushī, 52.
Tatimmat al-Tatimmat, 288n.
 Tavira, 201n.
Al-Tawabī' wal-Zawabī, 169.
Tawārīkh Dimesch, 21.
 Al-Tawhīdī, 105.
 Al-Ṭawī, 10.
 Al-Ṭawīl, 267n.
 Ṭaybah, 171n.
 Al Ṭaybiyah 171n.
 Termedhī, 51, 275.
 Al-Tha'ālībī, 82, 83, 189, 191, 196, 227n.
 Tha'labah (son of 'Ukābah), 151.
 Al-Tha'labī, Abū Ishāq, 118, 119, 285.
 Al-Tha'labī, 139n.
 Al-Tha'ālībī, Abū Mansūr, 76, 327n.
 Al-Thawrī Sufyān, 48.
 Abu Thawr al-Kalbī, 47-48.
 Al-Thawrī, 27.
 Tha'lab Abū'l-'Abbās, 8n, 75n. 147, 151, 282.
 Thalab, 163n.
 Thawrā, 290.
 Tigris, 61, 178, 240, 266, 305n.
 Al-Tinnin, 62.
 Tugh'likin, 221.
 Tughrulbek Seguqīdī (Şulṭān), 265.
 Tughj, 183n.
 Tripoli, 24, 221, 225, 227, 263.
 Tughril, 280n.
 Tukharestān, 106n.
 Ibn Tūlūm (Aḥmad), 242.
 Banū Tūmā, 229.
 Turkmāni Shams al-Dīn, 13.
 Tūs, 144.
 Al-Tūṣī al-Muwayyad, 10.
 Tustar, 215, 216, 228.
 Al-Tūṣī, 144.
 Al-Turṭushī, 153.
 Tydeman, 4.
 Al-Taymī, 322n.

U

- 'Ubayd Allāh ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahab, 77.

- Abū 'Ubayd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abdah, 108, 109.
'Ubayd Allāh Abū 'l-Ḥakam, 226.
Abū 'Ubaydah, 279, 281.
Umm Ibrahim Fāṭimah al-Juzdāmyah, 287.
Umm 'Abidah, 239, 240.
Umm 'l-Arab, 95, 96.
Umm Salmah, 171.
'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, 17, 101.
'Umar Ibn al-'Alī, 303, 304.
'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, 46n, 153n, 239, 248, 263, 285, 291.
'Umar Ibn Shabbā, 160n.
Abū 'Umar Ibrāhīm al-Za'farānī, 316n.
Ibn 'Umar al-Ghazzi, 90.
Abū 'Umar Yusuf, 137, 199, 201.
'Umārat al-Yamani, 57.
Abū 'Umārah, 72.
Al-'Umari, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, 114.
Al-'Umayyad, Abu 'l-Faḍl, 314, 315.
Ibn al-'Umayyad Muḥammad, 105n, 178n.
'Umadah, 178.
Ibn 'Unayn, 259.
'Unwan fī 'l-Qara't, 32.
'Ukābah, 151.
'Uqbah Ibn 'Āmir al-Sahābi, 85.
'Uqbah, ibn Nafi'al-Fihri, 85n.
'Uqūd al-Jinan, 12.
Al-Urmāwī, Abū Bakr Muḥammad, 55.
Al-'Urūḍī, Ibrāhīm, 184.
'Urwah, 89.
'Usāmah Ibn Munqidh, 228, 273.
'Usāmah Ibn Muḥid Abu 'l-Muẓaffar, 269, 274.
Ibn Abi Usāmah, 184.
Al-Uṣūlī, Ibn Barhān, 144-145.
'Uswān, 232.
Uswānī, 232.
'Utba, 302, 303, 306, 307.
'Utba Ibn Ghazwān, 268.
'Uṭhmān (Khalīf), 13, 46n, 86n, 153.
'Uṭhmān Ḥāfiẓ Abu 'Amr, 15.
Ibn 'Uṭhmān, 90.
'Uṭhmān, 106n, 207n.
'Uṭhmānī, 97n, 100n, 109, 110, 115n.
Al-'Uṭhmanīs Tabaqāt, 148n.
'Uyūn al-Akḥbār, 72.
'Uyūn al-Tawārīkh, 122, 279n.
V
Vullers, 163n.
W
Al-Waḍḍāh Ibn Razāh, 168, 169.
Wafayāt al-A'yan, 9, 12.
Abū 'l-Wafā, al-Jalūdi, 287.
Wafī 'l-Wufayāt, 12.
Ibn Wahbūn, 180.
Al-Wāḥidī Abu'l Ḥasan, 211.
Al-Wajih Ibn Sūrah, 270, 271.
Wajiz, 144, 145n, 288.
Walid, 256n.
Al-Warrāq, Ibn al-Nadīm, 83.
Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṣā, 121n.
Wāsiṭ, 25n, 75, 76, 240, 296.
Wasīf, 104, 288. -
Al-Wāḥiq Billāh, 126.
X
Xucar, 89.
Y
Yaḥyā, 69n, 99n, 102n, 108n, 148n, 150n, 156n, 167n, 178n, 266n, 268n, 278n.
Al-Yāfi'i Mir'āṭ al-Janaā, 31, 51n.
Ya'fur (Tall), 252.
Yaḥyā Ibn al-Akḥamān, 125, 126, 127, 133, 278, 279, 280.
Yaḥyā al-Miṣrī, 272.
Yaḥyā Ibn Mu'in, 99.
Yaḥyā Ibn Nizār, 291.
Yaḥyā 'Alawī, 310n.
Ibn Yahyā, 7.
Abū Ya'lā al-Khalīlī, 108.
Abū, Jilā al-Tamīmī, 313.
Al-Yamani Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā, 229.
Ya'qūb Ibn Killis, 192.
Yāqūt al-Ḥamwī, 210n, 301.
Yaḥhob, 179.
Yaḥjub, 179.
Abū Yazid, 322.
Yūsuf Ibn Harūn al-Ramādī, 313.
Yatimah, 189, 191, 227n, 314, 315n, 219.

- Yazīd, 13.
 Yazīd Ibn al-Muḥallab Ibn Abi Sufra, 71, 72.
 Yazīd Ibn Qays, 46, 130, 290.
 Yazīd Riv. 274.
 Yemāmāh, 156n.
 Yeman, 13.
 Yemaen (Yaman), 24, 25n, 47, 63, 110, 223, 231, 275.
 Yesāi, 279n.
 Yumn, 82.
 Ibn Yūnus, 48n, 117, 301.
 Abū Yūsuf, Qādī, 25.
 Yūsuf al-Shantmar, 105n.
 Yūsuf Ibn Tāghifīn, 204, 237.

Z

- Al-Zubbā, 285.
 Al-Zāfir al-'Ubaydī, 152, 279.
 Al-Za'fīrī Abu'l Qāsim, 316.
 Al-Zāhid Abu 'Umar al-Muḥarrir, 147, 149.
 Zāhir al-Shahālmī, 115, 288n.
 Zāhir al-Dīn al-Ardbelī, 13.
 Abū Ishāq Zāhir al-Dīn, 8, 14, 59, 63.
 Al-Zāhirī, Abū Dawūd, 27, 101.
 Zahr, 120n.
 Zahr al-Riyāḍ, 155.
 Zahrā, 79.
 Ibn Zahrā Abū Bakr, 138, 312.
 Zahr al-Adab, 84, 85.
 Al-Zajjāj, 76, 77, 78, 79, 146.
 Zaki al-Dīn al-Mumdhiri, 154n.
 Al-Zamakhsarī, 42n, 210n, 238n.
 Zamzam, 228.
 Zanj, 241.
 Ibn al-Zaqqaq, 58.
 Al-Zar Kāshī Shaykh Badr al-Dīn, 12.
 Al-Zawzani, 189, 210n.
 Zayd Ibn Harit, 310.
 Zayd Ibn al-Ḥasan, 310n.
 Zayd Ibn Thābit, 20.
 Ibn Zayd 'Abū 'Abd Allah Muḥammad, 76.
 Ibn Zaydūn, Abu Bakr, 203.
 Ibn Zaydūn, al-Andalusī 201, 204.
 Zaynab, 162.
 Zayn al-Dīn, 11.
 Zayn al-Dīn, Ali, 225, 260n.
 Zayn al-Dīn al-Irāqī, 11.
 Al-Zayyāt, 66, 74, 121, 127, 131, 132.
 Zeidauno, 163n.
 Zibriqān Zibrican (Zibriqān), 308.
 Zinat al-Dahr, 207.
 Zinkī, 225.
 Ziri Ibn Manād, 97.
 Ziyād, 211.
 Al-Zubaydī, Abu Bakr Muḥammad, Ibn al-Ḥasan, 79.
 Al-Zubaydī Abu Bakr al-Andalusī, 312.
 al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkār, 147.
 Ibn al-Zubayr, 'Abd Allah, 169n.
 Zuhr, 120.
 Zuhri, Ibn Shihāb, 17.
 Ibn Zūlāq, 301.
 Zalzal, 64, 67.
 Zūrud, 185.

Page	Line	For	Read
3	37	Works	Work
5	17	ظلال	ظلال
11	32,34	'Aibek	Aybak
15	17	'Imra	Imra
17	26	al-Muqaṭṭa' al-Mutanabbī'	al-Muqaṭṭa' al-Mutanabbī
19	2	'Al	'Ali
24	7	Muwatṭa	Muwattā
27	1	Daw'ūd	Dāwūd
28	37	Huṣn al-Muha- 'ara,	Huṣn al-Muḥāḍarah
29	35	al-Shāfi'i	al-Shāfi'i
37	37	Curuls locks	Curls of locks
39	7	Trave's	Travels
46	3	NAKHA'I	NAKHA'I
46	7	Tābais	Tābi 'is
46	22	Tabai'is	Tābi'is
47	12	Abi'l Yamān	Abi 'l Yamān
47	25	comprison	comparison
48	2	Shā'fai'is	Shāfi'i
48	4	al-Shāfi'is	Shāfi's
49	20	K	Ḳ
50	6	Jāmi' 'al-	Jāmi' al
50	31	Chrestomathiue	Chrestomathie
51	29	Du'luj	Du'luj
54	19	Catalgi	Catalogi
55	4	Sa'd	Sa'd
55	4	al-Mutwalli	al-Mutawalli
55	12	Abu Sa'd	Abū Sa'd
55	16	Shāfi'i	Shāfi'i
55	24	Urmāwi	Urmawi
55	26	al-Kall	al-Khall
59	18	Mughayra	Mughīrah
61	9	tallent	Talent
61	10	to me	me to
65	9	word and	words
68	23	Baghdād	Baghdād
71	29	Mu'tazz	Mu'tazz
72	24	Da'id	Dā'i al-
72	29	ail	all
75	36	adies'	ladies'
76	19	Tha'alibi	Tha'alibi

Page	Line	For	Read
80	21	Orintale	Oriental
86	17	Canā'an	Kan'ān
86	41	Gregorus	Gregorius
94	8	Justy	justify
94	13	Askalan	'Asqalān
95	16	land-tan	land-tax
97	9	Ans	Anas
98	16	Ja'far	Ja'far
99	14	Hayān	Ḥayyān
101	8	Dā'ūd	Dāwūd
101	23	minifest	Manifest
101	34	as as a	as a
102	3	Suwayjat	Suwayqat
102	29	Yafi'i	Yafi'i
104	25	Muḥadhdhab	Muḥadhdhab
108	17	explained	expiated
108	25	Yāfi'i's	Yāfi'i's
108	35	Ṭanlun	Ṭūlūn
109	14	Samāni	Sam'āni
111	10	Abū Allāh	'Abd Allāh
111	19	al-Kudūri	al-Qudūri
111	28	Ta'lika	Ta'liqah
113	24	No. 26	No. 25
117	29	Ja'afar	Ja'far
121	19	tread	treated
121	29	'Aa	'Aja
124	13	preyed	prayed
125	25	Aḥḥam	Akḥḥam
125	33	Muta'kallimn	Mutakallimīn
127	4	Al-Aḥhiq	Al-Wāḥhiq
127	36	Originai	Original
127	38	notice	noticed
129	40	Mahzani	Mahzami
131	28	Sayyāt	Zayyāt
132	3	stirize	satirize
137	33	al-Barr	al-Barr's
142	5	Samāni	Sam'āni
145	21	السحر	الشهر
145	28	العاني	المعاني
145	32	A'shā	A'shā
148	27	(word 'dreams'	to be deleted)
150	36	تشديد on	تشديد with n

Page	Line	For	Read
151	34	'Imān	'Imān
152	3	Silafā	Silafi
152	29	al-Abbār	al-Jabbār
154	24	Fuqahd	Fuqahā
154	25	Salal	Salaf
154	38	abstenions	abstemions
155	2	Ribāq	Riyāq
155	21	Mundird	Mundhiri
155	30	Abn 'Ibn Qāsim	Abu'l-Qāsim
156	24	bouble	double
156	34	Anals	Annals
157	9	talen	talent
157	11	Tinbih	Tanbih
159	11	Qurṭudi	Qurṭubi
160	4,13, 17	izar	'idhār
163	24	Ths teset	the Text
164	5	thle areomestnd	the most learned
164	21	al-āmi'	al-Lāmi'
165	2,24,25	Habib	Ḥabib
165	26	Buḥlūori	Buḥturi
167	23,26	al-yāfi	yāfi'i
170	19	Imra'ut	Imra
171	11	Mu'jmil	Mujmil
173	6	deposes	deposed
174	8	'Iḍāh	'Idāh
174	10	Ḥiyla	Ḥijṭā
175	15	Ḥazal	Ḥajal
175	27,30	خوشی	حوشی
176	20	Ikḥshihī	Ikḥshidi
178	14	Uuḥiq	Ruḥiq
179	19	Mu'aḍḍal	Mu'aḍḍhal
179	36	atimah	yatimah
179	38	Ghārib	Ghārib
180	28	beprive	deprive
181	33	word	world
182	28	repproched	reproached
183	7	perceived	Perceive
184	26	hc	be
188	21	lbc	lbn
188	30	Nakr	Nakir

Page	Line	For	Read
193	15	Egypt	Egypt
193	32	Kuyah	Kunyah
195	29	of	or
196	2	Mu'azz	Mu'tazz
196	20	occomplished	accomplished
197	24	wasot	waste
198	18	meridan	meridian
198	18	evening	evenings
200	2	heirs	hairs
200	5	fo	of
201	20	Māk <sub>h</sub> -ūn	Mak <sub>h</sub> zūm
206	17	velley	valley
208	28	zephrr	zephyr
209	29	sleeplessnes	sleeplessness
210	12	men	man
214	11	al-Ahaā-i	al-Ahwāzi
216	27	some	same
217	25	througħ	though
221	23	Kharidah	Khurdād
224	6	Hijāj	Hijāz
228	5	al-Rashī	al-Rashid
228	34	emrr	emir
230	25	sa'ādi	sa'di
230	33	tde	the
233	12	may	many
235	33	in	is
236	5	'Ārif	'Arif
236	18	adour	odour
236	28	al-Zuwwāqin	Tawwābīn
237	1	'Iyāt	'Iyād
237	20	sings	signs
240	1	saqirs	faqirs
241	14	on	an
242	15	for	from
242	19	rai	a'ā
243	2	Shān	Shāh
243	5	Aktār	Aktāf
243	25	accostomed	accustomed
244	16	later	latter
244	17	place	palace
245	17	cnaracter	character

Page	Line	For	Read
247	31	missimaries	missionaries
248	30	si	is
250	7	Istikin	Iftikin
251	21	Hakkāis	Hakkars
251	31	Graleis	Graecis
259	1	any	and
261	14	Arsiān	arsilān
262	6	Najm at-Dīn	'Najm al-Dīn
262	9	'Az	'Aziz
262	11	Ipsahāni	Ispahāni
262	12	7	77
263	22	sulān	sultān
265	18	Basūrīr	Basūsiri
267	24,25	(Both lines to be deleted)
268	36	fouding	founding
270	62	Svria	Syria
274	—	276	274
277	25	Specimencatal	Specimencatal
278	40	oupage	on page
280	13	Ans	Anas
282	31	acquai stance	acquaintance
282	35	Lūt	Lūti
284	24	lines	line
293	23	Shuqr	Shukr
305	1	Khalifah	Khalifat
305	25	Jāhali	Jāhili
308	7	treshards	treshardi
308	7	satriser	satiriser
308	18	fass-fosse	bass-fosse
308	23	vavre	vivre
308	26	fair	faire
308	35	lonagge	lauange
308	38	ci'q	cing
312	33	Maḥammad	Muḥammad
326	22	him	his

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 2

Eng. Translation
M. de Slane

Edited by
Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. B00075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

T. W. BEALE

Thomas Beale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and edited by H.G. Keene, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It provides detailed biographical information on all the main figures in the history of the East from the first century A.D. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is an outstanding work of scholarship and has been highly acclaimed by Oriental scholars and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. 000018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan

wa
Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME II

Edited by:

S. MOINUL HAQ
M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN
New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set

ISBN 81-7151-172-4 (Vol. II)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002

Printed in India

NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

ا	=	a	ض	=	d
آو	=	aw	ط	=	t
ای	=	ay	ظ	=	z
ب	=	b	ع	=	'
ت and ث	=	t	غ	=	gh
ث	=	th	ف	=	f
ج	=	j	ق	=	q
ح	=	h	ك	=	' k
خ	=	kh	گ	=	g
د	=	d	ل	=	l
ذ	=	dh	م	=	m
ر	=	r	ن	=	n
ز	=	z	و	=	ū;w
س	=	s	ه	=	h
ش	=	sh	ی	=	ī;y
ص	=	ṣ	ء	=	'

Long vowels : ā, ī, ū

Short vowels : a, i, u

PREFACE

For some unavoidable reasons the publication of this volume was delayed. I am happy that Part I of the book is now being published. The printing of Part II will be taken up shortly.

It may be mentioned that three notices included in this Part (Nos. 210; 213; 216) are not to be found in de Slane's Trans., nor in the autograph. Since they appear in the printed editions (Cairo, 1299 H.; 1948; Tehran, 1367) we have also translated them, dropping however some additional anecdotes which appear only in the last one.

Wherever it was considered necessary to indicate the original orthography of a name or word it has been shown within square brackets—[ ]; additional footnotes by the Editor have not been numbered, but have been indicated with signs, such as an asterisk (*).

S. Moinul Haq

CONTENTS

	Page
Preface .....	iii
Note on Transliteration .....	iv
101 Umayyah Ibn Abī al-Ṣalt .....	1
102 Iyās al-Qaḍī .....	5
103 Ibn al-Qirriyah al-Hilālī .....	9
104 Najm al-Din Ayyūb .....	17

ب

105 Bādīs Ibn al-Manṣūr .....	23
106 'Izza al-Dawlah Bakhtiyār .....	25
107 Barkyaruq .....	27
108 Abū al-Ṭāhir al-Raffa al-Anmāṭī .....	28
109 Barjawān .....	29
110 Baṣhshār Ibn Burd .....	30
111 Biṣhr Ibn al-Ḥarith al-Ḥafī .....	34
112 Biṣhr Ibn Ghīyāth al-Marīsī .....	37
113 Bakkār Ibn Qutaybah .....	38
114 Abū Bakr the Jurisconsult .....	41
115 Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Māzinī the Grammarian .....	42
116 Bulukkin Ibn Ziri .....	45
117 Būrān .....	46
118 Būri Taj al-Mulūk .....	51

ت

119 Tutuṣh .....	52
120 Taqiyah Bint Ghayth .....	55
121 Abū Ghālib al-Tayyānī .....	57
122 Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr .....	59
123 Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs .....	62
124 Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh .....	65

ث

125 Thābit Ibn Qurrah .....	69
126 Ḍhu 'l-Nūn al-Miṣrī .....	74

127	Jarīr the Poet .....	78
128	The Imām Ja'far Al-Ṣādiq .....	84
129	Ja'far the Barmakide .....	86
130	Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt, called also Ibn Ḥinzābah .....	107
131	Ibn al Sarrāj al-Qārī al-Baghdādī .....	112
132	Abū 'l-Ma'ṣhar al-Balkhī .....	114
133	Ja'far Ibn Ḥamdan al-Andalusi .....	115
134	Ja'far Ibn Falāḥ .....	116
135	Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfat .....	117
136	The Amir Ja'bar .....	118
137	Naṣīr al-Dīn Jaqar .....	119
138	Jamīl The Poet .....	120
139	Abū Usāmah Jundādāh .....	128
140	Al-Junayd .....	128
141	The Qā'id Jawhar .....	131
142	Jihārkas al-Ṣalāḥī .....	140

143	Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī .....	140
144	Al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf .....	149
145	Al-Muḥāsibī .....	157
146	Abū Firās al-Ḥamdānī .....	158
147	Ḥarmalah .....	162
148	Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī .....	162
149	Abū 'Alī al-Za'farānī .....	165
150	Al-Iṣṭakhrī .....	167
151	Ibn 'Abī Hurayrah .....	168
152	Abu 'Alī al-Ṭabari .....	168
153	Abu 'Alī 'l-Fāriqī .....	169
154	Ibn al-Marzubān al-Qāḍī al-Sirāfi .....	170
155	Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī .....	172
156	Abū Aḥmad al-'Askari .....	174
157	Ibn Rashīq al-Qayrawānī .....	176
158	Al-Mujid al-'Asqalānī .....	178
159	Ibn Zūlāq al-Miṣrī .....	180
160	Abū Nizār Ibn Sāfi Malik al-Nuḥāt .....	181
161	The Imām al-Ḥasan al-'Askari .....	182
162	Abū Nuwās Ibn Hānī .....	183

163	Ibn Waki' al-Tinnīsī .....	188
164	Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Allāf .....	190
165	Abu 'l-Jawā'iz al-Wāsīṭi .....	194
166	'Alam al-Din al-Shātānī .....	195
167	Nāṣir al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān .....	196
168	Rukn al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh .....	199
169	Al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl the Vizir .....	200
170	Al-Wazīr al-Muhallabī .....	202
171	The Viṣir Nizām al-Mulik .....	205
172	Fakhr al-Kuṭṭāb al-Juwaynī .....	208
173	Al-Karābisi .....	209
174	Abū 'Ali al-Khayarān .....	209
175	The Qāḍi Ḥusayn .....	210
176	Abū 'Ali al-Sinjī .....	211
177	Al-Farrā al-Baghawī .....	211
178	Al-Ḥalīmī .....	212
179	Al-Wannī al-Faraḍī .....	213
180	Ibn Khamis al-Juhānī .....	214
181	Al-Ḥallāj .....	214
182	Al-Jannābī .....	218
183	Ibn al-Muqaffa' .....	223
184	Al-Ra'is Ibn Sinā (Avicenna) .....	231
185	Al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Khalī' .....	239
186	Ibn al-Ḥajjāj The Poet .....	240
187	Al-Wazīr al-Maghribī .....	242
188	Ibn Khalawayh .....	248
189	Abū 'Ali al-Ghassānī .....	250
190	Ali Bārī' .....	251
191	Al-Tughhrā'i .....	254
192	Ibn al-Khāzin, the Khātib .....	256
193	Abū 'Abd Allah the Shī'i .....	257
194	Abū Salamah Ḥafṣ al-Khallāl .....	259
195	Ḥammād Ibn Abi Hanifah .....	261
196	Ḥammad al-Rāwiyah .....	262
197	Ḥammād 'Ajrād, the Poet .....	266
198	Abū Sulaymān al-Khattābī .....	268
199	Ḥamzah Ibn Ḥabīb al-Zayyāt .....	270
200	Ḥunayn Ibn Ishāq al-'Ibādī .....	270
201	Ibn Ḥayyān .....	271

خ

202	Kh ārijah the Jurisconsult .....	273
203	Kh ālīd Ibn Yazīd the Umayyad .....	274
204	Kh ālīd Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Bajāli al-Qasri .....	276
205	Al- Kh idr Ibn 'Aqīl al-Arbili .....	280
206	Ibn Bashkuwāl .....	283
207	K halifah Ibn K hayyāt .....	284
208	Al- K halīl Ibn Aḥmad .....	285
209	K humārawayh [Ibn Ṭulūn] .....	290
210	K hayr al-Nassāj al-Ṣūfī .....	292

د

211	Abū Sulaymār: Dāwūd al-Zahīrī .....	293
212	Al-Malik al-Zāhir Mujīr al-Dīn .....	296
213	Dāwūd al-Ṭā'ī .....	297
214	Ḍubays Ibn Sadaqah .....	300
215	Di'biī Ibn 'Alī al- K hūzā'ī .....	302
216	Da'īaj Ibn Aḥmad al-Sijistānī .....	307
217	Abū Bakr Dulaf al- S hibli .....	308
218	Abu'l-Mutā' Dhu'l-Qarnayn Ibn Ḥamdān .....	311
219	Rabī'ah al-'Adawaiah .....	312
220	Rabī'ah al-Rāi .....	314
221	Al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān al-Murādi .....	317
222	Al-Rabī' al-Jīzī .....	318
223	Al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus .....	320
224	Rib'ī Ibn Khirāsh al-Kūfī .....	325
225	Rajā' Ibn Ḥayāt .....	326
226	Ru'bah Ibn al-'Ajjāj .....	329
227	Rawḥ Ibn Ḥatīm al-Muhallabi .....	330

ز

228	Al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkar .....	333
229	Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Zubayr .....	335
230	Zubaydah The Wife al-Rashīd .....	335
231	Zufar Ibn al-Hudhayl al-Ḥanafī .....	336
232	Abū Dulāmah .....	337
233	'Imād al-Dīn Zankī .....	344
234	Zankī Ibn Mawdūd .....	346

235	Bahā al-Dīn Zuhayr al-Muhallabī .....	347
236	Ziyād Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Bakka'ī .....	352
237	Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī .....	353
238	Zirī Ibn Manād .....	356
239	Zaynab The Daughter of al-Sha'ri .....	357

س

240	Sālim Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-'Adawī .....	358
241	Sālim al-Khāsir .....	359
242	Abū Bakr Ibn 'Ayyāsh .....	361
243	Sābūr Ibn Ardashir The Wazir .....	363
244	Sarī al-Saqatī .....	364
245	Al-Sari al-Raffā .....	366
246	Ḥayṣ-Bayṣ al-Ṣayfi .....	368
247	Abū 'L-Ma'ālī al-Ḥazīrī .....	371
248	Sa'id Ibn Jubayr .....	373
249	Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab .....	378
250	Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī .....	379
251	Al-Akhfash al-Āwsaṭ .....	382
252	Sa'id Ibn al-Mubārak al-Dahhān .....	383
253	Sufyān al-Thawrī .....	386
254	Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah .....	387
255	Al-Sayyidah Sukaynah .....	390
256	Sulaym al-Rāzī .....	393
257	Sulaymān Ibn Yasār .....	395
258	Al-A'Mash .....	396
259	Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī .....	399
260	Al-Ḥamiq The Grammarian .....	401
261	Abu 'L-Qāsim al-Ṭabarānī .....	402
262	Abū 'L-Walīd al-Bājī .....	402
263	Abū Ayyūb al-Mūriyānī .....	404
264	Sulaymān Ibn Wahb .....	406
265	Sanjar Ibn Malikshāh .....	410
266	Sahl al-Tustarī .....	412
267	Abū Ḥatīm al-Sijistānī .....	413
268	Abū 'L-Faṭḥ Sahl al-Arghiyānī .....	415
269	Abu 'L-Tayyib Sahl al-Ṣ'ulūki .....	416

ش

270	Shāwar .....	418
271	Al-Afḍal Shāhanshāh .....	423
272	Nūr al-Dawlat Shāhanshāh .....	425
273	Shabīb Ibn Yazīd al- Khārījī .....	427
274	The Qāḍī Shurayh .....	430
275	The Qāḍī Sharik .....	433
276	Shaqīq al-Balkhī .....	435
277	Shuhdah al-Kātibah Bint al-Ibarī .....	435
278	Shirkūh Ibn Shāḍhī .....	436

ص

279	Abū 'Umar al-Jarmī .....	440
280	Ṣaliḥ Ibn Mirdās .....	441
281	Sā'id The Philologer .....	443
282	Sayf al-Dawlat Ṣadaqah al-Asadī .....	444

ض

283	Al-Aḥnaf Ibn Qays .....	445
-----	-------------------------	-----

ط

284	Ṭawūs .....	453
285	Abū 'L-Ṭayyib al-Tabarī .....	454
286	Ibn Bābshadh The Grammarian .....	458
287	Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn al- Khuzā'i .....	460
288	Sayf al-Islām Tuḥtikīn .....	466
289	Al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik .....	469
290	Abū Yazīd al-Bastāmī .....	474

ظ

291	Abū 'L-Aswad al-Du'walī .....	474
292	Ẓāfir al-Ḥaddād .....	480

IBN KHALLIKAN'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

101 Umayyah Ibn Abi al-Şalt

Abu al-Şalt Umayyah Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Abi al-Şalt al-Andalusi al-Dāni (a native of Denia in Spain), possessed superior information in the different branches of general literature, and is author of a work entitled al-Ḥadiqah (the Grove), which is composed on the plan of al-Tha'ālibī's Yat mah; being also skilled in philosophy, he received the title of al-Adīb al-Ḥakīm (the learned in belles-letters and philosophy): he was besides deeply versed in the sciences of the ancients.<sup>1</sup> Having left Spain, he took up his residence at Alexandria. The kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him with commendation in the Kharidah<sup>2</sup> and cites the following, among other pieces of verse composed by him:

"Formed as I am of earth, the earth is my country, and the human race my relations. I must therefore impose on my camels a task of difficult accomplishment over for the tallest and the strongest."<sup>3</sup>

I have not, however, met with these verses in Ibn Abi al-Şalt's poetical works. The kاتب gives also as his, the following piece:

"She said to me: Why art thou living in obscurity? Is thy judgment weak or thy talent inferior?" To which I answered: 'My fault in the eyes of the public is to have obtained glory such as they never possessed. It is in fortune alone that I am deficient, but I am rich in honourable deeds.' "

1 The sciences of the ancients; the philosophical doctrines of the Greeks.

2 See MS. of the Bib. du Roi. No 1375, fol 76. Numerous extracts from the poems of Abu al-Şalt are there given.

3 That is, I must visit a generous patron who lives in a distant land

This piece also is not to be found in his divān.

By the same :

"She tormented and sported with my heart, and then returned unconcerned. How intrepid is that gazelle whose magic charms prolong my sufferings ;<sup>1</sup> she kills with her looks whom she pleases, and whom she revives. Where is the love which she has not betrayed? Where are the promises which she does not break? "

By the same :

"The 'idhar crept along his cheek, but retreated from the smiling lips it did not dare to kiss. No wonder it should fear death from such a kiss ; saliva is a deadly poison for scorpions.<sup>2</sup> "

By the same :

"I have seen a graceful maid, whose beauty partook of the qualities possessed by that liquor which she poured from the ewer into the wine-cup ; its intoxicating power was in her looks, its colour in her cheeks, its flavour in her kiss."

The author of the Kharidah gives as his the following verses in his notice on al-Ḥasan Ibn Abi Shakhnā<sup>3</sup>.

"I marvel how your looks, which are so languishing, can captivate the brave and vigorous ; your glance, though sheathed (in your eyelids), work the same effects as the unsheathed sword."

The poetical compositions of Umayyah Ibn Abi al-Ṣalt are numerous and good. Towards the end of his life he removed to al-Mahdiyyah<sup>4</sup>, where he died on Monday, the first day of the 1 Literally ; Who bloweth on the knots of patience ; see Sale's Koran, note on sūrat 1 3, in which a similar expression occurs.

2 See Introduction.

3 Abu 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn Abi al-Shakhnā, surnamed al-Mujid, was native of 'Asqalān in Syria, and the greatest poet which that city produced. He was living H. 470 (A. C. 1077-8) 'Imād al-Dīn's Kharidah furnishes little information respecting him, but it contains numerous fragments of his poetry. See MS. of the Bib du Roi, No. 137., fol. 13 v. In this manuscript, the name of al-Shakhnā is written al-Shajna. الشجنا

[The Egyptian edition gives al-Shakhḥba. The name is not legible in the autograph.—Ed.]

4 Al-Mahdiyyah, a sea-port city lying to the south of Tunis, was founded A. H. 303, by al-Mahdi 'Ubayd Allāh, the first of the Fā imite *Kh*alifs. For its description see al-Bakrī's geography of Northern Africa in the Notices et Extraits, tom. 12, p. 479.

year 529 H (22 nd October, A. C. 1134), some, however place his death on the 10th Muḥarram, 528*, and 'Imād al-Dīn says in the Khariḍah that he found written at the end of a copy of the Ḥadiqah given him by al-qāḍī al-Fāḍl, that the author died on Mondy, 12th of Muḥarram, H. 546; but the first is the true date, because most writers agree in giving it, and it is mentioned also in the Jinān of the qāḍī al-Raḥīd Ibn al-Zubayr<sup>1</sup>. Ibn Abi al-Ṣalt died (as we have said) at al-Mahdiyyah, and was buried at al-Munastir<sup>2</sup> (of which place we shall again speak in the life of Hibat Allāh al-Būṣīrī). The last words pronounced by him were the following verses of his own composition, which he ordered to be inscribed on his own tomb :

"I have dwelt in thee, O transitory world ! in the full certainty of passing to an eternal abode ; and the most awful circumstance for me in the event, is the obligation of appearing before One Whose judgments are equitable, and Who acts not unjustly. O ! that I knew what reception shall be mine on that day ; for my stock (of merits) is small, and my sins are many. If I be covered with confusion for my crimes (I shall avow the justice of my sentence), for I deserve the severest punishment inflicted on a sinner. But if mercy and forgiveness be shown me, (what happiness !) for bliss shall be there, and joy without end."

In the height of his last illness, he addressed his son 'Abd al-'Aziz in these terms ;

"O, 'Abd al-'Aziz ! thou who art to replace me ! Let the fear of the Lord of Heaven be before thee when I am gone. I thus do bind thee to fulfil a duty which thou knowest (to be essential) ; keep therefore thy agreement. If thou actest according to my recommendation, the true direction and thou shall be inseparable ; if thou brekest thy promise, thou shalt err from the rigway. I have now advised thee to the best of my power."

<sup>1</sup> See his life, No. 64.

<sup>2</sup> It would appear from al-Bukri's description of Northern Africa, that Monastir, a sea-port town 50 miles S. E. of Tunis, was a sort of military convent, o' ribat : see Notices of Extrails, tom. 22, p. 488.

* 3d April, A. C. 1151.—Ed.

[I have since discovered, in a compilation written by a native of Maghrib, that Abu al-Ṣalt was born at Denia, a city in Spain, in the year 460 (A. C. 1067-8), and that he studied under a number of persons in that country; among others, Abu al-Walīd al-Waqashī, qāḍī of Denia. He arrived at Alexandria with his mother on the festival of Sacrifices (10th Dhu al-Ḥijjah 489* in the year 505 he was banished from Egypt by al-Afḍal Shāhan-shāh, but he continued some time at Alexandria, uncertain (to what country he should go); he departed in the year 506 for al-Mahdiyyah, where he was honourably received by the sovereign of that city, 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādis'. He there had a son born to him, whom he called 'Abd al-'Aziz, and who became a poet of superior ability and a skilful chess-player; 'Abd al-'Aziz died at Bugia (in the province of Algier), H. 546 (A. C. 1151). I may observe that 'Imād al-Dīn, in citing the authority of al-qāḍī al-Fāḍil, has made a mistake and taken the date of the son's death for that of the father's. When Umayyah was imprisoned in Egypt, he composed, by al-Afḍal's orders, a treatise on the use of the astrolabe; a work on astronomy, entitled al-Wajīz (the compendium); a treatise on simple medicines; a work on logic, entitled Taqwīm al-Dhihn (regulation of the mind); another, called the Intiṣār (Aid), containing an answer to 'Alī Ibn Ridwān's<sup>2</sup> refutation of Ḥunayn Ibn Isḥāq's Medical Questions. When he had composed the Wajīz by order of al-Afḍal, that wazīr had it examined by his astronomer Abu 'Abd Allāh of Aleppo, who gave as his opinion that the work could not be made use of by beginners in astronomy, and that those who were masters of that science had no occasion for it. One

1 In the life of Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm will be found the requisite information respecting 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā: mention is also made, in the same article, of Umayyah Ibn Abi al-Ṣalt, and of some works composed by him, which are not indicated here.

2 'Alī Ibn Ridwān died, A. H. 460 (A. C. 1067-8). See Abu a p. 256. in which work will be found several anecdotes respecting him; see also Russell's Description of Aleppo, vol. 2, appendix, p. xix. His life is given in the Tārīḥ al-Ḥukamā, MS of the Bib. du Roi, supplement, No. 105, page 351.

* December, A. C. 1096.—Ed.

of Umayyah's verses is as follows :

"Why should his clothes not be worn out, since he is a full moon (in beauty), and they are of linen."

His reason for enouncing so singular a thought is, that linen rots when exposed to the light of the moon. The disease of which Umayyah died was dropsy]<sup>1</sup>.

102 IYĀS AL-QĀDĪ

Abū Wāḥilah* Iyās was son of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Qurrah Ibn Iyās Ibn Hilāl Ibn Rabāb Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Sū'āt Ibn Sāriyah Ibn Dhubyān Ibn Tha'labah Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Aws Ibn Muzaynah for which reason he was surnamed al-Muzani, or the descendant of Muzaynah. He was renowned for eloquence<sup>2</sup> and penetration, and the acuteness of his mind was proverbial; the persons of merit who spoke their language with elegance considered him as their chief; (his judgment was so sure, that) his conjectures were verified by the events, and in the management of affairs he showed great dexterity. It is he to whom al-Ḥarīrī alludes in the following passage of his seventh maqāmah: In quickness of understanding, I resemble Ibn 'Abbas, and in the art of physiognomy I possess the talent of Iyās.<sup>3</sup> He was appointed qāḍī of Baṣrah by (the khalif,) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, and his great-grandfather Iyās was one of the companions of Muḥammad. His father Mu'āwiyah, having been asked how his son behaved towards him, replied: "An excellent boy! (his filial piety) relieves me from the cares of this world, so that I have leisure to think of the next." Iyās was celebrated for his talents and judgment; he was equally remarkable for his acuteness, instances of which are thus related: Being at a place in which something happened pro-

1 I have since.....to dropsy, is not in the autograph, Ed.

2 An Arab of the desert defined eloquence as the art of expressing one's ideas with precision and brevity. Arabic eloquence is therefore quite different from European: it is Iconicism rather than eloquence.

3 See De Sacy's Ḥarīrī, page 72.

* Egyptian edition gives Wā'ilah.—Ed.

ductive of alarm, and where three females whom he did not know were present, he said : "One of these females is pregnant, the other is nursing, and the third is a virgin." On inquiry, it was found that he had judged right; and on being asked how he had acquired that information, he replied : "In time of danger, persons lay their hands on what they most prize; now I saw that the pregnant woman, in her fright, placed her hand on her belly, which showed that she was with child; and I perceived the nurse place her hand on her bosom, by which I knew that she was suckling; and the movement of the virgin's arm<sup>1</sup> proved to me that she was a maid."—*[Hearing a Jew express his astonishment at the silliness of Muslims in imagining that the inhabitants of paradise are to eat food, and yet not be subject to any natural evacuation, he asked him if all that he eat passed off in that manner and on the Jew's replying, that God converted a portion of it into nourishment, he said : "Why then dost thou deny the possibility of God's converting into nourishment the whole of the food eaten by the inhabitants of paradise?"—Being one day in the court-yard of a house at Wāsiṭ, he said that there was an animal under one of the bricks (which formed the pavement) and the people having pulled it up found a snake coiled under it. He was then asked how he came to know it, and he answered : "I saw that, among all the bricks in the pavement, there were only two between which any dampness appeared; so I knew that there must have been somethings underneath which breathed."—As he was one day passing by a place, he said that he heard the howl of a strange dog, and on being asked how he knew that, he answered : "I know it from the lowness of his howl, and the loudness of the other dogs in barking." On examination, it was found that a strange dog was tied up there, and that the other dogs were barking at him.—Another day, he saw a fissure in the ground and said that some animal was beneath, which was found to be true : being asked how he knew it, he replied that a fissure in the ground could only be produced by an animal or by a plant

<sup>1</sup> The Arabic is here much more explicit.

* From "Hearing" a Jew to "testimony" on page 8 is not in the autograph. Ed.

(underneath).—Al-Jāḥiẓ says that, on examining a raised spot in an even soil if the orifice be found of a regular form and surrounded with loose earth, it is a sign that a truffle is below<sup>1</sup>; but if the opening be irregularly shaped, and the earth thrown up unevenly, it denotes the presence of an animal. Were I not apprehensive of being prolix, I should relate many singular instances of his clear-sightedness, but one of our learned men has already compiled a large volume on that subject. When 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz was khalif, he wrote to 'Adi Ibn Arṭāh, who acted as his lieutenant in 'Irāq, ordering him to effect a meeting between Iyās Ibn Mu'āwiyah and al-Qāsim Ibn Rabi'ah al-Ḥarashī, and authorising him to appoint the most acute-minded of the two qāḍī of Baṣrah. The meeting having taken place, Iyās said to Ibn Arṭāh: "O amīr! ask the two great doctors of Egypt, al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and Muḥammad Ibn Sīrin, their opinion of al-Qāsim and me." (His object in this was, to avoid the heavy responsibility which he should incur, were he to accept the office of qāḍī, and he therefore wished that the choice of the amir should fall upon al-Qāsim, who would certainly be strongly recommended by these two doctors;) for al-Qāsim went often to see them, whilst he, Iyās, did not. Al-Qāsim (being equally unwilling to fill the place of qāḍī), and aware that these two doctors would advise the amir to name him, said: "Make no inquiries respecting me or him, for I solemnly aver by the only true God, that Iyās Ibn Mu'āwiyah is an abler jurisconsult than I, and knows better the duties of a qāḍī; if what I say be false, you cannot legally appoint me, because I am a liar; and if my declaration be true it is incumbent on you to receive it (and act by it)."

On this Iyās said: "(O amīr!) you set a man on the brink of perdition, and he escapes the dangers which he apprehends by making a false oath, for which he will implore God's forgiveness." "Since you perceive that" replied 'Adi Ibn Arṭāh, "you are fit to fill the place" and he appointed him accordingly<sup>1</sup>. It is related of Iyās that he said: "I was never worsted (in penetration) but by one man; I had taken my seat in the court of judgment at Baṣrah, when a person came before me and gave testimony that a certain garden of which he mentioned the boundaries, belonged to a man whom he named. (As I had some doubts of his veracity,) I asked him how many trees were in that garden; and he said to me, after a short silence, 'How long is it since our lord the qāḍi has been giving judgment in this hall?' I told him the time. 'How many beams' said he, 'are there in the roof?' On which I acknowledged that he was in the right, and I received his testimony."—Iyās was once in the desert, and the water had run short, when he heard the bark of a dog: "That fellow," said he "is at the mouth of a well." His companions, having gone to the place from which the barking proceeded, found the fact as he had stated; on which they asked him how he knew it, and he replied that the barking which he had heard seemed to issue from well. Many other extraordinary instances are recited of his sagaciousness. It is stated by Abu Ishāq Ibn Ḥafṣ that Iyās dreamt that he should live till the next Festival of Sacrifices (which takes place each year on the 10th Dhū al-Hijjah); he therefore retired to a farm which he had at 'Abdasi (a village in the dependencies of Dašt Maysān, which place lies between Baṣrah and Khūzistān); and he died there in the year 122 (A. C. 730-40) or, by another account, in the year 121, at the age of 79.

<sup>1</sup> Truffles are common in the Syrian Desert about the month of April. They are favourite dish with the Arabs. (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, vol. 1, page 60.)

1 In the early ages of Islamism, pious Muslims were detested from exercising the functions of judge, by consideration of the heavy responsibility they should incur, and the strict account they should give to God of their administration. There were many instances of learned juriconsults suffering persecution and punishment rather than consent to fill so dangerous an office. Their apprehensions were grounded on the Sunnah, or Traditions, which furnish many positive declarations on the subject; according to one of these traditions, Muḥammad said: "There will come upon a judge, at the day of resurrection, such fear and horror that he will wish: 'Would to God I had not judged between two persons in a trial for the value of single date!'" Muḥammad said also: "He who shall be judge and awards agreeably to justice, will neither gain nor loose." (See other traditions of similar import in Mathew's Mishkāt al-Maḡdib, vol. 2, page 221).

In the year of his death, he related that he had a dream<sup>1</sup>, in which it seemed to him that he and his father were riding a race, and that one was unable to outstrip the other; he then mentioned that his father had lived seventy-six years, and that he himself was in that year of his age. On the night before he died, he said: "Do you know that in this night I shall have reached my father's age?" He then went to sleep, and was found dead in the morning. His father Mu'āwiyah died H. 80 (A. C. 699). (We shall conclude this article by another anecdote respecting Iyās:) A number of persons, amongst whom was Anas Ibn Mālik<sup>2</sup>, then nearly one hundred years of age, were looking out for the new moon of the month of Ramaḍān<sup>3</sup>; Anas said that he saw it, and he pointed to the place, but the others could not discern it. On this, Iyās went up to Anas, and perceived that a hair of his eyebrow was bent down (before the pupil of the eye, and thus produced an optical delusion); he therefore drew his finger over it, and smoothed it to her brow, after which he said: "O Abū Ḥamzah! show us the moon;" and the other looked again, but could not discover it.

103 IBN AL-QIRRIYAH AL-HILĀLĪ.

Abū Sulaymān Ayyūb al-Hilālī, surnamed Ibn al-Qirriyah was son of Zayd Ibn Qays Ibn Zurārah Ibn Salamah Ibn Jusham Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Zayd Manāt* 'Āmir Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Khazraj Ibn Taym Allāh Ibn al-Nimr Ibn Qasiṭ Ibn Hinb<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See note on dreams no 19.

<sup>2</sup> Anas Ibn Mālik, one of the last survivors among the Companions of Muhammad, died at Baṣrah, about the year 92 (A. C. 710-11), aged 102 years. He had served ten years under the Prophet, to whose prayers (say the Muslim writers,) he was indebted for his long life, his great wealth (his palm-trees bearing fruit twice every year), and upwards of eighty children — (Siyar al-Salaf)

<sup>3</sup> The Muslim Lent begins on the appearance of new moon in the month of Ramaḍān.

<sup>4</sup> I have here suppressed the intervening links of this genealogy, as they have been already given in the life of 'Abū al-Ḥasan al-Banbal; no 19.

[The name of Ibn Afṣar Ibn Dūmāl Ibn Jādilah Ibn Asad Ibn Rab'ah Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'ad have been omitted.—Ed.]

* The name of Zayd Manāt's father is given in two different ways on the same page as 'Āmir and 'Awf. See next page also.—Ed.

Ibn 'Adnān. Al-Qirriyah was the surname of one of his female ancestors, whose real name was Khumā'ah*, and who descended also from the Khazraj of the above genealogy; her father, Juḥam, being son to Rabi'ah Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn 'Awf • Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Khazraj. Ibn al-Qirriyah was an untutored Arab of the Desert, but the elegance and precision of language entitled him to the reputation of being one of the first orators among that people. A season of severe drought having obliged him to quit the Desert, he went to 'Ayn al-Tamar<sup>1</sup>, the governor<sup>2</sup> of which was under the orders of al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf. This governor kept open table every day, morning and evening, and Ibn al-Qirriyah, who had stopped at the door of the palace and saw the people enter, asked where they were going; being informed that they were going to dine with the Amīr, he went in also, and dined along with them. He then asked if the Amīr did so every day and being answered in the affirmative, he went to the palace every day for morning and evening meals. It happened, however, that the Amīr received letter from al-Ḥajjāj, written in the pure Arabic of the Desert, and full of uncommon expressions, which he was unable to understand, and for that reason, he caused dinner to be delayed. Ibn al-Qirriyah, on his arrival, not seeing the Amīr at table, asked why he did not dine, nor have dinner served for his guests; and he was informed that al-Ḥajjāj had sent him (the governor) a letter which he could not understand, as it was in the language of the Desert Arabs, and worded in terms of rare occurrence. On this, Ibn al-Qirriyah, who was an able orator and spoke (the pure Arabic) with fluency and eloquence, said: "Let the Amīr have the letter read to me, and I shall explain it with the help of God." This being told to the Amīr, he called him in, and Ibn al-Qirriyah, on hearing the letter read, explained to him all the contents.

1 'Ayn al-Tamar is situated on the edge of the Desert to the west of the Euphrates (Marāṣid).

2 The word (جـ) (āmīl), which is here translated governor, signifies literally an agent; it was also the name given to the resident officers who collected the revenue in the provinces.

* Jamā'ah according to de Slane but the autograph is supported by al-Qāmūs.—Ed.

"Could you answer it? said the Amīr. "I cannot read," said Ibn al-Qirriyah, "neither can I write; but I may sit by a person who can write down what I dictate." The answer was drawn up accordingly, and sent to al-Ḥajjāj, who, on hearing it read, perceived that it was in the pure language of the Arabs, and that its expressions were of uncommon elegance; and knowing that such was not the ordinary style of writers in the tax office, he caused the letters of the governor of 'Ayn al-Tamar to be brought, and found that they were not like that which he had just received. He therefore wrote to the governor in the terms: "Your letter has come to hand; it is widely different from your (usual) answers, and is in a language not your own: therefore, on the perusal of this, lay it not out of your hand before you send me the man who dictated to you your letter. Adieu". The governor read this note to Ibn al-Qirriyah, and told him to go to al-Ḥajjāj; the other wished to be dispensed, but the governor insisted, and having ordered him a dress, a supply of money, and a conveyance, he sent him off. Ibn al-Qirriyah, on arriving, went to al-Ḥajjāj, who said to him: "What is your name?"—"Ayyūb."—"That," said al-Ḥajjāj, "is the name of a prophet, and yet I think that you are an untutored Arab of the Desert<sup>1</sup>, one who meddles with eloquence, and finds no difficulty in expressing his thoughts." He then gave him a hospitable reception, and his admiration for him increased to such a height, that he intrusted him with a mission to (the khalīf) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. On the revolt of 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays al-Kindi<sup>2</sup> in Sejestān, al-Ḥajjāj sent Ibn al-Qirriyah on a mission to that chieftain. When he entered, Ibn al-Ash'ath said to him: "You must mount the pulpit, and say the khuṭbah<sup>3</sup>, and you must pronounce the deposition of 'Abd al-Malik, and revile al-Ḥajjāj: If not, I shall strike off your head." Ibn al-Qirriyah represented that he was an ambassador (and ought to be respected),

1 The names of patriarchs and prophets were more frequently borne by the Arabs who dwelt in towns, than by those who inhabited the Desert.

2 See Abulfeda Annoles, tom. I p. 423; and Price's Retrospect of Muhammadan History, vol. I. p. 455 This revolt took place H. 80 (A.C. 699).

3 See note on Khuṭbah no. 78

but the other merely replied that he should do what he had said. He was therefore obliged to mount the pulpit pronounce the deposition of 'Abd al-Malik and rail at al-Ḥajjāj. He then remained at that place. On the defeat and repulse of Ibn al-Ash'ath<sup>1</sup>, al-Ḥajjāj wrote to his agents at Ray, Isfahān, and the neighbouring places, ordering them to arrest all the partisans of Ibn al-Ash'ath whom they might meet, and send them to him prisoners. Ibn al-Qirriyah was among the number that were taken, and on being brought before al-Ḥajjāj the following dialogue ensued<sup>2</sup> :—Al-Ḥajjāj : "Answer what I ask thee!" —Ibn al-Qirriyah : "Ask what thou wilt."—Ḥ. : "What sayest thou of the people of 'Irāq?"—Q. : "They know the best of any the difference between true (rights) and vain (pretensions)."
—Ḥ. : "And what of the people of Ḥijāz?"—Q. : "They are the most prompt of any to sedition, and the feeblest when in it."—Ḥ. :—"What of the people of Syria?"—Q. : They are the slaves of him who conquers;" —Ḥ. : "Those of Baḥrayn?" —Q. ; "They are Nabateans become Arabs."—Ḥ. : "What sayest thou of the people of 'Ammān?"—Q. : "They are Arabs become Nabateans<sup>3</sup>."—Ḥ. : "The people of Moṣul?"—Q. : "The bravest of horsemen, and the most fatal to their foes." —Ḥ. : "And those of Yaman?"—Q. : "People who hear and obey, and cling to the strong side." Ḥ. : "Those of Yamāmah?" Q. : "They are rude and fickle, yet most firm in fight." Ḥ. : "The people of Fārs?" Q. : They are mighty in their violence, and ready to work woe; their plains are extensive, their towns few." Ḥ. : "Now tell me of the Arabs," Q. : "Ask." Ḥ. : "The Quraysh?" Q. : "The greatest in prudence, and the noblest

1 H. 83 (A. C. 702) Price's Retrospect, page 461.

2 This singular dialogue or catechism is frequently cited by Arabic historians and philologists; and is remarkable as an encyclopaedia of the knowledge possessed at that period by the inhabitants of the Desert; it is frequently obscure, its style being singularly concise and ancient. But it may be doubted if such a conversation as this really took place between al-Ḥajjāj and Ibn al-Qirriyah.

3 The contempt of the Arabs for the Nabateans is well known.

4 I have doubts respecting the real meaning of expression اكرههم سباحا

5 I may be possibly mistaken here.

in rank" H.: "The tribe of 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah?" Q.: "They bear the longest spears, and are the bravest in making inroads<sup>1</sup>." H.: "The Banū Sulaym?" Q.: "The most sociable, and also the most generous in their gifts for God's service<sup>1</sup>." H.: "The tribe of Thaqif?" Q.: "The noblest by their ancestry, and the most frequent in their deputations." H.: "And the Banū Zubayd?" Q.: "They are the most attached to their standards, and the most successful in their vengeance<sup>2</sup>." H.: "What sayest thou of the tribe of Quḏā'ah?" Q.: "The greatest in importance, the noblest in origin, and the widest in renown." H.: "What of the Anṣārs?" Q.: "The best established in rank, the most sincere in their acceptance of Islāmism, and the most illustrious in their combats." H.: "The tribe of Tamim?" Q.: "The most conspicuous for their fortitude, and the greatest by their numbers." H.: "Bakr Ibn Wā'il?" Q.: "The firmest in their ranks, the sharpest in their swords." H.: "And 'Abd al-Qays?" Q.: "The first to reach the goal, and the best swordsmen under standards." H.: "What of the Banu Asad?" Q.: "A people great in number and fortitude; difficult to overcome, and firm in resisting." H.: "The tribe of Lakḥm?" Q.: "Princes, but some of them fools<sup>2</sup>." H.: "And Judḥām?" Q.: "They light up war, and fan it into a flame; they make it fruitful, and they reap the profits<sup>3</sup>." H.: "The Banu al-Ḥārith?" Q.: "They are maintainers of their ancient glory, and protectors of female honour." H.: "The tribe of 'Akk?" Q.: "Obstinate lions with hearts working evil." H.: "Taghlib?" Q.: "They strike home when they meet the enemy, and they raise around him the flames of war." H.: "And Ghassān?" Q.: "They of the Arabs possess the highest reputation, and the best established genealogy." H.: "Which of the Arab tribes in the time of paganism was the farthest above the reach of insult?" Q.: "Quraysh; the people of a hill (of glory) which is inaccessible, of a mount not to be shaken; dwelling in a town of which God declared

1 This is the tribe to which al-Ḥajjāj belonged.

2 It was to this tribe that the Mundhirs of Ḥirah belonged.

3 Literally: They impregnate it and milk it.

the rights sacred, and took under His protection the clients who sought its shelter." H.: "Tell me now of the character of each Arabian tribe in the time of paganism." Q.: "The Arabs used to say: Ḥimyar are lords of the kingdom; Kindah are the pure race of kings; Madhij are spearmen; Hamdān horsemen<sup>1</sup>; and Azd, the lions of the human race." H.: "Tell me now about the countries of the earth." Q.: "Ask." H.: "What is India?" Q.: "Its seas are pearl; its mountains rubies; its trees, (sweet-smelling) aloes; their leaves, perfumes; its people, a vile multitude, (fearful) as a flock of pigeons." H.: "The people of Khurāsān?" Q.: "Their waters are frozen, and the enemy they must contend with obstinate<sup>2</sup>." H.: "What sayest thou of 'Umān?" Q.: "Its heat is violent, and its game ready at hand." H.: "And Baḥrayn<sup>3</sup>?" Q.: "It is a heap of refuse between the two cities."<sup>4</sup> H.: "What of Yaman?" Q.: "It is the stock from which the Arabs are sprung; the people come of noble houses, and bear a high reputation." H.: "And Makkah?" Q.: "Its men are learned yet rude, and its women clothed yet naked." H.: "Madinah?" Q.: "It was there learning took root and sprang up." H.: "Baṣrah?" Q.: "Its winters are frosty, its heats violent; its waters salt, and its wars peace." H.: "And Kūfan?" Q.: "It is so high that it feels not the heat of the sea, and so low that the cold of Syria does not reach it; its nights are pleasant, and its good things abundant." H.: "What sayest thou of Wāsiṭ?" Q.: "It is a wife<sup>5</sup> placed between mother-in-law and a sister-in-law." H.:

1 Literally: Saddle cloths; that is always on horseback.

2 Probably the Turkish tribes.

3 Baḥrayn, as it is now written and pronounced, is a noun in the accusative case of the dual; it would appear that in old times it was pronounced Baḥrān in the nominative, which is more correct. The province of Baḥrayn is to the south-west of the Persian Gulf.

4 This I do not understand; but Kūfah and Baṣrah were sometime called the two cities.

5 I have followed the authority of the MSS. in printing جنته a garden in the Arabic text, but I am inclined to think that حنه (a wife) is the true reading. According to Abu al-Fida, Wāsiṭ lay between Kūfah and Baṣrah at the distance of fifty parasangs from each.

"And what are its mother-in-law and sister-in-law?" Q.: Baṣrah and Kūfah, which are jealous of it; but what harm can await it, since the Tigris and the Zāb shed, as they flow, prosperity upon it?" Ḥ.: "What of Syria?" Q.: "It is a fair bride, with females seated around her." Ḥ.: "Woe be to thee<sup>2</sup> 'O Ibn Qirriyah? (it had been better for thee) that thou hadst not followed the people of 'Irāq and adopted their hypocritical doctrines, after my telling thee to avoid them." He then called forth the executioner, to whom Ibn al-Qirriyah made a sign to wait, and then said: May God prosper the Amīr! (let me say only) three words, which shall become proverbs after my death<sup>3</sup>." Ḥ.: "Out with them." Q.: "The best horse may stumble; the best sword may rebound without cutting; and the man of prudence may commit a fault." Ḥ.: "This is not a time for jesting. Slave, inflict his (death's) wound!" On these words, the executioner struck off his head. According to another account, al-Ḥajjāj said, as he was about to put Ibn al-Qirriyah to death: "The Arabs pretend that for each thing there is a cause of ruin what then is the ruin for clemency?" Q.: "Anger." Ḥ.: "What is the ruin of knowledge?" Q.: "To bestow on those in affliction, and tell them that they are undeserving." Ḥ.: "What ruins the credit of the generous?" Q.: "To keep company with the base." Ḥ.: "What is the ruin of bravery?" Q.: "Tyranny". Ḥ. what is the ruin of piety? Q.: "Lukewarmness." Ḥ.: "And of genius?" Q.:

2 Literally: May thy mother be bereft of thee!

3 In the translation I have omitted rendering the expression كانهن ركب ووقف as it is impossible to make it understood without a note. Ibn al-Qirriyah's words are: "May God prosper the Amīr! the words are like a troop of travellers when halted." This is most probably an allusion to the third verse of Imr al-Qays's Mu'allaqah, in which the poet describes his sorrow at the sight of the abandoned cottage where mistress dwelt, and relates that his two companions stopped their camels وقفوا and endeavoured to console him. Their troop was therefore composed of three persons, and it is this number of three that Ibn al-Qirriyah made allusion. He merely meant that the words which he had to say were three in number, like the troops of Imra al-Qays. Al-Ḥajjāj possessing, as he did, a great acquaintance with the language, customs, and poems of the Desert Arabs must have immediately understood the expression.

"Ambition." H. : "And of traditon?" Q. : "Falsehood." H. : "What is the ruin of property. Q. : "Bad management. H. : "What is the ruin of the perfect man? Q. : Privation (of life). H. What is the ruin of al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf? Q. : "May God prosper the Amir ! nothing can ruin one whose reputation is noble, whose family is illustrious, and whose fortune is flourishing<sup>1</sup>." H. : Thou art full of schism ; thou hast shown thyself a hypocrite ! Strike off his head." "When he saw him dead, he was sorry for it. I took the above account from the work entitled Kitāb al Lafīf<sup>2</sup>, and gave it in full, as it was so connected that it was not possible to make an extract from it. To the demand of a learned man, who asked him the definition of address<sup>3</sup>, Ibn al-Qirriyah replied : "To bear with vexations, and wait for opportunities." The following was his definition of embarrassment : Stammering not produced by a natural infirmity, hesitation without motive<sup>4</sup>, and stumbling without cause. He was put to death A. H. 84 (A. C. 730). This is the person meant by the grammarians when, in citing their examples, they say Ibn al-Qirriyah in the time of al-Ḥajjāj<sup>5</sup>. Abu al-Faraj al-Isfahānī says, in his Kitāb al-Aghānī after giving a full account of Majnūn, the lover of Laylā<sup>6</sup>: "It has even been said that there are three persons who had never any real existence, though their (supposed) adventures and names are well known ; namely, Majnūn, the lover of Laylā, Ibn al-Qirriyah," (he of whom we are now speaking), "and Yahyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi al-'Aqb, the putative author of the Malāḥim?" Ibn al-Qirriyah was so

1 Literally : Whose branches are growing.

2 This work is not noticed by Ḥāj. Khalīfah

3 Meaning address in the management of affairs.

4 Literally : Not arising from doubtfulness (or mental incertitude).

5 I take the words Ibn al-Qirriyah in the time of al-Ḥajjāj to be grammatical example cited to prove that a noun governed in the genitive case by a preposition may sometimes be put in the accusative, and the preposition suppressed, thus في زمان is for في زمان.

6 See M. de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, p. 150

7 The Malāḥim (prognostics) is a collection of predictions and pretended prophecies. There were a number of works which bore this title. M. de Sacy has an excellent note on the subject in his Chrestomathie, tom. II. page 298 et seq.

named after al-Qirriyah, mother of Juṣham Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Amr, one of his ancestors; she had been first married to 'Amr and on his death she became the wife of his son Mālik,<sup>1</sup> by whom she had Juṣham. Qirriyah as an appellative noun, signifies the crop of a bird, but it was given to this woman as her real name. Some learned genealogists state that al-Qirriyah's true name was Khumā'ah* (as has been said towards commencement of this article;) and that she had two sons by Mālik: Juṣham, ancestor of Ibn al-Qirriyah, and Kulayb, maternal grandfather of al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭlib, uncle of Muḥammad; for Nutaylah or Natlah, mother of al-'Abbās, was daughter of Ḥubbāb†, son of Kulayb, son of Mālik; from this it would appear that al-'Abbās was a descendant of al-Qirriyah. Ibn Qutaybah says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, that Ibn al-Qirriyah was surnamed Hilālī because he sprung from the tribe of Hilāl Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn 'Āmir; but Ibn al-Kalbī states that he descended from Mālik Ibn 'Amr Ibn Zayd Manāt: there is then no Hilāl in Ibn al-Qirriyah's genealogy (as given by Ibn al-Kalbī), and Hilāl and Mālik are only related to each other through Zayd Manāt; God knows best!—Hilālī means descended from Hilāl Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Zayd Manāt, a branch of the tribe of Nimr Ibn Qāsiṭ: there is another Arabian tribe of the same name descended from 'Āmir Ibn Ṣaṣa'ah. Ibn al-Kalbī has noticed these two tribes in his Jamharat al-Nisab, and marked the relationship by marriage which existed between them; the reader is, therefore, referred to that work.

104. NAJM AL-DIN AYYŪB

Abu al-Shukr Ayyūb Ibn Shādhī Ibn Marwān, surnamed al-Malik al-Aḥḍal Najm al-Dīn (the excellent prince, the star of religion), was father of the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn Yūsuf, to whose life the reader is referred for the rest of the genealogy, and the nature of the uncertainty which prevails respecting it; we need not therefore repeat it here. A historian says: "Shādhī Ibn Marwān belonged to one of the most eminent and respectable families of Duwin<sup>1</sup>; he had there a companion called Jamāl al-Dawlat al-Mujāhid Bihruz," (the same who is mentioned in the life of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn.) "who was a most engaging and insinuating man, and gifted with superior abilities for the management of affairs; they were like two brothers for their mutual attachment, but an adventure which happened to Bihruz at Duwin forced him to abandon that city in shame and confusion. Having been suspected of improper familiarity with the wife of an Amir, he was seized and castrated by the husband; after this cruel mutilation, he would remain no longer in the city, but departed with the intention of entering the service of the sultān (of ʿIrāq), Ghiyāth al-Dīn Masʿūd, son of Mūḥammad Ibn Malikshāh.*" (The lives of these princes will be found in this work). "He there became acquainted with the tutor of the sultān's sons, and gained his favour and confidence by the address and skill which he displayed in all the affairs entrusted to his management; the tutor even authorised him to ride out with the young princes, when business prevented him from accompanying them himself. The sultān having perceived him one day with his sons, rebuked the tutor, who informed him that the person whom he had seen was a eunuch possessing great talents, and highly to be commended for his piety and morality. He then sent Bihruz occasionally on business to the sultān, who at length took much pleasure in his company, and chose him for his companion when he played at chess or draughts.<sup>2</sup> Bihruz got thus into such favour, that on the death of the tutor, he was chosen to fill his place; and being also entrusted by the prince with every affair of importance, his reputation spread over the empire. He then sent to Shādhī inviting him to come and witness the prosperity which he had attained, and partake of the good fortune with which God had favoured

1 These incestuous marriages were common before Islamism. See Pocock's Specimen, p. 350, 2nd ed.

* M. de Slane writes Jamā'ah and Egyptian edition also supports this reading.—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives Ḥubbāb.

1 Duwin or Dawin, is the Arabic name of the city of Tovin in Armenia. (St. Martin's Mem. hist. l'Arménie, tom. I. p. 119.)

2 Draughts, in Arabic Nurd. See Hyde's treatise de Ludis Orientalibus.

*M. de Slane writes Malakshah—Ed.

him, 'for,' said he, 'I wish you to know that I do not forget you.' On his arrival, Shādhī met with the greatest attention and kindness from his old friend, and he afterwards, with his sons, accompanied Bihruz to Baghdād, whither he had been sent by the sulṭān as governor: it being the custom of the Saljūq sulṭāns to have a lieutenant in that city. Bihruz having received the castle of Tikrit in gift from his sovereign, appointed Shādhī to the command of that place, finding that he above all others, was worthy of this mark of confidence. Shādhī died at Tikrit, and was succeeded by his son Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb (the subject of this article), who obtained, for his able administration, the thanks and the rewards of Bihruz. He was older than his brother Asad al-Dīn Shayrkūh* (whose life we intend to give). This relation differs in some points from that which is contained in the life of Ṣalāh al-Dīn (given in this work); but the facts may, no doubt, be perfectly established by combining the two accounts. We have also mentioned in that article by what means it was, that 'Imād al-Dīn Zankī, lord of Moṣul, became acquainted with Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb and Asad al-Dīn Shayrkūh; there is therefore no necessity for repeating it<sup>1</sup>. It happened some time after this that one of the females went out of the castle of Tikrit on some business, and passed, on her return, by Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb and his brother Asad al-Dīn Shayrkūh, who remarked that she was weeping, and asked her the cause; on which she told them that on entering the castle, she had been insulted by the Isfahsalār.<sup>2</sup> Shayrkūh, on hearing this, rose up, and seizing the halberd which belonged to that officer, struck him with it and killed him. In consequence of this, Najm al-Dīn imprisoned him and wrote to Bihruz, informing him of the circumstance, and putting Shayrkūh at his disposal. Bihruz made answer in these terms: "I have been under obligations to your father, who was my intimate friend; it is not therefore possible for me to treat either of you with severity; but it is my wish that you and your

1 I suspect that what follows is a continuation of the preceding extract.

2 See No. 100, note on إسماعيل.

*M. de Sane gives Shirkūh.—Ed.

brother retire from my service, that you leave the city of Tikrīt, and seek your livelihood where you will." This letter having put it out of their power to remain any longer at Tikrīt, they went to Moṣul where they met with a favourable reception from the Atābak 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī, who treated them with great honour and kindness, on account of his former acquaintance with them, and granted them a rich fief. When this Atābak obtained afterwards possession of the castle of Ba'labek, he appointed Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb as his lieutenant in that place. All these circumstances have been already related in the life of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn but in different terms. When I was at Ba'labek I saw there a convent of Ṣūfis, founded by Najm al-Dīn during his stay in that city, and called the Najmiyah after him. He was a man of great holiness and piety, fond of virtuous society and animated (in all his actions) by the purest motives and the best intentions. We have mentioned in the beginning of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's life some particulars respecting his father Najm al-Dīn, and have there related his appointment to the government of Ba'labek by Zangī and his removal afterwards to Damascus; it is not therefore necessary to repeat the same account here. When Shayrkūh went to Egypt to assist Shāwir, his brother Ayyūb remained at Damascus in the service of Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, son of Zangī. We shall speak of this expedition in the life of Shayrkūh and in that of Shāwir. In the reign of al-'Ādid, the (Fāṭimite khalif and) lord of Egypt, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn became wazīr of that country, and sent to request the presence of his father Ayyūb, who was still in Syria. In pursuance of his desire, Ayyūb was authorised to set out for Egypt, and was accompanied by a guard of honour furnished by Nūr al-Dīn, who defrayed also all the expenses of the journey<sup>1</sup>. He arrived at Cairo on the 24 Rajab, 565 H. (April, A.C. 1170)*; on approaching the city, al-'Ādid went out to meet him, in order to testify his esteem for Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who, on his part, treated his father with all due honour and respect; he even offered to resign the authority

---

1 I have here been obliged to paraphrase, in order to render fully the ideas expressed by the original.

* 13 April—Ed.

over to him, but Ayyūb replied: "O, my son! God had not chosen thee to fill this place, hadst thou not been deserving of it; and it is not right to change the object of Fortune's favours." Ayyūb continued to remain with his son till the latter obtained the sovereignty of Egypt, particulars of which event shall be given in his life. On the departure of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to lay siege to Karak<sup>1</sup>, his father remained at Cairo, and as he was one day riding out to exercise, as was customary with the troops; his horse stumbled after passing through the Bāb al-Naṣr, which is one of the city gates, and threw him in the middle of the road; this happened on Monday, 18 of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 568 H. (end of July, A. C. 1173)*. Having been carried home, he continued in great suffering till death took place on Wednesday, 27 of the same month. Such is the statement of generality of historians, the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn amongst the rest; this author says, however, that Ayyūb died on a Tuesday, and I read in the historical work of Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-'Adīm,<sup>2</sup> a passage extracted from a note written by Aḍad al-Dīn Murhif,† Ibn Usāmah,<sup>3</sup> stating that Ayyūb died on Monday, 18 of Dhū al-Ḥijjah; but it is manifest that 'Aḍad al-Dīn fell into this mistake from supposing that he died the same day on which he fell from his horse. Ayyūb was buried by the side of his brother Shayrakkūh in a chamber of the royal palace, and some years later, their bodies were transported to Madīnah; I find the following passage in a diary, composed by the qāḍī al-Faḍīl,

1 This was in A.H. 568; see Abu al-Fida's Annals and M. Reinaud's Extraits, c.c., p. 151.

2 The life of this historian has been given by M. de Sacy, in the Biographie universelle, article Kemal al-Dīn; and M. Freytag, in his selecta ex Historiæ Halebi. He died A.H. 660 (A. 1262). The passage to which Ibn Khallikān alludes is not to be found in the Zubdat al-Ḥalab, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No 728. On the contrary, that work places Ayyūb's death on the 28 Dhū al-Ḥijjah. It must therefore be his Bugh̃hiyat al-Talab, or biographical dictionary of the illustrious men of Aleppo, which contains the note here spoken of, but this I have been unable to verify, as the MS. of the Bugh̃hiyat belonging to the Bib. du Roi is incomplete; it proceeds only as far as "أيه".

3 See No. 64, note on the son of Usāmah.

* 30 July.—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives Murhif—Ed.

and in his own handwriting, in which he mentions the occurrences of each day: "On Thursday, 4 Šafar, 580 (May, A. C. 1184)*, a letter written by Badr al-Dīn, formerly mamlūk of Asad al-Dīn Šayrkūh, came from Madinah, with the information that the two coffins, containing the bodies of the amīrs Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb and Asad al-Dīn Šayrkūh had arrived, and that they had been deposited in the mausoleum prepared for their reception, and which is situated near the sacred tomb of the Prophet; may God grant to them the (spiritual) advantages of that neighbourhood!" Šalāh al-Dīn was on his way from Karak to Egypt, when he received the news of his father's death, and his affliction was the more poignant from his having been absent at the time. The following is an extract from a letter of consolation written by the Qādī al-Fāḍil, in the name of Šalāh al-Dīn, to 'Izz al-Dīn Farūkh Shāh Ibn Shāhanshāh Ibn Ayyūb, lord of Ba'labek and a nephew of that prince: "The fatality which has befallen our deceased lord (may God pardon him his sins and shed mercy on his tomb!) is a cause of great pain and extreme sorrow; and our sadness was doubled by our absence from his death-bed; though we invoke the aid of patience, it refuses to come but tears obey our wishes. O, what a misfortune! to be deprived of him who has thus deprived us of consolation; whose death has made all other affliction appear light, and sundered the bonds of our happiness, formerly so complete, and now, broken for ever!"

The hand of Death snatched him away in my absence; and had I been present, what could I have done?"

The doctor 'Umārat al-Yamānī (whose life shall be given) lamented his death in a long qasidah, the greater part of which is excellent; it begins thus:

"It is the greatest shock (which could happen)! and a double reward shall be his, who hath shown firmness in abiding its terrors."

---

1 Literally: By whose death the collected mass of happiness was scattered, so that, after its union, it became fragments.

* 17 May.—Ed.

The learned Ibn Abi al-Ṭay of Aleppo<sup>1</sup> says in his greater history that Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb was born in Sijistān, or by another account, at Jabal Jūr,<sup>2</sup> and that he was brought up in the city of Moṣul; but in this he is in contradiction with every other author, and my only reason for noticing his statement is to prevent those who may read that passage, and who are unacquainted with history, from supposing that it is exact, which is by no means the case; the true circumstances being those which we have mentioned above. Shādhī is Persian word and means joyful<sup>3</sup>—Duwin is the name of a city in the most northern extremity of Adherbījān, near Georgia. Duīnī and Dunī, are relative adjectives derived from it. The mosque and cistern which are outside the Gate of Victory (Bāb al-Naṣr, at Cairo, were constructed by Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb and it appears from an inscription on the stone placed over the cistern, and which I have myself seen, that it was built by him. A.H. 566 (A. D. 1170-1).

105. BĀDĪS IBN AL-MANŞŪR

Abū Manād Bādīs Ibn al-Manşūr Ibn Bulukkīn Ibn Zīrī Ibn Manād<sup>4</sup> al-Ḥimyarī al-Ṣunhāji (descended from the tribe of Ḥimyar through that of Ṣunhāj) was father of al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs (whose life shall be given later); the rest of his genealogy will be mentioned in the life of his grandson Tamīm. Bādīs governed the kingdom of Ifriqiyah as lieutenant to al-Hākīm al-'Ubaydī, the pretended khalīf

1 Ibn Abi al-Ṭay Ibn Ḥumaydah, a native of Aleppo, wrote a history of that city in the form of Annals, which he entitled Ma'adin al-Diḥab fi Tārīkh Ḥalab (Goldmines, being a treatise on the history of Aleppo). He died H. 630 (A. C. 1232-3).—(Ḥājjī Khalīfah).

2 Jabal Jūr (Mount Jūr) is the name of a region in Armenia, on the borders of Diy r Bakr, containing a number of castles and villages inhabited by Armenians.—(Marāsid ul-Iṭlā').

3 It does not mean joyful, but joy.

4 For the pronunciation of these names, I have followed Ibn Khalīkān. See the lives of Zīrī and Bulukkīn.

of Egypt, who gave him the title of Naṣīr al-Dawlat (aid of the empire); he succeeded to government on the death of his father al-Manṣūr, which happened on Thursday, 3 of the First Rabi', H. 386 (March, A. C. 996)*, in the great castle which he possessed outside the city of Ṣabrah<sup>1</sup> and in which he was interred the next day. Pādīs was a powerful and resolute prince; he possessed great bodily strength, and could break a spear by merely brandishing it: his birth took place on Saturday† evening, 13 of the First Rabi', H. 374 (August, A. C. 984), at 'Āshir, a place of which mention has been made in the life of Ibn Qurqūl.<sup>2</sup> He continued to govern with prosperity till A. H. 406; on Tuesday, 29 Dhu al-Qa'dah‡ of that year, he reviewed his army, which passed before the canopy under which he was seated to receive its salutations. He continued sitting till the afternoon, and then returned to his palace, highly pleased with the beauty of his troops, the splendour of their equipment, and their excellent condition. In the evening of the same day, he rode out with a superb escort, and caused the soldiers to exercise in his presence; he then went back to his palace, delighted with the prosperous state of his affairs, and took his place at a feast with his favourites and the other persons admitted to his table; during the repast he was animated with joy to a degree never observed in him before; the company at length withdrew, and about midnight he expired. His death was kept secret, and his brother Karāmat Ibn Manṣūr was established

---

1 The city of Maḡhrib, called al-Manṣūriyah, after al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im, bore previously the name of Ṣabrah—(Marāḡid al-Iḡlā') Al-Bakri has given a description of this city: see Notices et Extraits, XII, page. 473.

2 See No. 18. This city was built by Zīrī Ibn Manād, H. 324 (A. C. 935-6). It was a place of such natural strength that ten men were sufficient to defend it, and it contained within its walls two copious springs of excellent water. (Al-Nuwayri, MS. No. 702 fol. 28. Notices et Extraits, t. XIII. p. 519).

* 26 March.—Ed.

† It should be Sunday which fell on 16 corresponding to 17 August.—Ed.

‡ 8 May, 1016.—Ed.

ostensibly as sovereign<sup>1</sup> (by the chief officers of the kingdom), till they went to al-Mu'izz, son of Bādīs, and placed him at the head of affairs. It is stated, in the work called al-Duwal al-Munqafi'ah<sup>2</sup> that the death of Bādīs happened in the following manner: he had set out for Tripoli, and remained near it for a considerable time with the intention of attacking it; having sworn to depart till he had rendered (the soil on which) it (was built) as a field fit for grain. (To avoid prolixity, I abstain from relating the motive which induced him to take this determination.) In consequence of this, the inhabitants of the city went to a school-master called Muhriz, (who was in great reputation for sanctity); and said to him: "O thou who art God's friend! thou hast heard the declaration of Bādīs; call therefore on God to deliver us from his violence." On this, Muhriz raised his hands to heaven and said: "O Lord of Bādīs! preserve us from Bādīs." That very night, Bādīs died of a quinsy—Ṣunhāji means belonging to Ṣunhāj or Ṣinhāj, a great and celebrated tribe in Maghrib, descended from Ḥimyar. Ibn Durayd says that Ṣunhājiah is the true pronunciation, and he admits of no other; but some persons allow that Ṣinhājiah also is correct.—The orthography by the names of Bādīs' ancestors shall be given hereafter.

106. 'IZZ AL-DAWLAT BAKHTIYĀR

Abū Maṣṣūr Bakhtiyār, surnamed 'Izz al-Dawlat (might of the empire), was son of Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, whose life has

---

1 On the death of Bādīs, the chief officers<sup>1</sup> of the empire met and agreed to appoint his brother Karāmāt ostensibly as sovereign till tranquillity would be re-established, and that he should then place al-Mu'izz, son of Bādīs, at the head of affairs. As their design was not generally known, the partisans of al-Mu'izz murmured at Karāmāt's nomination, but were promptly appeased on learning for what object he was appointed.—(Al-Nuwayrī; MS. No. 702, fol. 35 verso.)

2 See note on al-Duwal Munqafi'ah, No. 68.

been already given, with the genealogy of the family.<sup>1</sup> 'Izz al-Dawlat succeeded to the government of the kingdom the same day on which his father died (Monday, 17 of the Second Rabi' H. 356)*. In the year 364 (A. C. 974-5), the khalif al-Ṭāi' gave him in marriage his daughter Shāh Zanān†<sup>2</sup> on whom a dowry.‡ of one hundred thousand dinārs was settled by her husband; the marriage-sermon<sup>3</sup> was pronounced by the qāḍi Muḥammad Ibn Quray'ah, whose life is given in this work § 'Izz al-Dawlat was a noble prince, and possessed such bodily strength that he would seize an enormous bull by the horns and throw him to the ground. He was profuse in his expenses, in his grants, and in his allowances to the officers of his court. It was related by a wax-chandler of Baḡdād named Bishr, that Aḍad al-Dawlat (on entering that city after the death of his nephew 'Izz al-Dawlat,) asked him respecting the wax-light which was kept burning in the presence of the prince, and was informed that it was furnished out of a monthly allowance of two thousands pounds weight of wax granted, for that object, to the wazīr Abu al-Ṭāhir Ibn Baqiyah : which allowance 'Aḍad al-Dawlat found so excessive, that he would not suffer the usage to be continued<sup>4</sup> in its full extent. (The life of the wazīr Ibn Baqiyah will be given in the letter M)—A contestation which arose between 'Izz al-Dawlat and his uncle 'Aḍad al-Dawlat relative to their respective possessions, caused a breach between them which led to a war; and on Wednesday, 18 Shawwāl, 367 (May, A. C. 288||), they met and

1 See No. 71.

2 Shāh Zamān. or prince of the age; a singular title for a female, but we have another example in Shāh Firēd, the name of the Omayyide khalif Yazīd Ibn al-Walīd's mother.—(al Nujūm, A. H. 126).

3 The marriage-sermon; kḥuṭbah of the bond. See the description of the ceremony in Lane's modern Egyptians, vol. I, p. 200.

4 One of my manuscripts has ليعود in the singular; this reading appears preferable.

* 1 April, 967 A.C.—Ed.

† M. de Slane has Zamān which is wrong. The Cairo edition (1948) also follows the same reading.—Ed.

‡ مداق (Saddaq) : Marriage gift by the husband.—Ed.

§ "in letter M" should be added.—Ed.

|| 29 May.—Ed.

fought a battle, in which 'Izz al-Dawlat was slain, at the age of thirty-six years. His head was placed on a tray, and presented to 'Aḍad al-Dawlat, who, on seeing it, covered his eyes with his handkerchief and wept.—(We shall give the life of 'Aḍad al-Dawlat.)

107. BARKYARUQ

Abu al-Muẓaffar Barkyārūq, son of the sultān Malik Shāh Ibn Alp Arslān Ibn Dāwūd Ibn Mikāyil Ibn Saljūq Ibn Daqāq, and entitled Rukn al-Dīn (pillar of religion). Shihāb al-Dawlat (flambeau of the empire), and Majd al-Mulk (glory of the kingdom), was a prince of the Saljūq dynasty: (we shall give an account hereafter of a number of persons sprung from the same stock). He succeeded to the empire on the death of his father, who, as we shall mention in its proper place, possessed a more extensive kingdom than any other (sovereign of that family), having entered Samarqand and Bukhārā, and carried the war into Transoxiana. Barkyārūq appointed his brother Sinjar (see his life in the letter S) as his lieutenant in Khurāsān, and in one of his wars he slew his uncle Tutush (as shall be related in the letter T). He was highly fortunate in his enterprises, and was animated by a lofty spirit; the only fault he had was his addiction to wine. He was born H. 474 (A. C. 1081-2) and died at Burūjird on the twelfth of the latter Rabi' (some say of the first), A. H. 498 (A. C. 1104*). He had governed as Sultān during twelve years and some months.<sup>2</sup>—Burūjird is a town at eighteen parasangs from Hamadān.

1 The word shihāb, which is here translated flambeau, means a shooting star.

2 A fuller account of this prince's life will be found in Mir'āsān's History of the Saljukides, edited and translated into German by Professor Vullers in 1838. A still more satisfactory notice of Barkyārūq will be found in Von Hammer-Purgstall's Gemeinesaal; fünfter Band.

* 1 January, 1105, or 2 December, 1104.—Ed.

108. ABU AL-ṬĀHIR AL-RAFFA AL-ANMĀṬĪ

Abu al-Ṭāhir Barakāt was son of the Shaykh Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm, son of the Shaykh Abū al-Faḍl Ṭāhir Ibn Barakāt Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad bn Aḥmad Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Hāshim: he was surnamed al-Khushū'i, al-'Dimishqī, al-Jirūnī, al-Furshī and al-Raffa al-Anmāṭī. He drew his knowledge of the Traditions from the highest sources, and he handed down some of them on the authority of certain Traditionists, from whom he alone, of all the persons of his time, possessed certificates of licence to that effect.<sup>1</sup> He was the link which connected the past and the rising generation of Traditionists;<sup>2</sup> for in his latter days he was the sole person who had heard Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Akfānī teach, and who was himself authorised to teach by al-Akfānī. He was also the sole person who possessed a similar certificate from al-Ḥarīrī the author of the Maqāmat, which certificate was dated Baṣrah H. 512 (A. C. 1118).<sup>3</sup> Abu al-Ṭāhir al-Anmāṭī belonged to a family of Traditionists, and he, his father, and grandfather, were Traditionists themselves. His father having been asked why they were called the Khushū'ūn (humble), replied that one of their ancestors, when acting as imām to a congregation, died in the miḥrāb<sup>4</sup> and was named al-Khushū'i, which word is formed from Khushū' (humility).<sup>5</sup> Abu al-Ṭāhir was born at Damascus, in the month of Rajab,* 510 (A. C. 1116), and died in the same city on 1 I have paraphrased the text here, so as to render intelligible the nature of the sort of certificate called Ijāzah اجازة.

2 In Arabic الحق الاصاغر بالاكابر a technical expression employed only in speaking of Traditionists.

3 Abu al-Ṭāhir was then only two years of age, if the date of his birth, as given by Ibn Khallikān, be correct. [One of the dates is incorrect, the date of Ijāzah is written on the margin.—Ed.]

4 See No. 16, note on miḥrāb.

5 It appears from this that Abu al-Ṭāhir died in making one of the prostrations ordained by the Muslim ritual as a sign of the worshipper's humility and profound submission to the Deity. [The text refers to one of his ancestors.—Ed.]

* In the autograph the word منى (Safar) is written under رجب (Rajab); this appears to be a slip of pen.—Ed.

the Šafar, 598 (November, A. C. 1210)* : he was interred outside the Bāb al-Farādīs (gate of the gardens) in the grave of his father : he was the last person who bore a licence from al-Ḥarīrī, authorising him to teach what he had learned from him.—Furshī means a seller of carpets (fursh) ; Anmāṭī has the same signification : Ruffā is well known.<sup>1</sup>—I met a number of Abu al-Ṭāhir's disciples, and learned Traditions from them, for which I have their certificates : I met also his son in Egypt, who used to visit me very often ; he gave a certificate authorising me to teach all the Traditions which he had learned, and granted to me the privileges contained in the certificates which he himself had received from his father.

109. BARJAWĀN

The ustād<sup>2</sup> Abu al-Fuṭūḥ Barjawān, whose name is borne by one of the streets of Cairo, was a eunuch in the service of al-'Azīz, lord of Egypt, and governed with unbound authority as one of his ministers of state. In the year 388 (A. C. 991), he was director of the affairs of Egypt, Ḥijāz, Syria, and Maghrib, and intendant of the royal demesnes : this was in the reign of al-Ḥākim. We shall give some further information respecting him in the life of al-'Azīz Nizār. Barjawān was black<sup>3</sup> ; he was slain in the castle of Cairo, by order of al-Ḥākim, on Thursday evening, 26 of the latter Rabi'ṭ, (or by another account, on Thursday, 15 of the First Jumāda), H. 390 (A. C. 1000). He was killed by Abu al-Faḍl Raydān al-Šaqlabī, the prince's umbrella-bearer who stabbed him in the belly with a knife. It is related by Ibn al-Šayrifī, in his History of wazīrs, that Barjawān had all the state under his control in the 1 Raffā signifies danner ; Anmāṭī means a carpet-merchant, it is derived from Anmāṭ, plural of Namaṭ, (carpet). Jirūnī means native of that quarter of Damascus which is near the gate of Jirūn, and Dimighī signifies native of Damascus.

2 Ustād means master ; it is a title frequently borne by eunuchs who were tutors or ministers to a prince.

3 Al-Maqrīzī says, on the contrary, that he was a white eunuch.

* 26 November.—Ed.

† 4 April.—Ed.

month of Ramaḍān, H. 387; and that, on his death, his wardrobe contained one thousand pair of Dabiq<sup>1</sup> trousers, with one thousand silk tikkahs,<sup>2</sup> and an immense quantity of clothes, furniture, musical instruments,<sup>3</sup> books and curiosities. The Raydān here mentioned is the person after whom the Raydāniyah<sup>4</sup> outside the Gate of Conquests (Bab al-Futūḥ) at Calro, was so called. On the death of Barjawān, al-Ḥākim transferred the entire direction of affairs to the qā'id al-quwwād<sup>5</sup> al-Ḥusayn, son of Qā'id Jawhar: (we shall make mention of him when giving the life of his father). Al-Ḥākim then caused Raydān to put to death by Mas'ūd al-Ṣaqlabi the sword-bearer, in the beginning of the year 393 (A. C. 1002). Ṣaqlabi means one of the people called Ṣaqālibah (Sclavonians), a race out of which eunuchs are procured.<sup>6</sup>

110. BASHSHĀR IBN BURD

Abu al-Mu'ādh Bashshār Ibn Burd Ibn Yarjūkh, member by adoption of the tribe of 'Uqayl, was a blind man and a poet of celebrity. Abu al-Faraj al-Isfahānī gives, in his Kitāb al-Aghānī, the names of twenty-six of his ancestors, which I do not insert here, as their number is too great; they belong also to a foreign language, and may probably be altered in the transcription, this author not having marked the right orthography of any of them; it is therefore useless to pay farther attention to them. Abu al-Faraj gives copious information respecting his life and adventures: he was a native of of Baṣrah, whence he removed to Baḥdād—he was surnamed al-Mura'ath—he was descended from one of

1 The town of Dabiq, situated between the cities of Farama and Bilbays was celebrated for the clothes made there—(Marāṣid).

2 The tikkah is the running string or bands by which the trousers are fastened round the waist.

3 Al-Maqrizī says that Barjawān was very fond of music.

4 According to al-Maqrizī, the Raydāniyah was a garden.

5 General-in-chief.

6 In M. de Sacy's life of ḫalīf Ḥākim will be found a full account of Barjawān's rise and fall, See Exposé de l'Histoire des Druzes, tom. I.

the natives of Tukhāristān, who were led into captivity by al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah.<sup>1</sup> It is said that Bashshār was born in slavery and enfranchised by a woman of the tribe of 'Uqayl, for which reason he received the surname of 'Uqayli. He was blind from his birth, and his eyeballs, which were prominent, were covered with red flesh; he was a man of great bodily frame and corpulence; his face was long and marked with the small-pox. He held the highest rank among the eminent poets in the first period of Islāmism, and the following verses, composed by him on good counsel, are among the best made on the subject:

"When your projects are so far advanced that counsel becomes necessary, have recourse to the decision of a sincere counsellor, or to the counsel of a determined man. Let not good advice be irksome to you, for the short feathers of a wing are close to (and sustain) the long. Of what use is one hand when the other is confined in a pillory? Of what use is the sword, if it has no handle to give it power?"

He is also author of this verse, which is so current:

"I have attained the furthest bonds of love; is there, beyond that, a station which I must reach in order to be nearer to thee?"

He composed also the following verse, which is the most gallant* of any made by the poets of that epoch<sup>2</sup>:

"Yes, by Allāh! I love the magic of your eyes, and yet I dread the weapons by which so many lovers fell."

By the same:

"Yes, my friends! my ear is charmed by a person in that tribe; for the ear is sometimes enamoured sooner than the eye. You say that I am led by one whom I never saw; know that ear, as well as the eye, can inform the mind of facts."

The idea expressed in the first of these verses has been adopted by Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar al-Mawṣili, surnamed Ibn al-Shāḥnah, and inserted by him in a qaṣīdah of one hundred and thirty verses, in praise of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, from which I extract:

1 See his life in this work.

2 In Arabic المولودون (al-Muwalladūn). See No. 91, note on classes of poets,

* For aghlzal "amorous" is more appropriate.—Ed.

"I am one who loves you on the report of your virtues; for the ear can be charmed as well as the eye."

Bashshār composed a great quantity of poetry, which is in general circulation; but we shall confine ourselves to the foregoing extracts. Happening one day to celebrate the praises of al-Mahdi, son of the khalif al-Manṣūr, that prince, to whom he had been denounced as an atheist,<sup>1</sup> ordered him to receive seventy strokes of a whip; this punishment had for result the death of Bashshār, who expired in the Baṭḥah (or swamp), near Baṣrah, to which city his body was transported by one of his relations, and there buried. This occurred in the year 167 or 168 (A. C. 783-4); he was aged upward of 90. It is related that he considered the element of fire superior to that of earth, and that he justified Satan for refusing to fall prostrate before Adam.<sup>2</sup> The following verse, on the superiority of fire to earth, is attributed to him:

"Earth is dark and fire is bright; fire has been worshipped ever since it was fire."

It is related, however, that on the examination of his works, nothing was discovered in them to warrant the accusation: the following passage was found in one of them: "I had the intention of satirizing the family of Sulaymān<sup>3</sup> Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās; but I abstained on recollecting their near relationship to the Prophet." God alone knows what were his real principles. Al-Ṭabarī says, in his History: "The reason for which al-Mahdi put Bashshār to death was this: That khalif had conferred a government on Ṣāliḥ Ibn Dāwūd, brother of his wazīr Ya'qūb,<sup>4</sup> and the poet satirized him in this verse addressed to Ya'qūb:

1 See d'Herbelot's Bib. Orient. Zendik.

2 God said to Iblīs (or Satan): "What hindered thee from prostrating thyself before Adam?" He answered: "I am more excellent than he; Thou hast created me of fire, and hast created him of clay!"—Qur'an, sūrat 7, verse 11.)

3 Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī al-'Abbāsī was uncle to the Khalif al-Saffāh, who named him governor of Baṣrah and the neighbouring provinces in H. 133 (A. C. 750-1). He died H. 142 (A. C. 759-60)—(Abu al-Fidā).

4 Abu 'Abd Allāh Ya'qūb Ibn Dāwūd was son of an enfranchised slave. His brothers and father were in the service of Naṣr Ibn Sayyār, Amir of Khurāsān;

(Continued on page 33)

'They have raised thy brother Šāliḥ to the pulpit,<sup>1</sup> and the pulpit complains of the indignity.'

Ya'qub, on hearing of this satire, went to al-Mahdī and said: 'Baṣḥshār has reviled you.'—'How so?' said al-Mahdī.—'The Commander of the Faithful must dispense me from repeating the verses.'—'I must hear them.'—So he recited to him these lines:

'A khalif who commits fornication with his aunts, and plays at the game of dabbuq and mall! May God give us another in his stead, and thrust Mūsā back into the the womb of al-Khayzurān.'<sup>2</sup>

Al-Mahdī therefore caused him to be sought for, and Ya'qub, fearing that Baṣḥshār, when brought before the kalif, might obtain pardon by reciting a panegyric on him, sent a person who threw him into the Baṭīḥah."—'Uqaylī means belonging to 'Uqayl Ibn Ka'b, which is a great (Arabic) tribe.—The word Mura'āṭḥ denotes one who wears ri'āṭḥ in his ears; ri'ā ḥ is the plural of ra'tḥah, which means ear-ring; Baṣḥshār received this surname from his wearing ear-rings when a boy: the ra'tḥat of a cock are the wattles which hang under his beak, and ra'tḥ means to be suspended or hanging down; whence the derivation of ra'tḥah for ear-ring. There are other reasons given for his receiving this surname, but the one here stated is the trues'.—Tūkhāristān is a great country containing the towns situated beyond the river of Balḥ, which river is called the Jayḥan.<sup>3</sup> This province has produced a number of learned men.

---

(Continued from page 32)

and he himself was chosen by the khalif al-Mahdī for wazīr. He was afterwards imprisoned in the Muṭbiq by that prince for having suffered a state-prisoner to escape, whom he had confided to his custody. Ya'qub was liberated on the accession of al-Raḥīd, and retired to Makkah, where he died A. H. 186 (A. D. 82). During his confinement, he lost his sight.—(Fakḥr al-Dīn MS. No. 895, fol. 71 et sequentia.)

<sup>1</sup> The governors of provinces possessed the right of pronouncing the khutbah from the pulpit.

<sup>2</sup> Mūsā was son, and al-Khayzurān wife, of Al-Mahdī.

<sup>3</sup> The MSS. and the printed text have على جيحون, but the true reading is certainly وهو جيحون. The whole passage is taken from the Lubāb of Ibn al-Aṭḥir. See the Arabic text of Geography of Abu 'l-Fidā, page 471.

111. BISHR IBN AL-ḤĀRITH AL-ḤĀFĪ

Abū Naṣr Bishr al-Marwazī (native of Marw al-Shāhijān), and surnamed al-Ḥāfī (the barefooted), was son of al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Ibn 'Aṭā Ibn Hilāl Ibn Māhān Ibn 'Abd Allāh; (this 'Abd Allāh, whose name was originally Ba'būr,<sup>1</sup> was converted to Islamism by 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib.<sup>2</sup> Bishr was one of the men of the path<sup>3</sup>; he ranked among the greatest of the holy ascetics, and was most eminent for his piety and devotion. He was born in the village of Mātarasām,<sup>4</sup> situated in the dependencies of Marw, and dwelt at Baḡhdād. His father was a kātib and president of one of the government offices. Bishr renounced the world from the following circumstance: Happening to find on the public road a leaf of paper with the name of God written on it, and which had been trampled under foot, he bought ghāliyah<sup>5</sup> with some dirhems which he had about him, and having perfumed the leaf with it, he deposited it in a hole in a wall. He afterwards had a dream, in which a voice seemed to say to him: "O Bishr! thou hast perfumed my name, and I shall surely cause thine to be in sweet odour both in this world and the next". When he awoke, he gave up the world, and turned to God.—It is related that he once knocked at the door<sup>6</sup> of al-

<sup>1</sup> Neophytes received a new name on their conversion to Islamism.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: Professed Islamism on the hand of 'Alī Ibn Ṭālib; that is, he took a solemn engagement to that effect, and ratified it by placing his hand in 'Alī's.

<sup>3</sup> Man of the path; a title given to some of eminent Ṣafīs; it means one who walks in the path of ascetism. The word "طريقه" (path) signifies also metaphorically doctrine and system of conduct, which, with the Ṣafīs, consisted in the continual practice of mystic devotion.

<sup>4</sup> In the Marāṣid this name is spelled Mābarsām.*

<sup>5</sup> The ghāliyah †(غالية) was indubitably a sort of perfume. This word occurs also in a satirical verse given in the Hamāsah, page 668, line 3, the meaning of which is: "Compared with Qatādah, son of Muḡhrib, the odour of a swine's putrid carcass is musk and ghāliyah."—Meninski notices the word after Wanḡalī.

<sup>6</sup> Literally: He knocked the door with the ring (or circular knocker).

* The name is not legible in the autograph and so it cannot be verified.
—Ed.

† The غالية (ghāliyah) was a mixture of perfumes.—Ed.

Mu'āfā Ibn 'Imrān,<sup>1</sup> and on being asked who was there, he answered Bishr al-Ḥāfī; on which the girl inside the door said: "Go and buy a pair of shoes for two dānaqs,<sup>2</sup> and the name of al-Ḥāfī (the barefooted) will leave you." He was so surnamed for the following reason: the latchet of one of his shoes having broken, he went for another to a shoemaker's, who said to him: "How full you are of worldly consideration!" On this Bishr threw away the shoe he held in his hand and kicked the other off his foot, making oath never to wear shoes again.—Bishr being once asked with what sauce he eat his bread, replied: "I think on good health, and I take that as my sauce."—One of his prayers was this: "O, my God! deprive me of notoriety, if thou hast given it to me in this world for the purpose of putting me to shame in the next." One of his sayings was: "The punishment of the learned man in this world is blindness of heart." He used also to say: "He that seeks for worldly goods should be prepared for humiliation." It is related that Bishr said to the Traditionists: "Pay the legal alms out of your Traditions:" and that on being asked what was the mode of doing so, he replied: "Out of every two hundred, "take five for rules of conduct."<sup>3</sup>—Sarī al-Saqāṭī and a number of holy men cited Traditions on his authority. He was born A. H. 150 (A. D. 767), and died at Baḡhdād (or, by another account, at Marw), in the month of the Second Rabi' A. H. 226 (February, A. D. 841) or 227; some say, however, that he died on a Wednesday 10 of Muḥarram and others again state that his death took place in Ramaḡān. †[Bishr had three sisters named Muḡḡah, Muḡḡah, and Zubdah, who spent their lives

<sup>1</sup> Abū Mas'ūd al-Mu'āfā Ibn 'Imrān, a member of the tribe of Azd and native of Moṣul, learned the Traditions from a number of learned men, and studied jurisprudence under Sufyān at-Thawrī; he was remarkable for his learning piety, liberality, and mortified life. Died A. H. 184 (A. D. 800).—(Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah, MS. No. 659.)

<sup>2</sup> Two dānaqs made one-third of a dirhem.

<sup>3</sup> The legal alms consist in a yearly tax of 2½ per cent. on cattle, money, corn, fruits, and wares sold.

* Wednesday fell on 10 Muḥarram 226 corresponding to 10 November A. D. 840, and in 227 it was Sunday.—Ed.

† From "Bishr had three" to the end not in the text — Ed.

in the practice of mortification and piety; the eldest, Muḍḡḡah, died before her brother, who was deeply afflicted at her loss and wept bitterly; on being asked why (he who was so resigned to the will of God should give way to grief), he answered: "I have read in some book, that when the creature is remiss in the Lord's service, the Lord deprives him of his companion, and my sister Muḍḡḡah was my companion in this world." The following is related by 'Abd Allāh, son of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal: "A woman came in to my father and said: 'O Abū 'Abd Allāh! I spin at night by candle-light, and, as it sometimes happens that my candle goes out, I spin by the light of the moon; is it incumbent on me to separate the portion spun by the light of the candle from that spun by the light of the moon?'<sup>1</sup> To this my father answered: 'If you think that there is a difference between them, it is incumbent on you to separate them'. She then said: 'O Abū 'Abd Allāh! are the groans of a sick person a repining against Providence?' To which he answered: 'I hope not; it is rather a complaint addressed to God.' The woman then withdrew, and my father said: 'I never heard such a question made; follow her.' I followed her therefore, till I saw her enter into the house of Biṣḥr al-Ḥāfi, and I then returned and told my father that it was Biṣḥr's sister. 'You are right,' said he 'it is impossible that this woman could have been any other than Biṣḥr's sister!'"—The same 'Abd Allāh related this anecdote: "Muḡḡḡah", one of Biṣḥr's sisters, came to my father and said 'O Abū 'Abd Allāh! I possess a capital of two dānaqs which I lay out in cotton wool; this I spin and sell for half a dirhem<sup>2</sup>; and I spend one dānaq each week: now it happened that the patrol passed one night with their cresset, and I profited by the opportunity to spin a double quantity by that light: I know that God will question me on the subject<sup>3</sup>; free me then from this strait, and may God free thee.'

<sup>1</sup> In spinning by moonlight, she had economised her candles, and being thus in some degree richer, she thought herself obliged to increase her legal alms; this anecdote is given as an example of her scrupulous piety.

<sup>2</sup> Half a dirhem is equal to three dānaqs.

<sup>3</sup> As the cresset did not belong to her, she imagined that she had no right to make use of its light, and that the money which she gained in so doing was badly acquired (غصب).

My father answered: 'Thou shalt spend two dānaqs in alms, and remain without any capital till God gives thee something better.' On this I said: 'How is that? You tell her to give her capital in alms?' And my father replied: 'O my son! her question would not admit of any modification in its solution. Who is she?' I answered: 'It is Mukḥḳḥah, a sister of Bishr al-Ḥāfi.' To which my father said: 'In making answer to her, I proceeded on that supposition.'"—Bishr al-Ḥāfi said: "I learned devotion from my sister; for she was assiduous in abstinence from whatever food had undergone preparation by a created being."]

112. BISHR IBN GHIYĀTH AL-MARĪSĪ

Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Bishr Ibn Ghiyāth Ibn Abī Karīmah al-Marīsī, a theologian and jurisconsult of the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah, was descended from a slave belonging to Zayd Ibn al-Kḥaṭṭāb.<sup>1</sup> He was instructed in the law by the Qāḍī Abū Yūsuf al-Ḥanāfi, but he was addicted to the study of dogmatic theology, and taught openly that the Qur'ān was created<sup>2</sup>; some abominable opinions of his on this subject have been handed down. He belonged to that sect of the Murji'ans<sup>3</sup> which is called after him the Marīsian, and

---

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Umar Zayd Ibn al-Kḥaṭṭāb, one of the companions of Muḥammad, was an elder brother of the ḫalīf 'Umar Ibn al-Kḥaṭṭāb, and embraced Islamism before him; he fought on Muḥammad's side at the battle of Badr. In the thirteenth year of the Hijrah he was standard-bearer of the Muslims in their expedition against the false prophet Musaylamah; he led them to action, and was slain after displaying great gallantry. His brother 'Umar was deeply afflicted for his loss.—(Al-Yāfi'i Siyaral-Salaf, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, fonds St. Germain, No. 133, fol. 72 verso.)—The details of his death will be found in Professor Kosegarten's edition of the Annals of al-Ṭabari.

<sup>2</sup> A most heterodox doctrine (see note on eternity of Qur'ān, No. 19); indeed all the doctors versed in dogmatic theology were suspected of heretical principles.

<sup>3</sup> See Pocock's Specimen, etc. MORJIANI.

he held that it was not an act of infidelity to bow down to the sun and the moon, but only a token of it. He had frequent discussions with the imām al-Shāfiʿī. He committed the grossest faults in grammar, from his ignorance of that science: he transmitted the Traditions on the authority of Ḥammād Ibn Salamah,<sup>1</sup> Ibn ʿUyaynah, the qāḍī Abū Yūsuf and others. It is said that his father was a Jewish goldsmith of Kāfah. He died at Baḡhdād in the month of Dhū'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 218 (A. D. 833-4) or 219.—Marisi means native of Maris, a village in Egypt, according to the statement of the wazīr Abū Sa'd in his work entitled al-Nuṭaf wa'l-Ṭuraf (pickings and sweetmeats); but the inhabitants of Miṣr tell me that the Marīs are a people of Negroes inhabiting the country between Nūbiah and Syene; they appear to be of Nubieh race, and their country is contiguous to that of Syene. In winter they (the people of Cairo) are visited by a cold south wind which they believe to come from that country, and name the Marisi in consequence.—I have since found in the handwriting of a person who has studied this branch (of science)<sup>2</sup>, that (Bishr al-Marisi) dwelt in the street of Baḡhdād which is called al-Marisi after him, and lies between the rivers al-Dajāj and al-Bazzāzin.—I may add that the name of maris is given at Baḡhdād to flat cake, only substituting honey for dates, and they call it lasisah.

113. BAKKĀR IBN QUTAYBAH

The qāḍī Abū Bakr Bakkār was son of Qutaybah Ibn Abī Fardhā'ah Ibn ʿUbayd Allāh Ibn Baḡhār* Ibn ʿUbayd Allāh Ibn Abī

<sup>1</sup> Abū Salamah Ḥammād Ibn Salamah was descended from an enfranchised slave belonging to the Banū Tamīm and sister's son of Humayd al-Ṭawīl (see No. 81 note on al-Ṭawīl, ). He was noted for his learning, piety, and holy life, and his authority as a traditionist was of the highest order. Born at Baḡrah, and died A. H. 168 (A. D. 784-5).—(Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah.)

<sup>2</sup> He means Biography.

* In Cairo edition (1948) the name is "Bishr" which in the autograph has been defaced and so it is illegible. In Ṭehrān edition it is "Baḡhār."—Ed.

Bakr Nufay' Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Kaldah al-Ṭḥaqafī (member of the tribe of Ṭḥaqif); Ibn Kildah was one of the companions of Muḥammad.<sup>1</sup> Bakkār followed the doctrines of Abū Ḥanīfah, and was appointed qāḍī of Miṣr in the year 248 (A. D. 862), or 249; but it is stated in another account, that he arrived at Miṣr for the purpose of acting as qāḍī on behalf of the khalīf al-Mutawakkil, on Friday 8 of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 246.* The excellent manner in which he fulfilled the duties of that office is well known, and the treatment which he experienced from Aḥmad Ibn Ṭulūn, lord of Egypt, has been mentioned by historians: Ibn Ṭulūn used to give Bakkār every year one thousand dinārs more than his salary; but the qāḍī made no use of that additional sum, neither did he break the seal placed on the purse which contained it. Ibn Ṭulūn having afterwards required of him to depose al-Muwassāq, the son of al-Mutawakkil and father of al-Mu'taḍid (who had been declared khalīf-elect), imprisoned him on his refusal, and then redemanded the amount of the money which he had advanced him each year in addition to his salary. This sum, which consisted in eighteen purses, was given up by Bakkār with the seals unbroken, to the great confusion of Ibn Ṭulūn, who thought that the money had been spent, and hoped to have had a pretext to persecute the qāḍī for his inability to pay. Bakkār, on being imprisoned, was obliged by Ibn Ṭulūn to appoint Muḥammad Ibn Shādhān al-Jawharī<sup>2</sup> as deputy, and he remained in confinement for a number of years; but as the students who were learning the Traditions complained that they were deprived of his tuition, he was frequently produced to the public by Ibn Ṭulūn, and then taught from a window of the prison. The qāḍī Bakkār was one of that class of pious men who were called the weepers

---

1 Nufay' was also a companion of Muḥammad, who named him Abū Bakrah, or the pulley-man, because he let himself down by a pulley from the castle of Ṭā'if when it was attacked by the Muslims in A. H. 8.—(Qāmūs, in the root ب ك ر.)

2 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Zakariyā Ibn Shādhān al-Jawharī possessed great reputation as a traditionist. He died A. H. 274 (A. D. 887), or by another account, 286, aged 73 years.—(History of the qadis of Egypt, by Ibn Ḥajr al-'Asqalānī.)

* 30 August, 860.—Ed.

and chanters of the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>; (every day) on the termination of his judicial duties, he retired into a private apartment, and then recalled to mind the cases of all those who had come before him, and the judgments which he had given he would then weep and say to himself: "O Bakkār! two persons came before thee on such and such a case; two adverse parties appeared before thee in such and such a cause, and thou hast judged so and so; how wilt thou answer for it to-morrow?"<sup>2</sup> He frequently made pious exhortations to the defendant when administering to him the oath,<sup>3</sup> and would recite to him this verse of the Qur'ān: They who make merchandize of God's covenant, and of their oaths, for a small price, shall have no portion in the next life, etc.<sup>4</sup> He never ceased making his Amins<sup>5</sup> render an account of their conduct and constantly inquired into the character of witnesses. He was born at Baṣrah A. H. 182 (A. D. 798), and died at Miṣr on Thursday, 6 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 270 (June, A. D. 884*) being still in prison and invested with the functions of a qāḍī. On his death, Miṣr remained without a qāḍī for three years. His tomb is close to that of the ṣharīf Ibn Ṭabāṭabā,<sup>6</sup> and is a well-known monument; it lies near the Muṣallā of the Banu Maskīn<sup>7</sup>; and is situated between the Kawm (the mound) and the road below; it is famous for the fulfilment of prayers offered up at it. His nomination as qāḍī is said to have taken place A. H. 245, but the correct date is A. H. 246.

<sup>1</sup> They wept for the sins and recited the Qur'ān assiduously through devotion.

<sup>2</sup> Tomorrow, that is, the day of judgment, when God should question him.

<sup>3</sup> According to the Muslim law, oaths are not required before justice, except in certain cases; as for instance, when a plaintiff is unable to furnish evidence in support of his claim; he has then the right of requiring the defendant to confirm his negation by oath. In criminal causes oaths are not receivable.

<sup>4</sup> Qur'ān; surat 3, verse 71.

<sup>5</sup> Amin (أمين) anglice trustee or confidant. It is the name of an officer in the qāḍī's court, in the manner of a register. It also signifies an inquisitor.—Hamilton's Hedaya, vol. II, p. 618.—They were entrusted with the care of the documents in the qāḍī's office, and of all property confided to him.

<sup>6</sup> Ibn Ṭabāṭabā's life is given in No. 52.

<sup>7</sup> This Muṣallā was probably in the Lesser Qarāfah.

* 4 June.—Ed.

114. ABŪ BAKR THE JURISCONSULT

Abū Bakr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ḥarith Ibn Hishīm Ibn al-Muḡhayrah Ibn 'Abd al-Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn Maḳḥẓam al-Qurashī al-Ma'ḥẓamī (member of the tribe of Quraysh and descended from Maḳḥẓam), was one of the Seven Jurisconsults of Madīna. The surname Abū Bakr was his real name, and we have placed him under the letter B, because it is customary with annalists, when noticing a person who has no other name but a surname, to insert his life under the letter which corresponds to the initial of the consequent in the genitive<sup>1</sup>; some annalists, however, place names of this kind in a separate chapter.—Abū Bakr was one of the chief Ṭabī'īs,<sup>2</sup> and was called the monk of the Quraysh; his father al-Ḥārith, brother of Abū Jahl, was an eminent companion of Muḥammad. The birth of Abū Bakr took place under the kḥilāfat of 'Umar Ibn al-Kḥaṭṭāb, and his death happened in A. H. 94 (A. D. 712-3); which year was denominated the year of the jurisconsults, because a number of them died therein. The Seven Jurisconsults lived at Madīnah in the same time, and it was from them that the science (of law) and legal decisions spread over the world; we shall notice them under their letters. One of the learned has united the names of them all in the two following verses :

"He who taketh not an imām for guide shall receive a portion (in the next life) inadequate to his deserts. Learn here their names: 'Ubayd Allāh, 'Urwah, Qāsim, Sa'id, Sulaymān, Abū Bakr, Kḥhārijah."

Were it not that it is very requisite for the jurisconsults of our epoch to have information respecting these persons, I should not have made mention of them in a work which, like this, aims at concision; for they are so well known, that I might have passed them over in silence.<sup>3</sup> They were designated by the appellation of the

<sup>1</sup> In Abū Bakr (Pater Bakri), Bakr is governed in the genitive as consequent of the antecedent Abū.

<sup>2</sup> See Author's Introduction, note 2.

<sup>3</sup> It might be supposed that the author intended this passage as a sarcasm against the jurisconsults of his time; but such, I am inclined to think, was not his intention.

Seven Jurisconsults, because the right of giving decisions on points of law had passed to them from the Companions of Muḥammad, and they became publicly known as muftis; it is true that there were some learned Tābi'īs still living, Sālim Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar for instance; but these seven alone were acknowledged as competent to give fatwās, or legal decisions. Such is the observation made by the Ḥāfiz al-Silafī.

115. ABŪ 'UTHMĀN AL-MĀZINĪ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abn 'Uṭḥmān Bakr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Uṭḥmān (named also Baqiyah and 'Adi) Ibn Ḥabīb al-Māzinī was a native of Baṣrah and the first man of the age in grammar and general literature. He learned Philology from Abn 'Ubaydah, al-Aṣma'i, Abn Zayd al-Anṣārī and others, and had for pupil Abū'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad, who profited greatly by his tuition, and handed down many pieces of traditional literature which he had learned from his master. The following works were composed by al-Māzinī: Observations on the Faults of Language committed by the Vulgar; a Treatise on the Arabic Article; one on the Conjugations; one on Prosody; one on Rhyme; and the Kitāb al-Dibāj, written in opposition to a work of the same title composed by Abn 'Ubaydah.<sup>1</sup> It is related by Abn Ja'far al-Ṭahāwī that he heard Bakkār Ibn Qutaybah, the qāḍī of Egypt, say: "I never saw any grammarian resemble a jurisconsult except Ḥayyan Ibn Harmah and al-Māzinī;" meaning the present Abn 'Uṭḥmān. Al-Māzinī was scrupulously pious, and among the anecdotes related by al-Mubarrad (on this subject) is the following: "A Dhimmi<sup>2</sup> went to Abn 'Uṭḥmān, and offered him one hundred dīnārs, on condition that he would explain to him the grammar of Sibawayh. He refused however to do so, and I said to him: 'May I be your ransom! how can you reject so advantageous an offer, suffering, as you do, from poverty and extreme distress?' On which he replied: 'That work contains three hundred and so many verses of the book of God (the Qur'an), and I do not think it right to communicate them to a dhimmi; (in this I am actuated) by zeal for the book of God, and by the desire of guarding it from profanation.'—Some time after, a slave girl happening to sing, in the presence of the khalif al-Wāṭḥiq, this verse of the poet al-'Arjī<sup>1</sup>:

---

<sup>1</sup> Dibāj means cloth made of silk. Abn 'Ubaydah's work is noticed by Ḥājī Khalīfah, but he does not mention its subject.

<sup>2</sup> Dhimmi means client; it is the legal denomination of the Christian Jewish, and Sabea subjects of a Muslim power.

'O (fair) tyrant! thy evil treatment of a man who made thee his salutation, is an injustice!'

'A contestation arose among the persons who were in the khalif's presence, respecting the case of the word ʾAṣṣ (man); some were of opinion that it should be put in the accusative, as being the subject of a preposition governed by ʾAl (utique); and others, would have it in the nominative as being the attribute of that preposition.<sup>2</sup> The girl maintained, however, that her master, Abū 'Uṭḥmān al-Māzinī had taught her to pronounce the word in the accusative. Al-Wāṭḥiq therefore sent for him: 'When I came into his presence, said Abū 'Uṭḥmān, he asked: Of what family are you?'<sup>3</sup> I answered: 'Of the Banū Māzin'.—'Which of the Māzins? Is it those of the tribe of Tamīm, those of the tribe of Qays, or those of the tribe of Rabī'ah?'—'That of Rabī'ah', I replied.—The khalif then addressed me in the dialect of my tribe, saying, Ba 'Smuk, in place of Ma 'Smuk (what is thy name?) for they change the m into b and vice versa. Not wishing to answer him in the same dialect, so as to

<sup>1</sup> 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amr al-'Arjī (native of 'Arj near Ṭā'if) was grandson of the khalif 'Uṭḥmān. His life, extracted from al-Suyatī's Sharḥ Shawāhid al-Mughnī, is given by M. de Sacy in his Anthologie Grammaticale, page 453.

<sup>2</sup> This grammatical question can only be understood by reference to the Arabic text of the verse; it is necessary, however, to observe that expressions such as the following Utique Deus est justus, would stand thus, Utique Deum justus, if construed according to the genius of the Arabic language. I shall make another remark on the anecdote; neither of the two parties understood the meaning of the verse, otherwise they would not have given grammatical explanations so totally inapplicable.*

<sup>3</sup> Literally: Of whom is the man? It was natural for the khalif to make use of the third person in addressing a stranger and one much beneath him.

*This remark is unwarranted. If Māzinī was not in a position to understand the meaning of a verse of his own tongue, then who else can?—Ed.

avoid pronouncing before him the word Makr, I replied 'Bakr'i and he, having perceived my motive, was well pleased with that (mark of respect). He then repeated to me the verse of al-'Arjī, and asked me if I put رَجُل in the nominative or in the accusative; to which I answered: 'Commander of the Faithful! it must be put in the accusative.'—'Why so?'—'Because مَصَاب is a noun of action employed here with the sense of اَصَابَه. Then al-Yazīdī commenced making me some objection, but I said: 'The phrase is similar to this ان ضربك زيداً ظلم (utique actionem tuam percutiendi Zeidum injustitia est); the word رَجُل is governed by مَصَابِكُمْ and is therefore in the accusative; the proof is, that the sense of the phrase is suspended till you pronounce ظلم, which completes it.'<sup>2</sup> Al-Wāṭḥiq approved of my opinion, and asked me if I had any children. 'Yes, Commander of the Faithful, a little girl.'—And what did she say to you on leaving her!—'She recited to me these verses of the poet al-A'shā.<sup>3</sup>

'Remain with us, dearest father! we shall be happy whilst you stay. If a distant region possess you, we foresee that harsh treatment will befall us, and that the tie of blood will be severed (by our unjust relations).'

'And what answer?' said he, 'did you return her?'—'My answer,' I replied, 'was in the words of the poet Jarīr :

'My confidence is in God, whose power is shared by none; and my hopes of success are fixed upon the khalīf!'

<sup>1</sup> The word Makr means wile or stratagem. In respectable society, terms of a disagreeable import are avoided in conversation, as the person spoken to might consider them as an offence to himself or as an evil omen.—(See Lane's Arabian Nights, chap. 2, note 8.)

<sup>2</sup> Al-Māzinī's reasoning is perfectly just, but it can be intelligible to those only who are acquainted with the technicalities of the Arabic system of grammar.

<sup>3</sup> The life of al-A'shā is given by M. de Sacy in his Chrestomathie, tom. II, p. 471.

*In English it means; "verily your striking Zayd is injustice".—Ed.

On this al-Wāṭhiq said: 'I answer for your success; and he dismissed me with a present of one thousand dīnārs.' Al-Mubarrad then relates that al-Māzinī, on his return to Baṣrah, said to him: "What think you of that, Abu 'l-'Abbās? I refused one hundred dīnārs for God's sake and he has given me a thousand instead." Al-Mubarrad states also that he heard al-Māzinī relate the following anecdote: "There was a person who for a long time, studied under me the grammar of Sibawayh, and who said to me, when he got to the end of the book, 'May God requite you well! as for me, I have not understood a letter of it.'" Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Māzinī died at Baṣrah, A. H. 249 (A. D. 863); or, according to other accounts, in 248 or 236.

116. BULUKKĪN IBN ZIRĪ

Abu 'l-Futūḥ Bulukkīn<sup>1</sup> Ibn Zīrī Ibn Manād al-Himyarī al-Ṣunhājī (descended from the tribe of Himyar through that of Ṣunhāj) was grandfather of the Bādīs, whose life has been given.<sup>2</sup> He was also called Yūsuf, but it is by the name of Bulukkīn that he is generally known. It was he whom al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr al-'Ubaydī left as his lieutenant in Ifriqiyah (Africa Propria) on his departure for Egypt; this nomination took place on Wednesday the 22 Dhū'l-Hijjah, A. H. 361 (October A. D. 972)*, and the people were enjoined by al-Mu'izz to obey Bulukkīn, who was then placed in possession of the province, and had its revenues collected in his name. Al-Mu'izz (in departing) gave him pressing injunctions respecting a number of things necessary to be done, and finished by saying: "Though you forget my counsels, forget

<sup>1</sup> All European authors have written this name Belkin, or Bulkin; but its true pronunciation is given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 105.

*The date should be 23 Dhū'l-Hijjah which according to Eduard Mahler's calculation fell on Saturday, 5 October.; so there is some discrepancy.—Ed.

not (at least) these three: never cease levying contributions on the nomadic Arabs, and keeping the sword on (the necks of) the Berbers; never appoint any of your brothers or cousins to a place of authority, for they imagine that they have a better right than you to the power with which you are invested; and treat with favour the dwellers in towns." He then departed, and Bulukk'n, after bidding him adieu, returned to his government, and having taken the country under his command, he ruled with ability, and gave unremitting attention to the welfare of his empire and subjects. He died on Sunday the 23rd of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A. H. 373 (May, A. D. 984),* at a place called Wāraklān, on the confines of Ifr qiyah. His death† was the result of an inflammation‡ in the intestines; or, as some say, of a tumour in his hand. He had four hundred concubines; and it is even stated that on one single day, the births of seventeen sons were successively announced to him.—His name must be pronounced Bulukkin, and his father's, Ziri. The remainder of his genealogy will be given in the life of his descendant Tamim.

117. BŪRĀN

Bārān was daughter of al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, whose life shall be given; it is said by some that her real name was Ḳhadijah and her surname Bārān; but the first is the more general opinion. She became the wife of the Ḳhalif al-Maman, who was induced to marry her by the high esteem he bore her father. The marriage was celebrated at Fam al-Ṣillḥ, with festivities and rejoicings the like of which were never witnessed for ages before: the expenses were defrayed by her father (the wazir), whose liberality went so far that he showered balls of musk upon the Hashimites<sup>1</sup> the commanders of the troops, the kātibs<sup>2</sup>, and the persons who held an eminent rank

1 The persons related to the Abbaside ḳhalifs were designated by the title of Hashimites, as being descended from one common ancestor, Hāshim Ibn 'Abd Manāf.

2 See 'No. 10, note on Kātibs.

*27 May; the day was Tuesday.—Ed.

† For قولنج cholice pain is the correct word.—Ed.

at court; each of these balls contained a ticket, on which was inscribed the name of a landed property, or of a slave girl, or of a set of horses, etc.; and the person into whose hands it fell having opened it and read its contents, proceeded to an agent specially appointed for the purpose, from whom he received the object inscribed on the ticket, whether it was a farm, or other property, or a horse, or a slave girl, or a mamlūk. The Wazīr then scattered gold and silver coins, balls of musk, and eggs of amber among the rest of the people. He defrayed all the expenses of al-Māmūn, of his officers and companions, those of the troops which accompanied him, and of the camp-followers, who were innumerable; he even paid the camel-drivers, those who hired the camels out, the boatmen, and all those who were in the camp; so that none of the latter were under the necessity of buying anything either for himself or his horse. Al-Ṭabarī relates, in his History, that al-Māmūn stopped nineteen days with al-Ḥasan (Bīrān's father), who furnished him and his suite, every day, with all they required; these expenses amounted to fifty millions of dirhams<sup>1</sup>. Al-Māmūn, on his departure, having ordered him ten millions of dirhams<sup>2</sup>, and granted him Fam al-Ṣillī in fief, al-Ḥasan gave a public audience, and distributed that sum to the Khālif's generals, companions, and domestics. The historian then says: "After this, on the 8th of Ramaḍān, al-Māmūn went forth to (visit) al-Ḥasan, and he set out from Fam al-Ṣillī on the 22 Shawwāl,* A. H. 210. The death of Ḥumayd,† Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamid<sup>3</sup>. took place on the first of Shawwāl, the same year." The following anecdote is told by another historian: "At the marriage ceremony) a mat interwoven with gold was spread out for al-Māmūn, who stood on it whilst pearls were showered down in abundance at his feet; on perceiving the pearls thus scattered on the

<sup>1</sup> This, on a very moderate evaluation, is about one million two hundred thousand pounds sterling.

<sup>2</sup> About two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling.

<sup>3</sup> Ḥumayd Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamid died in the year 210 (A. D. 825). He was a native of Ṭūs, and one of al-Māmūn's principal generals. In his enterprizes he displayed great vigour, courage, and promptitude.—(Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah).

*23 Shawwāl corresponding to 6 February, 826.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Ḥamid.—Ed.

mat of gold, he said: 'God be merciful to 'Abū Nuwās! one would think that he had seen this when he described the bubbles which cover the surface of wine when mixed with water:

'The little bubbles and the great resemble a gravel of pearls upon a ground of gold.'

(In this verse critics have remarked a fault, the nature of which cannot be explained here.) —"Al-Māmūn then granted al-Ḥasan one year's revenue of ḍiḡars and of the province of al-Ahwāz. Poets and orators were profuse in their praises on this occasion, and the following verses on the subject by Muḥammad Ibn Ḥāzīm al-Bāhilī, have been remarked for their ingenuity<sup>3</sup>:

'God grant that Barān and al-Ḥasan may be happy with the son-in-law! Thou hast triumphed, son of Hārūn<sup>4</sup>; and of whose daughter hast thou made the conquest?'

"When these verses were mentioned to al-Māmūn, he said: 'By Allāh! I know not whether the author means good or ill.'" 'Al-Ṭabarī says: "Al-Māmūn went in to Barān on the third night after his arrival at Fam al-Ṣillī; and when he sat down by her side, a thousand pearls were showered upon them, out of a golden tray, by her grandmother; he ordered them to be picked up, and asked her how many there were, and she answered, one thousand; on which he deposited them in her lap, saying: 'Let this be the marriage gift, and ask what thou requirest.' On this, her grandmother said to her: 'Speak to thy lord, who hath commanded

<sup>1</sup> Literally: May God slay him. This imprecation is frequently employed to denote approbation.

<sup>2</sup> The fault consists in his having employed كبرى and صغرى the feminines of اكبر and اصغر (which are adjectives in the comparative degree), without their being preceded by the definite article, or followed by a complement in the genitive case. (See M. de Sacy's Grammaire Arabe, tom. II, p. 302.) An Arabic grammarian in noticing this fault, would say, in his technical language ذكر فعلی —افعل التفضيل من غير اضافة ولا تعريف. The word فواقع signifies bubbles, but this meaning is not indicated by the lexicons; it occurs again, however, in page 413, line 5, of the Arabic text, with the same signification.

<sup>3</sup> In the original Arabic, these verses are so turned, that they may be taken either as a compliment or a sarcasm.

<sup>4</sup> The khalif al-Māmūn was son of Hārūn al-Raṣṣid.

thee.' Burān then asked him to pardon Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī.<sup>1</sup> (His life has been already given under no. 8.) "To this the Khalif answered, saying: 'I grant his pardon.' On that night they lit a candle of ambergris weighing eighty pounds, which was placed in a candle-stick<sup>2</sup> of gold; but al-Māmūn blamed them, saying, that it was an excess of prodigality." Another author says: "When al-Māmūn sought to enter in to Burān, he was refused admittance, on the pretext that she was indisposed, but he would not retire; and when his bride was brought forth to him, he found her unwell, and left her. The next morning, when he gave public audience, the Kātib Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf<sup>3</sup> entered and said to him: 'Commander of the faithful! may God accord you happiness and good fortune in what you have undertaken; may you be great in

<sup>1</sup> In the Arabic text, the word ابن (Ibn) has been omitted through inattention.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Lane, in the second volume of his excellent translation of the Thousand and One Nights (p. 351), refers to this passage, and supposes that the word تور*, as given in my Arabic edition of Ibn Kḥallikān's work, is an error of the press for تنور lantern. The best manuscripts agree, however, in giving تور, and the correctness of this reading is confirmed by the following passage from Kamāl al-Dīn's History of Aleppo: "أربع شمعات من عنبر في أربعة أتوار من فضة فضة" "four candles of ambergris in as many candlesticks of silver." See Freytag's Selecta ex Historia Halebi, p. 34.) Were تنور the true reading in the first instance, we should necessarily be obliged to suppose that, in the second, أتوار is a mistake of the copyist for تنوير; which is inadmissible. The word تور is not to be found in the lexicons with the signification of candlestick, but this or lantern is certainly its meaning here. The same word occurs again in the next page of M. Freytag's work, where it is said that the princess Qaṭr al-Nadā (dew-drop) went forth, preceded by four hundred female slaves, each of whom bore in her hand a تور of gold and silver, containing a candle of ambergris.

<sup>3</sup> Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn al-Qāsim was the son of an enfranchised slave. He filled the place of kātib in one of the government offices, and was distinguished by his talents, instruction, prudence, and skill in state affairs; he was also a poet. On the death of the wazīr Aḥmad Ibn Abī Kḥālīd, he was chosen to succeed him by the khalīf al-Māmūn, to whom he had been recommended by al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl. He died during the reign of al-Māmūn. (MS. No. 895, fol. 211.)

*(The autograph copy has the word تور and it is also printed in new Egyptian editions.)—Ed.

pro prowess and victorious in combat!' To this al-Māmūn replied by reciting the following verses:

'Eques impetuosus, cum hastā suā promptus ad confossionem in tenebris, praedam suam sanguine inficere voluit; sed eum prohibuitilla, cum sanguine, a sanguine suo'.<sup>2</sup>*

In this, he made allusion to the nature of her indisposition, and the figure he employed is perfectly appropriate. The foregoing anecdote is related by Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Jurjānī<sup>1</sup> in his Kināyāt or tropes; but I have found the story told in a different manner and God knows best the truth<sup>2</sup>. All this occurred in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 210 (A. D. 825-6), but al-Māmūn had been (already) betrothed to her in the year 202. She was with him in A. H. 218 when he died; his death took place on Thursday, 17th Rajab (August, A. D. 833†); and hers, on Tuesday, 27th of the first Rabi. AH.. 271 September, A. D. 884†). She was then eighty years of age, as she was born on Sunday evening, 2 Šafar, A. H. 192 (December, A. D. 807)§, at Baghdād. It is said that she was buried in a vault opposite to the maqṣūrah<sup>3</sup> in the mosque of the sulṭān, and that her monument exists till this day.—According to al-Sam'ānī, Fam al-Šilḥ (the mouth of the Šilḥ) is a town on the Tigris near Wāsiṭ; but the kātib 'Imād

1 Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Jurjānī was a doctor of the sect of al-Šāfi'ī. He studied jurisprudence under Abū Ishāq al-Šīrāzī, and became eminent for his talents. He filled the place of qāḍī at Baṣrah, and was the Šhaykh of the Shafites in that city. He was learned in the Traditions and composed both in verse and in prose. Among his works are the following: Kitāb al-Šhāfi' الشافعي (the healing), rare, in 4 vols. The Tajrid التجريد (the stripped), a large volume of legal decisions without the proofs. Al-Mu'āyāt المعايات (the puzzler), being a collection of enigmas, jeux d'esprit, etc. He died A. H. 482 (A. D. 1089).—(Tab. al-Fuq. Tab. al-Šhāf.)

2 This story is told differently in another part of the work. See no. 12. [But the passage is not in the autograph copy—Ed.]

3 See no. 100 note on maqṣūrah.

*In English it means: A cavalier going with his lancet which can strike its target in darkness, intended to bleed his prey; but abstained from pouring blood because it was already flowing there.—Ed.

†7August.—Ed.

§22 September.—Ed.

§ اثني (ithnayn) is Monday corresponding to 6 Decem.—Ed.

al-Dīn says, in his ḵharidah, that al-Ṣilḥ is a large canal branching off the Tigris above Wāsiṭ, and that a great number of towns<sup>1</sup> were on its banks; but the waters having overflowed, those places went to ruin. I must observe that 'Imād al-Dīn was better informed on the subject than al-Sam'ānī, having made a long residence at Wāsiṭ as director of the Government office<sup>2</sup>.

118. BŪRĪ TĀJ AL-MULŪK

Abn Sa'id Būrī, surnamed Tāj al-Mulūk (crown of kings) and Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion) was the youngest son of Ayyūb Ibn Shādhī (whose life has been already given), and brother to the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. He was a man of talent; and his diwān, or collected poetical works, though made up of pieces, some feebly, and some well written<sup>3</sup>, is yet good, if compared to those of the epoch. I extract from it the following lines, written on one of his mamlūks, who came riding up from the west on a grey horse:

"My friend approached from the west, riding on a grey horse, and I exclaimed: 'Glory to the Almighty! the sun has risen in the west!'"

The following piece is given as his by the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn, in the Ḵharidah:

"O, thou who, when pleased, art my life; and when angry, my death! how beautiful are the muskspotted roses of thy cheeks<sup>4</sup>! Between thy eyelids is a (magic) power which holdeth sway over my weakness. I strived to assume fortitude, though love tormented me, and passed all bounds. Perhaps Fortune may one day grant, through mistake, that I obtain from thee my cure."

He also quotes the following:

"O, thou who bearest a lance as slender as thy waist! O, thou who wieldest a sword which wounds like thy glance! Quit the lance

1 Literally: places.

2 An office existed in each province, for the administration of the government estates, recovery of taxes, and registry of all property liable to taxation.

3 Literally: Lean and fat; a metaphor taken from cattle.

4 Moles on the cheek are compared by the poets to spots of musk, which is of a black colour.

and sheath thy weapon, for sometimes, undesignedly, thou givest mortal wounds (with thy eyes)."

This prince composed some good poetry, and other specimens, besides the foregoing, are given by 'Imād al-Dīn. Būrī was born in the month of Dhu-'l Ḥijjah, A. H. 556 (A. D. 1161), and died near Aleppo, on Thursday the 23rd of Ṣafar, A.H. 579 (June, A.D. 1183),* of a wound he received when that place was besieged by his brother, the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. They laid siege to it on the 16 of Muḥarram, and on the same day, Būrī received the wound in his knee of which he died. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his al-Barq al-Shāmī: "On the conclusion of the peace, the sultān, before his entry into the city, had a feast prepared in the camp for 'Imād al-Dīn (Zinkī), the lord of Aleppo; he was sitting at table, with Zinkī by his side, and we were in the height of joy and pleasure, when the chamberlain entered and whispered to the sultān that his brother was dead. On receiving this information, he betrayed no emotion; and having given orders to bury him privately, he continued to do the honours of hospitality to the last moment." It is related that Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn used to say: "We did not gain Aleppo cheaply at the cost of Tāj al Mulūk's life." Būrī is a Turkish word and means wolf.

119. TUTUSH

Abu Sa'īd Tutush<sup>2</sup> Ibn Alb Ars'īān Ibn Dāwūd Ibn Mik'āl Ibn Saljūq Ibn Daqāq al-Saljūqī was lord of the countries to the east of Syria. When Badr al-Jamālī held Damascus besieged by order of the lord of Egypt (the Fatimite Khalif al-Mustanshir), the Turk-Atsiz<sup>3</sup> Ibn Awq Ibn al-Kḥuwārezmī, who was then in possession of the city, sent to implore the aid of Tutush, who marched to his assistance.

1 Zinkī offered some resistance at first, but he then made a secret treaty with Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and gave Aleppo up to him.

2 In Reiske's Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā this name is incorrectly written Tanash.

3 Reiske erroneously writes this name Ansiuz.

*16 June.—Ed,

On arriving near Damascus, Tutuṣh was met by Atsiz, whom he caused to be arrested, and having put him to death he took possession of his kingdom: this was in the year 471, on the 11 of the Second Rabī' (October, A. D. 1078)*. Atsiz had become master of the city in the month of Dhu'l Qa'dah, 468 (June, A.D. 1076); I have read, however, in some historical work, that it was in 472. It has been already stated in the life of 'Āq-Sunqurī, that Tutuṣh again took Aleppo in A. H. 478; he then conquered the provinces of Syria, but the dissensions which afterwards arose between him and his nephew Barkyāraq led to a war, and a battle was fought between them, near the city of Ray, on Sunday the 17 of Ṣafar, A.H. 488 (February, A. D. 1095)†, in which the troops of Tutuṣh were defeated, and he himself was slain: his birth was in the month of Ramaḍān, 458 (August, A. D. 1066). He left two sons, Fakhr al-Mulūk Riḍwān and Shams al-Mulūk Abū Naṣr Daqāq, the former of whom took possession of the principality of Aleppo, and the latter of that of Damascus. Riḍwān died on the last day of the First Jumādā, A. H. 507 (November, A. D. 1113‡); it was from (one of) his lieutenants that the Franks took Antioch in the year 492).? Daqāq died on the 18 of Ramaḍān, A. H. 497 (June, A. D. 1104§), and was interred in the mosque situated in the Ḥakr al-Fahhādīn<sup>3</sup>, on the bank of the river Baradā outside Damascus. He died of a lingering illness, but it has been said that he was poisoned by his mother with a bunch of grapes. On his death, he was

<sup>1</sup> See No. 99.

<sup>2</sup> This is a mistake; Antioch was taken by the crusaders A. D. 1098 (A. H. 491).

<sup>3</sup> Ḥakr al-Fahhādīn (the enclosure of the panther or ounce-keepers); the word hakr signifies an enclosed ground; see Chrestomathies, t. I, 239. It is well known that in the East, panthers and ounces were trained for hunting. In the Arabic text I have printed التي in conformity with all my MSS. except one, which has الذي; the latter reading seems preferable. (The autograph copy has التي and the printed Egyptian edition has الذي.—Ed.)

*21 October.—Ed.

†25 February.—Ed.

‡12 November.—Ed.

§14 June.—Ed.

succeeded by his atābek, or guardian, Ẓāhir al-Dīn Abū Maṣṣūr Tuḡhtikin, to whom his mother had been given in marriage by his father Tutush. This Tuḡhtikin was an enfranchised slave of Tutush. Riḍwān is the ancestor of the family called Awlād al-Malik Riḍwān (Prince Riḍwān's children), which resides outside of Aleppo. Tuḡhtikin continued in possession of the principality of Damascus till his death, which took place on Saturday, 8 Ṣafar, 522 (February, A. D. 1128)*. He was succeeded by his son Tāj al-Mulūk Abū Sa'īd Burī†, who died on Monday, 21 Rajab, A. H. 526 (June, A. D. 1132)‡, of a wound he received from the Batinites.<sup>2</sup> He had for successor his son Shams al-Mulūk Ismā'il, who reigned till Thursday, 14 of the Second Rabi', 529 (February, A. D. 1135)§, on which day he was put to death by his mother Khātūn Zumurrud (princess Emerald), daughter of Jāwili, and his brother Shihāb al-Dīn Abū 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd was placed by her on the throne. Maḥmūd governed Damascus till he was murdered by his page al-Buḡhush,§ the eunuch Yūsuf, and the farrāsh<sup>3</sup> al-Kharkāwī on the night of Thursday, 23 Shawwāl, 533 (June, A. D. 1139)||. The next morning, his brother Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Burī arrived from his principality of Ba'l'abek and took possession of Damascus, where he remained till his death, which happened on the night of Thursday, 8 Sha'bān, 534 (March, A. D. 1140). ¶ He was succeeded by his son Mujir al-Dīn Aḥiq, who continued to govern Damascus till besieged by Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn Zankī (A. H. 549, A. D. 1154), when he delivered up the city and received Emessa in exchange. He had not been long in Emessa, when Nūr al-Dīn sent him to Bālis, a town on the Euphrates where he remained for some 1 These were also the names and titles of a brother of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn; his life has been given in the preceding article.

2 See note on Batinites, No. 99.

3 The duty of the farrāsh is to pitch his master's tent, spread his carpets, and keep his furniture in order.

*11 February.—Ed.

†6 June.—Ed.

‡31 January.—Ed.

§M de Slane gives al-Tuḡhush.—Ed.

||22nd June.—Ed.

¶28 March.—Ed.

time, and then went to Baḡdād, where he was honourably received by the khalif al-Muktafi (li'amr illā<sup>1</sup>); but I do not know the epoch of his death.<sup>1</sup> When he was at Damascus, he confided the government to Mu'in al-Dīn 'Anez Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a mamlūk of his grandfather Ṭuḡhtikīn. The castle of Mu'in al-Dīn, in the canton of al-Ḡhawr, which is in the dependencies of Damascus, was so named after him; he died on the night of the 23 of the latter Rabi' A. H. 544 (August, A. D. 1149)*. It was his daughter whom Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd married, and who became wife of the sultān Ṣa'āḥ al-Dīn on the death of her first husband. There is a college at Damascus which was founded by Mu'in al-Dīn.—I have since discovered the date of Muḥr al-Dīn 'Abcī's death; it was (in A. H. 564, A. D. 1168-9) as we shall mention in the life of Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd.

120. TAQIYAH BINT GHAYTH

Omm 'Alī Taqiyah Bint Abi 'l-Faraj Ḡhayth (Taqiyah, mother of 'Alī and daughter of Abu'l-Faraj Ḡhayth) Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Sulamī al-Armanāzī al-Ṣarī was the mother of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Fāḍil Ibn Ṣamdān al-Ṣarī. She was a woman of talent, and composed some good qaṣīdahs and short pieces of poetry. The ḥafīz al-Silafī, in whose service she had been for a time when at Alexandria, speaks of her favourably in some of his works, and the following passage is found in his handwriting: "I stumbled in the place of my abode, and my foot was wounded thereby; on which a girl in the house tore a piece off her veil and bound it up"<sup>2</sup> Taqiyah herself pronounced the following verses on the occasion:

<sup>1</sup> See however the last lines of this article.

<sup>2</sup> So slight a mention as this was yet highly honourable coming, as it did, from so great and learned a man. See his life, No. 43.

*31 August.—Ed.

† Ibn Sa'd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Yahyā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad. This portion of genealogy has been omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

"Had I found means, I should have given my cheek<sup>1</sup> rather than a maiden's veil. How happy should I be to kiss a foot which has always trod in the laudable path (the path of righteousness)."

In expressing this idea, she had in view the following lines, which are by Hārūn Ibn (Alī Ibn) Yaḥyā al-Munajjim:

"How should he stumble who hath always been upright under the gravest circumstances? How could a hurt happen to a foot which hath never swerved from the road of honour?"<sup>2</sup>

<sup>3</sup>[Besides it she has other good pieces].

I have been informed by the ḥ īfī 'Abd al-'Aẓīm al-Mundhīrī, that Taqīyah composed a qaṣīdah in praise of Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar, nephew of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn; its subject was wine, and in it she described all the apparatus of a convivial party,<sup>3</sup> and every thing respecting wine. When the prince read the poem, he said, "The old lady knows all those things from her youth." Taqīyah, having been informed of what he said, composed another qaṣīdah on war, in which she described it to perfection, and all its accompanying circumstances; she then sent it to him, saying; "My acquaintance with that is like my acquaintance with this." In so doing, it was her intention to justify herself<sup>4</sup> from the imputation which he cast upon her character. Taqīyah was born at Damascus in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 505 (August, A. D. 1111); I have seen, however, a note in the handwriting of al-Silafī, stating that she was born in the month of Muḥarram of that year: she died in the beginning of Shawwāl, A. H. 579 (January, A. D. 1184). Her father Abu 'l-Faraj died towards the end of A. H. 509, and as some say, in the month of Ṣafar of that year; he was an authority as a traditionist<sup>5</sup>. Her grandfather, 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Salām, died at Ṣūr (Tyre) on Sunday morning, 9 of the Second Rabi', 478 (August, A. D. 1085).† Her son Abu l-Ijāsān 'Alī who was a native of Ṣūr, but a denizen of

<sup>1</sup> See No. 58 note on common topics of poets.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: Which hath not ceased to tread towards an honourable station.

<sup>3</sup> See note on social parties, No. 84.

<sup>4</sup> Literally: The justification of the court of her dwellings.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: he was a ṭhiqat. "أثقة" See note on "أثقة", No. 48.

*This sentence is omitted by M. de Slane.—Ed.

†3 August.—Ed.

Egypt, died at an advanced age in the city of Alexandria, on the 15 Šafar, A. H. 603 (September, A. D. 1206).* He was an able grammarian and master of the different readings of the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>; his handwriting was elegant and his orthography correct: his father Fāḍil was born at Damascus in the month of Šawwāl, A. H. 490 (September, A. D. 1097). (This I have taken from a note written by the ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī.) I find in the handwriting of Abu 'l-Ḥasan that his father Fāḍil, who was surnamed Abū Muḥammad, died at Alexandria in the beginning of the First Rabi' 568 (October A. D. 1172.) Armanāzi means belonging to Armanāz, which is a village in the dependencies of Damascus; some say, however, that it is situated in the dependencies of Antioch, but the former statement is more correct; Al-Sam'ānī says that it is in the dependencies of Aleppo, and I have been informed by a person who saw Armanāz, that it is in the dependencies of Aleppo, and lies at less than a mile's distance to the west of 'Azāz.<sup>2</sup> Šārī means belonging to Šār (Tyre), a city on the coast of Syria, and now in the hands of the Franks, may God frustrate their projects! it was taken by them in the year 518 (A. D. 1124). God render its conquest easy to the Muslims!.

121. ABŪ GHĀLIB AL-TAYYĀNĪ

Abū Ghalib Tammām Ibn Ghālib Ibn 'Umar, the philologist, surnamed al-Tayyānī, was a native of Cordova, but had settled at Murcia. He held the first rank in the science of philology, and was

1 See note on intonation, No. 48.

2 This is one of the additions, made by the author, and as it frequently happens with him in such cases, he has neglected to modify what was previously said, and has thus fallen into a contradiction. 'Azāz, عزاز written also عزاز, lies to the north of Aleppo. The country was celebrated for its beauty and fertility.

3 Tyre was not retaken by the Muslims till A. D. 1289, seven years after Ibn Khallikān's death.

*21 September.—Ed.

considered as a sure authority in his doctrines on that subject<sup>1</sup>. He was cited also for his knowledge of jurisprudence, his observance of the precepts of religion, and his piety. His celebrated compilation of philological remarks is unequalled by any work of the kind both for concision and extensive information. The following anecdote, related of the author by Ibn al-Faraḍī, is a proof not only of his learning, but of his strict religious principles: "When Abu 'l-Jaysh Mujāhid<sup>2</sup> took Murcia, he sent to Abū Ghālib, who was then residing in that city, a present of one thousand dinārs, with the condition that he should add these words to the title of his work: Composed by Abū Ghālib for Abū 'l-Jaysh Mujāhid. On this, he returned the money, saying: 'Were the world offered to me on that condition, I should refuse it, to avoid having a falsehood to answer for; it was not for you that I composed the work, but for the public at large'.—How admirable was the noble and lofty spirit of that able master<sup>3</sup>! what an honest pride, what integrity in that profound scholar!" Ibn Ḥayyān says that Abū Ghālib was pre-eminent in his knowledge of the (Arabic) tongue, and that all yielded to him in philology. He composed a most instructive collection of philological observations,

---

1 Those philological doctrines consisted in the explanation of the terms and expressions proper to the language of the ancient Arabs. These explanations could only be learned from tradition, and it is for this reason that Ibn Kḥallikān, in speaking of at-Tayyānī, makes use of the word "أَمَّ" (ḥiqat), which means a sure authority in the transmission of traditional information.

2 Abu 'l-Jaysh Mujāhid Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-'Āmirī, surnamed al-Muwaffaq, was an enfranchised slave of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Manṣūr, the kālib or prime minister of the Spanish khalīf Hishām. Ibn al-Ḥakam. In A. H. 406 (A. D. 1015) he made an expedition to the Balearic Isles and Sardinia, an account of which is given by Conde. On his return to Spain, he succeeded, after many adventures, in obtaining possession of Denia, Murcia, and the neighbouring towns. He died at Denia, of which he was wālī, or governor, in A. H. 436 (A. D. 1044-5), and left behind the reputation of a just and able ruler, and a generous patron of men of learning. He was brought up at Cordova.—(Bughyat al-Multa-mis.)

3 Able master : the Arabic word is Ra'īs (chief); which was perhaps the title given him as chief philologist of the age.

which he entitled Talqīḥ al-‘Ayn.<sup>1</sup> He died at Almeria, A. H. 436 (A. D. 1044-5) in one of the months of Jumādā. Among his masters in philology were his father and Abī Bakr al-Zubaydī.—I suppose that Tayyānī is derived from Tīn (fig), and means a seller of that fruit.

122. TAMĪM IBN AL-MU‘IZZ IBN AL-MANŠŪR

Abū ‘Alī Tamīm was son of al-Mu‘izz Ibn al-Manšūr Ibn al-Qā‘im Ibn al-Mahdī. His father was lord of Egypt and Maḡrib, and the founder of the city of Cairo (which is for that reason entitled) al-Mu‘izziyah. (We shall give his life in the letter M, and have already made mention of a number of his family; of the others we shall speak hereafter.) Tamīm was a man of superior talent and a poet, gifted with a subtle wit and a refined taste; he did not, however, obtain the supreme authority, as the throne devolved to his brother al-‘Azīz in virtue of the solemn covenant by which this prince had been recognised, during his father’s lifetime, as the legitimate successor to the empire. Al-‘Azīz also composed some good poetry and a great number of pieces by him and by his brother are given in al-Ṭḥa‘ālībī’s Yatīmah. The following verses are by Tamīm:

“The love I bore her did not appear excusable till her hair spread a dark shade on her cheek, and her beauty had attained its perfection.<sup>2</sup> The locks which encircled her cheeks<sup>3</sup> aspired to kiss her lips, but she repelled them with the drawn sword of her glances. By Allāh! were I not apprehensive that people should say of me: ‘His head is deranged by love;’ (and yet I am justified in loving!) on kissing those rosy cheeks, I should think them a bunch of violets, and her shoulders of camphor (whiteness) I should mistake for ambergris."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This title signifies literally: Fructification of the Eye; it is perhaps a commentary on Khālil Ibn Aḥmad’s celebrated Arabic dictionary, the ‘Ayn, or a supplement to it.

<sup>2</sup> The verb عَزَّر in the second form signifies to have the face encircled with the ‘iqḥār, which word is explained in the Introduction. I have modified the idea for an obvious reason.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: The scorpions of her face. See Introduction.

By the same:

"I swear by Him who alone possesses sovereign power, and who knows the most hidden secrets! that painful though it be to conceal one's sufferings, it would be, for me, more grievous and painful to reveal them.<sup>2</sup> I undergo tortures the least of which would force the eyes to shed tears (from pain), and yet, for her sake, I always wear a smiling face."

The author of the Yatimah gives the following lines as being composed by Tamīm:

"No! the mother of the tender fawn who passed days and nights in the desert suffering from thirst,—who roamed unconscious and wandered in amaze through the wilderness,—whom the noontide heat oppressed, and who found not a drop of cool water to quench her thirst,—who drew near to her fawn, and, hanging fondly over it, found its flanks parched and shrunk,—that mother felt not greater pain than I on the day (of my friends' departure) when they girthed their camels, and a voice exclaimed from the tribe: 'Adieu for ever!'"<sup>3</sup>

The following (well-known) line is attributed to him also:

"Evil Fortune was mortified (and frustrated) by (the abundance of) his gifts: such mortification he also felt when forced to refuse (a solicitation)."

All Tamīm's poetry is good. The author of the Duwal al-Munqaṭi'ah<sup>4</sup> says that he died in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H.

<sup>1</sup> What I have here translated rosy cheeks, means literally, the apple of her cheeks; the similitude between the violet and the 'idhār has been explained in the Introduction; camphor with Arabic poets is the emblem of whiteness, as musk is of blackness, and ambergris is prized for its whiteness and perfume.

<sup>2</sup> His affliction was love; but respect for his mistress obliged him to conceal it.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: "No meeting again!"

<sup>4</sup> See No. 68, note on Duwal al-Munqaṭi'ah.

374 (April, A. D. 985), in Miṣr; and al-'Utaqī<sup>1</sup> states in his History, that his death took place on the afternoon of Tuesday 13th of the month,* and that his brother al-'Azīz Nizār was present at the funeral prayers, which were said over him in his garden: the qāḍī Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān<sup>2</sup> washed the corpse, and having wrapped it up in sixty robes, he brought it out of the garden towards sunset, and prayed over it at the Qarāfah<sup>3</sup>; he then bore it to the castle of Cairo, and placed it in the vault wherein the body of his father al-Mu'izz was deposited. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadānī<sup>4</sup> says, in his work entitled al-Ma'ārif al-Muta'aḳḳirah (Sciences of later Times), that Tamīm died in the year 375; God knows best! A third writer says that he was born in A. H. 337 (A. D. 948-9).

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-'Utaqī is the author of the work entitled Tārīkh al-Maghāribah (History of the natives of Maghrib). (Al-Dhahabī's Muṣṭabih al-Asmā, MS. No. 862). Al-'Utaqī died A. H. 385 (A. D. 995). His life is given by Casiri in the Bibliotheca Arabica, tom I, p. 431, after the Tārīkh al-Hukamā, or History of the Philosophers, by al-Zawzenī. See Bib. Arab. No. 1773. I have given an account of al-Zawzenī's work in a note on the life of Thābit Ibn Qurrah; see No. 125. Casiri does not seem to have known this author's name, although he cites his authority frequently.

<sup>2</sup> Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān was born at Qayrawān, A. H. 345 (A. D. 956). He accompanied his father to Egypt, and was appointed qāḍī by al-'Azīz in the year 374 (A. D. 984-5). Before him, this place was filled by his brother 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān, who died in that year. The death of the qāḍī Muḥammad took place A. H. 389 (A. D. 999). The ceremony of his installation is thus related: "After receiving from al-'Azīz a pelisse of honour and a sword, he proceeded on the same day (from the castle) to the city; as he was suffering from illness, he was seated in a covered chair which was placed on the back of a mule. On entering the great mosque, he found himself unable to preside at the meeting (held for his installation), and he therefore went home and left his son 'Abd al-'Azīz and his nephews with the notaries; it was in their presence that the diploma was read after Friday prayers. By it he was appointed qāḍī of Egypt, Alexandria, Makkah, Madinah, and the provinces of Syria; he was authorised also to preside at public prayers (which was one of the privileges granted to governors of provinces and wazirs), and was empowered to act as controller of the mint, and inspector of weights and measures (these were duties usually filled by the chief magistrate of police or Muhtasib, (محتسب)) to In this document the names of his father and brothers were mentioned in terms of high praise."—(Ibn Ḥajar's History of the Qāḍis of Egypt, MS. No. 691).

<sup>3</sup> See note on Qarāfah No. 24.

<sup>4</sup> According to Ḥājji Khalīfah, this writer died A. H. 521 (A. D. 1127).

*7 April.—Ed.

123. TAMĪM IBN AL-MU'IZZ IBN BĀDĪS

Abū Yaḥyā Tamīm was son of al-Mu'izz (and a descendant of Qaḥṣān; his genealogy is thus given:)<sup>1</sup> Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn Bulukkin Ibn Zrī Ibn Manād Ibn Man-qūṣh Ibn Zanāk<sup>2</sup> Ibn Zayd al-Aṣḡhar (the less) Ibn Wāṣḥfāl Ibn Wazḡhafi. Ibn Sari Ibn Watlākī Ibn Sulaymān Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Adī al-Aṣḡhar al-Maṭhnā (the less or the second) Ibn Miswar Ibn Yaḥṣub Ibn Mālīk Ibn Zayd Ibn al-Ḡhawṭh al-Aṣḡhar Ibn Sa'd; Sa'd, named also 'Abd Allāh, was son of 'Awf Ibn 'Adī Ibn Mālīk Ibn Zayd Ibn Sadad Ibn Zur'ah; Zur'ah, who was Ḥimyar the less, was son of Sabā the less, son of Ka'b Ibn Zayd Ibn Sahl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Qays Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Juṣḡham Ibn 'Abd Ṣhams Ibn Wā'il<sup>3</sup> Ibn al-Ḡhawṭh Ibn Ḥaydān<sup>4</sup> Ibn Qūr<sup>5</sup> Ibn 'Awf Ibn 'Arib Ibn Zuhayr Ibn Ayman Ibn al-Ḥumaysa' Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ḥimyar; Ḥimyar, named

1 This genealogical list has been drawn up after the MSS. of Ibn Khallikān, and confronted with the copies of it given by 'Imād al-Dīn in his Khariḍah (MS. No. 1375, fol. 59), and al-Nuwayrī in his History of the Zirite dynasty (MS. No. 702, fol. 26). The latter writer says that he extracted it from the البيان والجمع or History of Maghrib and Qayrawān, composed by a grandson of Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, whose name was 'Izz al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Ṣhaddād. I am inclined to suspect this genealogy to be a forgery, and that it was fabricated to flatter the Zirite princes, who naturally desired to prove their descent from an Arabian stock. A number of names in it appear to be Berber, and might be adduced as a proof that the Arabic language was not then in general use in the tribe of Ṣunḥāj. Other lists besides the present are extant, showing the descent of the Himyarites from Qaḥṣān, but none of them is in perfect accordance with the others. This is, however, a curious document, tracing, as it does, the tribe of Ṣunḥāj up to that of Ḥimyar: which point, if proved, would be important for the history of Northern Africa; the fact is indeed asserted by many Arabian historians, but I should not admit it were it founded merely on the authority of suspicious genealogies.

2 There are differences between the MSS. in the manner of pointing some names in this list. The following various readings may not be undeserving of notice: Zayyāk زياكي for Zanāk; Wāṣḡḡāk واشغاك for Wāṣḡfāl; Wazḡhafi and Waz'cafi for Wazḡhafi, Wayliki for Watluki.

3 Or Wāṭhil. (وائل)

4 Perhaps Huddān.

5 Qūr قور, according to the Khariḍah.

also al-'Aranjaj, was son of Sabā the elder, son of Yashjub<sup>1</sup>* Ibn Ya'rūb Ibn Qaḥṭān Ibn 'Ābir (Heber); 'Ābir is the same person as the prophet Hūd, who was son of Shāl kh (Šāleḥ) son of Arfakhshad son of Sem son of Noah. Such is the statement made by 'Imād al-Dīn in the Khariḍa<sup>2</sup>—This Tamīm, who was surnamed al-Ḥimyarī al-Ṣunhājī (sprung from Ṣunhāj and Ḥimyar), became sovereign of Ifriqiyah and the neighbouring countries on the death of his father al-Mu'izz. His government was just, and his conduct praiseworthy; he liked men of learning, and honoured persons of talent; for this reason, poets came from the most distant regions to celebrate his praise, and, amongst the rest, Ibn al-Sarrāj al-Ṣa'ī. Tamīm's ancestor, al-Maṭṭnā Ibn al-Miswar, was the first of the family who entered Ifriqiyah<sup>2</sup>. Ibn Raṣḥ'q al-Qairawānī composed a number of pieces in honour of Tamīm, and in one of them is this passage:

"The truest and most authentic history of liberality which has been transmitted from ancient times, is that narrative made by the torrents, which learned it from the rain, which received it from the sea, which held it from the hand of Tamīm."<sup>3</sup>

The amīr Tamīm himself composed some good poetry, of which the following are specimens:

"If my eyes looked at hers, she would know with whom I should wish a secret interview. Her glances seem to reach the heart and discover its hidden contents."

1 Yashjub according to the Qāmūs.

2 The historian (Ibn Shaddād, see note 1, says that al-Maṭṭnā Ibn al-Miswar was the first of his family who entered Maghrib. When the Abyssinians took Yamen from the Himyarites, he emigrated to Maghrib, in consequence of a prediction made to him by a soothsayer, the import of which was, that some of his posterity in that country were to obtain an empire.—Al-Nuwayrī, MS. No. 702, fol. 27.)

3 The Arabs compare liberality to a torrent or to the ocean, and frequently designate it by the emblem of humidity. This poet therefore represents the waters of the torrent as proceeding from the hand of the prince, and then transmitted by the sea to the rain, and by the rain to the torrent. The humidity or liberality resembles therefore an ancient tradition, which is handed down from one generation to another. Such is the idea expressed in the verse.

*M. de Slane gives Yashhub.—Ed.

By the same :

"Ask of the abundant rains which have watered all thy country, if they fell as copiously as my tears! If it be thy character to show aversion and rigour (to thy lover), patience should be mine; but where shall I find it?"

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn speaks of him in the Sayl, and gives the following passages of his poetry:

"I thought of hell and its fires (and when the wicked shall exclaim:) 'Alas for us! There is no time for escape'<sup>1</sup>. I then invoked the Lord, for my best recommendation to his mercy is to declare the sincerity of my faith."

By the same:

"How often have I drunk intoxication off faces which in beauty far surpassed description. The cheeks were like roses, the teeth like pearls, and the ringlets like myrtle."<sup>2</sup>

The merits of Tamīm were abundant like his poetry, and his gifts were bestowed with liberality. It was in his reign that the Mahdī, Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart, [whose mention will be made]* passed through Ifrīqiyah on his return from the East, and manifested his disapproval of those whom he saw transgress the rules of the divine law; from thence he went to Morocco, where he acquired celebrity by his proceedings. The amīr Tamīm was born at al-Manṣūriyah (called also Ṣabrah,<sup>3</sup> a town in the province of Ifrīqiyah), on Monday, 13 Rajab, A. H. 422 (July, A. D. 1031)† he was entrusted by his father with the government of al-Mahdiyyah, in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 445, and he remained in command of that city till his father's death, which took place in the month of Ṣha'bān, A. H. 454 (August, A.D. 1062),‡ when he became sole master of the kingdom. He continued in the exercise of supreme authority till he

1 Qur'ān, sūrat 38, v. 2.

2 Arabic poets frequently compare the hair to myrtle, on account of its dark colour. The word أس (myrtle) is often used metaphorically to designate the hair.

3 See note on Manṣūriyah No. 105.

*Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

†7 July.—Ed.

‡The correct date as given in autograph is 445 (November & December 1053).—Ed.

died in A. H. 501, on Friday night, 15 Rajab (February, A. D. 1108)*. He was buried in his palace, but his corpse was afterwards removed to Qaṣr al-Sīdal; at Munastīr.<sup>1</sup> He left after him upwards of one hundred sons and sixty daughters, according to the account given by his grandson Ibn Shaddād in his History of Qayrawān.<sup>2</sup>—I have already marked the manner in which the names of some of his ancestors are to be pronounced, but it would occupy too much room, were I to fix the orthography of the remainder. I have written them here, however, with the vowel points<sup>3</sup>, so that any person who wishes to quote the genealogy has only to follow what I have here given after a note in the handwriting of a man of information.—Munastīr shall be noticed in [letter H in]† the life of al-Būṣīrī.

124. SHAMS AL-DAWLAT TŪRĀN SHĀH

Al-Malik al-Mu‘azzam Shams al-Dawlat (the exalted prince, sun of the empire) Tūrān Shāh Ibn Ayyūb Ibn Shādhī Ibn Marwān was surnamed Faḳḥr al-Dīn (glory of religion). Mention has been already made of his father and his brother Tāj al-Mulūk<sup>4</sup>. He was an elder brother of the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn who often expressed his high esteem of him, and treated him with deference. In the month of Rajab, 569 the sulṭān having established his authority on a solid basis and strengthened his army, sent his brother Tūrān Shāh, with a chosen body of troops, from Egypt to Yaman against ‘Abd al-Nabī Ibn Mahdī. This man pretended that his authority was to extend over all the land, and having become master of the greater part of the cities and fortresses in that province, he caused the khutbah<sup>5</sup> to be said in his own name. Tūrān Shāh, on <sup>1</sup> See note on Munastīr, No. 101.

<sup>2</sup> See note 1, p. 62.

<sup>3</sup> These vowel points have been omitted by the copvists.

<sup>4</sup> See No. 104 and No. 118.

<sup>5</sup> See note on Khutbah, No. 78.

* Saturday, 29 February.—Ed.

† Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

his arrival in Yaman, obtained the victory by God's permission, and slew the rebel. He then took possession of nearly all the country, and enriched great numbers by his donations, for he was of a noble and generous disposition. He left Yamen when the sultān was besieging Aleppo, and arrived at Damascus in the month of Dhu'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 571 (June, A. D. 1176). Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, on raising the siege, went back to Egypt, after appointing Tūrān Shāh as his lieutenant in Damascus, where he remained for some time and then returned to Miṣr. Ibn Shaddād says, in his History of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, that al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Tūrān Shāh died at Alexandria on Thursday, 1st of Ṣafar, A. H. 576 (June, A. D. 1180)<sup>1</sup>,* but in another part of the work he states that his death took place on the 5th of Ṣafar. His body was transported to Damascus by Shitt al-Shām † who was his sister by the father's side, ‡ and was interred by her in the college which she had founded outside the city. That edifice contains also her tomb, that of her son Ḥusām al-Dīn 'Umar son of Lājīn, and that of her second husband, Nāsir al-Dīn, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Asad al-Dīn Shayrkūh, whom she had espoused on the death of Lājīn.—Ḥusām al-Dīn (the sword of religion) died on the night of Thursday, 19th Ramaḍān, 587 (October, A. D. 1191 §); he was master of the eunuch Shibli al-Dawlat (whelp of the empire) Kāfūr Ibn 'Abd Allāh, who was therefore entitled al-Ḥusāmī and who founded the Shibliyah College and the Shibliyah convent outside of Damascus, on the road leading to Mount Qāsiyan; these two establishments have a certain celebrity at Damascus. Shibl al-Dawlat founded a great number of waqfs and charitable institutions useful (to others) in this life and (to himself) in the next. He died in Rajab, 623 (July, A. D. 1226), and was interred near the

<sup>1</sup> See Saladini vita et res gestae, p. 45.

<sup>2</sup> See note on waqf, No. 21.

*26 June.—Ed.

†M. de Slane reads the name as Sitt al-Shām.—Ed.

‡ شقيقه Shaqiqūh means real sister i.e. having same father and mother. The term is not applied to بنو العلات banu'l-'allāt (children by the father's side) or بنو الألبان banu'l-a-khyūf (children by the mother's side).—Ed.

§10 October.—Ed.

Shibliyah College, in the mausoleum which bears his name.—Mention shall be made of Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad, son of Shayrkūh, in the life of his father.—Shitt al-Shām (the lady of Syria) died on the 16th Dhū l-Qa'dah, 616 (January, A. D. 1220).†—On finishing this article, I found some further information in the handwriting of a person of merit, who had cultivated the science of biography; this additional note I shall give here, and let what I have already said stand as it is. His narration is as follows:—When Shams al-Dawlat had reduced the province of Yaman to tranquillity, and submitted it to his authority, he felt a dislike to residing in that country, having been brought up in Syria, a land of abundance, whilst Yaman was sterile region, deprived of every advantage. He therefore wrote to his brother, offering his resignation and demanding his authorisation to return to Syria. (In this letter) he complained of his unpleasant situation, and of the sufferings which he underwent in being deprived of the necessary conveniences of life. Ṣalāh al-Dīn sent a letter in reply, encouraging him to continue in a country possessed of so much wealth and forming so extensive an empire. Shams al-Dawlat, on hearing the contents of the letter, ordered his treasurer to bring him a thousand gold pieces, and, giving them to his major-domo in the presence of the messenger who brought the letter, he ordered him to send to market and buy a lump of ice with that sum. To this the major-domo answered: “My lord, this is Yaman, and how can ice be found in it?”—“Tell them then,” said the prince, “to buy with it a tray of apricots! .—“How could such a fruit be found here?” was the reply; He then named all the different sorts of fruit peculiar to Damascus, and the major-domo manifested his astonishment and said, as each species was named: “How, my lord, could such a thing be found here?” Shams al-Dawlat, having at length finished, said to the messenger: “I should like to know what is to be done with these riches, since they cannot procure me the pleasures of life, nor furnish me with what I desire? Money cannot be eaten. and its sole use is, that it

1 Apricots شمش لوزی literally, almond apricots: “a beautiful well-flavoured fruit with a sweet kernel.” (Russell's Aleppo, vol. 1, p. 87.)—See also De Sacy's Abdallatif, p. 132.

* 12 February Ed.

† From ‘On finishing’ to the end. not in the autograph.—Ed enables a man to attain the object of his wishes." The messenger on his return, related the circumstance to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who, in consequence, allowed his brother to come back. Al-Qāḍī al-Faḍīl used to write to Shams al-Dawlat, and in his letters, which were elegantly drawn up, he expressed the ardent desire he had (of seeing him again); one of these letters contained this well-known piece of verse:

"Be not offended at my conduct; for my bosom is (alas!) inclined to betray the secrets of love. By thy departure I die, and by thy return I receive new life. Time swore to separate us; when will it relent and break its oath? Thy letters are strewed around my couch, and I seem to be a victim stung by thee, whilst they are the magicians which strive to effect my cure!. How long can the body exist deprived of life? How long, when deprived of respiration?"

Shams al-Dawlat returned to Damascus in the year abovementioned, and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, on his departure for Egypt, A.H. 574 (A.D. 1178). appointed him as his lieutenant. He had already sent him to subdue Nubiah in the year 568 (A. D. 1172-3); this was before his expedition to Yaman. When he arrived in Nubiah he found that its conquest would not repay the trouble, and he therefore left it and returned with a rich booty, consisting of slaves. He held from his brother a number of fiefs for his support, and the taxes of Yaman were collected in his name by his lieutenants, yet he died indebted to the treasury-office for a sum of two hundred thousand dīnārs<sup>1</sup>, which were paid in by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. My master, the learned and talented

1 Literally: These are the magicians, the blowers. This is a learned allusion of the qāḍī's to a superstitious practice prevalent among the ancient Arabs. When a person was stung by a scorpion, enchanters were called in, who blew upon the wound and performed other ceremonies to effect a cure. Another approved receipt was, to prevent the patient from sleeping, and for this purpose a number of metal bracelets and collars, such as are worn by females, were shaken at his ears all night; or else he performed this operation himself. It is thus that the poet al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī says :

يسهر من ليل التمام سليمها * بحلى النساء فى يديه قعاقع

"He that is wounded by its sting remains awake the entire night, and a rattling sound proceeds from the women's ornaments which he holds in his hands."

2 About 120,000 pounds sterling.

Shaykh* Ibn al-Khaym al-Ḥilli (native of Ḥillah) who had settled in Egypt<sup>1</sup>, relates that he had a dream, in which he saw Shams al-Dawlat Tūrān Shāh dead in his tomb; and that he recited to the prince some verses in his praise, on which he rolled up his shroud and threw it to him (Ibn al-Khaymī), saying:

“Think it not slight, the gift which I make when dead, for, in bestowing it, my body remains naked. Imagine not that avarice could ever blemish the generosity of one who lavished the wealth of Syria and of Yamen. I left the world, and, of all which my hands possessed, a winding-sheet alone remained with me.”

When Shams al-Dawlat was in Yamen, he appointed al-Mubārak Ibn Munqidh (whose life shall be given in the letter M) as his lieutenant in the city of Zabid.—Tūrān is a Persian word; Shāh is also Persian and means king; Tūrān Shāh signifies king of the East. The East was named Tūrān because it is the country of Turks, who are called Turkān by the Persians, which word has been altered into Tūrān.

125. THĀBIT IBN QURRAH

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Thābit Ibn Qurrah Ibn Hārān (or Zahrān)† Ibn Thābit Ibn Karāyā Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Karāyā‡ Ibn Marinūs Ibn Mālājaryūs (§) al-Ḥarrānī was a great arithmetician and philosopher. He commenced his career as a money-changer at Ḥarrān, and then removed to Baghdād, where he studied with success the sciences of the ancients<sup>2</sup>. He acquired a superior knowledge of medicine, but he devoted himself principally to philosophy. About.

<sup>1</sup> See in the life of Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī Zayd Ibn al-Ḥasan.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 65 note on Sciences of Ancients.

* Between Shaykh and Ibn al-khaymī 'Muḥadhdhab al-Dīn Abū Tālib Muḥammad b. 'Alī known as Shaykh, is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

† The autograph copy has هرون (Hārūn) while the Cairo edition 1948 has زهرون (Zahrūn).—Ed.

‡ Two names of Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Karāyā have been omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

§ In original it is in Greek letters.

twenty treatises were composed by him on different branches of science, and the work of Euclid, which had been translated into Arabic by Ḥunayn Ibn Ishāq al-'Ibādī, received from him a better order, its difficulties were removed, and its obscurities cleared up. He attained by his talents an eminent rank among his contemporaries; but having, in his intercourse with the persons of his sect<sup>1</sup>, advanced principles which they considered heterodox, he was cited by them before the chief of their religion, who condemned his doctrines and forbid him to enter the church. On this, he renounced his opinions and returned to his sect; but relapsing, some time after, into his former doctrines, he was excluded from the congregation. In consequence of this, he retired from Ḥarrān and settled at Kafratūthā, where he continued to reside, and where he met with Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā<sup>2</sup>, who was on his return to Baghdād from the country of the Greeks. Muḥammad, struck with his talent and the elegance of his language, took him to Baghdād and lodged him in his own house; he then presented him to the khalif<sup>3</sup> who placed him among his astronomers. Thābit then settled at Baghdād, and his children and their posterity have continued to inhabit it to the present day.—Kafratūthā is a town situated in Mesopotamia near Dārā.—Thābit Ibn Qurrah was born A. H. 221 (A. D. 836), and died on Thursday, 26 Ṣafar, 288 (February, A. D. 901).* He belonged to the sect of the Ṣabeans, and had a son named Ibrāhīm, who equalled him in merit, and was one of the greatest physicians of his time. The poet Sarī al-Raffā having been cured of an illness by Ibrāhīm, composed in his honour the following lines, which are the best ever made on the subject of medicine:

“Who is there, after God, to heal the sick—who suffices, if not Ibn Qurrah? Philosophy was dead, and he revived it among us; the traces of medicine were effaced, and he restored them to

1 He belonged to the sect of the Sabeans.

2 The life of Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā is given in this work. See also Abulfeda Annales, tom. II, p. 241.

3 According to al-Zawzanī, it was the khalif al-Mu'taqid to whom Thābit Ibn Qurrah was presented by Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā.

*19 February.—Ed.

light. He is like Jesus, the son of Mary, who by a simple word bestowed life. I presented him a phial,<sup>1</sup> and he saw therein that which was concealed between my ribs and my heart. The hidden malady appeared to him as plainly as pebbles at the bottom of a clear pond."

By the same on the same:

"Ibrāhīm, by his surpassing knowledge, obtained the title of the heir of science. He brought to light the path of medicine, the traces of which had long been effaced among mankind. From the penetration of his mind, you would think that he passed between the blood and the flesh (to discover diseases so well). When the soul quarrels with the body, he effects a reconciliation."

Abu'l-Ḥasan Thābit Ibn Sanān was grandson of Thābit Ibn Qurrah. He also was a Sabean, and inhabited Baghdād during the government of Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh. This learned and skilful physician taught the works of Hippocrates and Galen; he shewed great penetration in discovering the sense of obscure passages, and he trod in the footsteps of his grandfather, cultivating, like him, medicine, philosophy, geometry, and the exact sciences <sup>2</sup> of the ancients. He wrote a very good work on history.<sup>3</sup> Some say

1 Literally: My urinal.—Notwithstanding Ibn Khālikān's admiration of these strange verses, I must say that even in the original language they are very poor, and offer no excuse for a profane comparison and a gross idea.

2 The exact sciences (which were comprehended under the term of Quadrivium by the schoolmen of the middle ages), are, according to Hājji Khālifah, geometry, astronomy, arithmetic and music.

3 "Thābit Ibn Sanān Ibn Thābit Ibn Qurrah lived in the days of (the khalif) al-Muṭi' Lillāh, and under the government of al-Aqṭa' Ahmad Ibn Buwayh (see his life, No. 71). Before that, he was attached to the service of (the khalif) al-Rāḍi, and held a great eminence by his knowledge of medicine; he was learned in its fundamental principles, highly skilful in resolving the difficulties (met with) in the books (of the Greeks which treat on that science), and was charged with the direction of the hospital at Baghdād. The eloquent kātib Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassan Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi was his sister's son. This Thābit composed the celebrated history which surpasses in extent all other works of the kind. It begins shortly after the year of the Hijrah 290, and proceeds to A. H. 363, in which year the author died. His nephew Hilāl (Ibn) al-Muḥassan Ibn Ibrāhīm continued it, and were it not for them, much of the history of that period had remained unthat the first piece of verse given above was composed by al-Sarī on him.—Ḥarrārī means belonging to Ḥarrān, a well-known city in Mesopotamia: al-Ṭabarī says in his History that it was built by Ḥārān, uncle of the patriarch Abraham whose name it bore; and (Continued from page 71)

(Continued on page 72)

known. If you want a good series of historical works, take that of al-Ṭabarī, which extends from the creation to the year 309 (of the Hijrah); and you would do well to join with it the works of Aḥmad Ibn Abī Ṭāhir and that of his son 'Ubayd Allāh (see the end of this note), for they have given a perfect account of the Abbaside dynasty, and have furnished details not to be found in al-Ṭabarī; the works of these three finish nearly at the same epoch, but al-Ṭabarī's goes on a little farther than the others. After these, comes the work of Thābit, for it commences some years before the period to which al-Ṭabarī's history reaches, and it proceeds to the year 363. If you join to that, al-Farghānī's continuation of al-Ṭabarī, you will do well, for it is fuller, in some places, than the work of Thābit. Then comes the work of Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassan Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi, which commences where his uncle Thābit's history ends, and proceeds to the year 447: none of his contemporaries have undertaken, like him, to judge events and discover the secrets of dynasties; this he learned from his grandfather, who, being secretary of the chancery-office (see note on chancery No. 14), was acquainted with what occurred: he also was in the chancery-office, and the facts which came to his knowledge there, served to form his historical compilation. Then follows the work to his son Ghārs al-Ni'mah Muḥammad Ibn Hilāl, which is very good till it approaches the year 470, but is of inferior merit قصر from that period to the end; the reason of which God only knows. This history is then taken up by (Muḥammad) Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadānī, who brings it down to the year 512; it is also continued by Ibn al-Rāghūnī, الراغوني, (see at the end of this note,) to the year 527; he gives, however, but an unsatisfactory account of that period, as history was not his profession. After him, 'Afīf al-Dīn Ṣadaqah al-Ḥaddād continues the history beyond the year 570; Ibn al-Jawzī brings it down to 580, and it is continued by Ibn al-Qādisī, ابن القادسي, to the year 616.—Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassan says: On the eve of Wednesday, 11 Dhu'l-Qa'dah, 365 (July, A.D. 976*) died Abu 'l-Ḥasan Thābit Ibn Sunān Ibn Thābit Ibn Qurrah, the historian." (Tawārīkh al-Fukamā, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, Supplement, No. 105, p. 94.)

The work from which this extract is taken was composed by Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Khaṭībī al-Zawzani الخطيبي الزوزني in the year of the Hijrah, 647 (A. D. 1249). It contains, in alphabetical order, the lives of those Greeks, Syrians, Arabs, Indians, and Hebrews, who were eminent for their knowledge in medicine, that this name was in Arabic converted into Ḥarrān.<sup>1</sup> Ḥārān was the father of Sārah, wife of Abrahām; one of Abrahām's brothers was also called Ḥārān; this was the father of Lot. Al-Jawhārī says in his Lexicon, the Ṣiḥāḥ, that from Ḥarrān, the name of a town, is derived the relative adjective Ḥarrānī, which is a word of irregular formation and that the vulgar form Ḥarrānī is regular.

* 12 July. —Ed.

(Continued on page 73)

<sup>1</sup> Ḥarrān, in Arabic is written with a hard ḥ, and Hārān with a soft.

(Continued from page 72)

astronomy, and mathematics. A copy of it is in the library at the Escorial, and is noticed by Casiri in his Bibliotheca Arabica, under the number 1773. He has also published some extracts from it in his first volume, page 402 et seq. This work has furnished Abu 'l-Faraj, in his History of Dynasties, with most of the literary information there given, and though some glaring faults occur in it, its utility to the student cannot be contested. It contains some long passages translated from Plato and Aristotle. The Manuscript of the Bibliothèque du Roi was copied, as it appears by a note at the end, in A. D. 1770, after a MS. belonging to Doctor Russel, the author of the description of Aleppo. This circumstance is mentioned in the appendix to the second volume of Dr. Russell's work, where he says: "Having accidentally heard, at Aleppo, of a manuscript of this work, I with some difficulty obtained permission to have a copy taken; but I was not aware of its value till two years after, when the French consul, in consequence of letters from Paris, requested the favour that I would allow a copy to be made from my manuscript for the king's library." It did not, however, reach the Bib. du Roi till A. D. 1784, when it was left to it as a legacy, with five other manuscripts, by M. Legrand, secrétaire-interprete du Roi. It has there remained unnoticed, till lately, when it attracted my attention.

Abu 'l-Faql Ahmad Ibn Abi Tahir Tayfūr was son of a Khōrasānī slave in the service of the Abbāsīd khalīf "من ابناء خراسان من اولاد الدولة". He was born at Baghdād, A. H. 204 (A. D. 819-20), and commenced his career as a low schoolmaster and kātib. He then rose to considerable eminence تخصّص and opened a shop in the book-bazaar on the west side of the Tigris.

جلس في سوق الوراقين في الجانب الشرقي.

He compiled upwards of fifty works on different subjects, the titles of which are given in the Fihrest. Died A. H. 280 (A. D. 893). His son Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Ubayd Allāh trod in his footsteps as a compiler, author, and transmitter of ancient narrations. He wrote a continuation of his father's History of Baghdād; taking it up at the end of the khalīfat of al-Muhtadī, and adding to it the lives of al-Mu'tamid, al-Mu'ta'īd, al-Muktafi, and al-Muqtadir.—(Kitāb al-Fihrest, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 874, fol. 197).

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Rāghūnī a native of Baghdād and chief doctor (Shaykh) of the Hanbalites, died A. H. 527 (A. D. 1132-3). He taught the Traditions and the seven readings of the Qur'ān, was versed in theology and the doctrines of his sect, and composed some works by which he gained reputation.—(al-Yāfi'i).

126. DHUL-NŪN AL-MIṢRĪ

Abī 'l-Fayḍ Thawbān Ibn Ibrāhīm (or al-Fayḍ) Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Miṣrī (native of Egypt), and surnamed Dhu 'l-Nūn<sup>1</sup>, was a celebrated saint and one of the men of the path.<sup>2</sup> He was the first person of the age for his learning,<sup>3</sup> devotion, communion with the divinity,<sup>4</sup> and acquaintance with literature, and is mentioned as one of those who taught from memory the Muwaṭṭā of the imām Mālik.<sup>5</sup> Ibn Yānus says in his History, that he was acquainted with philosophy and spoken with elegance. His father, who was a native of Nābiyah, or Ikhmīm (in Upper Egypt), was a slave enfranchised and adopted by the tribe of Quraysh. Dhu 'l-Nūn said, on being asked why he had renounced the world: "I went forth from Miṣr, journeying to a certain village, and I fell asleep in one of the deserts on the way. And my eye was opened, and lo! a little bird,<sup>6</sup> still blind, fell from its nest to the ground. Then the ground split open and two trays came forth, one of gold and the other of silver; in one was sesame, and in the other water: and the bird ate of that and drank of this. 'That,' said I, 'is a sufficient warning for me; I renounce the world!' And I then did not quit the door (of divine mercy) until I was let in."—Having been denounced by his enemies to al-Mutawakkil, he was cited from Egypt to appear before him; on entering into his presence, he addressed a pious exhortation to the khaliḥ, who shed tears and dismissed him honourably. (After this interview.) whenever men of piety were spoken of before al-Mutawakkil, he would weep and say:

1 Dhu 'l-Nūn, or he of the fish, is a surname given by the Muslims to the prophet Jonas.

2 See note on طريق, No. 111.

3 Jurisprudence is probably meant here.

4 See the note on the signification of the word ḥāl حال, No. 85.

5 In the early ages of Islamism, many authors composed works, but did not put them in writing; those works they taught from memory to their disciples, who either wrote them down or transmitted them orally.—The Muwaṭṭā, or beaten path, is a celebrated treatise on jurisprudence.

6 A little Bird; قنبره qunburah, which, according to Dr. Russell in his History of Aleppo, is the Arabic name of the crested lark. Larks, however, build on the ground, not on trees, so some other species must be meant here.

"Speaking of pious men, let me have Dhū'l-Nūn." - Dhū'l-Nūn was lean-bodied; of a sanguine complexion,<sup>1</sup> and had not a gray hair in his beard. His master in the path of devotion was Shuqrān al-Ābid (the devout)<sup>2</sup>. One of his sayings was: "When hearts hold converse, the members of the body are in repose<sup>3</sup>." "It was related by Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Sarakhsī at Makkah, that he saw Dhū'l-Nūn dragged, handcuffed and fettered, to the Maṭbaq.<sup>4</sup> whilst the people were weeping around him, and that he heard him say: "This is one of the gifts and favours of God: all He does is sweet, right, good." He then recited these lines:

"For thee (my beloved!) is a reserved place in my heart; I despise all blame cast on me for loving thee. For thy sake, I strive to fall thy victim: to support thy absence is (a task) not possible."<sup>5</sup>

* [In a compilation containing some particulars concerning Dhū'l-Nūn, I found the following passage: "A dervish, who was one of his disciples, quitted him in Egypt and went to Baghdād. He there attended a religious concert,<sup>5</sup> and when the brethren were excited and fell into ecstasy, he stood up and whirled about and hearkened (to the music): he then uttered a loud cry and fell, and on being shaken by those present, he was found dead. News of this having reached Dhū'l-Nūn, he said to his disciples: 'Get ready,

1 Literally: Redness prevailed in him which may also mean that his body was reddish or copper coloured.

2 "Shuqrān al-Ābid was Dhū'l-Nūn's master, but I do not know the year of his death; his tomb is near that of his disciple."—(Qāhir Shāh, in his Universal History: MS. No. 615, fol. 152).

3 This means that the service of the tongue is not required to express the thoughts of the mind, neither are signs necessary for the purpose, when two hearts are in sympathetic communion.

4 See No. 9.

5 The mystic import of these lines is manifest; the beloved is here the Divinity;

6 Literally: a hearing; which is something similar to the *dhikr*s so well described by Mr. Lane in his Modern Egyptians. Consult also D'Ohsson's Tab. Gen. t. iv, p. 656, M. de Sacy says, in the Notices et Extraits, t. XII, p. 369, that the سماع or hearing, which he translates by concert, means the dances of turning dervishes.

* [ ] From 'In a compilation' to 'I Shawwāl A.H. 581' not in the autograph. —Ed.

that we may walk to Baghdād.' So when they had finished their preparations, they set out for Baghdād, and the Shaykh said, the moment he arrived: 'Bring me that musician.' "When the musician was brought before him, and questioned about the dervish, he related the event. On this the Shaykh said: 'Blessed (is he)! Then he and his band of disciples commenced singing, and as they began, the Shaykh uttered a loud cry at that musician, who fell dead. 'A slain for a slain', said the Shaykh: 'we have taken vengeance for our companion's death. He then prepared to depart and go back to Egypt; and he stopped not at Baghdād, but returned immediately.'" A circumstance (similar to this) occurred in my time, and may be fitly related in this place. There was with us at Arbela a musician renowned for his skill and talent, whose name was Shujā' al-Dīn Jibril Ibn al-Awānī. Some time before the year 620 (A. D. 1223) he went to a religious concert. (I was then a boy, but I remember the circumstance well;1 my family and other persons having spoken of it at the time;) and he there sung the high sounding and beautiful qaṣidah composed by the grandson of Ibn al-Ta'āwidhī (whose life will be found in the letter M), and which begins thus:

"May a spring-tide shower descend upon thee by night, and may no evil eyes charm the clouds which come to shed their rain upon thee in the mornings."

He then came to these verses:

"The willow of the sands, in the tribe's reserved grounds, (was once) my heart's desire2 but now the sands move me not, neither does the willow. And how can the lover obtain his heart's desire when the cottage weeps (in its desolation) and friends are departed3. It was they who animated the dwellings4 but the mansions are dead when deprived of inhabitants. O, how many maids5 were in thee, sweet region! by whom my heart was dazzled! how many nymphs

1 Ibn Khalikān was not then twelve years of age.

2 The willow means the maid with a slender and pliant waist.

3 See note on fatiguing journey, No. 16.

4 Literally: They were the thoughts (or minds) of the dwellings.

5 Literally: Moons.

whose blandishments awoke my love!! O, what a night! when the wine received (new) lustre from the (bright) hand of the cupbearer, who sung in joy and lightness of heart. She was free from cares<sup>2</sup>, but the ring of metal which adorned her ankles was tight; her heart was void (of love) and mine was full. The cool source of her lips inflames with love, and her languishing glances awake desire. If she be filled with the sap of youth, my heart thirsts after the nectar of her lips. Her eyes and swords bear a relation to each other, and for this reason scabbards are called Ajfan (eyelids)."

When Shujā' al-Dīn came to this verse, one of the audience rose up and requested him to repeat it, which he did twice or thrice, during which that person was ravished in ecstasy, and then uttered a loud cry and fell on the ground. The people thought him in a swoon, but finding that his senses continued suspended, they examined him and perceived that he was dead. Shujā' related that the same thing occurred once before at one of his concerts. The poem from which these verses are taken is splendid and of considerable length; it was recited in honour of the K̲halīf al-Nāṣir li Dīn Allāh on the Festival of the Breaking of the Fast (i Shawwāl) A. H. 581].—The merits of Dhu 'l-Nūn were great in number; he died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 245 (February. A. D. 860), or according to others. A. H. 246 or 248, in Miṣr; and was interred in the lesser qarāfah <sup>3</sup>. A chapel has been built over his tomb, and in this chapel are the graves of a number of other holy men: I have visited it more than once.

---

<sup>1</sup> This verse runs literally thus: How often have moons in thy sky (or region) dazzled my heart, and how many gazelles in thee have blandished me!

<sup>2</sup> Literally: Loose from care, but in her anklets tightness. See. Mr. Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. II, p. 364.

<sup>3</sup> See note on Qārāfah, No. 24

127. JARİR THE POET

Abū Ḥazrah Jarir Ibn 'Aṭīyah Ibn Ḥudhayfah* (surnamed al-Ḳhaṭafāh) Ibn Badr Ibn Salamah Ibn 'Awf Ibn Kulayb Ibn Yarbū' Ibn Ḥanzalah Ibn Mālik Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Tamīm Ibn Murr al-Tamīmī (descended from Tamīm) was one of the greatest and most celebrated Muslim poets. He was in the habit of making satires on al-Farazdaq who retorted in the same manner, and they composed parodies on each other's poems. Most critics consider him as an abler poet than al-Farazdaq, and learned men agree unanimously that, among the poets of Islamic times, there were none equal to these three: Jarir, al-Farazdaq, and al-Akḥṭal.<sup>1</sup> It is said that verses are of four kinds: boasting laudatory, satirical, and amatory<sup>2</sup> and that Jarir excelled in them all, since he was author of these passages, which are specimens of each style: e.g.—(Boasting).

"When the tribe of Tamīm are wroth against you it seems to you as if all mankind were in anger."<sup>3</sup>

(Laudatory.)†

"Are you not the best of those who ever rode on camels, and the most liberal of men."<sup>4</sup>

(Satirical) †

"Cast down thy eyes (with shame), for thou belongest to the tribe of Numayr! You have not even attained the rank of Ka'b or of Kilāb!"

(Amatory)†

"Eyes, of which the glance were full of languor<sup>4</sup>, slew us but revived not our slain. These maids strike the man of courage prostrate and motionless, and yet they are the feeblest of God's creation."

<sup>1</sup> The lives of these three poets, translated from the Kitāb al-Aḡl ānī, have been given by M. Caussin de Perceval in the Journal Asiatique for the year 1834.

<sup>2</sup> It would seem that descriptive and didactic poetry were not acknowledged as forming particular classes, yet many examples are to be found, especially of the former kind.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: The most liberal of creatures as to the palms of the hand.

<sup>4</sup> See No. 11, note on sickly eyes.

*M. de Slane reads it Ḳḥudayfah.—Ed.

†The words "Boasting," "Laudatory," "Satirical" and "Amatory" are omitted in translation.—Ed.

Abu 'Ubaydah Ma'mar relates this anecdote: "Jarir and al-Farazdaq rode forth on the same camel to visit (the Khalif) Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who was then at Ruṣāfah.<sup>1</sup> Jarir having got down on a certain occasion, the camel turned its head round, on which al-Farazdaq struck it and said:

"Why dost thou turn when I am on thee, and am going towards the noblest of men? On thy arrival at Ruṣāfah, thou shalt repose from the toils of the journey and the bleeding wounds (caused by the friction of the saddle).

He then said to himself: 'When Jarir comes up and hears me recite these lines, he will say:

'She bears a blacksmith's son, and therefore turns to look after the bellows and the dull-edged hatchet. But on arriving at Ruṣāfah, she will meet with the (rough) treatment which her rider has experienced every year at the assemblies of Arabs'.<sup>2</sup>

Jarir, on coming up, saw al-Farazdaq laugh, and said to him: 'What makes you laugh, Abū Fārās?<sup>3</sup> Al-Farazdaq then recited to him the first lines, and Jarir answered with the last. On this, al-Farazdaq, said; 'By Allāh! I have just pronounced the same lines'; and Jarir replied: 'Do you not know that it is the same demon which inspires us both'<sup>4</sup>—Al-Mubarrad relates, in his Kāmil that the following verse of Jarir's was recited to al-Farazdaq:

"You will see the leprosy on her body (shine) like the hoary beard of al-Farazdaq<sup>5</sup>";

---

<sup>1</sup> The town of al-Ruṣāfah lay opposite to al-Raqqah, at one day's journey west of the Euphrates, Abu 'l-Fidā places it in lat. 36° N. It was called also the Ruṣāfah of Hishām, after its founder Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who made it his summer residence and retired there to avoid the plague, which desolated Syria.—(Marāṣid.)

<sup>2</sup> There were five places in Arabia at which annual fairs were held, and to which the poets resorted previously to the introduction of Islamism. See my Diwān d'Amro 'l-Qais, preface, page 8.

Kunyah or patronym is appropriate appellation.—Ed.

<sup>3</sup> Abū Fārās was al-Farazdaq's surname.

<sup>4</sup> Literally; That our demon is one and the same.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: Videbis lepram in imis pudendis hujus (mulieris) similem esse barbae canescenti (greek) Farazdak.

And that the latter, on hearing the beginning of the verse clapped his hand to his chin, in expectation of what was to come after, in the second hemistich. —Abū 'Ubaydah relates also this anecdote: "Jarīr's mother, when in her pregnancy, dreamt that she was delivered of a rope made of black hair, and that it began to spring about and seize a great number of people successively by the neck, and strangle them. On this she awoke in affright, and having asked the interpretation of her dream, was told that she would bring forth a male child and a poet, full of acrimony and violence, who would be an affliction to men. It was for this reason that, on his birth, she named him Jarīr (halter)."—

* [Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahānī gives the life of Jarīr in the Kitāb al-Aghānī, and relates theret he following anecdote; "A man said to Jarīr; 'Who is the first poet of the age?' 'Rise up,' said Jarīr, 'and you shall learn. 'He then lead him by the hand to his father 'Aṭīyah, who had just seized and bound a she-goat and was sucking its teat. On being called forth by Jarīr he appeared in a squalid dress, with drops of the goat's milk trickling down his beard. 'Do you see that man?' said Jarīr—'Yes.'—'Do you know him?'—'No.'—'That is my father; and do you know why he was sucking the goat's teat?'—'No.'—It was because he was afraid, that (if he milked her) some one might hear the noise of the milk (falling into the pail), and ask him for some. Now the ablest poet is he who, in contests with eighty others, vaunted his descent from such a father and vanquished them all."—It is related, in the work entitled, al-Jalīs wa 'l-Anīs (the companion and friend)<sup>1</sup>, that one of Jarīr's descendants, named Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabīb Ibn 'Umārah Ibn 'Uqayl Ibn Bilāl Ibn Jarīr, was asked what deed his ancestor intended to commit when he pronounced this verse:

"Had I known that the day of their departure was the last day in which we were to meet, I had done what I did not do."

To this question Muḥammad answered: "He meant that he would have plucked out his eyes, to avoid witnessing the departure of his friends!"—It is related in the Āghānī that Mas'ūd Ibn Bishr asked Ibn Munādhir<sup>1</sup> when in Makkah, who was the first poet of the time, and received from him this answer: "He who is playful and serious at will; who in his playful style gives you hopes to attain his level, but rises beyond your reach when you essay; and in his serious mood aims at thoughts so lofty, that you must despair to rival him."—"Who is it?" said Mas'ūd.—"Jarīr," replied Ibn Munādhir; "he who in his sportive humour said:

<sup>1</sup> This work is not noticed by Ḥājjī Khalīfah.

*From "Abu 'l-Faraj" to "excuse for love" on page 84 not in the autograph.—Ed.

'The maidens, who in their morning departure bore my heart away, left me<sup>2</sup> however, an abundant source, which ceases not yet to flow from my eyes! They dried up their tears and said to me: "Think not that we resemble you in feeling the effects of love<sup>3</sup>!"'

And who, in a graver style, pronounced words like these:

'He who has refused every honourable quality to the tribe of Taghlib, has placed the khalifat and the gift of prophecy in ours! Muḍar is my father and the father of princes! Say, Taghlib, pur-

<sup>1</sup> Muḥammad Ibn Mounādhir (Quelques-uns disent Ibn Manādhir, le fils des Moundhir, alleguant que son pere, son aieul et son bisaieul se nommaient Moundhir, voy. le Camous,) poete de Basra, a compose en divers genres, mais surtout dans le genre satirique. Les ressentimens excites par ses satires le forcerent meme a quitter Basra. Il se retira alors a la Mekke. Il a fait des vers a la louange du calife Elmahdi, des Barmecides et de Haroun Arrachid. Haroun, apres avoir fait perir les Barmecides, partit pour le pelerinage de la Mekke, accompagne de son nouveau vezir Fadhl fils de Rabic. A l'arrivee du calife a la Mekke, Ibn Mounadhir alla se presenter devant lui et demanda la permission de lui reciter un panegyrique qu'il avait prepare. Fadhl dit a Haroun: "Cet homme a celebre les Barmecides, ordonnez-lui de vous reciter les vers qu'il a composés en "leur honneur." Haroun l'ordonna en effet, et apres avoir entendu cet eloge des Barmecides, il fit donner des soufflets au poete et le chassa de sa presence. Ibn Mounadhir mourut a la Mekke, sous le califat d'Al-mamoun, en l'annee 198. Il etait alors devenu aveugle.—(Aghānī, vol iv. fol. 76, 83, 85).—Quant a Massoud ben Bechr, il est cite quelquefois dans l'article d'Ibn Mounadhir comme ayant rapporte quelques anecdotes relatives a ce poete, mais je ne trouve point dans cet article la conversation dans laquelle il lui demande quel est le meilleur des poetes, etc. je ne sais pas non plus quelle etait sa qualite.—(A Caussin de Perceval.)

<sup>2</sup> The pronoun is here in the second person; but as the poet addresses himself, it is necessary to translate by the first in order to express the thought clearly. Arabic poetry abounds with that species of irregularity which European grammarians call enallage of person.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: What have you felt from love which we feel.—It is needless to observe that they also felt its effect, but dissembled their weakness, blind tribe! where have you a father like ours? Behold my cousin khalif in Damascus; if I chose, he would drive you to me as slaves'."

The narrator says that (the khalif) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, on hearing these verses, said: "What could induce Ibn al-Marāghah (Jarir) to go so far as to take me for his constable? Had he said: 'If he chose, he would drive you to me as slaves,' I should have done so."—These verses are an attack on the celebrated poet al-Akhṭal, who was of the tribe of Taghlib<sup>2</sup>; Jarir says in them, that the khalifat and the gift of prophecy were in his own family; for the reason that the tribe of Tamim, to which he belonged, was sprung from Muḍar, son of Nizār, son of Ma'add, son of 'Adnān, and 'Adnān was an ancestor of Muḥammad's; so that the Khal fat and the gift of prophecy might be considered as belonging to Muḍar, from whom also the tribe of Tamim was descended.—The word Khuzr (here translated by purblind) is the plural of akhzar, and is regularly formed like the other plural adjectives of the same class. Akhzar means narrow-eyed, and is an epithet given to the Persians; it is for this reason that Jarir employs it here, excluding thus the Taghlibites from the Arabic nation, and pretending that they were Persians; a most grievous insult to an Arab.—In saying, Behold my cousin a Khalif in Damascus, he means 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān the Umayyid, who was then living. 'Abd al-Malik calls Jarir Ibn al-Marāghah (son of the Marāghah), because al-Akhṭal had made a satire on him, and said that his mother was a marāghah<sup>3</sup> for men; God forgive us for saying such a thing! but the explanation of the anecdote required it.—Jarir once went into the presence of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, and recited him a qaṣīdah, beginning thus:

<sup>1</sup> The word ghurātī شرطی is here translated constable, to avoid a periphrase. It means a soldier of the police cavalry.

<sup>2</sup> Al-Akhṭal was a Christian; his tribe also professed the same faith, and it is for this reason that the Taghlibites, although an Arab tribe, are specially excepted, by law, from paying the zakāt, or tithe, of their cattle. But this was merely a nominal advantage, as they were bound to pay tribute like the Christian subjects in conquered countries.

<sup>3</sup> Marāghah is thus explained in Freytags Lexicon: Locus ubi se volutat jumentum. Asina qua admittit admissarios.

"(My companions said to me) have you recovered, or is your heart still troubled (since) the evening that your friends resolved to depart? Censorious females tell me that gray hairs cover my head; must gray hairs then prevent me from being gay? (My wife) Umm Khazrah* was (at length) consoled (and consented to my leaving her): "Go," said she, 'I foresee that your servants will have a flock of she-camels (the Kh ilif's gift) "to drive to the watering place.' My confidence is in God who has no partner in His power, and my hopes for success are placed in the Kh ilif. Thee (O prince) shall I thank, if thou restore to me my plumage, and cause the pinions of my wing to grow: are you not the best of those who ever rode on camels, and the most liberal of men?'

Jarīr said: "When I recited this poem to 'Abd ai-Malik and came to this verse, he sat up straight on his throne and exclaimed: 'Those who praise us must pronounce verses like that, or else be silent'. He then turned towards me and said: 'O Jarīr, dost thou think that one hundred camels from the flocks of the tribe of Kalb would suffice to quench the thirst of Umm Ḥazrah†?' To this I replied: 'Commander of the Faithful if they suffice not, may God never assuage her thirst!' He then ordered them to be given to me, all of them black-eyed!; and I said: 'Commander of the Faithful! we are all old men in our family, unable to go on foot 2, and camels are apt to stray; suppose that you made me a present of some slaves to keep them?' On this, he ordered me eight, and as he had some dishes of gold before him and a rod in his hand, I said, in pointing to one of them: 'Commander of the Faithful! and the milkpail?' On which he pushed it towards me with the rod, saying: 'Take it, and much good may it do thee 3!'" It is to this circumstance that Jarīr alludes in the following verse:

---

1 This was a proof of their good breed.

2 More literally: And none of us can do without his riding-camel.

3 Literally: May it do thee no good. It very frequently happens in Arabic that good wishes are expressed under the form of imprecations, as in this case.

*In the new Egyptian (1948) edition it is Ḥazrah and M. de Slane also gives the same reading a few lines below.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives Khazrah above.—Ed.

"They gave a hunaydah, which was tended by eight; their gifts are not granted with ill-will, neither are they excessive."

The word hunaydah, which has the form of a diminutive noun, is a proper name serving to designate one hundred,<sup>1</sup> and most of the learned in philology do not allow it to take the definite article; so me, however, permit it, and the celebrated poet of Aleppo, Abu 'l-Faḥ Ibn Abi Ḥusayn al-Sulamī has said in one of his qaṣīdahs:

"O, my heart! the half of al-Hunaydah (i. e. fifty years) has left you no excuse for love"<sup>2</sup>.

When Jarīr learned the death of al-Farazdaq, he wept and said: "By Allāh! I well know that I shall survive him but for a short time; we were born under the same constellation, and each of us was taken up with the other; and it rarely happens that a rival or a friend dies without being followed by him whose rival or friend he was!" And this was in fact the case, as he and al-Farazdaq died in the year 110 (A. C. 728-9); see the life of (Hammām Ibn Ghālib) al-Farazdaq, where some particulars of Jarīr's death are related. Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī places the death of Jarīr in A. H. 111; and Ibn Qutaybah states, in his Kitāb al-Ma'arīf, that Jarīr's mother bore him in her womb seven months. He died in al-Yamāmah<sup>3</sup>, aged upwards of eighty years.

128. THE IMĀM JA'FAR AL-ŠĀDIQ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Ja'far al-Šādiq Ibn Muḥammad al-Bāqir Ibn 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib was one of the twelve persons who, according to the religious doctrines of the Shi'ites, are considered as imāms. This illustrious descendant of Muḥammad was surnamed al-Ṣādiq<sup>1</sup> for his veracity, and his merits are too well known to be mentioned here. He composed a discourse (or treatise) on alchemy, augury and omens, and the ṣūfī Abū Mūsā Jābir Ibn Ḥayyān of Ṭarsūs<sup>2</sup> compiled a work of two thousand pages, in which he inserted the problems of his master Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, which formed five hundred treatises. Ja'far was born A. H. 80 (A. C. 699), (which year is denominated the year of the Torrent<sup>3</sup>): but according to another statement, his birth happened before the daybreak of Tuesday 8 Ramaḍān, A. H. 83.* He died in the month of Ṣhawwāl, A. H. 148 (A. C. 765) and was buried in the cemetery of al-Baqī' at Mādīnah. The same tomb contains the bodies of his father Muḥammad al-Bāqir, his grandfather 'Alī Zayn al-'Abidīn, and his grandfather's uncle, al-Ḥasan son of 'Alī: how rich a tomb in generosity and nobility! His mother 'Umm Farwah, was daughter of al-Qasim, son of Muḥammad, son of (the Khalīf) Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq.—The lives of the twelve imāms shall be given in their respective places.—It is related by Kuṣḥājīm<sup>4</sup> in his Kitāb al-Maṣāyid wa 'l-Maṣā'irid that Ja'far once asked Abū Ḥanīfah his opinion respecting a pilgrim wearing the iḥrām who

<sup>1</sup> It is thus that an Arabic grammarian would say of the English words a dozen and a score, that they are the proper names of twelve and twenty.

<sup>2</sup> More literally: For attachment to the person whose face is shaded by the 'idhār.—See Introduction.

<sup>3</sup> Al-Yhmāmah; a country and town lying to the east of Makkah, at four days' journey from al-Qaṭīf on the Persian Gulf.—(Abu 'l-Fidā.)

---

<sup>1</sup> Al-Ṣādiq; the veracious.

<sup>2</sup> Jābir Ibn Ḥayyān is the name of the celebrated alchemist whom Europeans call Geber. Casiri gives some account of him, after the Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā, in the Bibliotheca Arabica; vide tom. I, p. 423.

<sup>3</sup> In the eightieth year of the Hijrah a torrent overwhelmed a number of persons at Makkah. It was for this reason that the above year was called the year of the impetuous torrent (al-Sayl al-Juhf).—(Ibn Ṣhākīr's 'Uyūn al-Tawārīkh.)

<sup>4</sup> Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Maḥmūd ibn al-Ḥusayn, surnamed Kuṣḥājīm, was a celebrated poet and philologist, contemporary with al-Mutanabbī. He is author of the following works: Adab al-Nadīm (the necessary qualities for a boon-companion); Al-Maṣāyid wa 'l-Maṣā'irid (snares and game), which appears to be a collection of sporting anecdotes; a Collection of Epistles, and a Diwān of poems. He died some time after A. H. 350 (A. C. 961).—(Fihrist; al-Dhahabī's Tārīkh al-Islām, MS No. 646, fol. 296, V).

*5 October, A. C. 702, but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Thursday. 'Asqalānī places his birth in A. H. 80/699 A. C.—Ed.

broke the canine teeth of a gazelle<sup>1</sup>; to which Abū Ḥanīfah answered: "Son of the Prophet of God! I know not what to say on the subject." On this, Ja'far said; "You, who are a man of quick mind do not know that gazelles have no canine teeth, but only incisors."<sup>2</sup>

129. JA'FAR THE BARMAKIDE

Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn *([Abū 'Alī]Yaḥy Ibn Khālīd †[Ibn Barmāk Ibn Jāmās Ibn Yaṣḥtāsf] al-Barmak was wazīr to Hārūn al-Raṣīd. †[In the high rank which he attained and the great power which he wielded, in loftiness of spirit and in the esteem and favour shown him by the khalīf, he stood without a rival. His disposition was generous, his looks encouraging, his demeanour kind; but his liberality and munificence, the richness and the prodigality of his donations, are too well known to require mention. He expressed his thoughts with great elegance, and was remarkable for his eloquence and command of language; it is stated that one night, he wrote, under the inspection of Hārūn al-Raṣīd, upwards of one thousand decisions on as many memorials which had been presented to the khalīf, and that not one of these decisions deviated in the least from what was warranted by the law. He had been instructed in jurisprudence by the qāḍī Abū Yūsuf the Ḥanefite, under whose tuition he had been placed by his father Yaḥyā. Ibn al-Qādisi relates, in his History of wazīrs, that Ja'far said to a person who asked his excuse for some fault: "By the pardon which we have already granted to you, God has dispensed you from the necessity of making any excuses to us; and our friendship for you is too great to permit that we should entertain an unfavourable opinion of your character."—A written complaint having been presented to him against one of the public <sup>1</sup> The person who is making the pilgrimage to Makkah is not allowed to hunt, fowl, or fish, as long as he wears the Ibrām, or pilgrim's dress. The laws on this subject may be seen in D. Ohsson's Empire Ottoman, tom. III.

<sup>2</sup> Camels have incisors, canine teeth, and molars, but most of the other ruminating quadrupeds have incisors and molars only. This peculiarity did not escape the notice of the nomadic Arabs, but was not generally known to towns' people.

* { } This name is omitted by M. de Slane.—Ed.

† { } These two names are omitted in the autograph.—Ed.

‡ { } From "In the high" to "his own folly." on page 87 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

men under his orders, he wrote the following note on the back of the document and sent it to him: "Those who complain of you are numerous, and those who praise you are few; be just, or resign."—The following example is related of his penetration: Having learned that al-Rashīd was much depressed in consequence of a Jewish astrologer having predicted to him that he should die within a year, he rode off to the Khalif and found him deeply afflicted: the Jew had been detained as a prisoner by the Khalif's orders, and Ja'far addressed him in these terms: "You pretend that the Khalif is to die in the space of so many days?"—"Yes," said the Jew.—"And how long are you yourself to live?" said Ja'far.—"So many years," replied the other, mentioning a great number. Ja'far then said to the Khalif: "Put him to death, and you will be thus assured that he is equally mistaken respecting the length of your life and that of his own." This advice was followed by the Khalif, who then thanked Ja'far for having dispelled his sadness. The Jew's body was exposed on a gibbet, and on this occasion the poet Aṣḥja' al-Sulamī pronounced the following lines :

"Ask the horseman who is perched on the trunk of that palm-tree, if a favourable constellation ever appeared for such a rider? Were it possible that the stars could teach the hour of death, he had known the fate which awaited his own silly head. He announced to us the imām's<sup>1</sup> death; such a prediction he must have learned from the sons of Khusroes and Caesar (the enemies of Islamism). Ah, worst of diviners! you foretell the ill fortune of others, while your own constellation plainly foreboded evil!"

The astrologer thus lost his life through his own folly.]—The generous character of Ja'far and the abundance of his donations are well known: it is related that when he made the pilgrimage to Makkah, he passed through al-'Aqīq,<sup>2</sup> which had greatly suffered that year from drought, and was met by a woman belonging to the tribe of Kilāb, who recited to him these lines :

---

<sup>1</sup> The khalif was the spiritual chief or imām of the Muslims.

<sup>2</sup> This place lies near Madinah.

"I passed through al-'Aqlq. and found its inhabitants complaining that the showers of spring had fallen but scantily. But now, that Ja'far is their neighbour, a spring without rain cannot injure them."<sup>1</sup>

On hearing this, Ja'far made her a rich present.—The idea expressed in the last verse is taken from a piece of poetry by al-Ḍaḥḥāk Ibn 'Uqayl al-Khafāji, in which he says :

"Had we Samrā this year for neighbour, we should not (though drought afflicts us) mind the absence of spring-tide rains."

How well the poet has turned that verse, and how sweet the parenthesis though drought afflicts us! This parenthesis is an example of what the rhetoricians call Hashw al-Lawziyya<sup>2</sup> *[(Hilāl) Ibn al-Ṣābi gives the following anecdote, in his Kitāb al-Amāthil wa'l-A'yān, on the authority of Ishāq (Ibn) al-Nadīm al-Mawṣili, who had learned it from Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī: "Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā was one day in a private apartment of his house with his boon companions, and I was one of the number; he had put on a silk dress and anointed himself with perfumes, and he made us do the same; he gave also orders not to admit any person except the intendant of his demesnes, 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Baḥrān, but the chamberlain heard the words 'Abd al-Malik only. Now it happened that 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṣāliḥ, the Hashimite<sup>3</sup> rode to Ja'far's house, knowing that he was at home, and the chamberlain sent in to say that 'Abd al-Malik was come, on which Ja'far said, 'Let him enter;' thinking that it was Ibn Baḥrān. Judge then of our consternation at the sight of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṣāliḥ in his black dress<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For he will shower down on them the rain of his generosity.

<sup>2</sup> These words mean, the pulp or stuffing of almond comfits.—I have not been able to find this term in the Calcutta edition of the Mukhtaṣir, or abridged treatise on rhetoric, by al-Taftāzāni.

<sup>3</sup> The Hashimites were all members of the khalif's family, being descended, like him, from Hāshim Ibn 'Abd Manāf.

<sup>4</sup> All the members of the Abbaside family and the chief officers of their empire wore black.

[ ] From "(Hilāl) Ibn al-Ṣābi" to "tear it in pieces" on page 98 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

and a ruṣṣīyah<sup>1</sup> on his head! Ja'far himself changed colour. Ibn Ṣāliḥ never drank nabīdh<sup>2</sup>, and had even refused to do so, though invited by the K̲h̲alīf; but on seeing Ja'far's perplexity, he called his page, to whom he gave his black robe and qalansuah, and then advanced to the door of the apartment where we were, and after saluting us, said: 'Allow me to be a partaker in your pleasures, and treat me as one of yourselves.' Having then received a silk dress from a servant, he asked for something to eat, and when he had done, he called for nabīdh and drank off a pint of it<sup>3</sup>. He then said to Ja'far: 'By Allāh! I never drank it till to-day, so I request your indulgence.' On this Ja'far ordered a pitcher of nabīdh to be set before him, so that he might take what quantity he pleased. 'Abd al-Malik then anointed himself with perfumes, and joining in our conviviality, he proved himself a most agreeable companion. The further he went on, the more Ja'far's mind was set at ease, and he said to his guest when about to retire: 'Inform me of your business, for I cannot make a sufficient acknowledgement for your courtesy.'—'You must know then,' said 'Abd al-Malik, 'that the Commander of the Faithful is ill-disposed towards me, and I wish you to remove that un-favourable feeling from his mind, and aid me to regain his good opinion.' To this Ja'far answered: 'The Commander of the Faithful shall take you into favour, and his prepossessions against you shall cease'. 'And I am also in debt,' said 'Abd al-Malik, 'to the amount of four millions of dirhams.'<sup>4</sup>—'Your debts shall be paid,' said Ja'far; 'the money is ready, but it will be more honourable for you to receive it from the k̲h̲alīf himself, and it will serve as a public token of his good feeling towards you.'—'I should like also,'

<sup>1</sup> The ruṣṣīyah was a sort of cap the precise form of which is not now known. A little farther on, this species of cap is called a qalansuah, which name is now given to the coif worn by Christian priests in that country.

<sup>2</sup> Nabīdh is a fermented liquor made of dates, but in many cases, this term is employed to denote wine made of grapes.—Ibn k̲h̲aldūn is of opinion that in the present case the date-liquor is meant.—(See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. I, p. 380).

<sup>3</sup> A pint, in Arabic رطل (raṭl); which word our principal orientalists, with the exception of M. de Hammer, pronounce incorrectly roil.

<sup>4</sup> About ninety thousand pounds sterling.

said the other, 'to raise my son Ibrāhīm to an elevated rank, by obtaining for him a princess of the khalif's family in marriage'.—'The Commander of the Faithful,' answered Ja'far, 'shall give his daughter al-'Āliyah to him as a wife'—'And I should wish,' said 'Abd al-Malik, 'as a public mark of my son's elevation, that a standard be borne over his head.'<sup>1</sup> 'The Commander of the Faithful,' replied Ja'far, 'shall give him the government of Egypt.'<sup>2</sup> 'Abd al-Malik then

<sup>1</sup> Governors of provinces were entitled to have a standard borne before them.

<sup>2</sup> This is certainly a mistake; it was Ibrāhīm, brother of this 'Abd al-Malik who was named governor of Egypt.—As these two persons filled places of the highest importance under the Abbaside khalifs, I shall here give some account of them.

'Abd al-Malik Ibn Sālīh was descended from Hāshim, grandfather of Muḥammad, and was consequently related to al-Rashid. The following genealogy will render the degree of their relationship more appreciable :

The mother of 'Abd al-Malik was a concubine of Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, the last Umayyid khalif, and on the death of her master, she was bought by Sālīh, to whom she bore a son named 'Abd al-Malik, the subject of this notice. Some even say that 'Abd al-Malik was son to Marwān, for according to them his mother was pregnant when she came into the possession of Sālīh. In A. H. 173 (A. C. 789-90), 'Abd al-Malik commanded the Ṣayfiyah or annual summer excursion made into the territory of the Greeks; in 175 (A.C. 791-2) he defeated the Greeks and returned with seven thousand heads of enemies slain in battle. In 177 (A. C. 793-4) he was appointed governor of Damascus by al-Rashid, and in 178 he was named governor of Egypt, but did not proceed to that country. In 187 (A. C. 803), he was accused by his own son, 'Abd al-Rahmān, of aspiring to the khalifat, and was arrested by order of al-Rashid, who only spared his life from the reluctance he felt to shed the blood of a Hāshimite. 'Abd al-Malik was then kept in confinement by his orders; it was only on the accession of the khalif Amin that he was restored to liberty. He received the government of Syria from this prince, and died in 193 (A. C. 808-9), a short time before his protector lost his life.—(Ibn al-Athīr's Kāmil. Abu 'l-Mahāsīn's al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah. Al-Magrizi's Khitāṭ.)

(Contd. on page. 91.)

withdrew, and we were in great astonishment at Ja'far's answers, and his boldness in taking engagements of such a nature without the authorisation of the khalif. The next morning we rode to the court of al-Raṣhīd, where we awaited the return of Ja'far, who went in to the khalif's apartment. Almost immediately on his entrance, the qāḍī Abū Yūsuf was called in along with Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan<sup>1</sup> and Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd al-Malik; and a moment had scarcely elapsed when Ibrāhīm came forth decked in a robe of honour, with a standard borne before him: he had also been betrothed to al-'Āliyah, who was then brought to him in state, and carried, with the money (which Ja'far had promised), to 'Abd al-Malik's house. Ja'far then came out and ordered us to follow him home, where he said to us: 'I suppose that your minds are so taken up with 'Abd al-Malik's affair, that you would like to know the result?'—Our reply was: 'That is precisely what we desire'; and Ja'far made us the following narration: 'I stood in the presence of the Commander of the Faithful, and informed him of 'Abd al-Malik's conduct from the beginning to the end, and the khalif exclaimed, "Excellent! excellent! And what did you do for him?" I here informed him of the promise which I had made him; and the khalif approved of it and confirmed it. You saw the result. (In relating this anecdote,) Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī said: 'By Allāh! I know not

---

I Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan was a jurisconsult of the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah. His life will be found in this work.

(Contd. from page 90.)

His brother Ibrāhīm Ibn Ṣāliḥ was appointed governor of Egypt by the khalif al-Mahdī in A. H. 165 (A. C. 781-2). Under his administration, a member of the Omayyide family, Dihyah Ibn al-Mu'aṣṣab, وحيه ابن المعصب Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān, revolted in Upper Egypt and had himself proclaimed khalif. Ibrāhīm was extremely remiss in taking measures to suppress this insurrection, and he even seemed to take no notice of it. Al-Mahdī was so highly displeased at this conduct that he deprived him of his place in A. H. 167, and fined him in a sum of fifty thousand dīnārs (twenty-five thousand pounds sterling); but he afterwards took him into favour and gave him another government. The khalif al-Raṣhīd re-appointed him to the province of Egypt in A. H. 176 (A. C. 792), and he died there in less than three months after his nomination.—(Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn's Nuḡūm.)

which (of the three) to admire most. 'Abd al-Malik's drinking nabīdh and putting on attire different from what he usually wore; he who was a serious man, scrupulously devout, full of gravity and sedateness; or the liberty which Ja'far took with al-Raṣhīd; or the confirmation given by al-Raṣhīd to the promises made by Ja'far'.<sup>1</sup> It is related that one day, at Ja'far's, a beetle flew towards Abū 'Ubayd, the Ṭhaqifite, and that Ja'far ordered it to be driven away, when Abū 'Ubayd said: "Let it alone; it may perhaps bring me good luck; such is at least the vulgar opinion." Ja'far on this ordered one thousand dīnārs to be given him, saying; "The vulgar opinion is confirmed." The beetle was then set at liberty, but it flew towards Abū 'Ubayd a second time, and Ja'far ordered him another present to the same amount.—The following anecdote is given by Ibn al-Qādisi,<sup>1</sup> in his History of Wazīrs: "A slave girl, who was just sold to Ja'far for forty thousand dīnārs, said to her former owner: 'Remember the promise which you made me, never to sell me even from necessity'<sup>2</sup>; * She then wept, and he exclaimed, 'Bear witness that I set her free and take her for my wife.' Ja'far (on hearing this) gave the money to her owner, without accepting any thing in return."—Many are the examples related of his generosity; he was also the most eloquent person of his family. The first of the Barmakides who acted as wazīr was Khālīd Ibn Barmak, who was raised to the wazīrāt by (the Khālīf) al-Saffāḥ after the assassination of Ḥafṣ al-Khallāl; (this circumstance is related in the life of Ḥafṣ). Khālīd continued in the wazīrāt till the death of al-Saffāḥ, which event took place on Monday, 13 of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 136 (June A. C. 754)†; and was confirmed in his post the same day, by the new Khālīf, al-Manṣūr, brother to al-Saffāḥ. One year and some months after this, he was removed through the intrigues

<sup>1</sup> This is probably the same historian mentioned in the note, No. 125.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: Not to eat the price obtained for me.

* M. de Slane has erred in this rendering, it should be Her master, then wept and explained.—Ed.

† "in the letter Ḥ" is omitted in translation.—Ed.

‡ Sunday 13 Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah corresponding to 9 June.—Ed.

of Abū Ayyūb al-Mūriyānī, who had gained great influence over the mind of al-Manṣūr, and represented to him that the Kurds had taken possession of Fārs, and that Khālīd was the most proper person to arrest their progress. Khālīd was therefore sent off to that country, and, in his absence, Abū Ayyūb got all the authority into his hands. Ibn al-Qādisī says that Khālīd died A. H. 163 (A. C. 779-80), but Ibn 'Asākir states, in his History of Damascus, that he was born A. H. 90 (A. C. 709), and died A. H. 165 (A. C. 781-2): God knows best!—Ja'far had taken a solid hold on the predilections of al-Raṣhīd, who yielded to his influence and granted him his friendship; the degree of favour which he attained was unexampled, so much so that the khālīf caused a robe to be made with two separate collars, which he and Ja'far wore at the same time. Al-Raṣhīd could not suffer being deprived of Ja'far's company, neither could he bear being separated from his own sister al-'Abbāsah, daughter of al-Mahdī, whom he loved with an extreme affection; his pleasure was never complete in the absence of one or the other; he therefore said to Ja'far: "My pleasure is never complete except when you and al-'Abbāsah are with me; I shall therefore marry you together, in order that you may legally keep company with her; but beware that you meet her and I not present!" Ja'far accepted this condition and married her; but at last the favourable feelings of al-Raṣhīd towards him and the Barmakides underwent a total change; he reduced that family to ruin, put Ja'far to death, threw his brother al-Faḍl and his father Yaḥyā into prison, and there left them to die (as will be mentioned in their respective articles). Historians disagree respecting the motives which turned al-Raṣhīd against them; some go so far as to say that when Ja'far and al-'Abbāsah were married on the condition above-mentioned, and had continued for a time to observe it, she conceived a passion for her husband, who refused however, through fear, to accede to her desires; she then had recourse to a stratagem, and sent to 'Attābah Ja'far's mother, requesting to be offered to him as a slave, (for Ja'far's mother made him a present every Friday of a young virgin, with whom he passed the night, having previously taken some nabidh). This proposal having been rejected, al-'Abbāsah said to 'Attābah: "If you do not consent to what I desire, I shall tell my brother that you asked me to act so and so; whereas, if I bear a son to Ja'far, it will be a source of honour to your family; and what could my brother do, were he to discover the circumstance?" Ja'far's mother was induced by this to accede to al-'Abbāsah's request, and she began by promising to her son that she would give him a fair slave whom she then had in her possession, and whom she described as possessing great beauty. Ja'far asked her, time after time, to fulfil her promise, and she, on perceiving that his desires were at length excited to possess the slave, told al-'Abbāsah to hold herself in readiness, and that night she introduced her into Ja'far's chamber. Her countenance was not known to Ja'far, as he had never met her but in the Khālīf's presence and did not then dare to cast his eyes on her. When they had been some time together, she said to him: "What think you of the stratagems practised by princesses?"—"What princess are you?" said Ja'far.—"I am thy sovereign mistress," she replied; "I am al-'Abbāsah!" Immediately the fumes of the nabīdh were dispelled from his head, and he sought his mother, to whom he said: "Mother, you have brought me to ruin!"<sup>1</sup> The pregnancy of al-'Abbāsah was the result of this interview, and she gave birth to a son, whom, to avoid discovery, she sent off to Makkah under the care of a slave called Rayyāsh, and a nurse whose name was Barraḥ. At that time Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd, was inspector of al-Raṣḥīd's palace and ḥarem, the doors of which he used to lock and then retire with the keys. The strict confinement in which he kept the females of the ḥarem induced at length Zubaydah to make complaints of him to (her husband) al-Raṣḥīd, who said to him: "Father,"—for so he used to call him—"Father, why does Zubaydah complain of you?"—"Commander of the faithful," said Yaḥyā, "can you suspect me of dishonouring your Ḥarem?"—"No"; answered the Khālīf.—"Then," replied Yaḥyā, "hearken not to what she says of me." After this, Yaḥyā acted towards her with such increased rudeness and severity, that she complained again to al-Raṣḥīd, who said to her: "I cannot harbour any suspicion against Yaḥyā relative to my ḥarem."—"Why then," replied she,

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: You have sold me for a vile price.

"did he not prevent his son from acting as he has done?"—"What has he done?" said he. She then informed him of al-'Abbāh's adventure. "Is there any proof of this?" said al-Raṣḥīd.—"What stronger proof than the child?" "Where is it?"—"It was here, but fearing a discovery, she sent it to Makkah"—"Does any other but yourself know this?"—"There is not a slave-girl in the palace but knows it." Al-Raṣḥīd then spoke no more to her on the subject, but manifested later his intention of making the pilgrimage to Makkah. When he set out with Ja'far for that place, al-'Abbāh wrote to the slave and the nurse, directing them to retire into Yam n with the child. Al-Raṣḥīd, on arriving at Makkah, commissioned a person of confidence to investigate the circumstance, and it was discovered that the child really existed<sup>1</sup>. From that time, the K̲halīf nourished in his bosom evil intentions against the Barmakides.—Ibn Badrūn speaks of Ja'far in his commentary on the elegiac poem composed by Ibn 'Abdūn on the fall of the Banu 'l-Aṣṭas<sup>2</sup> this qaṣīdah commences thus:

"After (inflicting) the reality (of misfortune), time torments (us) still with the traces (of it); why then weep for shadows and (unreal) images?"

And the mention of Ja'far occurs in the commentary on the following verse of the poem;

"(Fortune) made Ja'far to taste of death by the sword,<sup>3</sup> whilst Faḍl and the venerable Yaḥyā looked on."

---

<sup>1</sup> The Banū Muhannah, an Arabian tribe, settled in North Africa, pretended that they drew their descent from this boy, whom they called Samī' مع —(Ibn K̲haldūn's Hist. of the Mustajamite Arabs).

<sup>2</sup> The dynasty of the Banu 'l-Aṣṭas reigned for some time at Badajoz in Spain, but was overthrown by the al-Murābiṭs under the command of Yūsuf Ibn Tāḥīfīn in A. H. 486 (A. C. 1093).—The poem of Ibn 'Abdūn with the commentary of Ibn Badrūn will be published under the direction of Professor Weyers of Leyden.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: It choked Ja'far in making him swallow the saliva of the cutting steel.

In the following verses, Abū Nuwās alludes to the circumstance mentioned by Ibn Badrūn:

"Say to the trusty servant of God, the offspring of princes and able rulers: 'When you wish to make a traitor lose his head, slay him not with the sword, but marry him to 'Abbāsah'."

According to another statement, (a descendant of 'Alī), Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>1</sup>, who had revolted against al-Raṣḥīd, was given by him in charge to Ja'far who kept him prisoner in his house. This Yaḥyā, having asked to see Ja'far, said to him: "Fear God, O Ja'far! in your conduct towards me, and avoid the risk of having my ancestor, the prophet Muḥammad, for an adversary (on the day of judgment); for I solemnly aver that I never excited a revolt." Ja'far was touched with this appeal, and replied: "Go to what country you list." "I fear," said Yaḥyā, "lest I be arrested and brought back." Ja'far therefore sent with him a person who conducted him to a place of safety. When the news of this reached al-Raṣḥīd, he called Ja'far into his presence, and after a long conversation, addressed him thus: "O Ja'far! what is Yaḥyā doing?" To which Ja'far answered: "He is still as he was."—"Swear by my life that it is so" said the Khalīf; but Ja'far, after some moments of silence and hesitation, said: "No! I swear by your life that I have set him free; for I knew that no evil was in him."—"It was well done," said the Khalīf; "you have not acted contrary to my intentions." When Ja'far withdrew, al-Raṣḥīd followed him with his eyes and said: "May God slay me if I slay thee not!"—It is said that Sa'īd Ibn Sūlim was asked what was the crime of the Barmakides which had merited the wrath of al-Raṣḥīd, and that he answered: "Of a verity! they committed nothing to warrant al-Raṣḥīd's conduct towards them; but the day (of their prosperity and power) had been long, and that which continues long becomes irksome. There were persons, and those among the best of men, who were fatigued with the length of the Khalīf 'Umar's reign, although the like of it was never seen for justice, security, wealth, and victories; they also

<sup>1</sup> See Abulfedac Annales, t. II, pp. 60, 80; and M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 4 of the Arabic text.

* The name of 'Abd Allāh's father is omitted by de Slane. It should be al-Ḥusayn and according to another version al-Ḥāsan.—Ed.

bore with impatience the sway of 'Uthmān; and both were murdered. Besides, al-Rashīd saw that generosity had become their habitude; that the public were loud in their praise and that men's hopes were fixed on them and not on him. Less than this suffices to excite the jealousy of princes; so al-Rashīd conceived ill-will against them, wreaked his vengeance on them, and tried to find out faults (with which he might reproach them). Besides this, a certain degree of presumption was sometimes visible in the conduct of Ja'far and al-Faḍl (although Yaḥyā was exempt from it; for he had more solid experience than the others and better skill in affairs). This induced some of their enemies, as al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' and others, to have recourse to al-Rashīd, from whom they concealed the good done by the Barmakides, and only told him of their faults; (they persevered in this) till they brought about what took place. After this, when any persons spoke ill of the Barmakides in al-Rashīd's presence, he would say:

"Perdition to your father!<sup>1</sup> blame them less, or fill the void which they have left."

It is also stated that the ruin of the Barmakides was caused by a memorial which was presented to al-Rashīd by an unknown individual, and which contained the following lines :

"Say to God's trusty servant upon earth, him who has power to loose and to bind: Behold, the son of Yaḥyā has become a sovereign like yourself; there is no difference between you! Your orders must yield to his, and his orders dare not be resisted. He has built a palace, of which the like was never erected by the Persian or the Indian (king). Pearls and rubies form its pavement, and the floor is of amber and aloes-wood. We fear that he will inherit the empire, when you are hidden in the tomb. It is only the insolent slave who rivals his master in splendour."

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: No fathers to your fathers.

On reading this paper, al-Rashīd conceived a secret hatred for Ja'far.—Ibn Badrūn relates that 'Ulayyah, daughter of al-Mahdī,<sup>1</sup> said to al-Rashīd, after the fall of the Barmakides: "My lord, I have not seen you enjoy a day of perfect happiness since you put Ja'far to death. Why did you do so?" To this al-Rashīd replied: "My dear life! if I thought that even my inmost garment knew the reason I should tear it in pieces."—Ja'far was executed by al-Rashīd's orders at a place called al-'Umr, in the province of al-Anbār, on Sunday 30 Muḥarram (or on the first of Šafar), A. H. 187,* (end of January, A. C. 803)†.—Al-Ṭabarī says in his History: "In the year

---

<sup>1</sup> 'Ulayyah, daughter of the khalīf al-Mahdī, was born A. H. 160 (A. C. 776-7). Her mother Maknūnahh (مَكْنُونَه) was a slave girl possessing every perfection of mind and person, who had been bought by al-Mahdī for one-hundred thousand dinārs (upwards of fifty thousand pounds sterling). By her charms she gained al-Mahdī's affections to such a degree that his wife al-Khayzurān could not repress her jealousy. 'Ulayyah also was extremely beautiful, but her forehead was rather high; to conceal this defect, she wore a fillet or diadem set with precious stones. She had an exquisite taste for music, and in that art she surpassed her half-brother Ibrāhīm, whose talent was so eminent. The airs and verses of her composition excited the utmost admiration, and are mentioned with high eulogium by Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣpahānī, who has inserted a portion of them in his Kitāb al-Aghānī. It was only during those periods of delicate health in which females are not allowed by the Muslim law to fulfil the duty of prayer (see D'Ossons Empire Ottoman, t. II, p. 39), that she indulged her passion for music and conviviality; but on her convalescence, poetry and song were discontinued, and she abstained from nabīḡh (see note 2, p. 89) her occupation was then to read the Qur'ān and other books. She used to write poetical epistles to her friends and to a slave of al-Rashīd's, named Tall (طَلّ dew). Some of these pieces were set by her to music and are still preserved; they are short, but inspire an ardent passion. Her brother al-Rashīd disapproved of her familiarity with Tall, but afterwards gave him to her and authorised her to do with him as she pleased. Another slave called Rashā (رَشَى) was also honoured by her affection and celebrated in her verses. Her death took place A. H. 210 (A. C. 825-6): she was then wife to Mūsā موسى كانت تحت موسى Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, a member of the imperial family.—(From the Kitāb al-Aghānī, which contains a long notice on 'Ulayyah, interspersed with many curious anecdotes.)

* Saturday, 28 January, A. D. 803.—Ed.

† [ ] From "Al-Ṭabarī says" to "Our fortune has passed away" on page 104 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

186, al-Rashīd made the pilgrimage with the Barmakides, and arrived at Hīrah from Makkah in the month of Muḥarram, 187: he stopped at the palace of 'Awn al-'Ibādī for some days, and having then embarked, he descended the river to al-'Umr near al-Anbār. On the eve of Sunday*, last of Muḥarram, he sent the eunuch Abū Hāshim Masrūr with Abū 'Ismah Ḥammād Ibn Sālīm and a troop of soliders to guard the issues of Ja'far's house, and Masrūr went in and found him engaged in a party of pleasure with Ibn Bakhtayshū' the physician<sup>1</sup> and Abū Zakkār al-Kalwādānī<sup>2</sup> the blind musician. Masrūr dragged him out violently and led him to al-Rashīd's mansion, where he imprisoned him and shackled him with an ass's fetters. He then informed al-Rashīd of his arrival, and was ordered by him to behead him."—Al-Ṭabarī then gives in full the history of Ja'far.—Al-Wāqidī says: "Al-Rashīd stopped at al-'Umr, near al-Anbār, on his return from Makkah in the year 187; he then wreaked his vengeance on the Barmakides and slew Ja'far on the first of Ṣafar; his body he ordered to be gibbeted on one side of the bridge of Baghdād, and the head he caused to be stuck up on the other."—Another historian states that Ja'far's body was gibbeted on the bridge

---

<sup>1</sup> This was Gabriel Ibn Bakhtayshū'. See also the Chrestomathie, tom. I, page 53, and Russell's Aleppo, vol. II, appendix, p. v. A long account of his life may be found in the Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā.

<sup>2</sup> Abou Zakkār l'aveugle était un chanteur de Bagdad attaché à la famille des Barmekides, qui faisaient grand cas de lui et le comblaient de biens. Il était auprès de Djafar et lui chantait des vers exprimant la pensée que la menace de la mort est incessamment suspendue sur l'homme, lorsque Mesrouf entra chargé des ordres du calife Haroun et fit trancher la tête à Djafar. Abou Zakkār demanda avec instance qu'on lui donnât la mort à lui-même; Djafar, disait-il, a été mon bienfaiteur, il me serait trop dur de lui survivre. Mesrouf répondit qu'il allait consulter à cet égard la volonté de Haroun. Il porta au calife la tête de Djafar et lui répéta ce qu'Abou Zakkār avait dit. Cet aveugle, dit Haroun, mérite qu'on se l'attache; informe-toi du traitement qu'il recevra de Djafar; je veux qu'on lui en alloue un semblable.—(Aghānī, tom. IV, fol. 98 — Communicated by M. Causin de Perceval. Kalwādānī means native of Kalrādā, a town at two parasangs distance from Baghdād.—(Abu 'l-Fidā's Geography, p. 303).

* Saturday is correct word.—Ed.

opposite to al-Šarāt<sup>1</sup>.—Al-Sindī Ibn Shāhik<sup>2</sup> relates as follows: "I was one night asleep in the upper room of the guard-house, which is on the western side (of the Tigris), and I saw in a dream Ja'far, who stood before me in a robe dyed with saffron, and recited these verses<sup>3</sup>:

'('Tis now) as if not a soul had ever lived between al-Ḥajūn and al-Šafā<sup>4</sup>. As if there had never been one friend in Makkah to hold evening converse with another! For we were its inhabitants, but we perished by the vicissitudes of time and the precariousness of fortune. 5'

On this I awoke in terror, and related my vision to one of my friends, who answered: 'They are confused dreams<sup>6</sup> and it is not all which a man sees (in sleep) that will bear interpretation.' I then returned to my couch, but had scarcely closed my eyes when I heard the challenge of the sentries and the guard, and the ringing of the bridles of post-horses,<sup>7</sup> and a knocking at the door of my

<sup>1</sup> Al-Šarāt is the name of the canal on which Baghdād was built by al-Manšūr.—(See M. de Sacy's note in the first vol. of the Chrestomathie, p. 68.)

<sup>2</sup> It appears from the sequel, that al-Sindī Ibn Shāhik was al-Rashīd's Šāhib al-Shurṭah, or chief of the armed police. Ibn Shāhik was a native of India and an enfranchised slave of al-Manšūr. He filled a number of elevated posts under the Abbaside Khalifs: in the year 176 (A. C. 792), he was governor of Damascus; in 187, as appears by Ibn Khalikān's citation, he was Šāhib al-Shurṭah, and at another period he acted as qāḍī at Baghdād, where he died A. H. 204 (A. C. 819-20).—(Mir'āt al-Zamān, MS No. 640, fol. 41 verso.)

<sup>3</sup> These verses are taken from a well-known poem in which 'Āmir Ibn al-Ḥārith deplores the misfortune of his tribe, the Jurhamites, who had been guardians of the Ka'bah at Makkah, but were no longer in possession of that honourable office.—(See the Excerpta ex Abulfeda in the second edition of Pocock's Specimen Hist. Ar., page. 561; Fleisher's Annales Anteislamicae, (p. 192, and Schulten's Monumenta Vetustiora Ar., p. 1.)

<sup>4</sup> Ḥajūn and Šafā are hills near Makkah. For Šafā see Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, vol. I, p. 174.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: But we were destroyed by the vicissitudes of nights and stumbling fortunes.

<sup>6</sup> Qur'ān, sūrah., 12, ver. 44.

<sup>7</sup> It would appear from this that a number of small bells were fastened to the throat-band of the bridles, as with the post-horses on the continent.

chamber. I ordered it to be opened, and the eunuch Sallām al-Abrash (whom al-Rashīd never sent out but on important business,) came upstairs. I shuddered at his sight, and my joints trembled, for I imagined that he had got some orders concerning me; but he sat down by my side and handed me a letter, the seal of which I broke open, and lo! it contained these words: O Sindī! this letter is written with our own hand, and sealed with the seal-ring which we wear on our finger; it will be presented to you by Sallām al-Abrash; and as soon as you read it, even before you lay it out of your hand, go with Sallām to the house of Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd, (may God not protect him!) and having seized on him, put him in heavy irons and bear him to the prison in the city of al-Manṣūr<sup>1</sup>, which is called Ḥabs al-Zanādiqah<sup>2</sup> Order also your lieutenant Bādām Ibn ‘Abd Allāh to go to al-Faḍl’s, at the same time that you ride off to the house of his father Yaḥyā, before the news spread abroad: tell him to do with al-Faḍl what you are ordered to do with Yaḥyā, and let him take him to the same prison. On finishing with these two, send some of your men to seize on the children, brothers, and relations of Yaḥyā.<sup>3</sup>—Ibn Badrūn also relates the fall of the Barmakides with some additional circumstances which I am induced to give here in an abridged manner. After the passage relative to Ja’far which has been cited above,<sup>4</sup> he says: “Then (al-Rashīd) called al-Sindī Ibn Shāhik and ordered him to proceed to Baghdād and arrest secretly the Barmakides, their clerks and their relations, which was done. Al-Rashīd was then with Ja’far at al-‘Umr, near al-Anbār. Ja’far was in his lodgings at the time, and had called in Abū Zakkār and his slave girls; the curtains (of the apartment) were closed, and Abū Zakkār had sung to him this song :

<sup>1</sup> The city of al-Manṣūr; Baghdād, founded by that khalīf.

<sup>2</sup> Ḥabs al-Zanādiqah, the prison for Zindīqs, or atheists.—See D’Herbelot; ZEN DIK.

<sup>3</sup> The Manuscripts and the printed text have يحيى واولاده, but I read اولاد يحيى.*

<sup>4</sup> See above in this article.

*This is not in the autograph but the Cairo edition (1948) text corroborates M. de Slane’s reading.—Ed.

'What want they with us? They never cease to watch us! Their only thought is to detect (the joys) which we conceal.'

And al-Rashīd called his page Yāsir and said to him: 'I have chosen you for a business which I do not think fit to confide to any other <sup>2</sup>; justify then the opinion which I have of you, and beware resisting me, or you die'. —To this Yāsir answered: 'Were you to order me to kill myself, I would do it.'—'Go then,' said al-Rashīd, 'and bring me immediately the head of Ja'far Ibn Yahyū.' Yāsir was confounded, and gave no answer. 'Wretch!' exclaimed al-Rashīd, 'do you hesitate?'—'It is a serious business'; replied the other; 'would that I had died before this hour!'—'Execute my orders!' said the Khalif. Yāsir then went to Ja'far's, and found him in company with Abū Zakkār, who was singing these verses:

'Leave us not, for every man must meet death either in the night or in the day. Treasures, though well preserved, must one day be exhausted. Could you be preserved from the attacks of misfortune, I should give my own wealth and that of my father's to secure your safety.'

"(Yāsir then entered) and Ja'far said to him: 'I am happy to receive your visit, O Yāsir; but am displeased at your entering without permission.'—'My business,' said Yāsir, 'does not admit of ceremony'<sup>3</sup>. He then informed him of the orders which he had received from the Khalif. Ja'far, on this, kissed Yāsir's feet and said: 'Let me go in and make my will'—'As for going in,' answered Yāsir, 'it is impossible for me to grant it; but make your will if you please'—'You are under obligations to me,' said Ja'far, 'and you can repay them at the present moment only.'—'You will find me prompt to do any thing,' said Yāsir, 'except to disobey the Commander of the faithful.'—'Return then,' said Ja'far, 'and tell him that you have put me to death; if he express his regret, I shall owe you my life; and if not, you can fulfil your orders.'—'Impossible!' said Yāsir.—'Let me then go with you to his tent, that I may hear the answer which he makes you, and if he persist in willing my death, you can execute his commands.'—'To that I consent,' replied the other. He then entered the tent of al-Rashīd, who, on hearing the noise of his approach, said to him: 'Have you done it?'<sup>1</sup> Yāsir told him what Ja'far had said. 'Vile wretch!'<sup>2</sup> exclaimed the Khalif, 'if you answer me another word, I shall send you before him (to the next world.) Yāsir then retired, and having put Ja'far to death, he carried in his head and placed it before the Khalif. He looked at it for some time, and then ordered Yāsir to bring in two persons whom he named. When they came, he said to them: 'Strike off Yāsir's head, for I cannot bear the sight of Ja'far's murderer.'—In another part of the book, Ibn Badrūn relates this anecdote: During the pilgrimage, Ja'far had remarked al-Rashīd's estrangement, and on arriving at Hīrah, he rode out on business to a church, in which he found a stone with something written on it, which he did not understand. He sent for interpreters to have it explained, with the intention of drawing from it an omen relative to what he had to fear or hope from al-Rashīd. The inscription was read, and it ran thus:

<sup>1</sup> Literally: They sleep not off us; that is, their vigilance is never lulled so that their attention is drawn off us.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: For which I judge not fit either Muḥammad or 'Abd Allāh or al-Qasim.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: Is too grave for that.

'In the year that the family of Mundhīr<sup>3</sup> persihed, by the spot where the monk built the church, the hopes of the needy were fixed on them no longer and the criminal ceased to fear them. Their hair breathed the odour of musk and the perfume of ambergris, which caused the rose to frown (with jealousy). They became food for the worms of the earth; the patron had ceased to exist, and those also who sought his favour'.

<sup>1</sup> Literally: What is behind you? An expression frequently used in the sense of "What have you done?"

<sup>2</sup> Literally: Qusugens pudenda matris tuae! a foul imprecation, and very common in the mouths of the ancient Arabs. See another example in my Diwān d'Anro l'-Kais, page 20, note.

<sup>3</sup> A sketch of the history of this family will be found in Pocock's Specimen Hist. Ar.

Ja'far, on hearing this, was dejected and said: 'Our fortune has passed away!']—Al-Aṣma'i related this anecdote: "Al-Raṣhīd sent for me after he had put Ja'far to death, and on my arrival, he said: 'It is for some verses which I wish you to hear.' I answered: 'If it pleases the Commander of the faithful.' He then repeated to me these lines :

"Had Ja'far apprehended death, a bridled courser had saved him; and precaution against (the stroke of) fate had placed him in an asylum which even the eagle would despair to reach. But when his day was come, no horoscope could repel misfortune from him."

"I perceived that the verses were his own, and said: 'They are the best verses on the subject' and he said to me: 'Rejoin now your family, O Ibn Qurayb! if you like' "

*.It is stated that Ja'far, some days before his death intended to ride to al-Raṣhīd's, and called for an astrolabe that he might choose a (lucky) hour for the purpose]; he was then in his house situated on the Tigris, when a boat passed by with a man in it, who, although he did not see Ja'far or know what he was doing, recited this verse:

"In his ignorance he takes counsel of the stars, but the Lord of the stars does what He wills."

Ja'far, on this, threw down the astrolabe and rode out.—It is also related that on the morning after the night in which Ja'far was put to death, a bill was found posted on the door of 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn Māhān's palace at K̲h̲urāsān, containing the following lines written in a large hand :

"The unfortunate sons of Barmak have been overwhelmed by misfortune. Their fate is an example for us, and let him who inhabits this palace take warning".

---

1 This 'Alī Ibn 'Isā is spoken of in the lives of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn and al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī'.

*[ ] From "It is stated" to "bereft of its children" on page 106 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

When Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah heard the news of Ja'far's death and the misfortune of the Barmakides, he turned towards the qiblah<sup>1</sup> and said: "O my God! he relieved me from the wants of this world; relieve him from the pains of the next!"—On the death of Ja'far, a great number of elegies were composed on him by the poets, in which they deplored his loss and the misfortunes of his family; the following verses on the subject were composed by al-Raqāshī:<sup>2</sup>

"Those whose hearts were free from anguish such as mine, enjoyed quiet and repose; but sleep is not suited for my eyes. The passionate lover is wakeful, but it is not love which prevents my eyes from closing. Those sad events have awoken me; and when others yield to slumber, sleeplessness is mine. It was a heavy blow for me to lose those princely stars by whose generous showers we were watered when the skies withheld their rain. Let beneficence and the world now say adieu to the glory of the Barmakides! Before thy fall, O son of Yahyā! I never saw one sword cut by another.<sup>3</sup> By Allāh! were it not through fear of informers, and of the Khalīf's eye which sleepeth not, we should walk around thy gibbet (as round the ka'bah), and kiss it as men kiss the sacred stone."<sup>4</sup>

The same poet said, in a lament on the death of Ja'far and of his brother al-Faḍl:

<sup>1</sup> See No. 16, note on qiblah.

<sup>2</sup> The poet Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Faḍl Ibn 'Abd al-Ṣamad al-Raqāshī was born at Baṣrah, but settled at Baghdād, where he celebrated in his verses the praises of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd, al-Amin and the Barmakides: He and Abū Nuwās were constantly at enmity with each other, and his pretensions and pride exposed him to the attacks of all the other poets of the day. (The khaṭīb's Tārīkh Baghdād, No. 634, fol. 148:) The date of his death is not given.

<sup>3</sup> There is here a play upon words; سيف means a sword and metaphorically a prince.

<sup>4</sup> This is an allusion to the ceremony of the Tuwāf which consists in walking a certain number of times round the ka'bah, at Makkah, and kissing the black stone.—See Sale's introduction to the Qur'ān and Burckhard's Travels in Arabia, vol. I, p. 172.

"Behold how the cutting sword of the Barmakides has been broken by that of the Hashimites. Now that Fadl is dead, tell the camels that they may repose,<sup>1</sup> and tell misfortunes to come renewed each day."

Di'bil Ibn 'Alī al-K̲h̲uzā'i said, on the same subject :

"On seeing the sword fall upon Ja'far, and on hearing the K̲h̲alīf's herald cry vengeance on Yaḥyā, I wept for the world (of which they were the ornament), and I felt how true it was that the goal of human life is the quitting of the world."

And Šāliḥ Ibn Ṭarīf said of them :

"O for the sons of Barmak and the happy days (of their power)! with you the world was (brilliant as) a bride; but now it is widowed and bereft of its children .]

The apprehension of prolixity prevents me from giving numerous passages from the eulogistic poems and the elegies composed on the Barmakides;*[the present article has already attained a considerable length; but this, it is true, was rendered unavoidable by the necessity of stating, in a connected manner, the particulars of their rise and fall.] One of the most singular examples which history offers of the vicissitudes of fortune is thus related by Muḥammad Ibn †[G̲h̲assān Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥaṣḥimī, chief of the prayer at Kūfah<sup>2</sup> "On a certain day, which was the Festival of Sacrifices,<sup>3</sup> I went into my mother's, and found with her a woman of respectable mien, but dressed in shabby clothes. 'Do you know who this is?' said my mother.—'No', I replied.—'This' said she, 'is the mother of Ja'far the Barmakide.' On this I turned towards her and saluted her with respect; we then conversed together for some time after which I said:

<sup>1</sup> He means that there existed no longer a generous patron in the world; and that the camels which had borne him across the deserts to solicit Faḍl's bounty might now enjoy repose, as he should not require their services again.

<sup>2</sup> One of the privileges possessed by the governors of provinces was to preside at Friday prayers as the representative of the k̲h̲alīf, but this office was often filled by the qāḍī.

<sup>3</sup> The Festival of Sacrifices is held on the 10 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah. (It is an obvious mistake for Dhu 'l-Hijjah."—Ed.)

*[ ] From "the present article" to "rise and fall" is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

† "G̲h̲assān Ibn" is omitted in translation.—Ed.

'Madam! what is the strangest thing that you have seen?' To which she answered: 'There was a time when this anniversary found me with four hundred female slaves standing behind me to await my orders, and yet I thought that my son did not provide for me in a manner adequate to my rank; but now my only wish is to have two sheep-skins, one to serve me for a bed and the other for a covering.' 'I gave her,' said the narrator 'five hundred dirhams, and she nearly died from excess of joy. She afterwards continued to visit us till death placed a separation between us'—I found the word 'Umr, as here written, in a manuscript which had been read over and carefully corrected; Abū 'Ubayd al-Bakr<sup>2</sup> says, in his Mu'jam (or dictionary of proper names), that in the expression Qill'iyat al-'Umr (cell of an 'Umr), the word 'Umr means convent.

130. JA'FAR IBN AL-FURĀT, CALLED ALSO IBN ḤINZĀBAH

Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt, and generally known by the surname of Ibn Ḥināzbah, was wazīr to the Ikhshīd family in Egypt during the protectorship* of Kāfūr. When Kāfūr took the sovereign authority into his own hands, he served him in the same capacity, †[and he continued to act as wazīr and direct the administration of the Egyptian and Syrian provinces for Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd, on the death of Kāfūr. He then seized on a number of the great <sup>2</sup> Abū 'Ubayd 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Bakrī was a native of Cordova. Died A. H. 487. This is the author of the geographical work, a portion of which has been translated and published in the Notices et Extraits, tom. XII. For his life, see Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica, tom. II, p. 46; and for specimens of his poetry and the history of his ancestors and himself, see Ibn al-'Abbār's al-Hullat al-Siyarah, fol. 82 et seq. See also the translation of al-Maqqarī by Mr. Gayangos, vol. I, p. 312.

---

<sup>1</sup> To avoid confusion, the Arabic words Yā Umma (O mother!) are here rendered by madam.

* "Sovereignty" is proper word.—Ed.

† [ ] From "and he continued" to "A.H. 358, (A.C. 969)" on page 109 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

officers of the Empire and extorted sums of money from them: he arrested also Ya'qub Ibn Killis, who was (afterwards) wazir to al-'Aziz al-'Ubaydī, and forced from him a sum of four thousand five hundred dinārs. Ibn Killis was delivered out of his hands by the Sharif Muslim al-Ḥusaynī<sup>1</sup>, in whose house he lay concealed for a time, and then fled secretly to Maghrib. Ibn al-Furat was not, however, able to satisfy the exorbitant demands of the Kāfūrītes, the Ikḥshīdites<sup>2</sup>, the Turkish mercenaries, and the other troops, as the persons who had farmed out the different branches of the public revenue paid him nothing. His authority was shaken to such a degree, that he was twice obliged to conceal himself, whilst (a seditious multitude) pillaged his palace and the houses of some of his partisans. About this time Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭughj, prince of Ramlah<sup>3</sup> arrived at Miṣr, and, having arrested Ibn al-Furat, he caused him to be put to torture and inflicted on him a heavy fine. Al-Ḥusayn then appointed his own secretary al-Ḥasan Ibn Jbir al-Riyāḥī<sup>4</sup> to the place of wazir, but through the intercession

<sup>1</sup> The Sharif Abū Ja'far Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir al-Ḥusaynī (descended from al-Ḥusayn grandson of Muḥammad), surnamed also Muslim al-'Alawī (descendant of 'Alī) and Abū Ja'far al-'Alawī, was an amīr of eminent talents and merit; he acted a conspicuous part at the capture of Miṣr by the troops of the Fatimite Khaliḥ al-Mu'izz (see the life of the qā'id Jawhar), and was treated with great respect and favour by that prince. Al-Mu'izz having one day found in his palace, or on the pulpit of the mosque, a piece of verse inviting him to prove the genuineness of his descent from the Khaliḥ 'Alī by obtaining the consent of the Banū Ṭāhir, Muslim's family, to a matrimonial alliance with his own, he asked Muslim to give one of his daughters in marriage to his son al-'Aziz. Muslim refused on the plea that they were already betrothed to relatives of his own family. Al-Mu'izz was so highly displeased at the rejection of his offer, that he imprisoned Muslim and seized on his property. From that period Muslim was never seen again; some say that he was put to death by the orders of the Khaliḥ, and others state that he escaped from confinement, but perished in one of the deserts of Hījāz. His grandson al-Ḥasan became sultān of Makkah. (See 'Umdat al-Tālib', MS No. 636, fol. 206).

<sup>2</sup> The Kāfūrītes were mamlūks of Kāfūr, raised by him to places of high authority. The Ikḥshīdites were the manmlūks and partisans of the Ikḥshīdite family.

<sup>3</sup> Al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ṭughj had been elected regent by the troops, during the minority of his relation Abū 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ikḥshīd. The poet al-Mutanabbī composed some poems in his honour. See No. 49.

<sup>4</sup> In two manuscripts of Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn's History of Egypt, this name is written الزنجاني (al-Zinjānī).

*Abū Ja'far Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Sharif al-Ḥusaynī is the full name according to the autograph.—Ed.

of the sharīf Muslim, he set Ibn al-Furāt at liberty, and retired to Syria after entrusting him again with the government of Egypt. This happened at the beginning of the month of the latter Rabi', A. H. 358 (February, A. C. 969). (Ibn al-Furāt) was learned himself, and loved learning in others; * [he taught the Traditions on the authority of Muḥammad Ibn Hārūn al-Ḥadramī (native of Ḥaḍramawt) and the Traditionists of Baghdād his contemporaries; he transmitted them also as they had come down to him from Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id al-Burjumī, a native of Emessa, Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Kharā'iṭī al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Baṣṭām, al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad al-Dārakī and Muḥammad Ibn 'Umīrah Ibn Ḥamzah al-Iṣpahānī. He related having heard read a Majlis, or conference, composed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Baghawī<sup>2</sup> and that he did not possess a copy of it; "If any one brings it to me," said he, "I will make him a rich man." When wazīr of Egypt, he used to teach the Traditions by dictation,] and for that reason was visited by eminent persons from distant countries. The same motive induced the ḥāfiz Abu'l-Ḥasan al-Dāraquṭnī to make the journey from 'Irāq to Egypt; †[and as the wazīr had the intention of composing a Musnad<sup>3</sup> he continued with him till the work was finished.] Ibn al-Furāt wrote also a treatise on the proper and patronymic names of men<sup>4</sup>, and some other works. The khaṭīb Abū Zakariyā al-Tabrīzī mentions, in his commentary on the poems of al-Mutanabbī, that this poet,

<sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Kharā'iṭī, author of the Makārim al-Akhlaq and other works, died at Jaffa or 'Asqālān in A. H. 328 (A. C. 939-40).—(Al-Dhahabī's Tārīkh al-Islām; al-Yāfi').

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Baghawī was born at Baghdād, A. H. 214 (A. C. 829). He was a ḥāfiz of the highest reputation. Died A. H. 317 (A. C. 929). He composed a Mu'jam, or catalogue of the Companions of Muḥammad.—(Tārīkh al-Islām. Ḥājjī Khalīfah).

<sup>3</sup> Musnad; a collection of Traditions, each of them accompanied with the names of Traditionists by whom it had been handed down.

<sup>4</sup> A branch of the science of the Traditions treats of the Traditionists, their names, country, credibility, etc.

* [ ] From "he taught the" to "Traditions by dictation" is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

† [ ] From "and as the" to "was finished." is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

when he visited Egypt, celebrated the praises of Kāfūr and the wazīr Ibn al-Furāt in the qaṣīdah of which the verses rhyme in R, and which begins thus :

"Your love will appear whether you resist it or not."

He named it the Ja'fariyah (after Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt), having terminated one of the verses with the word Ja'far, and inserted the words Ibn al-Furāt in the following line :

"I should have made a bracelet for the arm of him who announced the news of Ibn al-Furāt's approach, and have rewarded the servant who shouted with joy."

As the wazīr did not satisfy his expectations, he abstained from reciting this poem to him; and on setting out for Arrajān with the intention of visiting 'Aḍad al-Dawlat, at whose court Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amīd, the wazīr of Rukn al-Dawlat, was then residing, he changed the address of the qaṣīdah, and converted it into a panegyric on Ibn al-'Amīd, whose name he inserted in place of Ibn al-Furāt's. He composed some other pieces in praise of Ibn al-'Amīd, but this is a splendid production. We shall insert here another observation made by the same khaṭīb, where he explains al-Mutanabbī's qaṣīdah rhyming in A, which contains the account of his journey to Kufah and the description of the places at which he stopped successively on the way; in this piece the poet attacks Kāfūr in these terms :

"What are the objects which raise the laughter of Egypt, laughter which nearly resembles weeping? There is a Nabatean from al-Sawād<sup>1</sup> who gives lessons on the genealogies of the desert tribes; <sup>2</sup> and a negro whose lip is half as large as himself, and whom they style the moon of darkness. When I praised that hippopotamus, my pieces were half poem, half incantation (to charm the brute); and it was not so much to praise him as to satirize the human race.<sup>3</sup>"

On this the khaṭīb observes, that by the Nabatean he meant Ibn al-Furāt, and by the negro Kāfūr; but, after all, such an attack does not detract from their merit, for the noblest characters have always been subject both to blame and praise.—The wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Maghribī says in his Adab al-Khawāṣṣ: “In a conversation with the wazīr Ibn al-Furāt, I quoted to him passages from the poems of al-Mutanabbī, and he betrayed, by the very excess of his approbation, his concealed (hatred) for the poet; he was afraid of appearing like one who was prevented by a feeling of private animosity from concurring with the public opinion (respecting al-Mutanabbī's eminent talent). He had been satirized by the poet, and that was the motive of his enmity towards him.”—The birth of Ibn al-Furāt took place on the 3 of Dhū 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 308 (April, A.C. 921)*; he died in Egypt on Sunday, 13 of Ṣafar (or of the first Rabī'), A. H. 391 (January, A. C. 1001).† Prayers were said over him by the qāḍī Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān<sup>1</sup>: and he was interred in the lesser Qarāfah, where this tomb is still conspicuous.—Thābit Ibn Qurrā says in his History<sup>2</sup> that Ḥinzābah was the name of his father's mother. This word, when used as an appellative noun, means a short and corpulent female.—The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir speaks of this wazīr in his History of Damascus, and mentions the following verses as composed by him :

<sup>1</sup> Al-Sawād; Babylonian 'Irāq.

<sup>2</sup> That is; he taught the history and genealogy of the ancient Traditionists.

<sup>3</sup> In praising Kāfūr he satirized all mankind, for so despicable a being as Kāfūr was among the best of them.

“He who humbleth his soul, preserveth it in repose, and passeth his night free from anguish. The storm, in its violence, throweth down only the loftiest trees.”

The same writer says: “He was very beneficent towards the inhabitants of Makkah and Madinah; he purchased a house in the latter city, close to the mosque, and separated by a wall only from the tomb of the Blessed Prophet. He directed, by his will, that he should be buried in this house, and he enjoined the sharīfs<sup>3</sup> to carry that into effect. When he died, his bier was borne from Egypt to

<sup>1</sup> Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān was grand Qāḍī of Egypt under the Fatimite l'khalīf al-Hākim, who put him to death, A. H. 395 (A. C. 1005). (Exposede “Histoire des Druzes, tom. I, pages 298, 308, 314, 316).

<sup>2</sup> See No. 125.

<sup>3</sup> A family of sharīfs, or descendants of Muḥammad, were then governors of Makkah and Madinah.

*15 April—Ed.

†Sunday fell on 13 Ṣafar corresponding to 12 January and on the 13 of First Rabī' it was Monday 10 February.—Ed.

those two cities, and (on its approach to Madinah), the sharifs went forth to meet it in acknowledgement of the benefits they had received. They bore the body to Makkah and made the pilgrimage with it, visiting the temple, walking round it, and stationing at Mount 'Arafāt. They then brought the corpse to Madinah and interred it in the house of which we have spoken." This is in contradiction with what I said above, and God best knows the truth! I shall only observe that the tomb of which I have spoken, I myself have seen in the Qarāfah, bearing the following inscription: "This is the tomb of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt." I have since found a note in the handwriting of Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Ṣūfī, in which it is stated that the wazīr was buried in the audience-hall of his great palace, and that the body was afterwards removed to Madinah.

131. IBN AL-SARRĀJ AL-QĀRĪ AL-BAGHDĀDĪ

Abū Muḥammad Ja'far Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far al-Sarrāj (the saddler), surnamed al-Qārī al-Baghdādī (the Qur'ān-reader of Baghdad), was the chief hāfiẓ and the most learned man of the age. He composed some admirable works, such as the Maṣāri'-al-'Ushshāy (Death places of Lovers). He taught the Traditions on the authority of Abū 'Alī Ibn al-Shādhān, Abū 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Shihīn<sup>2</sup> al-Khallāl<sup>3</sup>, al-Barmakī, al-Qazwīnī, Ibn Ghaylān<sup>4</sup> and others. His disciples were numerous, and among

1 In the Arabic text the word ابن (Ibn) has been unintentionally omitted.

2 The hāfiẓ Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar Ibn Aḥmad al-Baghdādī, surnamed Ibn Shādhān, composed a great number of works; al-Ḥusayn, son of the khalīf al-Muhtadī Billāh, states that they amounted to three hundred and thirty; among the number was a commentary on the Qur'ān in one thousand parts, or quires; a collection of authenticated Traditions still more voluminous; and a historical work in one hundred and fifty quires; this last is mentioned by Ḥajjī Khalīfah under the title of Kashf al-Mamālik (Flügel's edition, t. II, p. 148). Died A. H. 385 (A. C. 995-6).—(Al-Yāfi'i.)

3 The hāfiẓ Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad al-Khallāl was a preacher and traditionist of Baghdad. He wrote some works and taught the Traditions on the authority of the Ṣāhiḥs of Bukhārī and Muslim. Died A. H. 439 (A. C. 1047).—(Al-Yāfi'i.)

4 The hāfiẓ Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ghaylān died A. H. 440 (A. C. 1048-9).—(Abu 'l-Fidā.)

*The autograph and Cairo edition (1948) have the word ابن.

then was the Hāfiẓ al-Silafī, who was proud of citing the authority of such a master, although he himself had met and studied under the principal Traditionists of the time. Ibn al-Sarrāj has composed some good poetry, of which we may give the following specimen :

"The caravan departed, and, from affection towards them, my tears gushed forth. The voice of separation incited them to abandon the place of their dwelling, and they loaded their camels. Say to those travellers who have journeyed out of my sight, although they are lodged in my heart, that they spilt my blood on the morning of departure, although I committed no crime. What harm would it have done them, had they suffered me to quench my thirst for their society with repeated draughts?"

By the same (to his mistress):

"You promised to visit me every month; visit me now! the month is finished, visit me! The space which separates us extends from the river al-Mu'all to the town of Shahrūzūr. The months of your forced absence are a reality, but the month of our reunion is an illusion."<sup>1</sup>

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn gives the following lines, by the same author, in his Khariḍah :

"The hoary-headed pretender to youth dyes his beard with woad, to prevent it from giving him the lie."

Ibn al-Sarrāj was born towards the end of the year 417, or the beginning of 418 (February, A. C. 1027); the Sharīf Abu 'l-Ma'mar al-Mubārak Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Anṣarī says, in his Wafayāt al-Shuyakh (Obituary of the Shuykhs), that his birth took place at Baghdād, A. H. 416. He died at Baghdād on the eve of Sunday, 21 of Ṣafar, A. H. 500 (October, A. C. 1106), and was buried at the gate of Abrez.

---

<sup>1</sup> The original is remarkable for an ingenious play upon words, by which the poet is enabled to terminate each of the three verses with the syllables shahrūzurī. In the second line, however, he has committed a fault; for shahrūzurī, the name of the town, is in the accusative case, and should be pronounced Shahrūzūru.—(Al-Yafī'i).

* 21 October.—Ed.

132. ABU 'I-MA'SHAR AL-BALKHI

Abu 'I-Ma'shar<sup>1</sup> Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar al-Balkhī (native of Balkh), the celebrated astrologer, was the great master of his age in that art. He composed a number of instructive works on the science of the stars, such as the Mudkḥil (introduction), the Zayj (astronomical tables), the Ulūf (thousands)<sup>2</sup>, etc. He was singularly fortunate in his divinations. I have read in a collection of anecdotes, that he was in the service of a prince who wished to arrest one of the great officers of his kingdom, who had committed some crime and then concealed himself through fear of punishment. As this officer was aware that Abu 'I-Ma'shar would discover him by means of the operations which he employed for finding out treasures and things hidden, he thought of doing something to bewilder the astrologer and baffle his penetration; and he remained therefore some days seated on a golden mortar which he had placed in a vessel containing blood. The prince, being unable to discover him, notwithstanding the strictest perquisitions, sent for Abu 'I-Ma'shar and ordered him to employ his usual processes and find out in what place the officer was; the astrologer, after erecting a scheme by which he might make the discovery, remained for a time in silent amazement; and on the prince's asking him the cause, replied that what he saw was most extraordinary; the man whom they wished to discover was on a mountain of gold, which mountain was in a sea of blood. "And I know not," said the astrologer, "of any place in the world such as that." On this, the prince ordered him to observe anew the aspect of the heavens, and examine again by means of another scheme. The result was the same, and Abu 'I-Ma'shar declared that he had never met with the like before. The prince, having lost all hopes of discovering the offender by this means, declared by proclamation that he would pardon the man and the person who harboured him; and he gave public proofs of the sincerity of his intentions. The officer's apprehensions being thus allayed, he left his hiding-place and presented himself before the prince, who, on learning from him where and in what manner he had been concealed, was struck with admiration at the artifice he had employed and the skill of Abu 'l-Ma'shar in making the discovery.—Other anecdotes are related of his successful divinations. He died A. H. 272 (A.C. 885-6).—Balkhī means native of Balkh, a large city in K̲h̲ur s̲n̲, which was taken by al-Aḥnaf Ibn Qays al-Tamīmī in the kh̲alīfat of 'Uṭh̲mān. Al-Aḥnaf was proverbial for his prudence: his life shall be given in the letter Ḍad.—(See al-Ḍāḥ ḥāk.)

<sup>1</sup> This astrologer is better known in Europe by the corrupted name of Albumaser. Casiri has given the list of his works in the Bibliotheca Arabica, tom. I, p. 351, after the Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā. A number of his astrological works are to be found in the Bib. du Roi.

<sup>2</sup> See Casiri, page 851.

133. JA'FAR IBN ḤAMDĀN AL-ANDALUSI

Abū 'Alī Ja'far Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamdān al-Andalusī, prince of al-Masīlah and amīr of the province of al-Zāb in Ifrīqiyah, was a generous patron and friend to men of learning; a number of admirable poems, beautiful beyond description, were composed in his honour by Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Hānī. It was this poet who made the following verses in his praise :

"There are two things of which the languor is unequalled in the world; my body (consumed with love) and the dark enchanting<sup>1</sup> eyes (of my mistress). There are three brilliant luminaries—the sun, the bright moon, and Ja'far."

As for the long qaṣīdahs (which Ibn Hānī made on him, they are so generally known that) it is useless to give extracts. Al-Masīlah was founded by 'Alī father of Ja'far, and it is known to this day by the name of Masīlah banī Ḥamdān (the Masīlah of the Ḥamdān family). The hatred which subsisted between him and Zīr Ibn Manād, ancestor to al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, and their mutual contestations led to a war, and a terrible battle ensued in which Zīrī was slain. Bulukkīn, whose life has been already given (no. 116), succeeded his father Zīrī, and acquired such superiority that Ja'far, finding it impossible to resist him, abandoned his kingdom and fled to Spain, where he was killed A. H. 364 (A. C. 974-5). Such is the summary of his adventures, which are too long to be related in detail.—Masilah is a city in the province of al-Zāb, a region in Ifr qiyah.

---

<sup>1</sup> Enchanting: literally babylonian. An allusion to the angels Hārūt and Mārūt, who taught men sorcery at Bābel. (See Qur'ān, sūrat 2.)

134. JA'FAR IBN FALĀḤ

Abū 'Alī Ja'far Ibn Falāḥ al-Kut mī (belonging to the Berber tribe Kutāmah) was one of al-Mu'izz al-'Ubaydī's generals, and was sent by him with al-Qā'id Jawhar (whose life will be given later), to make the conquest of Egypt. He was then directed by Jawhar to proceed to Syria, and he took the town of Ramlah in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, 358 (September, A. C. 969), and the city of Damascus in Muḥarram, 359, after some resistance from the inhabitants. He then went to al-Dakkah<sup>1</sup> on the river Yazīd, outside of Damascus, and from that place he marched, though unwell, to meet al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad al-Qirmitī<sup>2</sup>, surnamed al-A'ṣam, who was advancing to attack him. (In the combat which ensued) Ja'far was taken prisoner and slain by al-Qirmitī; a great number of his followers fell in the action. This happened on Thursday, 6 Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 360 (September, A. C. 971)*. After his death, the following lines (it is said) were found written on the door of Ja'far's palace:

"Thy inhabitants, O mansion! have become the sport of Fortune; Fortune hath destroyed them, and they are dispersed never to meet again. Where are those whom we once saw residing in thee, and by the hands of whom Fortune inflicted evil and poured forth benefits?"

Ja'far was a chief of high authority, and his praises were often sung by the poets; the lines which follow were composed on him by Ibn Hānī:

1 According to the Marāṣid, al-Dakkah is a village near Damascus.

2 Al-Qirmitī (the Qarmaṭ or Karmatian); Ibn Khallikān, in another part of his work, says that this name is pronounced al-Qirmitī.

*31 August.—Ed.

"In questioning the (returning) caravans, I learned excellent news of Ja'far Ibn Falāḥ; and, by Allāh! when we met, my ears had not heard anything superior to what I witnessed with my eyes."

Those two verses are generally said to have been made by Abū Tammām on the qaḍī Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, and according to them the first verse ends thus: I learned excellent news of Aḥmad Ibn Duwād; but this is a mistake, for the name is not Aḥmad Ibn Duwād, but Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, and the measure of the verse does admit* of the latter reading.

135. JA'FAR IBN SHAMS AL-KHILĀFAT

Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfat (sun of the khalifat) Abī 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Shams al-Khilāfat al-Mukht r al-Aḥḍālī, surnamed Majd al-Mulk (glory of the kingdom), was a poet of talent and celebrity. He wrote a great deal, and books transcribed by him are in high request for the elegance of the handwriting and their correctness. Some of his works are compilations, and contain pieces, the elegance of which proves the goodness of the (taste which presided at their) selection. His collected poetical works are of considerable merit; the following passage, composed by him, I found in his own handwriting :

"Distress is followed by happiness, and soon perhaps may be heard the harbinger of speedy bliss. Consider also that the evil which ceaseth is preferable to joy just passing away."

The following lines were made by him on Ibn Shukr Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī<sup>1</sup>, wazir of al-Malik al-'Ādil and of his son al-Malik al-Kāmil:

<sup>1</sup> See No. 88, note on الآدمي.

*It should be "not admit"—Ed.

"Fear induces people to praise thee with their tongues, and they pronounce in your presence the highest eulogiums. I may yet live, however, to see the time in which those tongues shall be loosened<sup>1</sup> (and speak the truth)."

One of our literary men at Cairo told me, in reciting these verses, that they were by Ibn Shams al-Khilāfat; but I met with them afterwards in an old book containing a collection of different pieces, and there, the author is not named. The peculiar cast of Ibn Shams al-Khilāfat's poetry merits approbation. He was born in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 543 (A. C. 1148), and died on the 12 Muḥarram, 622 (January, A. C. 1125)* at a place called al-Kūm al-Aḥmar (the red mound) outside Cairo.—Afḍalī is a title given to the persons who were in the service of al-Afḍal Amīr al-Juyūsh, (the wazīr) of Egypt. Shams al-Khilāfat, this poet's father, was born A. H. 520 (A. C. 1126), and died in Dhū 'l-Hijjah, 569 (A. C. 1174).

136. THE AMIR JA'BAR

The Amīr Ja'bar Ibn Sābiq al-Quḥayrī, surnamed Sābiq al-Dīn (the surpasser in religion), is the person after whom the castle of Ja'bar obtained its name; but the sole information that I have been able to procure respecting him amounts only to this: he was advanced in age and blind; he had two sons who robbed on the highway and rendered the roads dangerous; the castle continued in his possession till taken from him by the sultān Malik Shāh, son of Alp Arslān (whose life shall be given). Ja'bar was killed afterwards in the beginning of the year 464 (A. C. 1071-2). These particulars I found in a historical work, but some doubts remain on my mind as to their exactness; for the sultān Malik Shāh did not come to the throne till the death of his father Alp Arslān, who was slain A. H. 465 (A. C. 1072); unless, indeed we suppose that he took the castle in his father's lifetime, and was then acting as his lieutenant. The date of Ja'bar's death may however be erroneous.—My object in <sup>1</sup> Literally: Thinkest thou that time may delay the term of my life, so that I may live till the loosening of the tongues?

*24 January, 1225. There is a misprint in de Slane's edition.—Ed.

noticing this difficulty was to prevent the reader from supposing that the fault originated with me, or that I passed over it without perceiving it; but I have been since enabled to verify the circumstance, and I find that Malik Shāh, in his expedition to Aleppo, A. H. 479, took this castle, and put Ja'bar to death on being informed of his evil conduct. It was also named al-Dawsariyah after its founder Dawsar, a page of al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhir, king of Ḥirah, who had placed him there to guard the Syrian frontier.<sup>1</sup>— The word Ja'bar signifies in Arabic short and thick.

137. NAṢĪR AL-DĪN JAQAR

Abū Sa'īd Jaqar Ibn Ya'qūb al-Hamadānī (native of Hamadān), and surnamed Naṣīr al-Dīn (defender of religion*), was governor of Moṣul, having been appointed by 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, lord of Moṣul, Mesopotamia, and Syria, as his lieutenant in that city. He was tyrannic, unjust, a shedder of blood, and a violator of property. Having strengthened the walls of Moṣul, he was admiring the solidity of their construction, when a madman cried out to him in these sensible terms: "Are you able to build a wall which may arrest the course of approaching fate?"—During his government, Moṣul was closely besieged for a time by the K̲halīf al-Mustarshid; but Jaqar, who had already fortified and entrenched the city, resisted the attacks of the K̲halīf, frustrated his efforts, and forced him to retire. This was in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 527 (July, A. C. 1133). Farsukh Shāh al-K̲h̲afāji, a son of the Seljūq Sultān Maḥmūd, was then at Moṣul; but it is stated by Ibn al-Athīr, in his History of the Atābeks, that the K̲h̲afāji who was at Moṣul during these events, was Alp Arsilān (another) son of (the sultān) Maḥmūd. This young prince had been confided to the care of Zinkī, who received, for that reason, the title of Atābek; this word means a bringer up of princes; ata in Turkish signifying father, and bek, amir. As Jaqar was frequently in opposition to al-Kḥafājī and thwarted him in his projects, the latter took the opportunity of Zinkī's departure for the siege of al-Birah, to arrange, with some of his partisans, a plot for the death of Jaqar. On the 8, or (according to some) on Thursday, 9 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 539 (May, A. C. 1145),* Jaqar proceeded to the palace, that he might pay his salutations to the prince; and was there attacked and slain by the conspirators. Zink then appointed a new governor named Zayn al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Baktikīn, who was father to Muẓaffar al-Dīn, lord of Arbela: Zayn al-Dīn was an upright man, and governed his subject with justice. Zinkī on his return to Moṣul confiscated Jaqar's property, seized on his treasures, and extorted large sums from his relations and the persons in his service. Jaqar had nominated to a place of authority in Moṣul one al-Qazwīnī, a wicked wretch, whose tyrannical conduct excited general complaint; he was therefore obliged to appoint another, named 'Umar Ibn Shaklah, whose administration was also very bad: on this, the following lines were composed by a native of Moṣul, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Shaqāqā, who died A. H. 533 (A. C. 1138-9).

<sup>1</sup> See, however, Freytag's proverbs of al-Maydānī, p. 198.

<sup>2</sup> This name is also written فروخ Shāh Farūkh Shāh.

* "Supporter of religion" would be more appropriate title.—Ed.

"O, Naṣīr al-Dīn! O, Jaqar! a thousand Qazwīnīṣ rather than one 'Umar! If God flung 'Umar down to hell, hell would complain of his wickedness."

Jaqar is a foreign name, and I believe that he himself was a mamlūk.

138. JAMIL THE POET

Abū' Amr Jamīl, the celebrated poet and the lover of Buṭḥaynah, was son of 'Abd All h Ibn M 'mar Ibn Ṣubāḥ, Ibn Ṣabyān Ibn Ḥunn Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn Ḥar m Ibn Ḍubbah Ibn 'Abd Ibn Kaṭḥīr Ibn 'Uḍḥrah Ibn Sa'd Ibn Hudḥaym Ibn Zayd Ibn Layṭh Ibn Sūd Ibn Asl m Ibn Alḥ f Ibn Quḍ 'ah. Jamīl was one of the famous Arabian

---

* 2 or 3 May.—Ed.

lovers: his passion for Bu ḥaynah commenced when he was a boy; on attaining manhood he asked her in marriage, but met with a refusal, and he then composed verses in her honour and visited her secretly at Wādi 'l-Qurā<sup>1</sup>, where she resided. His poetical compositions are so well known that it is needless to quote any of them. Ibn 'Asūkir relates, in his History of Damascus, that a person said to Jamil: "If you read the Qur'ān, it would be more profitable for you than composing poetry;" to which Jamil replied: "There is Anas Ibn Mālīk<sup>2</sup> who tells me that the Blessed Prophet said: 'Wisdom is certainly (to be extracted) from some poetry.'" * [Jamil and Buḥaynah, who was surnamed umm 'Abd al-Malik, both belonged to the tribe of 'Udhrah; beauty and true love abounded in that tribe; it was said to an Arab of the Desert, a member of the tribe of 'Udhrah: "What is the matter with your hearts? They are as the hearts of birds, and dissolve away like salt in water. Why have you not more firmness?" To this the other replied: "We see eyes of which you do not see the like."— Another Arab being asked to what family he belonged, made this answer: "I am of a people who, when they are in love, die." A girl, who heard him say this, exclaimed: "By the Lord of the Ka'bah! This man belongs to the tribe of 'Udhrah."—The author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī says: "Kuthayyir, the lover of 'Azzah, handed down by tradition the poems of Jamil; Jamil handed down those of Hudbah Ibn Kḥaṣḥam<sup>3</sup>;

<sup>1</sup> Wādi 'l-Qurā is the name of a delicious valley near Madinah much celebrated by the poets.

<sup>2</sup> A celebrated Companion of the Prophet. See No. 103, note on Anas.

<sup>3</sup> Hudbah Ibn Kḥaṣḥam belonged to the tribe of 'Amir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Dhabyān. He lived in the first century of Islamism, and was celebrated as one of the greatest poets among the Arabs. In a pilgrimage made by him to Makkah with some of his family, he had a dispute with Ziyādah Ibn Zayd, one of his relations, and killed him. Sa'id Ibn al-'Asi, the governor of Madinah, caused him to be arrested and sent before the khalīf Mu'āwiyah. His poetical reputation was so great that Mu'āwiyah did all he could to save him, but the family of Ziyādah would consent to no arrangement, and refused with disdain the legal ransom, though augmented to ten times its amount: they insisted that Hudbah should be kept in prison till the majority of Ziyādah's son, al-Miswar, to whom, as the nearest heir, pertained the right of avenging Ziyādah's blood, Hudbah remained in prison for some years, and excited general sympathy by his conduct, but the family of his victim was implacable, and al-Miswar, on coming of age, beheaded him in the presence of the inhabitants of Madinah.—A very full and curious narrative of this event is given in the Hamāsah, p. 233, et seq.

* [ ] From "Jamil and Buḥaynah" to the end of the notice on page 128 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

Hudbah, those of Ḥuṭay'ah; Ḥuṭay'ah<sup>1</sup>, those of Zuhayr Ibn Abi Salmā<sup>2</sup>, and of his son Ka'b Ibn Zuhayr." The following verses are by Jamil :

"You told me, my two friends<sup>3</sup>, that Taymā<sup>4</sup> was the abode of (my mistress) Laylā when summer once set in<sup>5</sup>. But now the months of summer have passed away from us; why then does absence cast Layl into (distant) regions?"

Some persons insert these verses in a qaṣidah by Majnūn, the lover of Laylā,<sup>6</sup> but they are not by him.—Taymā was a station frequented solely by the tribe of 'Udhrah.—In the same poem from which these verses are taken, Jamil says :

"You have continued, O Butḥaynah! (to torment me), so that the turtle-dove would sympathize with me, were I, in the ardour of my passion, to awaken its complaints with mine. The jealousy of spies only increased my love, and the prohibitions of my friends only made me persevere. This distance which separates us has not rendered me indifferent, and weary nights have not forced me to renounce you. O thou whose lips are a sweet source, knowest thou not that I languish with thirst on the day in which I see not thy face. I often feared that death might surprize me whilst my soul needed thee, as still it does."

Ku ḥayyir, the lover of 'Azzah, used to say: "By Allāh! Jamil was the best poet among the Arabs when he said: You told me, my two friends, etc.—The following lines are by Jamil :

<sup>1</sup> See No. 91, note on Ḥuṭay'ah.

<sup>2</sup> This is one of the authors of the seven Mu'allaqahs; his son Ka'b was outlawed by Muḥammad, but received his pardon in the ninth year of the Hijrah, after reciting to the Prophet the celebrated poem called the Buraah. An account of his life is given by Professor Fieytag in his edition of that poem.

<sup>3</sup> See No. 52, note on "my two friends."

<sup>4</sup> Taymā is situated on the frontier between Arabia and Syria.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: When summer had cast anchor.—The nomadic tribes removed towards the north in summer, and Laylā's family, which probably frequented Ḥijāz in the cool seasons, went to the neighbourhood of Taymā, that they might feed their flocks in a more temperate region, when the heat had dried up the herbage in the station where they had passed the winter.

<sup>6</sup> See M. de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, p. 150.

"I conceal the secret of my love<sup>1</sup> and should feel happy were you to know that you are (ever) remembered with sincere (affection), and that the day in which I meet you not, nor see your messenger, seems to me like months. Were it impossible for us to meet again one day, O then, may I meet a speedy death!"

From the same poem :

"Whilst I live, my heart shall love thee; and if I die, my ghost<sup>2</sup> shall flit after thine among the tombs. I look towards thee for the fulfilment of thy promise, as the poor looketh (imploringly) towards the rich. Other debts are paid, but there is a debtor who keeps no engagement with us, and who yet is not pressed (by us). Thou and thy promise are as the lightning of a cloud which withholds its genial rains."

From another of Jamil's qasīdahs :

"When I said: 'O Buthaynah! what is this passion which causeth my death?' she replied: 'It is deeply rooted and will augment. When I said: 'Bu:haynah! restore to me a portion of my reason, so that I may live! she replied: 'That (which thou desirest) is far beyond thy reach! ' "

By the same :

"Did the jealous spy who observes my conduct know with how slight a favour Buthaynah could make me happy, his envious passions would repose. (A word from her), a no or an unless suffices to content me; vain desires, hopes long deferred and at last deluding my expectations, the sight of her for an instant, the year which begins and ends without my meeting her: (such are the enjoyments for which I am envied.)"

By the same :

"I should blush with shame were I seen to love one whom another had already loved, or were another to be loved (by my mistress) after me. (I should recoil) from sipping at thy lips, if love existed no longer; I should reject thy attachment, were it feeble. avoid a troubled source at which many have drunk before."

<sup>1</sup> Literally: I keep your secret; that is, the secret of my love for you.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: My owl. See Le Diwan d'Amro 'l-Kais, p. 8; and M. de Sacy's Anthologie, p. 213.

By the same :

"(Mgivings are) far from him who desireth nothing, and near to him who has something to desire. 'O Jamil,' said Bu ḥaynah, 'thou makest me doubt of thy fidelity'; and I replied; 'O Buṭḥaynah! each of us giveth the other cause of doubt; but of us two the most to be doubted is the person who betrayeth confidence and keepeth not secrets when far from the beloved'."

Kuṭḥayyir, the lover of 'Azzah, related the following anecdote: "I was once met by Jamil, the lover of Bu ḥaynah, who said to me: 'Where dost thou come from?' and I answered: 'From the tent of the father of the beloved'" —meaning Buṭḥaynah,—'And whither,' said he 'art thou going?' I answered: 'To the beloved;—meaning Azzah, 'Thou must go back again,' said Jamil, 'and obtain from Buṭḥaynah that she appoint a place where I may meet her.' I answered: 'I have just seen her this moment, and I should be ashamed to go back.'—'Thou must surely do it!' said Jamil. 'When,' said I, 'didst thou last see Buṭḥaynah?'—'At the beginning of summer,' he replied; 'the lower part of Wādi 'l-Dawm (palm-tree valley) was watered by a shower, and she went out with a servant-girl to wash clothes: she did not at first know me, and seized a cloak out of the water to cover herself; but the girl recognized me, and Buṭḥaynah replaced the cloak in the water. We conversed for an hour, till the sun had set, and I then asked her to appoint a place of meeting, but she answered that her family was removing, and I have not met her since; nor found a trusty person whom I might send to her.'—'Wouldst thou that I go,' said I, 'to the camp of her tribe, and recite, as if undesignedly, some verses in which I may hint at this circumstance, in case I find it impossible to speak to her in private?'—'Yes,' replied Jamil, 'that is a good plan.' I then set out and made my camel kneel down in their camp, and her father said to me: 'Son of my brother! what bringeth thee back?'—'There are some verses,' I replied, 'which I have just happened to compose, and I wish to submit them to thee.'—'Let us have them,' said he. I then recited these verses in Buṭḥaynah's hearing :

'I said to her: 'O 'Azzah! I send my companion to thee, (and he is a trusty messenger,) so that thou mayest fix a place where we may meet, and that thou mayest tell me what I am to do. The last time I met thee was in Wādī 'l-Dawm, when clothes were washing.'

Then Buḥaynah struck the curtain behind which she was, and said: 'Go away! go away!'—'What is the matter, Buḥaynah?', said her father.—'It is a dog,' replied she, 'which has come to me from behind the hill, now that the people are asleep.' She then said to her girl: 'Let us go to the palmtrees (Dawmāt) and gather wood to cook a sheep for Kuḥayyir'.—'No', said I, 'I am in too much haste to wait.' I then returned to Jamil and told him what had passed, and: he said 'The place of meeting is at the palm-trees.' Then Buḥaynah went forth with her female companions to the palm-trees, and I went to them with Jamil: the lovers did not separate till morning dawned, and I never saw a more virtuous meeting, nor two persons who knew so well what passed in each other's hearts; I know not which of the two was the more discerning.'—The ḥāfiz Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn 'Asākir says in his great History: Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī states that the following verses were recited to him by his father as having been composed by Jamil Ibn Ma'mar, but they are also attributed to other poets:

'I ceased not my search to find the tribe (of my beloved), and I followed their scattered bands till I rode (my camel) up to the inmate of the palanquin.<sup>1</sup> I approached her tent by stealth and entered by the secret passage; her smooth finger tips, stained with ḥinnā, were passed over my head that she might recognize me, and she said: By the life of my brother, and the kindness of my father! I shall awake the family unless thou withdrawest.' Struck with fear at her words, I was retiring, when she smiled, and I knew that her oath would not be kept. I then took her by the ringlets and kissed her lips, with the pleasure that the man whose throat is parched with intoxication, drinks the cool water of a spring.<sup>1</sup> "

<sup>1</sup> Literally: To the female brought up in the palanquin (hawdaj). This may mean that she was accustomed, from her childhood, to travel in a hawdaj, and that her parents were too careful of her to let her walk or expose her to the sun. The hawdaj is a sort of covered chair, closed in front by a curtain and borne on camel.

The qāḍī Hārūn Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>2</sup> says: 'Jamil came to Egypt with the intention of reciting to 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān<sup>3</sup> a poem composed by him in his honour: this governor admitted him into his presence, and, after hearing Jamil's eulogistic verses and rewarding him generously, asked him concerning his love for Buthaynah, and was told of his ardent and painful passion. He, on this, promised to unite him to her, and did him stop in Miṣr, where he assigned him a habitation and furnished him with all he required. But Jamil died there very shortly after, in A. H. 82 (A. C. 701)."—Al-Zubayr Ibn al-Bakkār says that the following anecdote was related to him by 'Abbās Ibn Sahl al-Ṣa'idī "When in Syria, I met one of my friends, who said to me: 'Would you like to see Jamil? he is sick; let us go and visit him'. On entering, we found him near his last, and on seeing me he said: 'O Ibn Sahl! What sayest thou of a man who never drank wine, nor committed fornication nor murder; who never stole, and who beareth witness that there is no god but the only God.' My answer was: 'I think that he has attained salvation, and hope that he will enter paradise; who is that man?'—"It is I"; replied Jamil.—'By Allāh!' said I, 'I do not think that thou wilt gain salvation after having celebrated, for the last twenty years, the charms of Buthaynah, —'May I be deprived of the intercession of Muḥammad (on the day of judgement),' said he;—"I that am now entering into the first day of the life to come, <sup>1</sup> Al-Yāfi'i speaks of Jamil in his annals and gives these verses, but he suppressed the last for its indecency, as he says.

<sup>2</sup> Hārūn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, a descendant from the tribe of Quraysh, and a native of Mādīnah, was a juriconsult of the sect of Mālik. He entered Egypt, A. H. 217 (A. C. 832), where he filled the functions of qāḍī till he was deposed, A. H. 227 (A. C. 841-2), after having administered for eight years and six months. He then retired to 'Irāq, and settled at Sarr-man-ra'ā, where he died in the month of Sh'abān. A. H. 232 (A. C. 847).—(Al-'Asqalānī's History of the qāḍīs of Egypt, MS No. 691).

<sup>3</sup> Abu 'l-'Aṣḥabī 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān Ibn al-Hakam succeeded 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn 'Uqbah as governor of Egypt, A. H. 65 (A. C. 684-5). He died in office, A. H. 86 (A. C. 705), and had for successor 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Malik.—(Al-Maqrizī's Khita; Abu 'l-Mahāsīn's Nujūm.)

and am in the last day of my life in this world;—if I ever placed my hand on her with an improper intention!" We did not quit him till he expired." It is stated, however, by Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far al-Ahwāz, that he fell sick and died in Egypt; and that during his illness he was visited by Ibn Sahl al-Ṣā'idī; he then relates the anecdote just given: God knows which statement is correct. The following relation is given in the Kitāb al-Aghānī on the authority of al-Aṣma'i: "A person who was present at the death of Jamil in Egypt relates that the poet called him and said: 'If I give you all I leave after me, will you perform one thing which I shall enjoin you?'—'By Allāh! yes,' said the other.—'When I am dead,' said Jamil, 'take this cloak of mine and put it aside, but keep every thing else for yourself; then go to Buḥaynah's tribe, and when you are near them, saddle this camel of mine and mount her; then put on my cloak and rend it, and, mounting on a hill, shout out these verses:

'A messenger hath openly<sup>1</sup> proclaimed the death of Jamil! He has now a dwelling in Egypt from which he will never return. There was a time when, intoxicated with love, he trained his mantle proudly in the fields and palm-groves of Wādi 'l-Qurā! Arise, Buḥaynah and lament aloud; weep for the best of all thy lovers!'

"I did what Jamil ordered, and had scarcely finished the verses, when Buḥaynah came forth, beautiful as the moon when it appears from behind a cloud: she was muffled in a cloak, and, on coming up to me, she said: 'Man! if what thou sayest be true, thou hast killed me; if false, thou hast dishonoured me!' I replied: 'By Allāh! I only tell the truth;' and I showed her the cloak which Jamil had given me. On seeing it, she uttered a loud cry and beat her face, and the women of the tribe gathered around weeping with her and lamenting his death. Her force at length failed her, and she swooned away. After some time she revived and said:

'Never for a single instant shall I feel consolation for the loss of Jamil; that time shall never come. Since thou art dead, O Jamil, son of Ma'mar! the pains of life and its pleasures are the same to me.'

---

<sup>1</sup> Openly, the Arabic says; without naming him by his surname. The same surname was often borne by many persons, and of course it would be difficult to know which of them was meant by it.

(These verses have been already given (see no. 43) in the life of the ḥāfiẓ al-Silaf) "I never saw man nor woman weep more than those I saw that day."

139. ABŪ USĀMAH JUNĀDĀH

Abū Usāmah Junādah Ibn Muḥammad al-Azdī al-Harawī (belonging to the tribe of Azd and a native of Herat): this philologist possessed a most extensive acquaintance with pure Arabic, and transmitted much of that knowledge (to his disciples) he knew what terms of the language had become obsolete and those which were still in general use, and during his lifetime he was without an equal in that science. A close intimacy and friendship subsisted between him, the ḥāfiẓ 'Abd Ḥanī al-Miṣrī, and Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Sulaymān al-Anṭākī (native of Antioch), who was a grammarian and a teacher of the reading of the Qur'ān. They used to meet in the college (Dār al-'Ilm)<sup>2</sup> and hold literary discussions, till two of them, Abū Usāmāh Junādah and Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Anṭākī were put to death by al-Ḥakīm, lord of Egypt. They were executed in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 399 (July, A. C. 1109), and on the same day. The ḥāfiẓ 'Abd Ḥanī concealed himself to avoid a similar fate. This is the account given by the amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī in his history (of Egypt).—Herāt is a large city in K. Khurāsān.

140. AL-JUNAYD

Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Junayd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Junayd al-Khazzāz al-Qawrī,<sup>3</sup> the celebrated ascetic<sup>3</sup>, was born and bred in

<sup>1</sup> In another part of this work he is called Abū 'Alī, and in the Nujūm of Abū 'l-Mahāsīn his name is written Abū Bakr al-Anṭākī.

<sup>2</sup> "And he (al-Hākīm) founded a college (Dār al-'Ilm), which he furnished, and to which he sent books of great value. In this college he placed two Sunnite ḥāfiẓs, one of whom was named Abū Bakr al-Anṭākī. He gave them pelisses of honour, treated them with favour, and ordered them to come to his court. He afterwards put them to death."—(Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah, year 400. Exposé de la religion de Druzes, t. I, p. 346.

<sup>3</sup> In the Notices et Extraits, tom. XII, M. de Sacy has given an account of the Ṣūfī doctrines and a translation of the life of al-Junayd by Jāmi,

• M. de Slane has read it Qawāriri which is wrong.—Ed.

'Irāq, but his family was from Nahāwand. He was the shaykh<sup>1</sup> of his time, the pearl of his age, and his doctrine on the truth<sup>2</sup> is well known and carefully preserved.<sup>3</sup> He studied jurisprudence under Abū Thawr, the disciple of the imām al-Shāfi'i, but it is said by some that, as a doctor of the law, he followed the system of Sufyān al-Thawri. He had for masters his maternal uncle al-Sar al-Saqat', al-Hārith al-Muḥāsibī and other great shaykhs. The Shāfiite doctor, Abū 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj, had been his disciple, and used to say to his auditors, when they were in admiration at his discourses on the dogmatical and secondary points of the law: "Do you know from whom I had that? That is one of the blessed results of my intercourse with Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Junayd."—Al-Junayd being asked who was he who knoweth, answered: "He who can tell what thy secret is, although thou keepest silence." He used to say: "Our system of doctrine is firmly bound with the dogmas of faith and the Qur'an and the Sunnah." He was seen one day with a rosary<sup>4</sup> in his hand, and a person said to him: How! you who have reached such an exalted degree of sanctity, you carry a rosary? "To which he replied: "I quit not the way which led me to my Lord." The following anecdote is related by al-Junayd: "My uncle, Sar al-Saqat' said to me: 'Give lectures'<sup>5</sup>; but a feeling of diffidence prevented me, for I had doubts whether I was worthy thereto; but one Friday eve, I saw in a dream<sup>6</sup> the blessed Prophet, who said to me: 'Give lectures'. I awoke immediately, and went to al-Sarī's door before he had risen, and having knocked, (I related to him what had passed). He answered: 'You would not believe me till you were

<sup>1</sup> The word Shaykh bears throughout this article the signification of Sūfi doctor.

<sup>2</sup> The word حَقِيقَة (truth) denotes that knowledge which can only be acquired by spiritual exercises, and which is the object of sūfism. In following that way طَرِيقَة, the creature obtains, at last, a true knowledge of the Creator; and this knowledge, in the terminology of mystic divines, is styled emphatically the truth.

<sup>3</sup> Carefully preserved مَدُون; this word may also signify.—Put in writing and collected into a book.

<sup>4</sup> The Muslim rosary is composed of ninety-nine beads, which is the number of the names, or attributes of God mentioned in the Qur'an.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: Speak in teaching the people.

<sup>6</sup> See note on dreams, No. 19.

told to do so'. That morning I sat in the mosque to teach, and the news spread among the people that al-Junayd was lecturing, and a young Christian in disguise stood up before me and said: 'O shaykh! what did the holy Prophet mean by these words: Dread the physiognomic talent of the true believer, for he seeth by means of God's light?' I reflected with downcast eyes, and, raising then my head, I said: 'Become a Muslim; the time of your conversion has arrived!' and the youth made profession of Islamism."<sup>1</sup>—The shaykh al-Junayd said: "There is nothing from which I drew so much profit as from some verses which I once heard." On being asked what they were, he answered: "As I passed through the Derb al-Qarāfīs<sup>2</sup> I listened to a slave-girl who was singing in a house, and I heard her say:

"When I say to thee: 'Departure hath given me the raiment of decay,' thou repliest: 'were it not for departure, love had not been proved sincere.' If I say: 'This heart is burned by passion'; thou sayest: 'The fires of passion ennoble the heart;' and if I say: 'I am not in fault,' thou answerest: 'Thy existence is a fault to which no fault can be compared!' "

On this I uttered a loud cry and swooned away.<sup>3</sup> When I was in that state, the master of the house came out and said: 'What is this, sir?' and I replied: 'The effect of what I heard;' on which he said: 'I take you to witness that I now make her a present to you;' and I answered: 'I accept her, and declare her free before God.' I afterwards gave her to one of our companions in the convent<sup>4</sup>, and she had by him a fine boy, who grew up well."—Al-Junayd made the pilgrimage (to Makkah) alone and on foot thirty times: his <sup>1</sup> According to al-Yāfi'i, this answer contained two proofs of al-Junayd's miraculous gifts; the first, that he discovered the religion of the youth notwithstanding his disguise, and the second, that he foretold his immediate conversion.

<sup>2</sup> Derb al-Qarāfīs the paper street or bazar.

<sup>3</sup> Al-Junayd perceived a mystic meaning in these verses; for him, the beloved was God, and his own existence in this world was the fault or obstacle which prevented his union with the Divinity.

<sup>4</sup> The fraternities of Ṣūfīs, or dervishes, lived in convents. Abū Ḥaf's 'Umar al-Sahrawarī, in his 'Awārif al-Mu'arīf, or treatise on ṣūfism', has three chapters on the monastic life.—(See MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 375.)

(merits) are numerous and celebrated.<sup>1</sup> He died at Bagh<sup>h</sup>lād, A. H. 297 (A. C. 910), on a Sunday, * which was the *kh*alif's Nayrūz;<sup>2</sup> but some say that his death took place on a Friday, in the last hour of the day in A. H. 298: he was buried, on the Sunday * following, in the Shūnīziyah cemetery, near the grave of his maternal uncle Sari al-Saqāṭi. Before his death he had just read over the entire Qur'ān, and recommenced the sūrat of the Cow, of which he had read the first seventy verses when he died.—He was surnamed al-khizzāz because he spun silk (khizz); and they gave him the name of al-Qawāriri, † because his father was a glass-blower (qawāriri). Nahāwand, or, according to al-Sam'ānī, Nuhāwand, is a city in Persian 'Irāq, said to have been built by Nūḥ (Noah), and named for that reason Nūḥ-āwand, that is, Noah has built<sup>3</sup>; these words have been altered into Nahāwand to suit the genius of the Arabic language.—The Shūnīziyah is a well-known (burying) place at Bagh<sup>h</sup>lād, on the west side of the river; it contains the tombs of a number of *shaykh*h.

(For further reference, vide Ansāb, f. 464b.—Ed.)

141. THE QĀ'ID JAWHAR

Al-Qā'id<sup>4</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan<sup>5</sup> Jawhar Ibn 'Abd Allāh, known also by the name of al-Kātib al-Rimī (the Greek scribe)<sup>6</sup>, was a client by <sup>1</sup> An eye-witness said that the *Kātib*s of Bagh<sup>h</sup>lād went to hear al-Junayd for his choice of words; the philosophers for the subtlety of his discourse; the poets for the elegance of his language, and the dogmatic theologians for his profound ideas. When he was a boy at play, his uncle al-Saqāṭi asked him what was thankfulness (to God), and received this answer: "To act so that his favour may not conduce to disobedience towards him".—(Al-Yāfi'i, A. H. 298).

<sup>2</sup> The *kh*alif's Nayrūz; this is another name for the Nayrūz Khāssa (new year's day proper), in which it was customary to visit the sovereign and offer him presents. This festival was held on the sixth day of the month of Farwardīn (end of March). The old Persian custom of celebrating the Nayrūz existed at Bagh<sup>h</sup>lād under the Abbāsīd *kh*alifs.—(See No. 91 of this work. See also, in one of the following volumes, an anecdote of Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf the kātib, in the life of al-Mubarrad.)†

<sup>3</sup> It is scarcely necessary to say that this derivation is absurd in every point.

<sup>4</sup> The word qā'id signifies leader or chief.

<sup>5</sup> The circumstance of Jawhar's having had a son named al-Ḥusayn, of whom mention is made at the end of this article, induced me to suppose that, in place of Abu 'l-Ḥasan (father of al-Ḥasan), it would be more correct to read Abu 'l-Ḥusayn. The best MSS. of Ibn Khallikān, and three MSS. of Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn's Nujūm confirm, however, the reading which I had adopted in the Arabic text.

<sup>6</sup> He was called the Greek scribe, because his father was a native of the Greek empire, and he himself was scribe, or secretary, to his master al-Mu'izz.

* Saturday is proper word.—Ed.

† M. de Siane gives Qawāriri.—Ed.

‡ No. 608.—Ed.

enfranchisement of al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manşūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī, lord of Ifriqiyah, who sent him, at the head of an army, to take possession of Egypt on the death of Kāfūr al-Ikhshidī. He set out from Ifriqiyah on Sunday*, 14 of the First Rabī', A.H. 358 (February, A. C. 969), and got Mişr into his power on Tuesday, 16 Shā'bān (July) † of the same year. On Friday† 19 Shā'bān he mounted the pulpit and pronounced the khutbah with a prayer for his lord al-Mu'izz. In the middle of the month of Ramaḍān (beginning of August,) the news of this conquest reached al-Mu'izz in Ifriqiyah. Jawhar continued to govern Egypt with absolute power till the arrival of his master; he preserved his high rank, dignity, ‡[and authority till A. H. 364, when al-Mu'izz, on Friday 17 Muḥarram (October, 974§), removed him from the presidency of the government offices, the collectorship of the revenue, and the control of affairs.] The beneficence of Jawhar ceased only on his death; he expired at Mişr on Thursday, 20 Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 381 (January, A. C. 992),|| and there was not a poet of the time but composed verses to deplore his loss and celebrate his liberality. ¶[The motive which induced al-Mu'izz to send him to Egypt was this: On the death of the eunuch Kāfūr al-Ikhshidī (whose life shall be given**) the officers of the empire agreed to confer the supreme authority on Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshid, who was still a boy, and that he should have for lieutenant the son of his father's uncle, Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Tuḡhjl; the great officers and the troops were to be under the orders of Shamūl al-Ikhshidī, and the administration of the public revenue was to be *Sabb is Saturday and not Sunday. Saturday fell on 6 February.—Ed.

1 Their relationship will be better understood from the inspection of the following table : (Contd. on page 133.)

† Ibn Khallākān says: "Twelve days remained of the month." "It means 18 Shā'bān corresponding to 6 July which was Tuesday.—Ed.

‡ [ ] From "and authority" to "control of affairs" is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

§ This date is not given in the autograph. According to Eduard Mahler's reckoning, Friday fell on 19 Muḥarram corresponding to 9 October.—Ed.

|| 28 January.—Ed.

¶ [ ] From "The motive which" to "his own house;" on page 139 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

**In letter K omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

confided to the wazir Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt. This arrangement took place on Tuesday, 20 of the First Jumādā, A. H. 357 (April, A. C. 968*). Prayers were offered up for Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī, and then for al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh, from the pulpits of Miṣr, of the Egyptian and Syrian provinces, and of the two holy cities (Makkah and Madīnah). Then as we have already related in the life of Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt, the troops became turbulent from the diminution of their pay and the cessation of the ordinary gratuities; this induced a number of persons who held a high rank (in Miṣr), to write to al-Mu'izz, who was then in Ifriqiyah, inviting him to send a body of troops to Egypt and take possession of the capital. In consequence of this communication, he ordered the qā'id Jawhar to hold the army in readiness to march, but this general fell so dangerously ill, that no hopes were entertained of his recovery. In this state, he was visited by his master al-Mu'izz, who declared that he would not only escape from death, but make the conquest of Miṣr. During his convalescence, the necessary supplies of money, arms and men were furnished to him, and he advanced with upwards of one hundred thousand horses and more than twelve hundred chests of money, to a place named al-Raqqādah<sup>1</sup>. He was visited every day by al-Mu'izz, who conversed with him in private and gave him directions; he then received orders to set out, and the prince came to bid him adieu. During this meeting, Ja'far stood before al-Mu'izz, who leant down on his horse's neck and spoke to him in secret for some time. The prince then ordered his sons to dismount and give Jawhar the salutation of departure; this obliged the great officers of the kingdom to dismount also; then Jawhar kissed the hand of al-Mu'izz and the hoof of his horse; and having mounted on his own by order of his master, he put the army in march. When al-Mu'izz <sup>1</sup> Al-Raqqādah lay at a short distance from Qayrawān; it was the residence of the Aghlabite princes, and was taken by Abū 'Abd Allāh the Shī'ite in the month of Rājab, A.H. 296.—(See M. de Sacy's Exposé de l'histoire des Druses, t. I, p. 271).

*21 April.—Ed.

(Continued from page 132.)

returned to his palace, he sent to Jawhar as a present all the clothes which he had on, retaining only his drawers and seal-ring, and he wrote orders to his slave Aflaḥ governor of Barqah, that he should set out to meet Jawhar and kiss his hand. Aflaḥ offered one hundred thousand dinārs to avoid performing that ceremony, but he was obliged to submit. When the approach of Jawhar's troops was known at Miṣr, great agitation was caused by the news, and it was agreed on that the wazīr Ibn al-Furāt should write to obtain peace, and security for the lives and property of the inhabitants; they requested also Abū Ja'far Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh<sup>1</sup> al-Ḥusaynī to be their ambassador, and obtained his consent provided that a number of the citizens should accompany him. The wazīr furnished them his conditions in writing, and on Monday, 18 Rajab, A. H. 358 (June, A. C. 969)*, they set out to meet Jawhar, who had halted at a village called Tarwājah†, near Alexandria. When the sharīf Muslim and his companions arrived, they delivered their message to Jawhar, who granted every demand, and confirmed his promise by a written instrument; but the city of Miṣr fell into the utmost agitation; the adherents of the Ikhṣīd family, the officers who had been in the service of Kāfūr, and a portion of the army prepared for battle and after concealing the valuables which were in their houses, they encamped outside the city and rejected the peace which had been offered. When Jawhar was informed of their intentions, he marched against them, but the sharīf had already arrived ther on the 7 Sha'bān‡ with the written promise of protection (amān), and the wazīr with the inhabitants had ridden to his house to meet him; the troops also had assembled around him. He then read the document, and handed to every person who had written to Jawhar for fiefs, money, or governments, a favourable answer to their

---

<sup>1</sup> In the Arabic text, 'Abd Allāh; but it is a fault. Mention has been made of Abū Ja'far, No. 130, note on Abū Ja'far.

<sup>2</sup> In the Arabic text, for البلد read البلاد

* 7 June.—Ed.

† M. de Slane reads it Tarūja.—Ed.

‡ 26 June.—Ed.

demands; he delivered also to the Wazīr a letter in reply to his, and addressed to him as wazīr. A considerable time elapsed in discussions and opposition, and the meeting separated without acceding to the proposals. Nahrīr al-Shū'izānī<sup>1</sup> was chosen by them as general, and the troops, having prepared for battle, marched to Jizah (Gizeh), where they took up their position and placed guards on the bridges.<sup>2</sup> The qā'id Jawhar arrived at Jizah and attacked them on the 11 of Sha'tān; in this combat he made some prisoners and took from them a number of horses, after which he proceeded to Muniyat al-Şayyādīn (Fishermen's village) and seized on the ford of Muniyat Shalqān. A portion of the (Egyptian) troops then passed over to him in boats and surrendered, but the people of Mişr placed a guard at the ford. Jawhar, on seeing this, said to Ja'far Ibn Falāḥ: "This is the day for which al-Mu'izz required your services!" He then stripped to

<sup>1</sup> Al-Shoizānī; in two manuscripts of Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn's Nujūm, this name is written ابن اسويراسى without points; the third has ابن اسويراسى; its true pronunciation is therefore uncertain. (See Editor's note, p. 134.—Ed.)

<sup>2</sup> The account of the conquest of Egypt given by Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn in his Nujūm, on the authority of more than one author (غور واحد) is nearly identical with Ibn Khallikān's. This sole passage, however, offers a remarkable difference, as it stands in the MSS. of the Nujūm. We there read: "The troops marched towards the isle" (الجزيرة, and not Jizah الجيزة) "to combat Jawhar. They placed guards on the bridges جـور, and Jawhar, on arriving at the isle, attacked them; the combat continued for some time, and Jawhar then went to Muniyat al-Şayyādīn."—If this be correct, the isle is the isle of Rawḍah, in the Nile, between Fuṣṭāṭ and Jizah. It was only in later times that it came to be known by the name of al-Rawḍah; before that, it was called simply the isle. (See Chrestomatie, t. I, p. 229). A bridge of thirty boats united it to Fuṣṭāṭ, and it communicated with Jizah by means of another bridge of thirty boats also, (Maqrīzī's Khīṭa, MS. fonds St. Germain, No. 106, fol. 248v). The word جـور bridges, bears also in Egypt the signification of dykes or mounds; those dykes were raised to protect the edifices of the inhabitants against the inundations of the Nile, and during that period they served as roads; but they could have been of trifling importance as a means of communication at the period of Jawhar's combat with the Egyptians, as the Nile was only beginning to rise and did not overflow the country till six or seven weeks after. I am, therefore, inclined to believe that the word جـور here means bridges (probably the two above-mentioned), and that Ibn Khallikān's account is to be preferred. For it is evident that the intention of Jawhar in marching to Jizah, was to gain possession of the bridge of boats between Jizah and Mişr (or Fuṣṭāṭ); the resistance of the Egyptian troops frustrated this project, and he then took the bold determination of fording the Nile, which at that moment, the 5 of July, must have been very low.

*The name is given in different ways, e. g., Nahrīr al-Shūharānī, Tahrīr al-Shūnizānī.—Ed.

†30 June.—Ed.

his trousers and passed over in a boat<sup>1</sup>, whilst his men forded (the river) and arrived at the other side, where they attacked and killed a great number of the lkḥshidites and their partisans. The rest fled during the night and entered Miṣr, which they evacuated in disorder after carrying off from their houses whatever they could. Their wives then went on foot to the sharīf Abū Ja'far and (implored him) to write to Jawhar, requesting him to ratify his former promise of protection. The sharīf wrote in consequence, and after congratulating him on his victory, solicited the renewal of the amān. The people remained with the sharīf until an answer was returned, confirming the promise of pardon and protection. An envoy arrived also from Jawhar, bearing a white flag and, during two days, he circulated through the people, proclaiming an amnesty and forbidding pillage. This re-established tranquillity in the city, so that the bī zārs were opened and all became as quiet as if no disturbance had taken place. Towards the latter part of the day, a messenger arrived with a letter from Jawhar to Abū Ja'far, ordering him to be ready to receive him on Tuesday, the 17 of Sha'bān, with a body of the sharīfs, learned men, and chief inhabitants of the city. (The persons who had assembled at the sharīf Muslim's house) then retired, and having made preparations for their visit to Jawhar, they set out from the city with the wazīr Ja'far and a number of men eminent for their rank, and proceeded to Jizah where they met the (Fatimite) general. Then by order of a herald, every person, except the sharīf and the wazīr, dismounted and saluted successively Jawhar, who had placed the wazīr on his left hand and the sharīf on his right. When this ceremony was concluded, they set out for the city, and the troops commenced making their entry, with arms and baggage, as the sun was declining towards the west. About four O'clock<sup>2</sup>, Jawhar entered the city, preceded by his drums and flags; he wore a silk dress heavily embroidered with gold, and rode a cream-coloured horse. He passed through Miṣr to the place in which he designed to halt<sup>1</sup> and which is now the spot on which Cairo is situated. He then marked out the circumference of the new city, and when the people of Miṣr came the next morning to congratulate him on his success, they found that the foundations of the citadel had been dug during the night. He was at first displeased with some irregularities in the outline of the future city, but then declared that as the trenches had been excavated in a fortunate hour, he would allow no alterations to be made. On the Tuesday above mentioned and the six following days, his troops continued entering into Miṣr. Jawhar hastened to write a despatch to his master al-Mu'izz, informing him of the conquest, and he sent to him also the heads of the Egyptians slain in the action. He then ordered that the prayer for the Abbasides should cease to be offered up from the pulpits throughout Egypt, and that their name should be replaced on the coinage by these words: *Bismi mawlāi 'l-Mu'izz (in the name of my master al-Mu'izz)**. He forbid also the black livery of the Abbasides to be worn any longer<sup>2</sup> and directed khawāṭib (preachers) to wear white vestments. He then every Sunday† held a court for the hearing of grievances; at which the wazīr, the qāḍī, and a number of the great doctors were present, whilst he himself gave judgment. On Friday, the 8 of Ḍhu 'l-Qa'dah‡ he caused these words to be added at the end of the khutbah<sup>4</sup>: O my God! bless Muḥammad the chosen,

<sup>1</sup> The MSS of the Nuḥūm have فِي مَوْكِبٍ (at the head of a troop), in place of فِي مَرْكَبٍ (in a vessel); it is probably the right reading.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: After the 'aṣr. "The 'aṣr, or afternoon, i.e. about mid-time between noon and nightfall." (Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. 1, p. 82.)

<sup>1</sup> Literally: To his halting-place. In the Nujum we read: "He stopped at (المنأخ) al-Manākh (the halting-place)."<sup>1</sup> I am inclined, however, to give the preference throughout to Ibn Khallikān's account; Abu 'l-Mahāsīn seems to have done nothing more than copy it; and in some cases, he appears to have misunderstood it.

<sup>2</sup> The black dress was worn not only by members of the 'Abbaside family, but by the public officers in their service.

<sup>3</sup> In the court of Inspection of Grievances نَفَرُ فِي الْمَقَالِمِ it was the sovereign or one of his great officers who presided as judge. The establishment of this court was rendered necessary by the difficulty of executing the decrees of the qāḍī when the defendant was of high rank or employed in the service of government. None dared to disobey a citation before this court, and none were powerful enough to escape its severity.

<sup>4</sup> See No. 78, note on khutbah.

*M. de Slane does not seem to grasp the sense which is only that the coins were struck in the name of his Lord al-Mu'izz and these words were not meant as legend.—Ed.

† Saturday.—Ed.

‡ 24 September.—Ed.

'Ali the accepted, Fāṭimah the pure, and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, the two grandsons of the Apostle whom thou hast freed from stain and thoroughly purified. O my God! bless the pure imāms, ancestors of the Commander of the believers. On Friday, 18 of the Second Rabi' A. H. 359*, the qā'id presided at public prayers in the mosque of Ibn Ṭūlūn; a great number of the military were present, and the preacher, 'Abd al-Samī' Ibn 'Umar al-'Abbāsī, made mention in the Khutbah of the people of the house<sup>1</sup> and their excellent merits; he prayed also for the qā'id and pronounced aloud the Bismillāh.<sup>2</sup> He then, during the prayer, read the sūrats of the Assembly<sup>3</sup> (al-Jum'ah) and the Hypocrites<sup>4</sup> (al-Munāfiqūn) and in the adhān or call to prayer, he introduced these words: Come to the excellent work<sup>5</sup>! He was the first who did so in Egypt. This form was then adopted in the other mosques, and on Fridays the preacher pronounced the qunūt<sup>6</sup>. In the month of the first Jumādā, the words Come to the excellent work were inserted in the adhān at the Old Mosque, and all this gave the qā'id Jawhar great satisfaction, and he wrote to al-Mu'izz with that pleasing intelligence. Jawhar disapproved however of prayers being made for himself, and said that such was not in the directions given him by his master. He then commenced the construction of mosque at

<sup>1</sup> The People of the House: 'Ali, Fāṭimah, Ḥasan, and Ḥusayn.' (See Mishkāt, vol II, p. 779.)

<sup>2</sup> The first sūrat of the Qur'ān, entitled the Fāṭihah, forms a portion of the Muslim canonical prayer: it begins with the Bismillāh (in the name of God, the merciful, the clement), which the Hanīfites and Hanbalites pronounce in a low voice, because they do not consider it as a part of the Qur'ān;† but the Shāfiites, Mālikites, and Shī'ites hold the contrary opinion, and pronounce it aloud. (See Zamakhsharī's commentary on the Fāṭihah in his Kashshāf, and M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 161.)

<sup>3</sup> Qur'ān, sūrat 62.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., sūr. 63.

<sup>5</sup> Those words are peculiar to the Shī'ite form of the adhān.

<sup>6</sup> The qunūt consists in these words: Innā laka qānituna انا لك قانتون (see Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 162, and Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, t. III, p. 151.)

* Friday fell on 15 corresponding to 25 February, A. D. 970. If Fāṭimi calender is taken into consideration, it could be 17 or 18.—Ed.

† Here the assertion is not true because none says that it is not a part of the Qur'ān. The difference lies here that the former group does not consider it a part of the Fāṭihah while the latter group holds this view. This verse is said to be revealed twice, once in the body of the Qur'ān and a second time as a verse to make distinction between the sūrahs and so it is not the part of any sūrah.—Ed.

Cairo, and finished it on the 7 of Ramaḍān, A. H. 361 (June, A.C. 972) ; on the following Friday he celebrated it in public prayers.—I believe that this is the mosque which is called al-Azhar (the splendid)<sup>1</sup> and lies between the gate of al-Barqiyah and that of al-Naṣr; for the other mosque of Cairo near the gate of al-Naṣr is well known to have been founded by al-Ḥākim (whose life we shall give). Jawhar continued in the government of Egypt for four years and twenty days; al-Mu'izz then arrived at Cairo (as shall be related in his life), and Jawhar left the citadel to receive him, taking nothing with him of all he possessed except the clothes he had on. He did not afterwards return to the citadel, but took up his residence in his own house: we shall give other particulars of his history in the life of his master al-Mu'izz.—Jawhar had a son named Ḥusayn, who was qā'id al-quwwād, or general-in-chief to al-Ḥākim, lord of Egypt: the conduct of this prince having inspired him with apprehensions for his personal safety, he fled with his son and his sister's husband, 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn al-Nu'mān; but al-Ḥākim sent after them and brought them back; he then quieted their fears, and treated them with kindness for some time; but one day, when they went to the citadel to pay him their respects, he gave orders to Rashīd al-Haḳīqī, the executioner<sup>2</sup>, who took with him ten of the Turkish pages and put al-Ḥusayn to death along with his brother-in-law the qāḍī: their heads were then brought to al-Ḥākim. This took place in A.H. 401 (A. . 1010-11).—Mention has been made of al-Ḥusayn in the life of Barjawān .

---

<sup>1</sup> Al-Makrīzī says it positively.

<sup>2</sup> In Arabic Sayyāf al-Niqmah† [*the swordsman* of the (sovereign's) vengeance*]. This seems to have been a peculiar title at the Fatimite court.

<sup>3</sup> See No. 109.

*22 June.—Ed.

†The text has سيف النقه Sayf al-Niqmah.—Ed.

142. JIHĀRKAS AL-ŞALĀĤĪ

Abu 'l-Manşūr Jihārkas Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Nāşirī al-Şalāĥī (attached to the service of al-Malik al-Nāşir Şal ĥ al-Dīn), and surnamed Fakhr al-Dīn (pride of religion), held a high rank as an amir in the empire founded by Şalāĥ al-Dīn. He was a man of noble character, high influence, and a lofty spirit. It was he who built the great Qaysāriyah<sup>1</sup> of Jihārkas at Cairo, which, as I am told by a number of Merchants who visited different countries, is without an equal for beauty, size, and solidity. On the summit of this edifice he erected a large mosque and (near it) a rab'a<sup>2</sup> supported by arcades. He died at Damascus in the year 608 (A. C. 1211-2), and was buried at Mount Şālihiyah, where his tomb still attracts attention.—Jinārkas means four persons: it is a Persian word of which the Arabic equivalent is Istār (four in number). The word istār means also four ounces: he was also known by this appellation.

143. ABŪ TAMMĀM AL-ṬĀ'Ī

Abū Tammām Ḥabīb, the celebrated poet, was son of Aws Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Qays Ibn al-'Aşhajj Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Marwān Ibn Murr Ibn Sa'd Ibn Kāhil Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Adī Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ġhawṭh Ibn Ṭay (the real name of Ṭay was Julhumah) Ibn 'Udad Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlān Ibn Yaḥjub<sup>3</sup> Ibn Ya'rab<sup>3</sup> Ibn Qaḥṭān. †[But Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ḥasan Ibn Bishr Ibn Yaḥyā al-'Āmidī<sup>4</sup> says in his Munvāzanah, or comparison between the two Ṭā'ites: "The general opinion

<sup>1</sup> Qaysāriyah, a bāzār.—(See De Sacy's Abdāllatif, p. 303.)

<sup>2</sup> The rab'a is a large house or hotel, capable of lodging ten or fifteen families, and constructed over shops or stores.—(De Sacy's 'Abd-Allatif', pp. 303, 402; Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. I, p. 23.)

<sup>3</sup> The Qāmūs says, Yaḥjub.

<sup>4</sup> Ḥājī Khallīfah places the death of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-'Āmidī in A. H. 371 (A. C. 981-2). His work, entitled Comparison between the two Ṭā'ites, is a treatise on the parallel passages in the poems of Abū Tammām and al-Buḥtūrī, who were both of the tribe of Ṭay.

* M. de Slane reads it Yaḥḥob.—Ed.

† [ ] From 'But' to 'Aws' on page 141 is not included in the Autograph.

respecting Abū-Tammām's descent is, that his father was a Christian named Tadūs al-'Aṭṭār (Thaddaeus the druggist) and native of a village near Damascus called Jāsīm. This name of Tadūs they changed into Aws, and fabricated a genealogy for Abū Tammām, tracing up his descent to Ṭay. There is also no Mas'ūd to be found in the list of ancestors which they give him, and this was an oversight in the person who forged it; besides, were it true that he descended from Ṭay, it would be impossible to admit that there were only ten generations between them.<sup>1</sup> Al-'Āmidī makes these remarks when speaking of the following verse of Abū Tammām's:

"Did Mas'ūd water their ruined dwellings with the torrents of his eyes, I should renounce Mas'ūd<sup>2</sup>."

But it must be observed that six generations have been omitted between Qays and Dafāqah and that Abū Tammām's words, I should renounce Mas'ūd, are not a proof that Mas'ūd was one of his ancestors; this expression is analogous to the following: I have nothing to do with such a one, such a one has nothing to say to me, by which is expressed the idea of renunciation or contempt. Similar to this is the sentence uttered by the holy Prophet: The child of fornication is not one of us, and 'Alī is one of us.<sup>4</sup> In the History of Baghdād by the Kḥaṭīb, Abū Tammām's genealogy is given in full with some slight differences from that inserted here; and al-Ṣūlī relates that some say of Abū Tammām Ḥabīb, that his father Tadūs was a Christian, and that this name was changed into Aws.] Abū Tammām surpassed all his contemporaries in the purity of his style, the merit of his poetry, and his excellent manner of treating a sub-<sup>1</sup> It is clear from this, that al-'Āmidī had before him a genealogical list different from that given by Ibn Kḥallikān.

---

<sup>2</sup> Literally: I am not of Mas'ūd.

<sup>3</sup> It would appear therefore that the name of Dafāqah was in the list given by Ibn Kḥallikān, yet nothing like it is to be found in the MSS.

<sup>4</sup> The mistake committed by al-'Āmidī is singular enough; he does not understand a very common Arabic expression, and he takes Mas'ūd, who was a brother of the poet Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ, for an ancestor to Abū Tammām. Ibn Kḥallikān repeats his observations on this subject in his life of Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ.

ject.<sup>1</sup> He is author of the Ḥamāsah, a compilation which is a standing proof of his great talents, solid information, and good taste in making a selection. Another of his works is entitled Fuṭūḥ al-Shu'arā (first-rate poets), and contains (the history of) a great number of poets, some of whom flourished in the times of paganism, and others when Islāmism was introduced or at a later period. The Ikhtiyārāt, a third work of his, contains (as its title implies) selections from the poets. The number of pieces which he knew by heart was so great, that none ever attained his rank in that branch of knowledge; it is stated that, without counting qaṣīdahs and fragments of poems, he knew by heart fourteen thousand verses of that class of compositions, called Rajaz.<sup>2</sup> He used to compose verses in honour of the *kh*alifs and was generously rewarded by them. In his travels, he visited different countries and proceeded to Baṣrah, where the poet 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn al-Mu'adī *dh*al<sup>3</sup> happened to be at the time. The latter was surrounded by his scholars<sup>4</sup> and followers when he received intelligence of Abū Tammām's approach, and being apprehensive that the public would favour the new comer and neglect himself, he wrote these lines to Abū Tammām, who had not yet entered the city :

<sup>1</sup> The original of this, if literally translated, would run thus: "He was the unique of his time in the silk stuff of his word, and the wares of his poetry, and the goodness of his manner." In Arabic this is in very good style and perfectly intelligible.

<sup>2</sup> Short poems, the verses of which consist of but a few feet, are termed Rajaz. Each verse contains generally six مستفعلن or epitriti tertii.

<sup>3</sup> Abdessamad fils de Moadhdhel fils de Ghailan avait le prenom d'Aboulca-cem; sa mere etait une femme esclave nommee Zerka الزرقاء. C'est un poete de merite qui florissait sous les Abbasides; son pere Moadhdhel et son grand-pere Ghailan etaient poetes aussi. Moadhdhel et Abbān-ellāheki ابان اللاهقي avaient fait des satyres l'un contre l'autre. Abdessamad etait ne et avait ete eleve a Basra. Son frere Ahmad avait aussi du talent pour la poesie et y joignait un beau caractere, beaucoup de pieté et diverses qualites qui lui donnaient un rang distingue parmi les moazele et dans le monde. Abdessamad, qui etait mochant, satyrique et tres-medisant, portait e. vi a son frere et faisait contre lui des epigrammes. Il fut amoureux d'une femme nommee مشم esclave d'un seigneur de Basra. Abdessamad se trouva un jour dans une societe avec Abou Tammam; ils s'ecrivirent a l'instant l'un a l'autre des vers piquants. Abdessamad, qui composait avec plus de promptitude et avait la riposte plus vive qu'Abou Tammam, eut sur lui quelque avantage en cette occasion.—(Aghani, vol. III. f. 194—200). Note communicated by M. Caussin de Perceval.

<sup>4</sup> Scholars; غلمان (boys).

<sup>5</sup> M. de Slane reads it Muaddal.—Ed.

"You appear before the public in two characters, each of which requires a tatterer's face.<sup>1</sup> You are always soliciting the favour of a mistress or the gifts (of a patron). Can a blush of generous shame ever mantle on your cheeks<sup>2</sup>, after submitting to the degraded state of a lover and a beggar?"

When Abū Tammām read these verses, he changed his mind and turned back, saying: "This man has drawn to himself the attention of all about him, so they do not stand in need of me." (I have already mentioned some verses similar to these in the life of al-Mutanabbī).<sup>3</sup> * [Abū Tammām and Ibn al-Mu'adh dhal not being personally acquainted, the latter, on composing these lines, gave them to a copyist who was intimate with them both, and told him to deliver them to Abū Tammām: the latter, having read them, wrote on the back of the paper:

"Is it on me that you make verses filled with falsehood and calumny? you who are less than zero! In your anger you have packed your heart full of hatred, (plainly to be seen) as the palpitation of the soul is seen in the body. Wretched man! you have exposed yourself to the danger of my satires, like the ass which from fear rushes towards the lion."

'Abd al-Šamad having read the first verse, said: "What an excellent logician, to assert that a non-existence is capable of increase and diminution! Of the second verse he said, that packing was the business of Farrāshes<sup>4</sup>, and that such an idea could not be admitted in poetry; but on reading the third verse, he bit his lips. According to al-Šūlī, this anecdote is related by Kuṣḥājīm in his Maṣū'id wa'l Maṭārid, after making the following observation: "Al-Jāhīz, in

<sup>1</sup> In place of مذال, as given in most MSS., it appears more natural to read, with the Uyūn al-Tawārikh (year 231, where these verses are cited.)†

<sup>2</sup> Literally: What water remains for your face. See note on ماء الوجه No 49.

<sup>3</sup> See No. 49; they begin with these words: What merit, etc.

<sup>4</sup> See note, No. 119.

* [ ] From "Abū Tammām" to "perceives his scent" on page 144 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

† مذال or else مدالى vide Edi. or's note abov.—Ed.

speaking of certain animals which deliver themselves up to certain beasts of prey, has forgotten to mention the ass which rushes on the lion when it perceives his scent."—Abū Tammām recited to Abū Dulaf al-ʿIjī the qaṣīdah which contains this verse:

"At the sight of dwellings (abandoned) like these, and places of joyous meetings (now deserted), our tears, long treasured up, were shed in torrents!"

He admired the piece and gave the poet fifty thousand dirhams,<sup>1</sup> saying: By Allāh! it is less than your poem is worth; and that idea is only surpassed in beauty by your elegy on the death of Muḥammad Ibn Ḥumayd * al-Ṭūs.<sup>2</sup> "Which," said Abū Tammām, "does the amīr mean?"—"Why," said Abū Dulaf, "your poem commencing thus :

"Now let misfortune do its worst, and time inflict its evils! There is no excuse for eyes which have not shed their tears."

"I wish, by Allāh! that this elegy had been composed by you on me." "Nay!" said the poet, "may I and my family die to save the amīr, and may I leave the world before you!" To this Abū Dulaf replied "He whose death is deplored in verses like those, is immortal."—The learned say that the tribe of Tay produced three men, each of whom attained excellence in their speciality, namely: Ḥātim al-Ṭaʿī,<sup>3</sup> famous for his liberality; Dawūd Ibn Nuṣayr,<sup>4</sup> for his self-mortification; and Abū Tammām, for poetry.—The number of anecdotes related of Abū Tammām is very great, and I find this one

<sup>1</sup> About twelve hundred pounds sterling.

<sup>2</sup> Muḥammad Ibn Ḥamid al Ṭūsī, a son of one al-Māmūn's principal generals, was sent by that khalif at the head of an army against Bābak al-Kharrami, who was desolating the province of ʿAḍharbijān. In the action which ensued, the Muslim troops were totally defeated, and Ibn Ḥamid, abandoned by all except one faithful officer, fought till he fell. This occurred in A. H. 214 (A. C. 829-30). He was renowned for his liberality, and his death gave great pain to al-Māmūn.—(Ibn al-Aṭhīr's Kāmil).

<sup>3</sup> See D'Herbelot and Rasmussen's Additamenta ad Hist. Ar. p. 19.

<sup>4</sup> Dawūd Ibn Nuṣayr نصير al-Ṭāʿī, a doctor eminent for his knowledge of the law (العلم) his piety and self-mortification, was one of Abū Ḥanīfah's principal disciples: he was deeply learned in the Traditions. Died A. H. 165 (A. C. 781-2).—(AlNuḥūm al-Zāhirah).

*M. de Slane reads it Ḥamid.—Ed.

generally accredited; He was reciting to the Khalif a qasida composed in his praise and rhyming in s; when he came to these words:

"(In you I see) the prowess of 'Amr,<sup>1</sup> the liberality of Hatim, and the prudence of Ahnaf, joined with the keenness of Iyas<sup>2</sup>.

The vizir said to him: "How! do you compare the Commander of the faithful with vile Arabs of the desert?" On which the poet kept silence a moment, and then looked up and said (in the same rhyme and measure):

"Take not offence at my comparing him with inferiors, persons whose names have gone abroad and are proverbial for liberality and bravery; for God has compared his light to a mean object, a candle in a niche."<sup>3</sup>

The vizir then told the khalif to grant to Abu Tammam whatever he should ask, as he foresaw that the poet could not live more than forty days; "for," said he, "I perceive that his eyes are suffused with blood from excessive thought, and the person in whom such symptoms appear cannot survive longer than that time." On this, the khalif asked Abu Tammam what he would like to have, and being answered that he desired the government of Mosul, he appointed him to that place; Abu Tammam proceeded thither and remained there till his death. This anecdote is however totally devoid of truth, and is related differently by Abu Bakr al-Suli in his History of Abu Tammam. "This poet," says he "when reciting the above qasida to Ahmad, son of the khalif al-Mu'tasim, came of these words: The prowess of 'Amr, etc.; on which the philosopher Abu Yusuf Yaqub Ibn al-Sabbah al-Kindi,<sup>4</sup> who happened to be present, observed that the

1 The poet meant either 'Amr Ibn Ma'dikarib, or 'Amr Ibn al-Mundhir, surnamed Ibn Hind; his prowess was proverbial. (See Pocock's specimen Hist. Ar. p. 73, and Rammussen's Additamenta ad Hist. Ar., p. 50, 53.)

2 See his life, No. 102.

3 See Qur'an, surat 24, verse 35.

4 Abu Yusuf Ya'qub Ibn Ishaq Ibn al-Sabbah al-Kindi, the philosopher of the Arabs, was descended from the royal family of Kindah.-(See their genealogy and history in my Diwan d'Amro al-Kais.)-His father Ishaq, was emir of Kufah under al-Mahdi and al-Rashid; his great grandfather al-Ash'ath <sup>الاشعث</sup> was one of Muhmmad's companions; Qays, the father of al-Ash'ath and sovereign of all the tribe of Kindah, was celebrated in four qasidas by the poet al-A'sha. (See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie tom. II). Ma'di Karib, father of Qays, reigned in the province of Hadramaut over the Banu al-Harith al-Asghar, a branch of the tribe of Kindah, Mo'awiyah and his other emir was much above the persons to whom the poet compared him; and Abu Tammam, after a short silence, added the two other verses; but, when he gave (to the prince) the copy of the qasidah, it was discovered that these lines were not in it, and the audience were in admiration at the promptitude of his genius and his presence of mind. "When he withdrew, al-Kindi, who was the philosopher of the Arab, said: This circumstance is related in a different manner, but that account is totally ungrounded, and ours alone is correct." I have examined into the reality of the fact that Abu Tammam was governor of Mosul, and all I have found is, that al-Hasan Ibn Wahb<sup>1</sup> had appointed him master of the post-horse establishment<sup>2</sup> at Mosul, in which city he died. The exactness of the anecdote is also disproved by the fact that this qasidah was not composed in honour of any of the khalifs, but that it was addressed to Ahmad son of al-Mu'tasim, or Ahmad son of al-Mamun neither of whom became khalif. In one of the seven memorials in which (the poet) Hays Bays solicited the government of Ba'quba<sup>3</sup> from the khalif al-Mustashid, [he states that the government of Mosul had been granted to a poet of the tribe of Tay. As for this assertion, Hays Bays must have either grounded it on hearsay, without examining into its truth, or advanced it in the idea that it would serve him as a means for obtaining the government of Ba'quba. Ibn Diayah has followed Hays Bays in the same error, and inserted it in his work called the Nibras. It is related by al-Suli that Abu Tammam recited to the vizir Ibn al-Zayyat a poem which he had composed in his honour, and containing these two verses:

"His generosity is a constant rain, rushing with slackened bridle, and of which the succour is implored by the afflicted earth. Could a tract of country proceed towards another to pay it honour, each barren spot had gone towards the (land which he inhabits)".

ancestors ruled the tribe of Ma'ad كانوا اهل كالى معد al-Mushakkar (a fortress in Bahrayn according to Abu al-Fada in his (Geography), al-Yemama and Bahrayn. I give this extract from the Tarikh al-Hukama, because it serves to confirm, if necessary, M. de Sacy's opinion that the philosopher al-Kindi was not of Jewish, but of Arabian extraction. (See 'Abd al-Latif, page 487). Casiri, in his Bibliotheca Arabica, t. I, p. 358, has given a short notice on al-Kindi and a list of his works, all of which he took from the Tarikh al-Hukama, but he suppressed the passage cited above.

1 See in the life of Sulayman Ibn Wahb.

2 The postmaster kept horses for the special use of government officers and messengers; he acted also as a spy on the conduct of the provincial governor, and he then corresponded directly with the khalif or the sultan.

3 Ba'quba, a large town at two parasangs from Baghdad (Abu al-Fada's Geography.)

(When) Ibn al-Zayyat (heard these verses, he) said: "O Abu Tammam! your poetry is adorned with the jewels of your words and the originality of your ideas; with beauty, moreover, which surpasses the splendour of jewels on the necks of handsome females. The most abundant remuneration which could be treasured up for you is unequal to the merit of your poetry." A philosopher who was present then observed that the poet would die young, and being asked what induced him to believe so, he answered: "I saw in him sharpness of wit, and penetration and intelligence, united to the refined taste and prompt genius; from this I knew that the mind would consume the body, as a sword of Indian steel eats through its scabbard. And such was the fact, for he died at some what more than thirty years of age.<sup>1</sup> This, however, does not accord with what we shall state lower down respecting the time of his birth and his death. The poetry of Abu Tammam was put in order, for the first time, by Abu Bakr al-Suli, who arranged it alphabetically (according to the rhymes), then 'Ali Ibn 'Hamzah al-Ispahani classed it according to the subjects.] Abu Tammam was born at Jasim, A.H. 190 (A.D. 805-6); other accounts say in A.H. 188, 172<sup>2</sup>. Jasim is a village situated in al-Jaydur, a canton in the dependencies of Damascus, between that city and Tabariyah (Tiberias). He passed his youth in Misr, where, it is said, he used to distribute water to the public out of a pitcher in the mosque<sup>3</sup>; but some say that he worked in the service of a tailor at Damascus, where his father sold wine<sup>4</sup>. Abu Tammam was a tall man of a tawny colour, he spoke his language with elegance and sweetness, but stammered in a slight degree. After studying and passing, through different situations of life, he attained that eminence by which he is illustrious. His death took place at Mosul, as has been already said, in A. H. 231 (A.C. 845-6); but other dates are assigned to that event, such as the month of Dhu al-Qa'dah or that of the first Jumada, 228, or 229 and some say that he died in the month of Muharram, A.H. 232. It is stated by al-Buhturi that a canopy was built over his grave by Abu Nahshal Ibn Humayd al-Tusi,<sup>5</sup> and I myself saw the tomb

1 It is not easy to explain how al-Suli, in relating this anecdote, did not perceive that it was only another version of the one which he had already given as the sole correct. Ibn Khalikan has perhaps mistaken the name of the author whom he cites.

2 Al-Jaydur is one of the dependencies of Damascus, to the north of al-Hauran. It is said, however, that al-Jaydur and al-Hauran are the same place.—(Marasid al-I'tila.)

3 See Lane's Modern Egyptians, Vol. II, p. 18.

4 This would prove that his father was not a Muslim.

5 This was probably the son of the Hamid al-Tusi mentioned in note (5), No. 117.

at Mosul, outside the Maydan Gate on the edge of the ditch which surrounds the city; the common people call it the tomb of Tammam, the poet. It was related to me by 'Afif al-Din Abu 'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn 'Adlan al-Musili, the grammarian and interpreter, that he asked Ibn 'Unayn (whose life shall be given later) what the meant by this verse;

"May God shed genial showers on the groves of Ghutatayn,<sup>1</sup> but of barren Mosul, may he refresh the tombs alone!"

"For what reason," said Ibn 'Adlan, "when you exclude Mosul from the benediction, do you except its tombs?" To which he replied, that it was in consideration of Abu Tammam's. This verse belongs to a qasidah composed by Ibn 'Unayn in praise of the sultan al-Malik al-Mo'azzam Sharaf al-Din 'Isa (whose life shall be given later). It is a very fine poem and begins thus;

"You long to see the palaces of 'Ali<sup>2</sup> at Damascus, and the youths and dark eyed maids in Nairabayn.<sup>3</sup>

The following lines were composed on the death of Abu Tammam by al-Hasan Ibn Wahb:

"Poetry was in affliction at the death of the last of the poets; him who was the lake in the meadow of poetry Habib al-Taj. He and it are now dead and sojourn together in one tomb; it was thus also that they were (inseparable) when alive.

some persons say, however, that these verses were composed on his death by Dik al-Jinn. The following lines are taken from a qasidah in which his death was lamented by al-Hasan Ibn Wahb:

"That precious tomb at Mosul has been watered by clouds which deplored his loss. When they shed their dew upon it, that dew fell

1 The Ghutah, or cultivated grounds which surround Damascus, are well known. The poets often call it Ghutatayn (the two Ghutahs) although there is in reality but one place which bears the name. (Marasid under the word نوب).

2 'Alia; this is perhaps the river called al-Tawamat al-'Alia التامة العليا one of the streams which water Damascus. (See Oiyun al-Tawarikh, No. 638, fol. 93).

3 Nairabayn, a delicious spot in the neighbourhood of Damascus. As Nairabayn is the dual form of Nairab, it might be supposed that there were two places of the name, but such was not the case. It is by the poets that the dual was employed. (Marasid.)

The story is not in the autograph.

Probably the poet refers to Ghutah and Nayrab in both the verses. Ed.

in copious showers.<sup>1</sup> The lightnings beat (the) cheeks (of the clouds in grief), and the thunders tore open (their) bosoms. For the earth of that tomb contains Habib (a friends), who was called my friend.

The verses which follow were on his death by Ibn al-Zayyat, who was then vizir to al-Mu'tasim; but they are attributed also to katib Abu 'l-Zibriqan 'Abd Allah, son of al-Zabriqan, an enfranchised slave of the Omayyad family:

"It is most dreadful news which has reached our agitated hearts, Habib, they say is dead; O, I implore you! let it not be him of Tay.

The names of the persons mentioned in Abu Tammam's genealogy are so well known, that it is needless to mark their orthography. Al-Jaydur is a canton in the province of Damascus, near al-Haulan.<sup>2</sup> Al-Taj means belonging to Tay, which is a famous tribe. This relative adjective is of irregular formation; analogy would have required it to be Tayî<sup>3</sup>, but the formation of relative adjectives admits some variations; thus from dahr (time) is derived duhrl (temporal), and from sahl (a plain), suhll (plain, level), etc.

144. AL-HAJJAJ IBN YUSUF

Abu Muhammad al-Hajjaj was son of Yusuf Ibn al-Hakam Ibn 'Uqayl Ibn Mas'ud Ibn 'Amir Ibn Mu'attib Ibn Malik Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Amr Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Awf Ibn Qasi (called also Thaqif): mention is made of Thaqif in following terms by Ibn al-Kalbi in his Jamharat al-Nisab: "Munabbih Ibn al-Nabit had a son called Qasi, who is said to be the same person as Thaqif. Such is the genealogy given by those who state that Thaqif was sprung from Iyad<sup>4</sup> but some say that he descended from Qays, and that Qasi was son of Munabbih Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawazin;<sup>5</sup> and they state that Umayma, Qasi's mother, and daughter of Sa'd Ibn Hudhyl, lived (as wife) with Munabbih Ibn Nabit, and being afterwards married to Munabbih Ibn Bakr, she went to

1 Literally: when they shed their dew on it, they slied on it the full of the water-bag of the dark cloud, which pours forth after theirs, another.

2 Al-Haulan is the name of a village of a hill near Damascus.-(Marasid.)

3 The difference between the two forms can be best understood from the inspection of the original text.

4 From this we must suppose that the descent of Munabbih from Iyad was well established and generally known.

5 See the seventh genealogical list, drawn up by Eichhora after Ibn Qutaybah, in the Monumenta antiquissima Historia Arabum.

him, being then pregnant with Qays by (her former husband Ibn al-Nabit) the Iyadite.--(Al-Hajja) al-Thaqafi (the descendant of Thaqif) was governor of Traq and Khurasan for 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, and on his death he was confirmed in his authority by the new khaliif al-Walid. Al-Mas'udi in his Muruj al-Dhahab narrates as follows:--" Al-Farighah, the mother of al-Hajja and daughter to Hammam Ibn 'Urwah Ibn Mas'ud of the tribe of Thaqif, wife to al-Harith Ibn Kaldah, a member of the tribe and native of the town of Ta'if; this Harith was judge of the Arabs.<sup>1</sup> Having gone into her apartment early one morning, he found her picking her teeth, on which he sent her a sentence of divorce? And she said to him: 'Why have you sent to me my divorce? has my conduct given you any cause for suspicion.--'Yes, said he, 'When I went in to you in the morning, you were picking your teeth: if you had breakfasted before the regular time, you are a glutton; and if you have passed the night with particles of meat sticking between your teeth you are sluttish. To this she replied: 'It was neither one nor the other; but I was taking out a fragment of the toothpick. She then married Yusuf Ibn Abi 'Uqayl al-Thaqafi, to whom she bore al-Hajja, who came into the world incompletely formed, as he had an imperforate anus. This defect was removed by an operation; and the child refused the breast of its mother and every other person, so that they were at a loss what to do, till, as it is said, Satan appeared to them in the form of al-Harith Ibn Kaldah and asked them what was the matter; they told him the circumstance, and he said; 'Kill a black kid and give its blood to the child to drink; the next day do the same thing; the third day slay a black he-goat and give the blood to be drunk by the child, then kill a snake and make the child swallow the blood, and daub his face with some of it; if you do thus, the child will take the breast on the fourth day. They followed these directions, and the effect of this first nourishment which he received was such that he could not refrain from shedding blood. He even said of himself, that his greatest enjoyment was to [shed blood and commit actions which no other could.'<sup>2</sup> Ibn 'Abd Rabbih says, in his 'Iqd, that al-Farighah was wife to al-Mughayrah Ibn Shu'bah, and that it was he who divorced her on account of the circumstance of the tooth pick. He adds that al-Hajja and his father kept school at Ta'if, and that the former attached himself to] Ruh Ibn Zinba' al-Judhami<sup>3</sup> vizir of

1 Harith Ibn Kaladah was one of Muhammad's companions.--(Qamus.)

2 Some of the MSS. have يقدّم in place of يقدّر if this reading be adopted, the sense is: which no other dare to do.

3 Abu Zar'ah ( زرعه ) Ruh Ibn Zinba' al-Judami, the Syrian, was

(Cont. on page 151)

'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, and entered into the Shurtah (police guards),<sup>1</sup> of which Ruh was commander. 'Abd al-Malik, having remarked the indiscipline of his army, and that the soldiers never set out nor heated at the same time with himself, complained of it to Ruh Ibn Zinba', who told him that there was a man in the police guards named al-hajjaj Ibn Yusuf, who, if the Commander of the faithful gave him the command of the troops, would oblige them to march and to halt in conformity to his (the khalif's) movements. 'Abd al-Malik adopted this counsel and nominated al-Hajjaj commander of the army. The guards under Ibn Zinba's orders were the only troops dispensed with the obligation of marching and halting at the same time as the khalif, and one day, after the departure of the rest of army al-Hajjaj came upon them and found them at dinner: he asked them what had prevented them from setting out with the Commander of the faithful, and received this answer: "Dismount, you son of a slut<sup>2</sup>! and dine with us." To this he gave a refusal, telling them that those times were gone by; and he ordered them to be flogged and paraded before the army; by his directions also, the tents belonging to Ruh Ibn Zinba' were set on fire. Ruh complained bitterly of this to the khalif, who set immediately for al-Hajjaj and said to him: "What induced you to do as you have done?—"I have done nothing," replied al-Hajjaj.—"Who did it then?" said the khalif.—"You;" answered al-Hajjaj; my hand is your hand; my whip is your whip; and what prevents the "Commander of the faithful from presenting Ruh with a double quantity of tents and men,<sup>3</sup> rather than break my commission after having given it yourself?" The khalif, on this, indemnified Ruh for his loss and treated al-Hajjaj with increased favour. This was first known proof which al-Hajjaj gave of his abilities. It was unheard of, what slaughter he committed, how much blood he shed, and what tortures he inflicted. It is said that Ziyad one of the Tabi'is (see note (2), Anshor's Preface) and highly respected by the people. Mu'awiyah was so apprehensive of his influence, that he resolved to put him to death, and had him arrested, but he afterwards set him at liberty. Ruh was the grandee (عظيم) of the empire of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan. He was husband to (the celebrated poetess) Hind, daughter of al-Nu'man, and he died A.H. 73 A.C. 692-3).—(An Nujum al-Zahirah.) (Al-Makin No. 37) call him 'Abd al-malik's katib, or secretary of state.

---

1 It may be observed that Ibn Khaldun, as cited by M. de Hammer in his Landverwaltung unter dem Khalifate (page 154), says that the post of commander of the police guards was first established under the Abbasides: this seems in contradiction with Ibn Khallikan's statement.

2 This form of compellation was very frequently used by the Arabs; it indicated either anger or familiarity.

3 Men: the Arabic word ghilman signifies boys, pages, mamluks etc

Ibn Abih<sup>1</sup> wished to resemble the khalif 'Umar in firm authority, resolution, decision, and severity of administration, but that he carried this to an excess and passed bounds; and al-Hajjaj, say they, took Ziyad for his model, and killed and destroyed. One day, he said in the course of a khutab<sup>2</sup> which he was pronouncing: "O men! God's prohibitions are easier to be borne with than his punishments: On which a man rose up and said; "Woe be to thee, O Hajjaj what an impudent face thou hast, and how little modesty!" Al-Hajjaj ordered him to sit down, and when he descended from the pulpit he called him forth: "Thou hast been presumptuous towards me!" said he. "How?" replied the man, "thou art presumptuous towards God and dost not disapprove of thine own conduct, and if we are presumptuous towards thee, thou disapprovest of it! Al-Hajjaj, on receiving this answer, let the man go. Ibn al-Jawzi says, in his Talqih, that al-Farighah, mother of al-Hajjaj, was the person who was surnamed al-Mutamamiyah (the wish-maker); When she made the wish, she was wife to Ibn Shu'bah, and we shall here present an abridgement of the anecdote as related by this writer. 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab happening to make his rounds one night in the city of Madinah heard a woman sing, from behind the curtain of her apartment, the following verse:

"Where shall I find wine that I may drink it? or else where shall I find Nasr Ibn Hajjaj?"

On this, 'Umar said: "I shall not allow in the same city with myself, a man whose beauty is celebrated by young females in the privacy of their apartments; bring me Nasr Ibn Hajjaj!" When he was brought he was found to be the most beautiful of men in countenance and the handsomest in hair; and 'Umar said to him: "The Commander of the faithful's determination is, that 'you shorten your hair.' When this was done, his cheeks appeared (fair) as half-moons. "Now, put on a turban," said 'Umar. The turban was put on, and the youth still charmed the spectators with his eyes. Then 'Umar said; "Dwell not in any town where I may be." "What is my crime, O Commander of the faithful?" said Nasr. "It must be done as I told you," replied 'Umar; and he then sent him off to Basrah. Such are the main points of the narration, and I suppress the sequel. This Nasr was son of Hajjaj Ibn 'Ilat al-Sulami, one of Muhammad's companions.,. Some say, however, that the Mutamanniyah belonged to the tribe of 1 Ziyad Ibn Abih; Ziyad son of his father, that is, the bastard. He was son of Abu Sufyan. His history may be collected from D'Herbelot and Abu 1-Fida: Annales, years 44 and 53.

2 See No. 77, note on Khutbah

Kinanah, and that she was al-Hajjaj's paternal grandmother.--It is related by Abu Ahmad al-'Askari, in his Kitab al-Tashif, that the people passed upwards of forty years regarding the Qur'an from 'Uthman's copy<sup>1</sup>, but, in the days of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, the erroneous readings had become numerous and has spread through Iraq; this obliged al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf to have recourse to his katibs<sup>2</sup> for the purpose of putting distinctive marks on the words of uncertain pronunciation<sup>3</sup>; and it is said that Nasr Ibn 'Asim undertook that duty and imagined single and double points (nuqat) which he placed in different manners.<sup>4</sup> The people then passed some time without making any copies of the Qur'an but with points, the usage of which did not, however prevent some false readings from taking place, and for this reason they invented the ij'am (points serving to distinguish the letters of a similar form one from another), and they (the people) thus placed the ij'am posteriorly to the nuqat; but yet when, by neglect, a word (of the Qur'an) was written with its full accompaniment (of distinctive marks), and was thus deprived of its requisites, erroneous readings occurred; for this they endeavoured in vain to find a remedy, and they were obliged to recur to oral tradition and learn (the true readings) from the mouths of men.<sup>5</sup> On the whole, the anecdotes concerning al-Hajjaj are numerous and would take long to relate.<sup>6</sup> It was he who founded the city of Wasit; he commenced it A.H. 84 (A.C. 703) and finished it in 86. He named it Wasit (intermediate,) because it lay between Basrah and Kufah, and might thus be said to lie between (tawassat) these two capitals. Ibn al-Jawzi states, however, in his historical annals, entitled Shuzur al-'Uqud, that al-Hajjaj began to build Wasit in the year 47, and terminated it in

1 See Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, year 30.

2 See No. 10, on al-'Akr.

3 The word حرف in the plural حروف is employed by the Quranists to designate a group of letters (or word) which may be read in different manners. See, for instance, the marginal notes of the Qur'an printed at Casan.

4 It is necessary for me to observe that the vowel-signs and diacritical points now in use, were invented, as is generally stated, by Khalil Ibn Ahmad, who died in the second century to the Hijrah, and that they are totally different from those imagined by Zalim al-Du'all (see his life), and by the secretaries of al-Hajjaj. The points introduced by the latter were similar to those of the specimens given by M. de Sacy in his Arabic grammar, plate III, tom. I and Dr. Pusey in the Catal. Bib. Bod., tom. II, tab. I.

5 M. de Sacy has given a translation of this passage in his Memoire sur la litterature des Arabes; it may be observed that I differ totally with him respecting the meaning of the words huruf, nuqat, and ij'am.

6 Consult D'Herbelot, Abu 'l-Fida, al-Makin, and Price's Retrospect of Mahammadan History, Vol. I.

78. When al-Hajjaj felt his death approach, he called in an astrologer and asked him if he knew of any prince who was to die (at that time), and the astrologer replied: "Yes, I do; but you are not the person." "How know you that?" said al-Hajjaj. "Because the name of him who is to die is Kulayb." "It is I, by Allah!" exclaimed al-Hajjaj "for such was the name by which my mother called me." He then made his will. One thing puts in mind of another.<sup>1</sup> This is like the words of the missionary<sup>2</sup> 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ali al-Sulayhi (of whom mention will be made hereafter). A simple missionary in Yemen,<sup>3</sup> he became sovereign of all that country, and held its princes in subjection till the period which God had assigned to his life had expired, when he left San'a to make the pilgrimage to Makkah in A.H. 472 (A.C. 1081). On arriving at al-Mahjam,<sup>4</sup> he encamped without the town, at a farm called Umm al-Duhaym,<sup>5</sup> or Bir Umm Ma'bad (the well of Ma'bad's mother), and was there attacked unawares by Sa'id al-Ahwal, son of Najah. This Najah was lord of the province of Tahamah, and had been deprived of his life and kingdom by al-Sulayhi, but Sa'id and his other sons had escaped. Sa'id arrived with a few partisans and entered the camp of al-Sulayhi, where they were mistaken for followers of the army; none discovered their real character but 'Abd Allah the brother of al-Sulayhi, who immediately got on horseback and said to his brother: "To horse! for, by Allah! here is al-Ahwal with his men, of whose coming we were warned yesterday by the letter which As'ad Ibn Shihab wrote us from Zabid." "Calm your mind," replied al-Sulayhi; "it is only at al-Duhaym and the well of Umm Ma'bad that I am to die;" thinking that it was of that Umm Ma'bad the Khuza'tie, at whose dwelling the blessed Prophet and Abu Bakr stopped on their retreat from Makkah<sup>6</sup> this

---

1 Ibn Khalikan gives a second time the anecdote which follows; it will be found, with some slight difference, in the life of 'Ali al-Sulayhi; and this induces me to think that the author intended to suppress it here, where it is totally misplaced.

It is inserted here from some other hand, Vide No. 457—Ed.

2 Missionary; see No. 10 note on da'is.

3 Consult, on the events which follow, Abu 'I-Fida's Annals, year 203 and 412; Johannsen's Historian Yrmana, pp. 121 at seq. In the three relations, a number of differences will be observed, which it is needless to notice here.

4 The town of al-Mahjam lay a the distance of three days' journey to the north-east of Zabid, and six days' journey from San'a.—(Abu 'I-Fida's Geography.)

5 This name is sometimes written simply al-Duhaim.

6 Muhammad and Abu Bakr, on their hijrah (departure, emigration) from place lies near Makkah, on the road from it to Madinah, and is in the neighbourhood of al-Iuhfah<sup>1</sup>. On this, some of al-Sulayhi's companions called to him, saying: "Defend your life! for, by Allah! this is the well of al-Duhaym Ibn 'Isa, and this mosque is built on the spot where the tent of Umm Ma'bad Ibn al-Harith al-'Absi was situated. On hearing these words, he was seized with terror, and, despairing of his life, he remained fixed to the spot, where he was immediately slain with his brother and his family. Sa'id al-Ahwal then brought the army of al-Sulayhi under his own command and took possession of his kingdom. Sa'id was brother of the illustrious and eminent prince Jayyash: his father, the prince Najah, had been a slave to the prince Marjan, who himself had been a slave to Husayn Ibn Salamah; Husayn had been enfranchised by Rushd al-Ustad<sup>2</sup> the Abyssinian. These two, Husayn, and Rushd before him, ruled the kingdom with absolute authority, although they were only ostensibly vizirs in the service of the last prince of the Ziyadite family, the sovereigns of Yemen. Their pupil was son to Abu al-Jaysh Ishaq Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ziyad, and his name was 'Abd Allah; some say Ibrahim or Ziyad. It was in his reign that the Ziyadite dynasty was overthrown by Qays, who had been a slave to the Marjan above-mentioned. On the death of Abu al-Jaysh, his child was confided to the care of his (its) aunt and of Marjan, the enfranchised slave of Abu al-Jaysh: Marjan had two slaves, Abu Sa'id Najah and Qays, both of whom became independent of their master; Qays was governor of the capital<sup>3</sup> and Najah ruled the provinces of al-Kadra, the town of al-Mahjam, and other places. A jealousy sprung up between these two, for they both aspired to the vizirat; Qays was a perverse and wicked man, Najah was mild and just. The former, having suspected the aunt of the boy to be more favourably inclined to Najah than to him, made complaints against her and her nephew to his master Marjan, who, in consequence, seized on them both and delivered them up to their enemy Qays and he, headless of their supplications, immured them

(Cont. on page 155)

---

Makkah to Madinah, stopped at the tent of the Umm Mabad 'Atika عاتكة and asked for food, but she had none to give them. On this Muhammad went to a sheep which was in the tent, and drew from it a great quantity of milk; this was the more extraordinary as that sheep was very old and had ceased to give any for some time before.-(al-Nuwairi, M.S. of the Leyden library).

1 Al-Ustad (the master); a title given to eunuchs and tutors of young princes.

2 The capital, or royal court الحاضرة literally: The presence.

3 Literally: Et fuit ex eo quod fuit, he became what he became.

alive and in an upright position. They thus perished in A.H. 407 (A.C. 1016-17). Najah, on learning the circumstance, hastened to avenge their death. He waged war against Qays, who was defeated, lost his capital Zabid, and subsequently his life in a combat at the gate of that city; this was in A.H. 412 (A.C. 1021-2). Najah, having thus obtained possession of the metropolis, said to Marjan; "What have you done with your and my master and mistress?" "They are in that wall," he replied. Najah then had their bodies taken out, and prayed over them, and buried them in a chapel which he erected to receive them; as for Marjan, he immured him in their place till he died. Najah was poisoned at al-Kadra in A.H. 452 (A.C. 1060), by the treachery of a female slave whom he had received as a present from al-Sulayhi. After the death of Najah, al-sulayhi wrote, in the year 453, to al-Mustansir, the lord of Egypt, demanding authorisation to preach openly in favour of the Fatimite dynasty, and having received that permission, he proceeded (to assert al-Mustansir's authority). His subsequent adventures we may omit.<sup>1</sup> Let us return to al-Hajjaj; during his last illness he used to repeat the following verses. Which were composed by 'Obayd Ibn Sufyan al-'Ukli:

"O Lord! my enemies have sworn, nay sworn positively, that I am one of those who shall dwell in the fire (of hell). Is it (not) from blindness (of heart) that they swear? Unfortunate wretches! what opinion must they have of Him who has always shown mercy and forgiveness?"

He wrote also a letter to al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, informing him of his illness, and concluded it with these lines:

When I meet God and find favour with Him, therein shall be the joy of my soul. The eternity of God sufficeth me, and I therefore place not my hopes on mortals. Those who were before us have tasted of death, and after them we also shall taste it.

His malady was cancer in the stomach, for which he called in a physician, who, having examined into his case, tied a bit of meat to a string and passed it down his throat; after a lapse of some time he drew it out, and found a swarm of worms adhering to it; God gave also a cold ague power over him, and although vases filled with lighted coals were placed around him so close as to scorch his skin, he felt them not. He complained of his sufferings to al-Hasan al-Basri, who made answer: "I forbade you to attack me of holiness, but you persisted! "O Hasan," replied al-Hajjaj, "I ask you not to pray to God that he may deliver me from my pains; beg of Him only that He hasten to] take my soul from my body and terminate my tortures." Al-Hasan on this wept bitterly, and al-Hajjaj continued to suffer under his malady for fifteen days; he then expired, in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 95 (May or June, A.C. 714), (some say in Shawwal), at the age of fifty-three, or (which is more correct) fifty-four years. Al-Tabari says, in his great historical work, that al-Hajjaj died on Friday, 21 Ramadan, A.H. 95; and another historian relates that al-Hasan al-Basri, on learning his death, made aprostration in thanks giving to God, saying, "O my God! Thou hast caused him to die; let also his example die from among us. Al-Hajjaj was buried at Wasit, in which city he died; but his tomb was afterwards levelled to the ground and a current of water turned over it. May God pardon him! He once dreamt that his eyes had been plucked out, and he therefore divorced his wives, Hind the daughter of al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah, and Hind, the daughter of Asma, Ibn Kharjah; he hoped by that to fulfil his dream; in a short time, however, he received news that his brother Muhammad had died in Yemen, and that, on the same day, his own son Muhammad had died also, on which he said: "This, by Allah! is the fulfilment of my dream; Muhammad and Muhammad! in the same day! We belong to God and to Him we return! He then asked if there was any person who would recite him verses to console him, and al-Farazdaq pronounced the following:

---

<sup>1</sup> They were governors of provinces, and had therefore the right of saying the khotba from the pulpit.

"This misfortune has no misfortune equal to it! to lose such persons as Muhammad and Muhammad! princes who have left the pulpits<sup>1</sup> vacant (and desolate)! Death has seized upon them unawares."

His brother Muhammad died some days after the beginning of the month of Rajab, A.H. 91 (May, A.C. 710); he was then governor of the province of Yemen. Al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik sent a letter to al-Hajjaj, consoling him on the loss of his brother, and al-Hajjaj wrote to him in reply: "Commander of the faithful; I and Muhammad never met together during a long period but for one year; and in that absence I never had such hopes of seeing him soon, as I now have of meeting him again in a mansion where two sincere Muslims shall never be disunited." Thaqafi means belonging to Thaqif, a great and well-known tribe dwelling at Ta'if.

145. AL-MUHASIBI

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Harith Ibn Asad al-Muhasibi, the famous

---

1 Taif; a well-known town lying to the south-east of Makkah.

ascetic and one of the men of the truth<sup>1</sup> drew his origin from a family which inhabited Basrah. He was one of those who possessed both the science of the exterior and the science of the interior<sup>2</sup>: he composed some ascetic and dogmatic treatises, and is author of the work (on Sufism) entitled al-Ri'ayah (contemplation). Having inherited seventy thousand dirhems from his father, he refused, through religious scruples, to accept them; it is reported that his reason for this was, that his father professed the doctrine of man's free will, and that he made this observation: "The Tradition is authentic which informs us that Muhammad declared: Persons of different religions cannot inherit, one from the other:" and he died in want, not possessing a single dirhem. It is related that when he stretched forth his hand to partake of food the purity of which was doubtful, he would be warned from touching it by a pulsation in his finger. Being asked what was intelligence, he answered; "The light of the natural sentiment (accompanied) with experience, and which is increased and fortified by science and prudence." He used to say: "There are three things which we find not, beauty with continence, fair words with honesty, and friendship with sincerity." He died A.H. 243 (A.C. 857-8). Al-Sam'ani says that he was named Muhasibi, because he frequently called himself to an account for his actions (yuhasib). He says also that Ahmad Ibn Hanbal disliked him, and banished him, on account of his speculations in scholastic theology and his works on that subject, he was therefore obliged to seek concealment from public (indignation), and on his death, four persons only attended his funeral service. The anecdotes related of what took place between him and al-Junayd are well known.<sup>3</sup>

146. ABU FIRAS AL-HAMDANI

Abu Firas al-Harith Ibn Abi al-'Ala Sa'id Ibn Hamdan Ibn Hamdun al-Hamdani was an uncle's son to Nasir al-Dawlat and Sayf al-Dawlat the sons of Hamdan: in the lives of these two princes, we

1 The man of the truth, the Sufis see note حقیقة No 140.

2 Reiske, in his Annals of Abu 'l-Fida, tom. II, p. 698, has translated the same passage; he renders it thus: "Qui simul conjuxit externi (civils) et interni (spiritualis) scientiam." The science of the interior means sufism, and that of the exterior, the ordinary branches of learning.

For further reference, vide Ansab, f. 509 b.

3 I have not been able to find any of these anecdotes in the manuscripts which I have consulted. They may probably be given in the Hilyat al-Awliya; but the copy of that work in the Bib. du Roi is incomplete.

shall give the rest of the genealogy. Al-Tha'alibi, in speaking of Abu Firas, says<sup>1</sup> 'The pearl of his time, the sun of his age in learning, talent, generosity, glory, eloquence, horsemanship, and bravery; his poetry is celebrated and current (throughout the world); it combines beauty, merit, ease, depth, softness, sublimity, and sweetness; with him were the brightness of genius, the impress of elegant taste, and the lustre of a princely race; qualities such as were never found before in any poet except 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Mi'tazz, but Abu Firas is considered superior to him by persons of the profession and by critics. The Sahib Ibn Abbad used to say: 'Poetry began with a prince and ended with one; meaning 'Imra al-Qays and Abu Firas. Al-Mutanabbi bore testimony to his superiority and pre-eminence; he avoided his contact<sup>2</sup>, neither did he proceed to cope with him nor dare to rival him; and his motive for omitting his praises when he celebrated those of all the rest of the Hamdan family was, to testify his respect for him and to honour him; his silence did not proceed from forgetfulness or contempt. Sayf al-Dawlat highly admired the excellent qualities of Abu Firas, and distinguished him above the rest of the family by the honours he conferred on him, as he took him with him on military expeditions, or left him as his lieutenant over his provinces." "In one of his engagements with the Greeks, Abu Firas was wounded by an arrow, the head of which remained in his thigh and he was made prisoner. They conducted him to Kharshannah, and from that to Constantinople; this occurred in A.H. 348 (A.C. 959-60), and in the year 355 he was redeemed from captivity by Sayf al-Dawlat." Such are the words of Abu T-Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Zarrad al-Daylami; but in this, it is said, he is mistaken, for Abu Firas was made a prisoner twice; the first time at Magharat al-Kuhl in the year 348, but he was then not taken farther than Kharshannah, which is a fortress in the country of the Greeks (Asia Minor) and situated on the Euphrates;<sup>3</sup> it is said that, when in that fortress, he mounted his horse and spurred him from the top of the wall into the river, but God knows best: the second time that he was made a prisoner by the Greeks was at Manbij in the month of Shawwal, 351 (November, A.C. 962); they then took him to Constantinople, where he remained in captivity for four years. During his confinement, he composed a great deal of poetry, which is still extant in the collection

---

1 See the Yatimah, No. 1370, fol. 8.

2 Literally: His side. This seems to be analogous to the French expression; Il ne se frota pas a lui.

3 Kharshannah, the Charisianum Castrum of Cedrus. A great portion of Cappadocia bore this name. (See St. Martin's note in Lebeau's Histoire du Bas-Empire, t. XIII. p. 107.)

of his poems; he held the town of Manbej in fief (from his cousin Sayf al-Dawlat). The following verses are of his composition.

"It was from your supply that I drew my force; you were to me a helping hand and an arm in the days of distress! But I since received from you the reverse of my hopes, and a man my be surfeited with fair promises."<sup>1</sup>

By the same:

"She was cruel;<sup>2</sup> yet cruelty only increased my affection for that beloved object, who despite her conduct, shall always be beloved. Her calumniators summed up to me her faults, but can a fair face ever be in fault?"

By the same:

"I am inebriated with her looks, not with wine; the grace of her motions has removed sleep from my eyes. I am not overcome by the pure liquor of the grape, but by the charms of her neck; it is her perfections which subdued me, not wine. When she turns her cheeks away, she makes my resolution yield, and that which her robes cover has ravished away my heart"<sup>3</sup>

His poetry abounds with beauties. He was slain in a combat with some slaves belonging to his own family, in the year 357 (A.C. 967-8). I read in his diwan, the following piece which he addressed to his daughter when he was on the point of death:

"Grieve not, my dear girl! all mankind must depart (this life); lament me with sighs (only), and remain behind thy veil and the curtain of the (harem). Say to me, when I am too weak to answer: "The ornament of the youth, Abu Firas, has not enjoyed "youth to the last."

From this it would appear that he was not slain, or else that he lingered for some time of his wounds before he expired. It is related by Ibn Khalawayih that Abu Firas, on the death of Sayf al-Dawlat,

1 Literally: A man may be choked with cool, or refreshing water. These verses were addressed to Sayf al-Dawlat; apparently from Constantinople, where the author was in prison.

2 In these little piece and the one which follows, have substituted the feminine pronoun for the masculine. See my observation on this subject in the Introduction.

3 In the original language this piece is full of jeux de mots; which, in Arabic poetry and prose, are considered by rhetoricians as a great beauty.

resolved to take forcible possession of Emessa; but Sayf al-Dawlat, son, Abu T-Ma'ali, and his slave Qarghawayh received information of this project and sent troops to oppose him; (in the action which ensued) he was taken prisoner, after receiving a number of sabre wounds, and he died on the way (When they were bearing him off.) I have read in a collection of loose notes<sup>1</sup> that Abu Firas was slain on Wednesday, 8th of the latter Rabi; A.H. 357 (March, A.C. 968) at a farm called Sadad; and Thabit Ibn Sainan al-Sabi'i says in his history; "On Sunday 2 of the First Jumada, 357, a combat took place between Abu Firas, who was then established at Emessa, and Abu T-Ma'ali, son of Sayf al-Dawlat. The latter was victorious, and slew Abu Firas in the action; he carried away this head and left his body exposed in the plain, till a Desert Arab came, and shorounded it and buried it." Abu Firas was maternal uncle to Abu Ma'ali; when Sakhina, the mother of Abu Firas, was informed of his death, she tore out her eyes; by another account, it is stated that she struck her face with hands, and then tore out her eyes. It is said that he was slain by (Qarghawayh without Abu Ma'ali's knowledge, and that the latter was greatly shocked on learning his death. By one statement; the birth of Abu Firas is placed in A.H. 320 (A.C. 932), and by another, in 321<sup>2</sup>. His father Sa'id was murdered at Mosul in the month of Rajab, A.H. 323, by his nephew Nasir al-Dawlat, who caused his testicles to be pressed till death ensued. The history of this business would be long to relate, but the main point of it is this: The Government of Mosul and Diyar Bakr had been framed out secretly to Sa'id by the khalif al-Radi Billah; Sa'id proceeded thither with fifty mamluks (Ghulam), but on arriving he was arrested and put to death by Nasir al-Dawlat; and the khalif was highly displeased on learning the circumstance. Kharshanah is a city on the Syrian coast, belonging to the Greeks<sup>3</sup> Qustantiniyah (Constantinople) is one of the greatest cities belonging to the Greeks; it was built by Qustantin (Constantine), the first kind of that nation who became a Christian.

---

1 In Arabic, Ta'liqah. This word signifies notes taken during the lectures of a professor.

2 Some of the circumstance of Abu Firas's life may be found more fully related in Freytag's Selecta ex historid Halebi. Some of his poems are given in the Yatimah the most remarkable are his طردية or hunting pieces, and his روميه or pieces composed in the land of the Rum, or Greeks. The latter are full of complanits (like the Tristia of Ovid), and the author implores Sayf al-Dawlat, in the most pathetic terms, to pay his ransom and free him from captivity. The latter was not very prompt in acceding to the entreaties of Abu Firas, and for this the poet is continually upbraiding him.

3 This is not only in contradiction with what has been said above, but is also a gross mistake.

147. HARMALAH

Abu Hafs* 'Abd Allah<sup>1</sup> Harmalah Ibn Yahya Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Harmalah Ibn 'Imran Ibn Qurad al-Tujibi al-Zumayli, was native of Misr. His ancestor Qurad was a slave to Salamah Ibn Makhrumah, who enfranchised him. Harmalah was one of al-Shafil's disciples, and the other disciples of that imam used to frequent him and profit by his knowledge. He was well informed in the Traditions and composed (on that subject) the works entitled the Mabsut (extensive) and the Mukhtasar (abridgement). Muslim Ibn al-Hajjaj cites his name very often in the Sahih<sup>2</sup> and gives some Traditions on his authority. Born A.H. 166 (A.C. 782-3): died at Misr on the eve of Thursday, 20 Shawwal, 243 (February, A.C. 858),<sup>3</sup> or, it is said, 244. - Tujibi is derived from Tujib, which is the name of a woman; her children were surnamed Tujibi after her; Zumayli means belonging to Zumayl, a branch of the tribe of Tujib. His great grandfather Harmalah Ibn 'Imran was born A.H. 80 (A.C. 699), and died in the month of Safar, A.H. 160 (A.C. 776).

148. AL-HASAN AL-BASRI

Abu Sa'id al-Hasan Ibn Abi'l-Hasan Yasar -al-Basri (belonging to Basrah) was one of the most eminent Tabi'is;<sup>3</sup> He possessed all the branches of science and was noted for self-mortification, fear of God, and devotion. His father was a slave who had been enfranchised by Zayd Ibn Thabit al-Ansari<sup>4</sup>, and his mother Kha'yrah was also a slave

1 Al-Yafi'i surnames him Abu Hafs.

2 This is a celebrate collection of Traditions.

3 See note (2) Author's Preface.

* The autograph also gives his kunyah as Abu Hafs which was omitted in the text by M.de Slane.—Ed.

(For further reference, vide Ansab f. 103 b.)

Correct date should be 21 Shawwal, 10 February, 852.—Ed.

4 Abu Sa'ad Zayd Ibn Thabit Ibn al-Dahhak al-Ansari (one of Muhammad's Ansars or allies) belonged to the tribe of Khazraj and was a native of Madinah. He died in that city, A.H. 54 (A.C. 673-4), Muhammad said to his followers: "The most learned among you in the laws of heritage is Zayd." Al-Sh'abi relates that Ibn 'Abbas once held the stirrup of Zayd Ibn Thabit, who said to him: "How! you, who are the uncle of the "Blessed Prophet, hold my stirrup?" "Yes" replied the other, "it is thus we do with the learned." The khalifs Umar and 'Uthman considered him without an equal as a judge, belonging to Umm Salamah, one of the Prophet's wives. (When he was a child) it happened occasionally that his mother was kept away by some occupation, and Umm Salamah would give him the breast to prevent him crying and to and to quiet him till her return; to the blessed influence of that milk are attributed the wisdom and eloquence for which he was afterwards distinguished. Abu 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala' having said that the never heard persons speak with more purity and elegance than al-Hasan al-Basri and al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf, he was asked by some person which of the two was the better speaker, and replied that it was al-Hasan. Al-Hasan was brought up at Wadi al-Qura<sup>1</sup> and he was the handsomest person in Basrah till the accident which happened to his nose by a fall from a horse<sup>2</sup>. Al-Asma' relates that he heard his father say: "I never saw a man with broader wrists than Hasan, their breadth was a span." One of al-Hasan al-Basri's words was: "I never saw a certainty of which there is no doubt, bear a great resemblance to a doubtful thing of which there is no certainty, than death does." When 'Umar Ibn Hubairah<sup>3</sup> al-Fazari was appointed to the Government of Iraq in the reign of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, A.H. 103 (A.C. 721-2), he called for al-Hasan al-Basri, Muhammad Ibn Sirin and al-Sha'bi, to whom he said: "Yaz'd is the khalif (lieutenant)* of God, who has chosen him as his lieutenant over his servants and has imposed on them the obligation of obedience unto him he was also received my promise that I will hear and obey him; and he has now appointed me to what you see, and I receive from him written orders; must I obey him in whatever order he takes upon himself to give?" To this Ibn Sirin and al-Sha'bi gave a cautious reply, but al-Hasan al-Basri, being asked his opinion, made this answer: "O Ibn Hubairah! God outweighs Yazid and Yazid cannot outweigh God, God can defend thee Yazid and Yazid cannot a jurisconsult, a calculator in the division of inheritances, and a reader of the Qur'an. Some of the chief Tabi'is profited by his lessons. He was one of those who wrote down the portions of the Qur'an dictated by Muhammad, and he acted afterwards as secretary to the khalifs Abu Bakr and 'Umar. When 'Umar made the pilgrimage, he left Zayd Ibn Thabit as lieutenant, and 'Uthman did the same; he was guardian of the public treasury under 'Uthman. Great numbers of the Companions and Tabi'is taught Traditions on his authority.-(Tab. al Fuqaha, f. 3).

---

1 Wadi al-Qura, a celebrated valley often mentioned by poets, lies at a short distance to the north of Madinah.

2 Literally: From his beast; so it may have been either a horse, an ass, a mule, or a camel, which he was riding when he met with the accident. The precise nature of this accident I have not discovered.

3 See M. de Sacy's Chrestomatinic, t. II, p. 293.

* Vice-gerent is a better word.--Ed.

defend thee from God! He will soon send an angel to take thee from thy throne and send thee from the width of thy palace into the narrowness of the tomb! then thy deeds alone can save thee. (Reflect.) O Ibn Hubairah! if thou ever actest in disobedience to God, that he hath only established this sultan (civil power) for the protection of his religion and his worshippers. Confound not then the civil power established by God with his religion; for no obedience is due to a creature which disobeys its Creator." Ibn Hubairah then rewarded them, but bestowed a double recompence on al-Hasan al-basri; upon which al-Sha'bi said to Ibn Sirin: We give him a poor answer, and he gave us a poor reward." Al-Hasan saw one day a handsome man of fine appearance, and on asking about him, was informed that he was a jester to persons in high rank, and was favoured with their friendship; on which he observed that he was clever fellow<sup>1</sup>, and that he never saw any one but him seek to obtain fortune by means of a thing which resembled her.<sup>2</sup> [His mother was (by profession) a storyteller to the women; he went into her house one day and found her eating an onion which she had in her hand: "Throw away that nasty weed, mother!" said he. "O my son" she replied, "you are old and advanced in years, and you dote sometimes." "To which he retorted: "Mother, which of us is the elder?"] Most of his phrases were maxims of wisdom and models of elegance. His father was one of the prisoners taken at Maysan<sup>3</sup> in Iraq. The birth of al-Hasan took place at Madinah two years before the death of the Khalif 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, and it is said that he was born a slave; he died at Basrah

---

1 Literally: His father belongs to God! A common mode of expressing admiration.

2 He meant a fair face, which deceive expectation.

3 "Maysan; an extensive tract of country covered with villages and datetrees lying between Basrah and Wasit. Its chief town is Maysan."—(Marasid.) Maysan was taken by Khalid Ibn al-Walid, in the khalifat of Abu Bakr, A.H. 12. Al-Dhahbi says, in his Annals under the year 12: "On the termination of the war with the apostate Arabs, Abu Bakr sent Khalid Ibn al-Walid into the land of Basrah, which was then called the land of al-Hind (or India). Khalid proceeded therefore with his troops from al-Yamamah and having entered the land of Basrah he stormed al-Aykah الايك and then penetrated into Maysan, where he plundered and carried off prisoners the people of the villages; he then went towards al-Sawad, etc." MS. No. 626, fol. 117 verso.) Al-Tabari calls al-Hasan al-Basri's father, Habib, and notices the circumstance of his capture. See Kosegartens Annals of al-Tabari, tom. II, p. 21.

* October—Ed.

From "His funeral" to "death did occur page 168 not in the autograph.—Ed.

on the 1 Rajab, 110 A.H. (October, A.C. 728#). [His funeral was most remarkable; Hamid al-Tawil<sup>1</sup> gives the following account (of it): "Al-Hasan died on a Thursday evening; the next morning, Friday having finished the requisite ceremonies with the corpse, we bore it off, after the Friday prayer, and we buried it. All the people followed the funeral and were so taken up with it, that no afternoon prayer was said that day in the mosque, for none remained in it to pray; this, I believe, was till then unexampled in Islamism." When al-Hasan was on the point of death, he had a fainting fit, and he said, on coming to himself: "You have awaked me out of gardens and fountains and honourable place"<sup>2</sup> Before the death of al-Hasan, a man related to Ibn Sirin that he had a dream in which he saw a bird carry away the finest pebble of the mosque. "Your dream is true," said Ibn Sirin, "it is al-Hasan who is to die;" and a very short time after-wards his death did occur]. Ibn Sirin was not present at his funeral, on account of something which had passed between them; and he survived him one hundred days only. Al-Sam'ani says that Maysan is a village below Basrah.

149. ABU 'ALI AL-ZAFARANI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Sabbah al-Za'farani, was one of al-Shafi'i's disciples. He attained an eminent rank as a doctor of the law and the Traditions, on which subjects he composed some works, and he acquired an extensive reputation. Having studied with assiduity under al-Shafi'i he became profoundly learned, and he used to say: "The Traditionists were sleeping till al-Shafi'i awoke them; and not a person wears an inkhorn but is under obligations to al-Shafi'i!"<sup>3</sup> His duty was (at the school) to read aloud the works of al-Shafi'i in his presence.<sup>4</sup> He learned Traditions from Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah and other of the same epoch, such as Waki'

From "His mother" to "is the elder" not in the autograph.—Ed.

1 See note (1) No. 80.

2 Qur'an: surat 26, verses 57 and 58.

For further reference, vide Tahdhib vol. II, p. 263, No. 488 and for mother, see Tahdhib, vol. II, p. 416 No. 2784.—Ed.

3 These last words were said not by al-Zafarani, but by Ahmad Ibn Hanbal.

4 This was very usual; the student who had made the most progress, read the book aloud, and, as he proceeded, the master made his observations and explained difficulties; these remarks were immediately written down by the rest of the class, and formed ta'liqahs.

Ibn al-Jarrah<sup>1</sup>, 'Amr Ibn al-Haytham, Yazid Ibn Harun,<sup>2</sup> etc. He was one of the four persons who handed down the ancient sayings<sup>3</sup> taught by al-Shafi'i the others were Abu Thaur, Ahmad Ibn Hanbal, and al-Karabisi. The traditionists of the modern sayings were six, namely: al-Muzani, al-Rabi' Ibn Sulayman al-Jizi, al-Rabi' al-Muradi, al-Buwayti, Harmalah, and Yunus Ibn 'Abd al-A'la; the lives of some of these doctors have been already given, and mention shall be made of the others hereafter. Al-Bukhari, in his Sahih, gives some Traditions on the authority of al-Za'farani, and he is quoted also by Abu Dawud al-Sijistani, al-Tirmidhi, and others. He died on the last day of the month of Sha'ban, A.H. 260 (June, A.C. 874), or in the month of Ramadan, according to Ibn Qani<sup>4</sup> but al-Sam'ani, in his Ansab, places

1 Abu Sufayan Waki' Ibn al-Jarrah Ibn 'Adi Ibn Malth, a descendant from the tribe of 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah, a skilful jurisconsult, a Traditionist, and a man of learning, was born in A.H. 129 (A.C. 746-7) at Kufah where his father was keeper of the public treasury. Abu Hanifah was one of the masters under whom he studied; he profited greatly by that imam's tuition, and followed his doctrines in giving fatwas, or opinions on points of law. He made the pilgrimage to Makkah seventy times, and on returning from the last, he died at Fayd, a town in Arabia, half-way between Makkah and Kufah, in A.H. 197 (A.C. 812-3). He was remarkable for his mildness and liberality. (Mirat al-Zaman, MS. No. 640, fol. 18 verso.)

2 Abu Khalid Yazid Ibn Harun Ibn Dawud Ibn Thabit al-Wasiti (belonging to Wasit) was descended from a native of Bukhara, who had been a slave to the tribe of Sulaym and was afterwards enfranchised. Yazid was a man of learning, merit and piety; a hafiz, a jurisconsult, and a Traditionist. It was at Baghdad that he taught the Traditions, of which he knew by heart thirty thousand. The esteem in which he was held may be judged from the fact, that through dread of his opposition, the khalif al-Mamun hesitated for some time before asserting his favourite opinion, that the Qur'an was created; this heretical doctrine was strenuously opposed by Yazid. He was born A.H. 118 (A.C. 736), and died in 206 (A.C. 821-2) (Mirat al-Zaman, fol. 54.)

3 Science writing the note on the ancient sayings taught by al-Shafi'i (see No. 1), I have observed that mention is made, in the Tabaqat al-Fuqaha, of some works by him, apparently on the same subject. Al-Uthmani, the author of the Tabaqat, says: "Al-Shafi'i composed in Iraq his ancient book كتاب القديم "which he entitled al-Hujjah (the proof). He then went to Egypt, in A.H. 199, and composed there his new of modern books." (MS. No. 755, fol. 24.) Of the latter, Hajji Khalifah does not speak, but from what he says of the Hujjah, it was probably a work of jurisprudence; it may be, therefore, that these ancient sayings were decisions of sentence pronounced on points of law by the Companions of Muhammad, and the modern ones were similar decisions given by the succeeding imam and muftis. See the life of al-Shafi'i in this work.

4 The hafiz Abu 'l-Hasayn 'Abd al-Baqi Ibn Qani' Ibn Marzuq Ibn

(Cont. on page 167)

his death in the month of the latter Rabi', 269 A.H. Za'farani is derived from al-Za'faraniyah (the saffron-field), which is the name of a village near Baghdad. The Za'farani street, in that city, was so called because this doctor had dwelt in it; Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi says, in his Tabaqat al-Fuqaha; "And there, in the Za'farani street, is the mosque of al-Shafi'i in which I formerly studied."

150. AL-ISTAKHRI

Abu Sa'id al-Hasan Ibn Ahmad Ibn Yazid 'Isa Ibn al-Fadi al-Istakhri a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i, was a rival (in talent) to Abu al-Abbas Ibn Surayj<sup>1</sup> and a contemporary (also) of Ibn Abi Hurayrah. He is author of some good works on Jurisprudence, among other, the Kitab al-Aqdiyyah (book of legal decisions)<sup>2</sup>. He was Qadi at Qumm<sup>3</sup>, and he filled the office of muhtasib<sup>4</sup> at Baghdad. His piety and abstinence were great; having been appointed qadi of Sijistan by (the khalif) al-Muqtadir, he proceeded thither and examined into the marriages contracted by the people of that province; and on finding that, in most of them, the prohibited degrees of relationship had been neglected, he annulled them all. He was born A.H. 244 (A.C. 858-9), and died on Friday, 12th or 14th of the latter Jumada, Wathiq, a client by enfranchisement of the Omayyide family and a native of Baghdad, was born in the year 265 (A.C. 878-9). He learned the Traditions from the most eminent masters of that age, and composed a Mu'jam al-Sahabat, or biographical list of Muhammad's companions. His exactitude was not, however, generally admitted, and al-Daraqutni declare that, as a hafiz, he committed frequent mistakes. In the last years of his life, his mental faculties were deranged. Died in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 351 (November, A.C. 962). Al-Dhahabi's Annals, MS. No. 646) Ibn Khallikan cites occasionally an historical work by Ibn Qani' drawn up in the form of Annals.

---

249, A. H. according to the autograph.--Ed.

1 "Abu Ishaq al-Marwazi said: 'When I entered Baghdad there were none in that city worth studying under, except Ibn Surayj and al-Istakhri.'" (Tab al-Shaf, fol. 9.)

2 "Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi says, in his Tabaqat, that al-Istakhri wrote a large volume on the duties of a Qadi; a good work." (Tab al-Shaf.)

3 Qumm, a town in Iraq 'Ajami to the south of Teheran.

4 The Muhtasib was the magistrate charged with the civil police of the city; he inspected the provisions, weights and measures, suppressed nuisances, etc. In M. de Hammer's Loederverwaltung, page 148, will be found an excellent chapter on the subject.

A.H. 328 (March, A.C. 940)* some say that his death took place in the month of Shā'ban. Istakhri means native of Istakhar, a town in Persia which has produced a number of men eminent for learning. It is stated also that the relative adjective derived from Istakhar assumes sometimes a final z and becomes Istakharzi; this is analogous to the formation of Marwazi and Razi, derived from Marwa and Ray.

151. IBN ABI HURAYRAH

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Abi Hurayrah a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i learned jurisprudence from Abu 'I-'Abbas Ibn Surayj and Abu Ishaq al-Marwazi. (In his lessons) he explained al-Muzani's Mukhtasir, and this explanation was taken down in writing<sup>1</sup> by Abu 'Ali al-Tabari. He composed some treatises on the secondary points of jurisprudence, and he gave lessons in Baghdad to a great number of students. He became the imam (or president) of the Shafites in Arabian and Persian Iraq, and continued to be highly respected, both by princes and by subjects, till he died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 345 (A.C. 956-7).

152. ABU 'ALI AL-TABARI.

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn al-Qasim al-Tabari, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i learned jurisprudence from Ibn Abi Hurayrah (whose life has been just given), and drew up, from the remarks made by that master during his lessons, the work which is entitled Ta'liqat al-Tabari.<sup>2</sup> He inhabited Baghdad, where he became professor on the death of Ibn Abi Hurayrah and wrote a number of works, such as the Muharrar fi 'l-Nazar (the written treatise on disquisition), which was the first work composed on the science of controversy in the abstract; the Ifsah (exposition), a treatise on law; a voluminous work on the 'iddat<sup>3</sup> in ten parts; a treatise on dialectics, and one on the main points * Friday fell on 27 March corresponding to 14 Jamadi al-Thani.--Ed.

(For further reference, vide Ansab, f. 41 b, where al-Istakhri's full genealogy is traced)--Ed.

1 Or else: Was taken down in the form of a ta'liqah etc. See No. 25, note on ta'liqah No. 149 and note on ta'liqah.

2 The meaning of the word ta'liqah explained in note on ta'liqah No. 25, and note on ta'liqah No. 149.

3 The 'iddat denotes a certain period of time which must elapse before of the law. He died at Baghdad, A.H. 305 (A.C. 917-8). Tabari means native of Taberestan, an extensive province containing a great number of towns, the largest of which is 'Amul: this country has produced many learned men. As for Tabrani, it means native of Tiberias, a town in Syria; of this we shall speak again in its proper place. I have found in some works containing lists of jurisconsults and their biographies, that the real name of Abu 'Ali 'I-Tabari was Al-Hasan, as here given, but I perceive that the Khatib, in his History of Baghdad, places him among the Husayns.

153. ABU 'ALI 'L-FARIQI.

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Ibrahim Ibn 'Ali Ibn Barhan<sup>1</sup> al-Fariqi<sup>2</sup> was a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i. He commenced his studies at Mayyafariqin under Abu 'Abd Allah -al-Kazruni<sup>3</sup>, on whose death he proceeded to Baghdad, where he took lessons from Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi, the author of the Muhammadhab, and Abu Nasr Ibn al-Sabbagh, the author of the Shamil. He then filled the place of qadi in the city of Wasit and it is related by the hafiz al-Silafi that when he was at Wasit, he asked Khamis Ibn 'Ali al-Huzi<sup>4</sup> about a number of persons, and among the rest, Abu 'Ali al-Fariqi, and obtained this answer: "He is pre-eminent as a jurisconsult and succeeded Abu Taghlib as qadi; his intelligence, justice, and excellent administration surpassed every expectation." He learned Traditions from Abu Bakr the khatib and others of the same period, and led a mortified and devout life. He is author of a work entitled al-Fawa'id, etc. (notes on the Muhammadhab), a widow or a divorced woman can legally contract a new marriage. (See Hamilton's Hedayah vol. I. p. 359, and D'Ohsson's Emp. Othom. tom. v. p. 238.

1 Not Burhun, as marked by error in the Arabic text.

2 Al-Fariqi means native of Mayyafariqin.

The Cairo edition (1949) gives Burhun; the autograph has Ed.

3 The imam Abu 'Abd Allah Mahammad Ibn Bayyan al-Kazruni, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i studied under al-Muhamili<sup>1</sup> and had afterwards for pupils Nasr al-Maqdisi, Abu Bakr al-Shashi, Abu 'Ali 'I-Fariqi, Abu 'I-Mahasin al-Ruyiani and others. He composed a work on jurisprudence, entitled al-Ibanat and died A.H. 455 (A. C. 1063)--(Tab. al-Shaf Tab al-Fuq.) In these works, his name is spelled al-Kazruni, and not al-Kazrawani as in the MSS. of Ibn Khallikan.

4 Abu 'I-Karam Khamis Ibn 'Ali ibn Ahmad, a celebrated hafiz and Traditionist of Wasit, was a man of learning veracity, and deep acquaintance with Arabic philology. Born A.H. 442 (A.C. 1050--1); died A. H. 501 (A. C. 1107--8). (Tabaqat al-Huffaz.) and Ibn Abi 'Asrun was taught Traditions by him. He gave his lessons out of the Shamil, and continued to do so till his death, which took place at Wasit on Wednesday, 22nd Muharram A.H. 528 (November, A.C. 1133)*. He was interred in the mosque where he taught. Born at Mayyafariqin in the latter Rabi A.H. 433 (December, A.C. 1041).

154. IBN AL-MARZUBAN AL-QADI AL-SIRAFI

Abu Sa'id al-Hasan Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Marzuban al-Sirafi, surnamed al-Qadi (the Qadi) was grammarian and an inhabitant of Baghdad, where he acted as deputy of the Qadi Abu Muhammad Ibn Ma'ruf.<sup>1</sup> He possessed a superior acquaintance with the system of grammar adopted by the learned men of Basrah<sup>2</sup> and he made a very good commentary on the grammar of Sibawayh; he composed also the following works: a treatise on the alif of union and the alif of separation<sup>3</sup>; a history of the Basrah grammarians; a work on the final pause and the commencement of phrases<sup>4</sup> كتاب الوقف البلاد a treatise on the art of poetry كتاب صفته الشفر البلاد and eloquence; and a commentary on Ibn Durayd's Maqsurah. He learned the reading

* 22 November.—Ed.

In autograph it is al-Kazruni.—Ed.

1 Abu Muhammad 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn Ma'ruf was qadi 'I-qudut (grand qadi) of Baghdad. He died in the month of Safar, A.H. 381 (A.C. 991).—MS. No. 634, fol. 127.)

2 On the conquest of Syria and Persia by the Muslims, a number of Muhammad's companions settled at Kufah, Basrah, Mada'in, and other cities in those countries; imbued with the doctrines of Islamism and accustomed to the practical application of the law under the direction of the Prophet, they were considered as the surest guides in the interpretation of Qur'an. That book, composed avowedly in the purest Arabic, offered many difficulties to those who were not acquainted with the idiom of the Desert Arabs, a race who alone spoke the language in its perfection. The study of the ancient poets was therefore considered as necessary for the intelligence of the Qur'an; and their poems, often obscure from the intricacy of their construction and their absolute terms, required the assistance of grammatical analysis and philology to render them comprehensible. It was particularly at Basarah and Kufah that the culture of these incidental branches of Islamic knowledge was pursued with success, and led to the development, in each city, of a system of Qur'anic reading and interpretation, and grammatical analysis, differing in some points from that taught in the other. They varied even in their manner of reading the ancient poems, and the suppressions, additions, and variations peculiar to each school produced two distinct editions of all the anteislamic poets.

3 See M. De Sacy's Grammaire arabe, t. I. p. 66.

4 See Grammaire, t. I. p. 74.

of Qur'an<sup>1</sup> from Abu Bakr Ibn Mujahid, philology from Ibn Durayd, and grammar from Abu Bakr Ibn al-Sarraj. He himself had many pupils and gave lessons on a variety of subjects such as the Qur'an and its readings, the sciences connected with the Qur'an,<sup>2</sup> grammar, philology, jurisprudence, the rules for the sharing of inherited property, arithmetic, metaphysics, poetry, prosody, and rhyme. He was retired and holy in his life, virtuous in his conduct, and gifted with the noblest qualities of mind. In his religious opinions he was a Mutazelite, but did not let it appear, and he supported himself wholly by the labour of his hands, copying books for his livelihood. His father was a Magian and his real name was Behzad, but the said Abu Sai'd his son changed it into 'Abd Allah. He used often to recite these lines in the presence of his assembled auditors:

Seek a calm retreat where you may taste of joy; time passed away, and you will remain companionless. You place your hopes on tomorrow, but tomorrow is like an animal in pregnancy: none knows what it may bring forth.

He and Abu 'I-Faraj al-Ispahani, the author of the Aghani were on ill terms through jealousy, as is usually the case with men of talent; and Abu 'I-Faraj composed on him the following verses:

You hold not the first rank, neither did the master under whom you studied; and useless is the stunted flow of your learning. May God curse such grammar, poetry, and prosody as comes from Siraf.

He died at Baghdad on Monday, 2nd of Rajab, A.H. 368 (February, A.C. 979)*, at the age of eighty four years, and was buried in the cemetery of al-Khayzuran. The following statement was made by his son Abu Muhammad Yusuf: "My father's family inhabited Siraf; he was born in that city, and it was there that he commenced his studies. He was under twenty years of age when he went to 'Uman, where he applied his mind to jurisprudence. He then returned to Siraf and afterwards proceeded to 'Askar Mukram, where he stopped with Abu Muhammad Ibn 'Umar the (Mutazilite) Metaphysician, who gave him an honourable reception and showed him a marked preference above his other disciples. He then went to Baghdad and acted as deputy to the qadi Abu Muhammad Ibn Ma'ruf first in that part of the city which lies on the east bank of the Tigris, and afterwards in both divisions".--Sirafi is derived from

1 See No. 68, note on seven qir'ats.

2 See Flugel's Hajji Khalifah, t. I. p. 37.

* Sunday fell on 17 Rabi' al-Awwal corresponding to 17 July, while 17 Rabi' al-Thani fell on Tuesday 16 August.--Ed.

Siraf, the name of a city on the sea-coast of Persia, near Kirman; this city has produced a number of learned men. In the life of Yusuf, the son of al-Sirafi, we shall give some additional information respecting Siraf.

155. ABU 'ALI 'L-FARISI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Abd al-Ghaffar Ibn Muhammad Ibn Sulayman Ibn Aban al-Farisi, the first grammarian of his time, was born in the town of Fasa and went, in the year 307 (A.C. 919-20), to Baghdada, where he made his studies. He travelled over many countries and stopped for some time with Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Hamdan at Aleppo, to whom he had been presented in A.H. 341 (A.C. 952-3); he had there some conferences with al-Mu'tanabbi. From that he proceeded to Fars, where he was admitted into the society of 'Adud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, and gained his favour and esteem to a high degree; so much so, that 'Adud al-Dawlah said: "In grammar I am the humble servant of Abu 'Ali 'l-Fasawi." Abu 'Ali composed for that prince his grammatical works, the 'Idah (illustration) and the Takmilah (supplement); the history of this circumstance is well known<sup>1</sup>. It is related that he was one day playing at mall<sup>2</sup> with 'Adud al-Dawlah in the Maydan (hippodrome) of Shiraz, and was asked by him why the exception is put in the accusative in this expression: The people came except Zayd (venit populus si non Zeidum)? To which he replied: "It is governed in the accusative by a verb-understood." "How," said Adud al-Dawlah, "is the ellipsis to be filled up?" "Thus," replied Abu 'Ali; "I except Zayd." "Why not put it in the nominative," observed the prince and fill the ellipsis thus: Zayrd kept back (abstinuit Zeidus)?" Abu Ali was silenced by this remark, and at last said: "This is a game of give and take<sup>3</sup>." When he returned home he composed on this subject a treatise, which obtained 'Adud al-Dawlah's approbation; and he mentions, in his 'Idah, that the exception is governed in the accusative by the verb which precedes (by the verb came), in consequence of its corroboration by the word except.- It is related by Abu 'l-Qasim Ibn Ahmad al-Andalusi (native of Spain), that (at a society) where he and Abu Ali were present, the conversation fell upon poetry, and Abu Ali said: I envy the faculty of making 1 Have not as yet found any relation of it.

2 Literally: Racing.

3 Literally: That answer is hippodromic. He meant that, as the advantages of each adversary are alternate in a well-played game of mall, so it was in the grammatical contest.

verses; as for me, my genius is not favourable to it, although, I am well acquainted with all the sciences which form the basis of poetry." A person then asked him if he had never composed verses, to which he replied: "I know or three verses only made by me; they were composed on gray hair, and run thus:

"I dyed my gray hairs because they were a subject of reproach; but it is rather the dyeing of gray hairs which should deserve reproaches. I did it not through apprehension of being abandoned by my beloved, and it was not censure or reproaches which I dreaded; but because gray hair are blamable, I dyed them as a punishment."

Abu 'Ali cites the following verse of Abu Tammam's as an example of a rule given by him in his 'Idah, in the chapter which treats of the verb -ud- (to be). "He, of whose resolutions and intentions the meadow of vain desire is the pastureground, will ever remain poor."

On this it has been remarked that he did not cite the verse because Abu Tammam was an author whose compositions might be quoted as authorities, but because 'Adud al-Dawlah liked it and fond of repeating it. Abu 'Ali 'I-Farisi is author of the following works: The Tadhkirah (remembrance), a large volume; a treatise on the short and the long Alif the Hujjah (proof) on reading of the Qur'an<sup>2</sup> the Aghfal (negligences), treating of the omissions made by al-Zajaj in his Ma'ani; the Hundred Agents (or governing parts of speech); Questions discussed at Aleppo, Baghdad, Shiraz, and Basrah, each forming a separate work; Questions discussed at Conferences, etc.--In the year 648 (A.C. 1250), I was at Cairo, and I had a dream<sup>3</sup> in which, methought, I went out to the village of Qalyub and there entered a funeral chapel. I found it to be an old building discoloured with (the) dust (of age), and in it I met three persons who were stopping there from religious motives.<sup>4</sup> As I admired the beauty of the edifice and the solidity of its construction, I said to them: "By whom was this erected<sup>5</sup>?" but they could not inform me, and afterwards one of them said that the Shaykh Abu 'Ali 'I-Farisi had sojourned in that chapel for many years; we then had a conversation about him, in

1 See M. de Sacy's Grammaire arabe, t. I. pp. 60, 64.

2 See No. 68, note on seven qir'ats.

3 See No. 19 note on dreams.

4 In Arabic, Mujawirun the Mujawirat means a religious retreat or residence at a mosque or a chapel built over the tomb of a holy man.

5 Literally; Vide (aut quæso) eajus constructio (est) hac?

the course of which, the person with whom I was speaking said: "And with his other talents, he possessed that of poetry;" to which I replied: I never met any of his poetry."—"I shall recite to you some of it: said he, and he then, with a sweet voice, pronounced three verses, When he had ended, I awoke, and the charming sound of his voice still rung in my ears, but the last verse alone remained in my recollection; it was as follows:

"People in prosperity are pleased with no one; what must they be when they suffer affliction or afflict others?"

To conclude, his merits are too well known to be mentioned or enumerate, (but) he was suspected of being a Mutazilite<sup>1</sup>. He was born in A.H. 288 (A.C. 901) and died at Baghdad on Sunday, the 17th of the latter Rabi (some say of the first), A.H. 377 (August, A.C. 987): he was interred in the cemetery called the Shunizi. Fasawi is derived from Fasa, which is the name of a city in the province of Fars; we have already spoken of it in the life of al-Basasiri<sup>2</sup>. Qalyub is a little village with numerous gardens, at two or three parasangs' distance from Cairo.

156. ABU AHMAD AL-'ASKARI

Abu Ahmad al-Hasan Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Sa'id al-'Askari, one of the great masters in general literature and a hafiz<sup>3</sup> of the first rank, was a narrator of historical facts and anecdotes; he taught also from memory a great quantity of ancient poetry.

Among the instructive works composed by him, is the voluminous compilation entitled the Kitab al-Tashif (book of logogriphes)<sup>4</sup>. The Sahib Ibn 'Abbad wished to see him, and not finding any other means of meeting him, he represented to Muwayyad al Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, the prince in whose service he acted as vizir, that the affairs of 'Askar Mukram had got into disorder, and that his (vizir's) presence was necessary to set them right; and by this statement, he obtained his sovereign's authorisation to proceed to that city. He had hoped that (on his arrival) Abu Ahmad would wait upon him, but, being disappointed in this expectation, he wrote him the following lines:

1 See Pocock's Specimen Hist. Arab.

2 See No. 78.

3 See No. 27. note Hafiz.

4 Flugel's Hajji Khalifah, t. II, p. 301.

"When you refused to visit us and said: 'I am weak and cannot bear the trot of the camel;' We came from a distant land to visit you, and many were the nights we halted, at stations of which some had been already frequented, and others never before. We now ask you if there be good cheer for your guest; we mean not well filled dishes; we wish only to fill our eyes (with your presence)."

To those verses were joined some lines in prose, and abu Ahmad, in his answer, replied to the prose with prose and to the poetry with this well-known verse:

"I resolve on doing a determined act, had I force enough; but the wild ass is prevented from making his spring."<sup>1</sup>

When the Sahib read the answer, he was astonished at the appropriateness of the verse to his own case<sup>2</sup> and exclaimed: "By Allah! had I known that he would have thought of this verse, I should have written those I sent to him in a different rhyme."

The verse itself is by Sakhr Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Sharid, brother of (the poetess) al-Khansa, and belongs to a celebrated piece composed by him under the following circumstance: He was present at a combat against the tribe of Asad, and received a spearwound from Rabi'ah Ibn Thawr al-Asadi, and some of the rings which formed his coat of mail were driven into his side by the force of the blow; during the space of a year he continued most dangerously ill, and was attended by his mother and his wife Sulaymah. Sulaymah, however, got tired of him, and said to a woman who asked her how her husband was: "He is not alive so as to give hopes; neither is he dead, so as to be forgotten." These words were overheard by Sakhr, who said:

"I see that the mother of Sakhr is not fatigued with attending me, but Sulaymah dislikes my couch and my presence. I had never apprehended being irksome to thee, (O Sulaymah) but who has (not) been deceived by fortune! By my life! you have awakened one that step, and caused one to hear that had two ears. Is there a man who showed his wife the same affection which he showed his mother? that man must have led a life of misery and contempt. I resolve on doing a determined act, had I force enough; but the wild ass is prevented from making his spring.<sup>1</sup> Death is better than a life of (of suffering), in which the couch of the chieftain is (painful) as the point of the spear."<sup>2</sup>

---

1 The poem from which this verse is taken, is in the same measure and rhyme as the lines written by the Sahib.

2 This verse was often cited sarcastically to persons who met with a disappointment when they least expected it.

Abu Ahmad al-'Askari was born on Thursday, 16th Shawwal, 293 (August, A.C. 906), and died on Friday, the 7th of Dhu al-Hijjah, 382 (February, A.C. 993). He studied under Ibn Durayd, and composed the following works: al-Mukhtalif wa 'I-Mutalif (the dissimilar and similar)<sup>3</sup>; a treatise on the Science of Logic; Maxims, and Proverbs; on Auguries, etc. - 'Askari is derived from 'Askar; there are a number of places bearing this name, but the best known is 'Askar Mukram (Mukram's camp), a city in the province of Ahwaz: the Mukram whose name it bears is Mukram al-Bahili, its founder.<sup>4</sup> Abu Ahmad was a native of this place. In another part of this work we shall notice the relative adjective 'Askari with a different derivation.

157. IBN RASHIQ AL-QAYRAWANI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Rashīq surnamed al-Qayrawani (the native of Qayrawan)<sup>5</sup>, was a writer distinguished for his talents and eloquence, and the author of the following fine works: The 'Umadah, or column, on the art of poetry, and poetical criticism; the Anmudhaj (specimen)<sup>6</sup>, and a collection of elegant epistles and poetry. Ibn Bassam

---

1 He intended to kill his wife, but was unable to rise. See Freytag's Meidani, Vol. II, p. 251.

2 Literally: Then a life like the bivouac of a chieftain on the head of a lance. A similar idea is expressed by Imrau 'I-Qays is one of his poems; see Diwan d' Amro 'I-Kais, p. 28, line 7.

3 This appears to be a sort of gazetteer, in which are indicated the different palces bearing the same name.

4 See no. 62.

5 He was probably so named to distinguish him from Ibn Rashīq al-Katib, Abu'l-Abbas Ahmad, who studied at Cordova, and attained eminence by his knowledge of general literature, jurisprudence, and Traditions. He was highly patronised by Abu 'I-Jaysh Mujahid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-'Amiri, who appointed him governor of the isle of Majorca, in which place he acted with exemplary justice. He died at an advanced age, a short time posterior to A.H. 440 (A.C. 1049). His epistles were collected and published. Al-Hillat al-Siyarah, p. 69.

6 This is a philological work; see Flüge's Hajji Khalifah, No. 1392. He composed also a history of Qayrawan, often quoted by historians; this work is also noticed by Hajji Khalifah, see No. 2285.

says of him, in the Dhakhirah: "I have been informed that he was born at Masilah, where he studied for a short time, and then in A.H. 406, removed to Qayrawan." Another historian says that he was born in 390 (A.C. 1000), at Mahdiyyah, and that his father was a Greek mamluk (white slave), a client of the tribe of Azd. Ibn Rashīq died A.H. 463 (A.C. 1070-1); his father was a goldsmith in the town of Muhammadiyah<sup>1</sup>, and instructed him in the same art. After studying belles-lettres at Muhammadiyah, he began to compose poetry, and conceived a strong desire to augment that talent and meet with literary men; he, in consequence, proceeded to Qayrawan, where he got into reputation, and composed poems in honour of the ruling prince (al-Mu'izz Ibn Badis), who attached him to his service. He continued in that city till it was carried and destroyed by the Arabs, and its inhabitants massacred<sup>2</sup>; on which he passed over to Sicily and settled at Mazar (Mazzara), where he died. In a note written by one of learned, I find his death placed in 456 (A.C. 1064), but the date previously given is the correct one. Mazar is a town in the island of Sicily; we shall mention it in the life of al-Mazari. According to another statement, he died on the eve of Sunday, the 1st of Dhu T-Qa'dah, 456, at Mazar.--The following are specimens at his poetry.

"I love my brother, though I turn away from him, and though my words rarely strike his ear. At the sight of his face I frown with pleasure, as you frown at the aspect of generous wine. Frowns do not always proceed from hatred, and secret hatred is often concealed by smiles.

O Lord! I am not able to repel this evil, and to thee do I apply for succour again this feeble worker of evil. Why hast thou sent against me a thousand gnats, whilst thou didst send only one against Nimrod<sup>3</sup>"

According to Ibn Bassam's statement in the Dhakhirah he is the author of this piece:

"Love for your Sulayman has delivered me up to a passion of which the slightest pains are mortal. When the host of his charms

1 This city of Masilah was rebuilt, A.H. 315 (A.C. 927-8), by al-Qa'im Billah, the Fatimite, who then named it Mulammadiyah Abu 'I-Fida's Geography).

2 This occurred in A.H. 449 (A.C. 1057-8). See Abu 'I-Fida's Annals, year 443.

3 According to the Muslim tradition, Nimrod was killed by a gnat which entered into his brain. See Sale's note on the subject in the Qur'an, surat 21, v. 70.

appears, they say to us in the words of the ant: "Enter into your abodes, lest he crush you with (the magic power of) his large dark eyes."<sup>1</sup>

When he was advanced in age and faultered in his gait, he composed the following lines, which express an original thought:

"When I wish to be light and gay as in the days of my youth, five and forty (years) refuse their consent. My steps faulter, not with age, but with the years which I train after me."

By the same.

"She said: "What means that melancholy and sickly air? To which I returned the answer which is made by a captivated admirer: 'Love (for you) came to me; he was a guest whom I cherished, and I gave him my flesh as nourishment and my blood as drink."

Another of his productions is the Quradat al-Dhahab (grains of gold), a work small in compass, but highly instructive<sup>2</sup>; he composed also a philological treatise, entitled al-Shudhudh containing a list of those words which are employed with a rare or exceptional signification. Were concision not our object, we should give an account of his alterations and adventures with Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Abi Sa'id Ibn Ahmad, surnamed Ibn Sharaf al-Qayrawani. Mention has been already made of Masilah.<sup>3</sup>

158. AL-MUJID AL-'ASQALANI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn 'Abd al-Samad Ibn al-Shakhla al-'Asqalani (native of Asqalan)<sup>4</sup>, surnamed al-Shaykh al-Mujid (the talented<sup>5</sup> Shaykh), is author of the (khutbahs)<sup>6</sup> which are so celebrated, and of the enistles so remarkable for their elegance. He was a most distinguished prose-writer, and displayed superior talents in that

1 An allusion to the Qur'an, surat 27, v. 18: "O ants! enter into your abodes, lest Sulayman (Solomon), "and his troops crush you, and perceive it not."

2 This is a collection of ancient poetry.--(Hajji Khalifah).

3 See No. 133.

4 A rather incomplete note on this poet has been given by inadvertence in No. 101, note 6.

5 The word Mujid, here rendered by talented, means more exactly one who executes well whatever he undertakes.

6 See No. 79, note on khutbah.

species of composition<sup>1</sup>. It is related that al-Qadi al-Fadil exerted all his efforts in acquiring a perfect knowledge of his phraseology, and was able to recall nearly the whole of it to memory. The Katib 'Imad al-din speaks of him in the Kharidah in these terms: "Al-Mujid (the talented) was really talented, as his surname implies; and capable of composing with originality, and shaping language (to the just expressing of his thoughts)"<sup>2</sup> he is the author of admirable khutbahs, and of the ingenious beauties (by which his compositions are adorned)."<sup>3</sup> Ibn Bassam also make mention of him in the Dhakhirah, and cites the following verses of his composition, which are a fragment of a long poem:

"Time ceases not to choose (and essay) princes it produces, till at length it finds the excellent, the chosen one. Bid those who governed mankind and held exalted rank in days of old come forth and see the latest (of princes); they will find him nobler<sup>2</sup> in rule than they were, and more fortunate in the results of his enterprises. If advice be needed, let them take counsel from him, they will find him, an Ahnaf<sup>4</sup>; if they meet him hand to hand, they will find him an 'Antar in bravery. He fasts, yet the book of his actions is (already) filled with pious deeds; even in the times he fasts not, his (abstemiousness) is like fasting. (Prince!) the enemy essayed to daunt thee he thought he could compel fate to withdraw its decrees. When you sent not against him (courasers) sleek and fleet, you sent hidden policy to meet him. When your policy goeth forth, your men bear not the sword, neither are your warriors shrouded in coats of mail. The enemies hastened to you, but they hastened to their fate; and you ordered your sword to vibrate among them. They were amazed how your mildness was changed into aggression, and how the sweetness of your nature had (for them) become bitter. Tenderness joined to firmness should not, however, seem a subject of wonder; fire can be produced by a green reed<sup>5</sup>"

---

1 Literally; He was a cavalier in praise, and in it he had (was) an able hand.

2 Literally: Capable of originality in language and of carving it out.— This is the usual style of 'Imad al-Din, who, in his works, seldom deigned to write phrase of plain intelligible prose.

3 Literally: Ampler in breast.

4 Al-Ahnaf was famed for his prudence; his life is given in this work.

5 An allusion to the mode of producing fire by means of two pieces of wood, one hard and the other soft, rubbed together. The poem from which these were taken, was probably composed in honour of the Fatimite khalif al-Mustansir.

Not to be prolix, I shall confine myself to his citation. He was put to death in the Khizanat al-Bunud,<sup>1</sup> a prison at Cairo, in the year 482 (A.C. 1089).--The following verses are also attributed to him:<sup>2</sup>

"O thou who art a sword to assist me where the sword (of the enemy) is red (with blood)<sup>3</sup>! thou who art a springtide-shower for my country when the rain-clouds are withheld! why doth thy clear and exalted mind entertain the vile calumnies of (my) traducers? that mind which is so pure! No falsehood can lie concealed in thy thoughts for thou art pellucid as the crystal of the rock".

I found also, in the collection of his poetical works, these two well-known verses:

"The curtain (of the audience-chamber which debar solicitors), the pride (of the patron), the excess of (his) haughtiness, and the (humiliation of) stretching an eager hand towards a superior<sup>4</sup>, (Such are the pains which await him who courts the great). Did these obstacles debar (us) from (a man of) talent, we should think lightly of them<sup>5</sup> but (here) they are (placed) before (a man of) incapacity."

'Asqalan is derived from 'Asqalan (Ascalon), a well-known city on the coast (of Syria).

159. IBN ZULAQ AL-MISRI

Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn Ibrahim Ibn al-Husayn Ibn al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Khalid Ibn Rashid Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Sulayman Ibn Zulaq a native of Egypt, was descended from a salve affiliated, by enfranchisement, to the tribe of Layth. He was eminent for his knowledge of history, on which subject he composed an excellent work<sup>6</sup>; he is also author of a Khitat or topographical description (of

1 The Khazanat al-Bunad (magazine of standards of flags) was founded by the Fatimite khalif al-Zahir. In this establishment, three thousand skilful workmen were employed in the fabrication of arms, military machines, etc.--(Al-Maqrizi's Khitat).

2 This is evidently a later addition.

3 The word يانع is pointed differently in each of my manuscripts, but none of the readings is plausible. That adopted in the Arabic text is not satisfactory, and if conjectures were permitted, I should be inclined to replace it by نال blunted broken.

4 Literally: Towards exalted rank.

5 Literally: We should excuse.

6 Most probably the second continuation of 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sufi's history of Egypt mentioned by Hajji Khalifah, t. II, p. 148.

old Cairo), in which fully treated the subject another of his works is the history of the qadis of Misr, designed by him as a continuation to a book of the same title composed by Abu 'Umar Muhammad Ibn Yusuf Ibn Ya'qub al-Kindi<sup>1</sup>, and which reaches to the year 246 of the Hijrah. Ibn Zulaq completed the work (of al-Kindi) by a supplement, which commences with the life of Bakkar Ibn Qutaybah, and finishes with that of Muhammad Ibn an-Nu'man. He gives the history of the latter down to the month of Rajab in the year 386 (July, A.C. 996). Al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali, great-grandfather to Abu Muhammad Ibn Zulaq was eminent for his learning. He died (I mean Abu Muhammad) on Tuesday, 25th of Dhu 'T-Qa'adah, A.H. 387 (November, A.C. 997). I have read in his history of the qadis of Egypt, in the life of Abu Ubayd (Ibn Harbawayth), that Mansur Ibn Isma'il al-Darir died in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 306 (October, A.C. 918), "about three months," says, he "before I was born." On admitting this as exact Ibn Zulaq's birth took place in the month of Sha'ban 306 (January, A.C. 919). He gave some Traditions on the authority of al-Tahawi.—Layth Ibn Kinanah is the name of a great (Arabian) tribe. Ibn Yunus al-Misri says that Ibn Zulaq belonged to that tribe by enfranchisement.

160. ABU NIZAR IBN SAFI MALIK AL-NUHAT

Abu Nizar al-Hasan Ibn Abi 'T-Hasan Safi Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Nizar Ibn Abi 'T-Hasan, the grammarian, was surnamed Malik al-Nuhāt (the prince of grammarians), the Katib 'Imad al-Din speaks of him, in the Kharidah, as a man of eminent merit, and gives the correspondence which passed between Abu Nizar and himself when at Damascus.<sup>2</sup> He became the ablest grammarian of his time, and was intelligent, eloquent, and acute, but vain and proud: he assumed the title of prince of grammarians, and if any other name but this was given to him when addressed, he would fly into a passion. At a period later than the year 520 (A.C. 1126), he proceeded from Baghdad to

---

1 According to al-Suyuti (Husn al-Muhadarah MS. No. 632. fol. 147 Iverso), al-Kindi, (who appears to have been a grandson of Ya'qub al-Kindi, the celebrated philosopher), composed also a work on the excellence of Egypt, entitled Fada'il Misr, and was contemporary with Kafur.—Hajji Khalifah, after al-Maqrizi, places his death in A.H. 246 (A.C. 860-1) Flugel's edition, No. 2312).

2 Arabic epistles generally contain some passages in verse; and it is a few extracts of this kind which 'Imad al-Din gives. See the Kharidah, No. 1447, fol. 36.

Wasit, where he took up his residence for a time, and communicated his copious philological information to the people of that city, who profited greatly by his talents and learning. Ibn al-Mustawfi says of him in his History of Arbela: "He visited Arbela and then went to Baghdad, where he learned the Traditions and studied the imam al-Shafi'i's system of jurisprudence and the science of dogmatic theology under Abu 'Abd Allah al-Qayrawani; in controversy he had for master Asa'ad al-Mihani; in the fundamentals of jurisprudence, Abu 'I-Fath Ibn Barhan, the author of the Waziz, and the Wasit, works which treat on that subject; he studied grammar under al-Fasihi, who himself had learned it from 'Abd al-Qahir al-Jurjani,<sup>1</sup> the author of the lesser Mujmil."<sup>2</sup> Abu Nizar then travelled to Khurasan, Kerman, and Ghaznah, whence he returned to Syria, and settled at Damascus, where he died on Tuesday, 8th Shawwal A.H. 568 (May, A.C. 1173) aged upwards of eighty years. He was interred the next day, Wednesday, in the cemetery, at the city-gate called Bab al-Saghir. He is author of many works on jurisprudence and its fundamentals, on the dogmas of religion and on grammar. He composed some poetry, which has been collected into a diwan: one of his qasidahs, made in honour of the Prophet, contains these lines:

"Praise be to God! I am cured of my passion, and I think of her no more: love calls me towards her, but I answer not to its seductions; and yet I rejoice not if an affliction befall her, neither am I pleased with the traducer who defames her."

He composed many fine passages, and possessed the greatest talents<sup>3</sup>

161. THE IMAM AL-HASAN AL-'ASKARI

Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ali al-

1 Abu Bakr 'Abd al-Qahir Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman al-Jurjani (native of Jurjan) a celebrated grammarian and a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i was eminent for his piety and talents. He composed the following works the Mujmil (or collector), a philological work; a commentary on it, entitled the Talkhis (comprehensive view); the Kitab al-'Amd المدد (the supporter), treating on grammatical inflexions; the Miftah (key), a commentary on the first surat of the Qur'an; the Mughni (sufficient), a commentary, in thirty volumes, on the 'Idah of Abu 'Ali 'I-Farisi, etc. He made his grammatical studies at Jurjan, under Abu 'I-Husayn Muhammad al-farisi, sister's son to Abu 'Ali. In dogmatical theology, he followed the doctrine of al-Ash'ari. Died A.H. 461 (A.C. 1068-9), or 464.

2 The greater Mujmil was composed by Ibn Faris al-Razi.

3 Literally: He was a collection of talents.

Rida Ibn Musa Ibn Ja'far al-Sadiq Ibn Muhammad al-Baqir Ibn 'Ali Zayn al-'Abidin Ibn al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, was, as his father also, one of the twelve persons who are considered as imams by the Immites (or Shiites). He was the father of (Muhammad) al-Muntazir (the expected), called also Sahib al-Sirdab (he of the cavern), and was surnamed al-'Askari, which title was borne also by his father 'Ali: we shall speak hereafter of him and the other imams. Al-Hasan was born on a Thursday in the year 231 (A.C. 845-6); on the sixth of the month of the first Rabi, it is said; but, according to another account, towards the end of the year 232. He died at Sarr-man-ra'a, on Friday (or Thursday,) 8th of the first Rabi (or of the first Jumada), A.H. 260 (January, A.C. 874) and was interred at the side of his father's tomb. -'Askari means belonging to, or native of Sarr-man-ra'a, which place was called al-'Askar (the camp or the troops), when the Khalif al-'Mu'tasim, who built it, removed thither his troops ('Askar). Al-Hasan and his father 'Ali were both denominated al-'Askari, because the latter had been sent to Sarr-man-ra'a, by the khalif al-Mutawakkil, and resided there for twenty years and nine months.

162. ABU NUWAS IBN HANI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Hani Ibn 'Abd al-Awwal Ibn al-Sabah al-Hakami, surnamed Abu Nuwas, was a poet of great celebrity. His (great) grandfather was an enfranchised slave and client of al-Jarrah Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Hakami, governor of Khurasan, and for this reason he bore the title of al-Hakami. Muhammad Ibn Daw'ud Ibn al-Jarrah relates, in his kitab al-Waraqah, that Abu Nuwas was born and brought up at Basrah, and that he accompanied Walibah Ibn al-Hubab<sup>1</sup> to Kufah, and from thence went to Baghdad. Another historian says that he was born at al-Ahwaz, and was removed thence at the age of two years: his mother Julaban was of that city; his father, who was a native of Damascus and a soldier in the service of Marwan Ibn Muhammad, the last of the Omayyide dynasty, had been sent to keep garrison at al-Ahwaz, and he there espoused Julaban, by whom he had many children and, amongst the rest, Abu Mu'adh and Abu Nuwas. The latter was confided by his mother to a druggist, and (when in this employment) he was seen by Abu 'Usamah Walibah, who was pleased with his disposition, and said to him: "I see in you presages (of success) which, I am sure, you will not belie: you are to cultivate poetry: be therefore my disciple; I will conduct you to eminence."—"And who are You? said Abu Nuwas.—"I am Abu Usamah Walibah Ibn al-Hubab," replied he.—"I accept," said Abu Nuwas; "and I had already the intention of going to Kufah, that I might receive instruction from you and learn from you your poetical works." He then accompanied him to Baghdad. well-known Abu Nuwas was a boy when he composed these, his first and verses:

<sup>1</sup> Abu 'Usamah Walibah Ibn al-Hubab, a native of Kufah and a celebrated poet, was in great favour at the court of al-Mansur and other Abbasid princes; in praise and satire he displayed abilities of the highest order. It was by him that Abu Nuwas was presented to the Barmekides, and these generous patrons of literature bestowed ample rewards on the rising poet. In the enjoyment of his good fortune, Abu Nuwas disdained to recognise the friend to whom he had been indebted for his success in the world, and Walibah had often reason to regret the service which he had rendered to his ungrateful disciple. Walibah inhabited Baghdad, and most of his poems are consecrated to the praise of wine and of beauty. He composed also some satires against Bashshar Ibn Burd and Abu 'l-'Atahiyah, but being vanquished by them with the same weapon, he withdrew from public life, and sought to conceal the confusion of his defeat by retiring to obscurity in his native town. (Masalik al-Absar, MS. No. 1371. Kitab al-Aghani, t. IV, fol. 631 verso).

"He who bears the weight of love is soon fatigued; he is agitated with joy, but weeping would be fitter for him; his occupation is not a trifling sport. And you (my fair mistress!) laugh in wantonness whilst your lover sighs; you marvel at my illness, but my health would be a marvel."

Al-Khasib, the chief of the revenue-office in Egypt, once asked Abu Nuwas, from what family he came; "My talents" replied Abu Nuwas, "stand me in stead of noble birth." Al-Khasib asked him no more questions after that. Isma'il Ibn Nubakht said: "I never saw a man of more extensive leaning than Abu Nuwas, nor one who, with a memory so richly furnished, possessed so few books; after his decease we searched his house, and could only find one book-cover, containing a quire of paper<sup>1</sup> in which was a collection of rare expression and grammatical observations." He was a muwallad<sup>2</sup> of the first class, and in the ten different species of poetry which he composed, he displayed equal abilities. A number of eminent men have occupied themselves with making a collection of his poetical works; amongst them were Abu Bakr al-Suli 'Ali Ibn Hamzah, and Ibrahim Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad al-Tabari, surnamed Tuzun; it is for this reason that discrepancies are observable in the collections of his poetry. His compositions are sufficiently known to preclude the necessity of citing any of them.<sup>3</sup> I read in some book that the

1 The word جراز is probably synonymous with كراس

2 See note on classes of poets, pages no. 91.

3 The MS. of the Bib du Roi, No. 1348, is called the Diwan of Abu Nuwas, but this is inexact; the compiler of the catalogue, a man of very little instruction in Arabic literature was deceived by a false title affixed to the work.

khalif al-Mamun said; "Were Fortune to describe herself, she could not produce a description equal to the following by Abu Nuwas;

"Is not each living creature mortal, and sprung from a mortal? Is not (the tree of) its descent deeply rooted in the dead? When Fortune wishes to prove the sage, it appears to him as an enemy in the disguise of a friend."

The first of these verses is a reminiscence of an Idea thus expressed by Imra al-Qays.<sup>1</sup>

"Woman, reproach me less! my experience and the recollection of my ancestors are for me admonitions sufficient. The roots of my (family-tree) are interwoven with the root of the earth':<sup>2</sup> but here comes death to strip me of the robe (of youth)."

In the life of al-Hasan al-Basri may be found an idea analogous to this.<sup>3</sup> What a favourable opinion Abu Nuwas must have entertained of this Creator's indulgence, may be learned from the following verses:

"Multiply the sins to the utmost, for thou art to meet an indulgent Lord. When thou comest before Him, thou shalt behold mercy, and meet the great, the powerful King. Then thou shalt gnaw thy hands with regret, for the pleasures which you avoided through fear of hell."

It is a very fine and original thought.<sup>4</sup> The anecdotes related of abu Nuwas are numerous; one of his best pieces is the qasidah rhyming in m, which excited Abu Tammam's jealousy to such a point that he composed one in the same rhyme and measure: Abu Tammam's commences thus:

"(The lover) approached (after a long journey, the abode of his mistress), and greeted ruins!<sup>5</sup> How often does such an approach break the firm knot of the lover's endurance."

1 See le Diwan d' Amro 'l-Kais, page 50.

2 The root of the earth is supposed by the commentators to mean Adam or Ismail; the poet means that his descent could be traced up to Adam; as for Ismail, it is well known that Imra 'l-Qays' family, the Kindites, were not descended from him, but from Qahtan.

3 The author alludes perhaps to the passage in No. 148, line commencing "I never saw etc:

4 It is not, however, in strict accordance with Muslim morality.

5 The word نرس signifies the dung of camels and sheep. When a family of nomadic Arabs removed their dwelling, the spot which they abandoned might be easily recognised afterwards by these marks. The idea is of constant recurrence in the qasidahs of the early Arabic poets.

As for the poem of Abu Nuwas, it was in honour of al-Amin Muhammad Ibn Harun al-Rashid, and composed during his khalifat.—It begins with this verse:

"O (deserted) mansion! what has the lapse of days wrought upon thee? No longer can we hope to find in thee a smiling face."

It contains also the following description of the camel mounted by the poet:

"She encountered with me the terrors of the desert,—a slender camel, ardent and mettlesome. She outstrips her fellows, (and they follow her motions) as a row of worshippers behind their imam (follow his). When our camels shall have borne us to Muhammad, let their backs be ever kept sacred from riders!

In the life of the celebrated poet Dhu al-Rummah Ghaylan, we shall mention an observation which has been made on this last verse. The same verse reminds me of a circumstance which passed between me and a talented friend of mine, Jamal al-Din Muhammad Ibn 'Abd, a native of Arabela, who was also a good scholar and an excellent singer: I was at a sitting of the council of state at Cairo, in I forget what month of the year 645, when Ibn 'Abd came to look for me, and he sat down near me for a while, there being a crowd of persons present on account of the great quantity of business to be transacted at the time; he then rose up and withdrew, nor was I aware of his absence, till his boy entered and handed me a note, in which the following lines were inscribed:

"O noble patron, by whose existence Fortune manifests to us her favour! I went on a pilgrimage to thy (place of) station,—a pilgrimage of desire, not of obligation; and I left the conveyance which bore me, near the noble sanctuary (of justice), but it went astray and was carried off by the people. Whilst I looked for it, I recited this verse of one who is a model in poetry: When our conveyances shall have borne us to Muhammad, let their backs be ever kept sacred from riders.

Having read the note, I asked the boy what was the matter, and he informed me that his master, on leaving me, perceived that some person had stolen his shoes<sup>1</sup>; on which I admired the aptness of the quotation, (as) the Arabs of the Desert compare shoes to beasts of burden. Examples of this may be found in the poetry both of the ancients and the moderns; the same idea has also been employed by al-Mutanabbi in different places of his poems. Some time after, 1 Which had been taken off on entering.

---

I was visited by Jamal al-Din Ibn 'Abd, an as we happened to speak of these verses, I observed to him that my name was Ahmad, not Muhammad; to which he answered that he knew it, but Ahmad and Muhammad were equivalent.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, be the name what it might, the introduction of the verse was skilfully maragaged.—The khalif al-Amin Muhammad, having been irritated against Abu Nuwas on account of something which passed between them, threatened him with death and had him put in prison; the poet, in his confinement, wrote to him these verses:

"I seek shelter from death under your protection; to you I fly for refuge to avoid your vengeance. I swear by your life<sup>2</sup> that I shall never commit the like again! I swear it by your life! If you kill your Abu Nuwas, where will you find another."

He had numerous adventures with the khalif Amin. In the life of Ibn Darraj al-Qastalli (see no. 55) we have given an extract from a qasidah by abu Nuwas, called the Raiyah because it hymes in r.] The khatib Abu Bakr makes mention of him in the history of Baghdad, and says that he was born in A.H. 145 (A.C. 762-3), (some say 136) and that he died A.H. 195 (A.C. 810-11), or 196, or 198, at Baghdad, where he was buried in the Shunizi cemetery. He was surnamed Abu Nuwas from two locks of hair which hung down (tanus) on his shoulders.—Hakami means belonging to Hakam Ibn Sa'd al-Ashirah, a great tribe of Yemen, from which al-Jarrah Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Hakami was descended. Al-Jarrah was governor of Khurasan, and it has been already said that Abu Nuwas was one of his mawlas<sup>3</sup>, and was therefore denominated after him. [We have spoken of Sa'd al-Ashirah in the life of al-Mutanabbi] (see no. 49). As for Suli, this name shall be noticed in the life of Abu Bakr Muhammad al-Suli.<sup>4</sup> I have never met with a notice on 'Ali Ibn Hamzah.<sup>5</sup> Tuzun studied belles-lettres under Abu 'Umar al-Zahid (al-Mutarriz), and became eminent in that branch; he resided at Baghdad, where he died A.H. 355, the month of the first Jumada (May, A.C. 966).

1 Ahmad means praiseworthy, and Muhammad, deserving of high praise, or highly praised.

2 Literally: By the life of thy head.

3 Mawla means a manumitted slave or a person sprung from one. It might be translated client, and the reciprocal duties of such clients and their patrons form an important chapter of Muslim Law. Mawla signifies also patron.

4 This is an oversight of the author's: he has already given the derivation of Suli in the life of Ibrahim al-Suli (No. 10); and in the life of Muhammad al-Suli he merely refers the reader to it.

5 He must not of course be confound with 'Ali Ibn Hamzah al-Kisa'i, whose life is given by our author.

163. IBN WAKI' AL-TINNISI

Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Khalaf Ibn Hayyan Ibn Sadaqah Ibn Ziyad al-Dubbi (member of the tribe of Dubb) al-Tinnisi, surnamed Ibn Waki' a celebrated poet, came of a Baghdad family, but was born at Tinnis. He is spoken of in the following terms by al-Tha'alibi in the Yatimah. "An eminent poet and a learned compiler; he surpassed every person of his time, and was outdone by none of his contemporaries; his vast originality of thought charmed the reader's mind and captivated his imagination." He then mentions his poems in the form of four-hemistich couplets, which certainly are very good, and he quotes passages from his other productions. His diwan is made up of excellent poetry, and another of his works, the Munsif, or impartial, contains an exposition of al-Mutanabbi's plagiarisms. He had an impediment in his speech, and was (for that reason) called al-'Atis (the sneezer). The following verses are by him:

"My heart, once enamoured, is now delivered from the love, and feels for thee neither inclination nor desire. Thy cruelty reconciled me to thy loss, a parent can cease to regret the death of a froward child."

By the same:

Though the time of our meeting may be distant, our affection shall endure, and we shall be true lovers despite of absence. How many have broken the bonds of love, and yet full confidence had been placed in the sincerity of their attachment! How many faithful lovers who have suffered from suspicion!"

By the same:

"I rejoiced at the suffering of my heart;--may God never grant it relief! How often have I blamed it for loving, and it replied: I cannot help it." Another poet has come near to this idea in the following verses:

"How inconsistent that resolution which inspired my heart with indifference and insensibility towards my beloved. It came to me and, a moment after, it became like my heart and said: I must submit."

Similar to this are the verses of Usamah Ibn Munqidh.

"Assume not a borrowed insensibility when abandoned by those your love; for your force will fail under their protracted aversion. Know that thy heart will return to them, either of its own accord or despite its reluctance."

It is related by a certain jurisconsult, that he repeated the following verses of Ibn Waki's so the shaykh Murtada 'T-Din Abu 'T-Fath Masr Ibn Muhammad Ibn Muqallad al-Quda'i, a native of Shayzar and professor at the chapel built over the tomb of al-Shafi'i in the Qurafah:

An obscure position satisfies my wishes, and they are turned away from exalted rank. And yet they are not ignorant how sweet is the taste of greatness, but to that they prefer health."

On this, Murtada 'T-Din pronounced extempore these verses:

"The fall is in proportion to the ascent; avoid therefore exalted rank. Remain in a place where, If you fall, your legs will escape uninjured."<sup>1</sup>

By Ibn Waki':

"The censor of my conduct saw my beloved for the first time and said: If you loved one like her, no person would blame your passion. Say! towards whom is your heart turned, that you neglect her, the sole creature worthy of love?" He continued thus, unwittingly, to incite to love, one whom he had commanded to abstain from it."

I once repeated the above verses to the doctor Shihab al-Din Muhammad, father of Ibn al-Khaymi,* and he immediately recited to me the following line of his composition:

"Did my monitor see the face of my beloved, he would quarrel with me for that pretty face."<sup>2</sup>

This verse forms part of a poem; it is well turned and the double meaning is prettily imagined. Every fine idea has been expressed by Ibn Waki'; he died on Tuesday, 23rd of the first Jumada, A.H. 393 (March, A. C. 1003),** in the city of Tinnis, and was interred in the chapel built to receive him in the Greater Cemetery. Waki' was the surname given to his great grand-father, Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn Khalf, who was deputy to 'Abdan al-Jawaliqi, qadi of al-Ahwaz; he

1 In the original Arabic, these verses rhyme with the preceding, and are terminated by the same words.

* M. de Slane has omitted the name of the poet, which runs thus: al-Shaykh Taqi al-Din 'Abd al-Munim surnamed Ibn al-Khaymi.—Ed.

2 This is the real meaning of the verse, but the last hemistich seems, at first sight, to signify we should separate in an amicable manner.

** 30 March.—Ed.

was gifted with talents, capacity, and eloquence; learned in the reading of the Qur'an, in jurisprudence, in grammar, and in history. He composed many works, amongst others the Kitab al-Tariq (book of the path); the Kitab al-Sharif (book of the noble);<sup>1</sup> a treatise on the number of verses contained in the Qur'an and on the conflicting opinions held on the subject; a treatise on archery; another on weights and measures, etc. He is author of some poetry, such as learned men generally compose. Died at Baghdad on Sunday, 23rd of the first Rabi', 306 (September, A.C. 918).# According to Ibn Qani', the death of 'Abdan al-Ahwazi took place in 307 (A.C. 919-20), at Askar Mukram.<sup>2</sup> Tinnisi is derived from Tinnis, the name of a town in Egypt near Damietta; it was so called after its founder, Tinnis, son of Ham, son of Noah.—Al-Murtada 's-Shayzari died A.H. 598 (A.C. 1201-2), and was interred in the cemetery at the foot of Mount Muqattam (near Cairo).

164. ABU BAKR IBN AL-'ALLAF

Abu Bakr al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn Bashshar Ibn Ziyad, surnamed Ibn al-'Allaf (son of the fodder-seller) al-Darir (the blind), a celebrated and able poet, was a native of Nahrawan. He learned the Traditions from Abu 'Umar al-Duri<sup>3</sup> the reader of the Qur'an, Humayd

1 These titles are so vague, that it is impossible to say what were the subjects treated of in these two works. Hajji Khalifah does not mention them.

2 The hafiz Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn Musa Ibn Ziyad al-Ahwazi al-Jawaliqi, surnamed 'Abdan (a contraction of 'Abd Allah), visited various countries and learned the Traditions from a great number of persons. As a hafiz, he was noted for his exactness, Ibn Qani' taught the Traditions on his authority. He composed a number of works, and died A.H. 306 (A.C. 918-19), aged ninety years and some months.—(Al-Dhahabi's Tarikh al-Islam, MS. No. 646, fol. 28.)

Sunday fell on 6 September corresponding to 26 Rabi' al-Awwal, and the date according to Ibn Khalikan should be 24.—Ed.

3 Abu 'Umar Hafs Ibn al-'Aziz Ibn Suhban سہبان al-Duri, a native of Baghdad and a member of the tribe of Azd, was a grammarian and a Qur'anic reader of the first celebrity in Iraq. He inhabited Sarr-man-ra'a. It is stated that he was the first who collected together the different readings of the Qur'an (see No. 68, note on seven readings). Men of the first talent flocked from all countries to his lectures, on account of his extensive learning and the high authority of the traditional information which he transmitted to them. He was a good and pious man. Towards the end of his life, he lost his sight. Died in the month of Shawwal, 246 (beginning of A.C. 861).—Duri means belonging to al-Dur, a well-known quarter of Baghdad on the east bank of the Tigris—(Abridged from the Tabaqat al-Qurra, MS. No. 742, fol 51.)

Ibn Mas'adah al-Basri, Nasr Ibn 'Ali al-Jahdami<sup>1</sup> and Muhammad Ibn Isma'il al-Hisabi; and Traditions have been given on his authority by 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Hasan al-Nahhas, the qadi Abu T-Hasan al-Khiraji, Hafis Ibn Shahin,<sup>2</sup> and others. He was one of the Khalif al-Mu'tadid's social companions, and he relates (of him) the following anecdote: "I had passed a night at the palace of al-Mu'tadid with a number of his other companions, when a eunuch came to us and said: The Commander of the faithful sends to tell you that, after you withdrew, he did not feel inclined to sleep, and composed this verse:

'When the vision (of my mistress), fleeting through the shades of night, awoke me, behold! my chamber was deserted, and far off was the place of (our) meeting.'

'He says also,' continued the eunuch, 'that he cannot complete the piece, and will give a rich present to any one who adds to it a second couplet to his satisfaction.' Those who were present failed in accomplishing the task, although they were all poets of talent, on which I hastened to pronounce the following verse:

'On this I said to my eyes: Sleep again; perhaps the vision, in its night visits, may return to me!'

'The eunuch then retired, and having come back, said: The Commander of the faithful declares that your verse is perfect, and he has ordered you a present.' This Abu Bakr had a pet cat, which used to enter into the neighbour's pigeon-houses and eat the young. As this occurred frequently, the owners of the pigeons caught the cat and killed it; and Abu Bakr lamented its fate in the following poem: Some say, however, that the poem was composed on the death of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Mu'tazz (of whom we shall give a biographical notice), and that the poet's apprehension of the khalif al-Muqtadir's vengeance prevented him from openly expressing his ideas in this qasidah, and for that reason, he pretended that it was made on his cat; and he alludes to the cat in some passages. He and Ibn al-Mu'tazz were intimate friends. Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadani, in his lesser history, entitleds al-Ma'rif al-Muta'akhhkirah (later information) says in the life of the vizir abu T-Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Furat: 'The sahib Abu T-Qasim Ibn 'Abbad said 'Abu T-Hasan the son of

1 Nasr Ibn 'Ali al-Jahdami died A.H. 250 (A.C. 864). (Nujum.)

2 Abu Hafis Umar Ibn Shahin, a celebrated hafiz, preacher and commentator on the Qur'an, was a native of Baghdad. Mention has been already made of him in No. 131, note on Abu Hafis.

* خادم means only servant!—Ed.

Abu Bakr al-'Allaf, surnamed al-Akul (the great eater), because he was remarkable for the quantity which he ate at the parties given by princes and great men, recited to me the poems composed by his father on the cat, and told me that by the cat, he meant al-Muhassin, son of visir Ibn al-Furat, and that he did not dare, during the disasters of that family, to lament al-Muhassin's fate or pronounce his name."--The history of this event will be found in the life of Abu 'I-Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Furat.--The philologer Sa'id says, in his kitab al-Fusus: "It was related to me by Abu 'I-Hasan al-Marzubani, that a slave girl belonging to 'Ali Ibn 'Isa loved a youth in the service of Abu Bakr Ibn al-'Allaf; but having been discovered, they were both put to death and their skins stuffed with straw; then Abu Bakr, the maula or patron of the youth, composed this poem to deplore his loss, and it is he whom he meant by the cat." God knows best the truth! This fine and original poem is composed of sixty-five verses, and its length prevents us from giving the entire; but we shall cite the prettiest passages and the verses containing moral reflexions<sup>1</sup>; it begins thus:

"You have left us, Puss! and will never return! you who were to me as a child! How can we cease to love you? you, who were for us a sure defence. You drove evil away from us, and guarded us, in our absence, from serpent and from cricket. You drove the mice from their hiding places and pursued them from their hole to the hall-door. In meeting them in the house, you found food, and without assistance you went against them. Flocks of them could not escape from you, not even one of the flock. You feared not the mid-day heat of summer, neither did you dread the frost of winter. Your order was uncontrolled in our house, and they could offer no resistance. (Thus it was) till you devised evil against our neighbours and thought that you were not working harm. To do them wrong you turned around death; but the (bird) which hovers round a pond mus. drink thereof. My heart trembled for you, but you glided forth without fear, and entered the pigeon-house with slow and stealthy step, but you were not slow in eating the young. You threw about the feathers on the path (of the masters), and you greedily swallowed the flesh. A wrong action fed you with their flesh but their masters judged that slaying you was a right action. They plotted long against you and exerted their efforts; success crowns the stratagems of him who exerts his efforts. For a long time they used wiles against you, but you fell not (into the snare); how often did you, without using any wiles, escape from theirs: but when, with perfidious diligence, you went openly to steal (and were then badly directed), they caught you in their angry mood, and inflicted vengeance on you, adding: 'He that hunts is caught in his turn!' Then, with a sharp steel, they cured their hatred towards thee, and hearkened to the intercession of none."

---

<sup>1</sup> This piece is remarkable for its verbal quibbles and far-fetched allusions; the little merit it possesses is lost in the translation.

From the same piece.

"You ceased not lurking for the pigeons till death surprised you with an ambushade.<sup>1</sup> They had no compassion on your plaintive cries, as you had none on those of the pigeons. Their master made you taste of death as you made their young ones to taste of it; it was simply retaliation.<sup>2</sup> The cord which his kindness placed round your neck<sup>3</sup> to strangle you, must have been made of the fibres of the palm-tree. Methinks I see you struggling in the noose and foaming at the mouth. You sought means to escape, but no stratagem could avail, neither could you find one. Now that you are no more, we never heard of such a death, or of a life so fatal to others. You lived like a glutton led away by his avidity, and you died a violent death without an avenger.<sup>4</sup> O you whom the love of young pigeons brought to you fall! why were you not satisfied with a piece of camel's fat? Did you not fear that fate would spring upon you, when you sprung like a lion into the pigeon-house? The punishment due to crime sleeps not, though it delay for a time. Ah! you would eat young birds and feared not that misfortune, like a ravenous beast, would eat you? That were far from being just, and you were strangely mistaken as to the nearness and the distance (of punishment). May God refuse his blessing to meat, since the belly is the destruction of lives! How often has a sweet bit entered a greedy stomach, and expelled the soul from the body! The possession of Paradise would not have sufficed to turn you from clambering up to the pigeon-house."

From the same qasidah:

"The powerful Lord, the Giver of safety, the Eternal had granted you luxurious ease; you ate at will of the mice in our house; (but

1 Literally; Till you were made to drink of death by the liers in ambush.

2 Literally: Hand for hand.

3 This piece is full of puns and quibbles, impossible to be translated. To place a cord round the neck, signifies figuratively, to lay a person under obligations. The word cord is often employed with the sense of obligation or favour.

4 Literally: By a murder, or victim of an assassin.

where are those who are grateful for the comforts of life?) You scattered their bands from time to time, but they met after their dispersion and spared neither cloth nor felted stuff in the house. They emptied it to the bottom, and left not even what our hands had suspended to the walls with hooks; they crumbled the bread in the baskets, and how often did they annoy the family!<sup>1</sup> They tore our new dresses, and all of us were undergoing fresh misfortunes."

We shall confine ourselves to these citations, which are the cream of the piece.—Ibn al-'Allaf died A.H. 318 (A.C. 930), or 319, aged one hundred years.<sup>2</sup> -Nahrawani means belonging to Nahrawan, an ancient village near Baghdad; al-Sam'ani pronounces it Nahruwan, but that is not exact.

165. ABU'L JAWA'IZ AL-WASITI.

Abu 'I-Jawa'iz al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn Bari* al-Wasiti (native of Wasit) the Katib, was a man of eminent talent. He inhabited Baghdad for a long period, and is spoken of by the Khatib in his history of that city. I wrote under his dictation," says this author, "different historical relations, anecdotes, pieces of verse, and philological observations, which, as he declared, were taught to him by Ibn Sukkarah al-Hashimi<sup>3</sup> and others; but his statements do not merit full confidence,<sup>4</sup> for he told me that he heard the lessons of Ibn Sukkarah, which could not be, as he must have been then too young. He was well informed in literature and composed some good poetry, particularly eulogiums and descriptions. Among the verses of his composition which he recited to me, were the following:

1 Literally: How often did they break in pieces the liver of the family.

2 That is, one hundred lunar years, equivalent to about ninety-six solar.

* In Cairo edition (1968) the name is given as Badi and in the footnote the Editor has given Bari which is corroborated by the autograph.—Ed.

3 Abu 'I-Hasan Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah, surnamed Ibn Sukkarah, a celebrated philologist and poet, was descended from 'Ali, son of the Abbasside khalif al-Mahdi, for which reason he was entitled al-'Abbasi. He was also named al-Hashimi, being descended, as all the Abbassides, from Hashim, great-grandfather of Muhammad. His collected poetical works form a mass of fifty thousand verses, the prevailing character of which is gaiety and humour. He and his contemporary Ibn Hajjaj were, by their rivalry, the Jarir and Farazdaq of the epoch. He died A.H. 385 (A.C. 996).—Al-Yafi'i's Annals, Yatimah, No. 1370, fol. 206. Specimens of his poetry may be found in both works.)

4 Literally. He was not a thiqat; see note on thiqah No. 48.

"Renounce all mankind and turn your friendship from them, if you cannot have indulgence for human nature. The stream of time is evidently a troubled current; hope not then to find pureness and sincerity in (men), the children of time; for their dispositions resist correction.<sup>1</sup> Two things are not to be found on earth, a dirhem gained honestly, and a friend really sincere."

Abu 'T-Jawa'iz is author of some good works; his handwriting was elegant, and his poetry charming; I have met with many of his pieces, but I never saw a complete collection of them, neither do I know if such a collection was ever formed. The following verses of his are currently cited:

"Love has worn me down as a piece of wood is thinned with a knife; and your aversion has melted me away, so that I am become a greater nonentity than the day which is gone by. I am not visible till I see you, for atoms of dust do not appear but in the rays of the sun."

In the piece which follows he has subjected himself to certain rules of compositions not at all necessary in poetry<sup>2</sup>:

"Oh! what sadness was mine when she said: 'He has been false in the promises he made me, and has sported (with my feelings)'. By the existence of Him who created me to live for her alone<sup>3</sup>! when her image crosses my mind, I am plunged in despair."<sup>4</sup>

He died A.H. 460 (A.C. 1067-8). The Khatib says: "I heard Abu 'T-Jawa'iz mention that he was born A.H. 382 (A.C. 992-3), and after the year 460, I never heard more of him." It is certain, however, that he died, as we have said, in 460 the Khatib, it is true, does not declare it expressly; he only notices the epoch at which he ceased to hear of him.

166. 'ALAM AL-DIN AL-SHATANI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Sa'id Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Bundar Ibn Ibrahim al-Shatani, surnamed 'Alam al-Din (the signal of religion), was

1 I have been obliged to paraphrase this verse, so as to render the author's idea.

2 Literally: In this piece is strict observance of what is not obligatory; Luzum ma la yalzum. See note on luzum No. 46.

3 Literally; who made me a waqf (settled) her and for her (use) See note.

4 Literally; It clothes me with despair.

a jurisconsult, but the cultivation of poetry became his dominant passion, and by his compositions, in which he displayed great talent, he became known as a poet: he had already left his native town and settled at Mosul, from whence he went occasionally to Baghdad. The wazir abu 'I-Muzaffar Ibn Hubairah treated him with great deference and favour. The Katib 'Imad al-Din mentions him in the Kharidah, and then gives some of his poetry. "He celebrated," says he, "the praise of Salah al-Din in a poem which begins thus:

"I see victory attached to your yellow standard; proceed then, and conquer the world, for you are worthy of its possession."

The same poem contains this verse:

"Fortune is in your right hand and wealth in your left; joy then to him who hopes for their favours! joy be to him!"

This poet was born A.H. 510 (A.C. 1116-7); he died in the month of Shā'ban, 599 (April, or May, A.C. 1203), at Mosul. Ibn al-Dubaythi mentions him with praise in his supplement (to the literary history of Baghdad)<sup>1</sup>. Shatan is the name of a town<sup>2</sup> in Diyar Bakr.

167. NASIR AL-DAWLAT IBN HAMDAN.

Abu Muhammd al-Hasan, surnamed Nasir al-Dawlat (champion of the empire) was descended from Taghlib (the progenitor of an ancient and illustrious Arabic tribe); his genealogy is as follows; Al-Hasan son of Abu' I-Hayja 'Abd Allah Ibn Hamdan Ibn Hamdun Ibn al-Harith Ibn Luqman Ibn Rashid Ibn al-Mathanna Ibn Rafi' Ibn al-Harith Ibn Ghatif Ibn Mihrabah Ibn Harithah Ibn Malik Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn 'Adi Ibn 'Usamah Ibn malik Ibn Bakr Ibn Habib Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ghanam Ibn Taghlib. He acted as lieutenant to his father in the government of Mosul, and after passing through many vicissitudes of fortune, he became lord of that city and its dependencies. On this occasion he was honoured with the title of Nasir al-Dawlat, by the khalif al-Muttaqi Billah, who granted also to his brother, on the same day, the title of Sayf al-Dawlat (Sword of the empire). This was on the first of the month of Shā'ban A.H. 330 (April, A.C. 942). Their influence then became very great. 'Abd Allah Ibn Hamdan, their father, had been appointed governor of Mosul and its dependencies. A.H. 292 (A.C.

1 Ibn al-Dubaythi's literary history of Baghdad; MS. No. 745, fol. 163.

2 Ibn al-Dubaythi says, a castle, قلعة

904-5), by the khalif al-Muktafi Billah, and he made his entry into the city towards the beginning of the year 293. Nasir al-Dawlat was older than his brother Sayf al-Dawlat and in higher favour with the khalifs. The two brothers made the greater part of their literary studies together, and a coolness having once taken place between them, Sayf al-Dawlat addressed these verses to Nasir al-Dawlat.

"Though suffering from your harshness, I shall not act unkindly; neither shall I neglect my duty in whatever state I may be. You are (to me as) a parent, and a parent's severity is best repaid with patience and resignation."

Another time, he wrote to him these verses, which are mentioned by al-Tha'alibi in his Yatimah:

"I concede to you exalted rank, although I am worthy of it; and I say to (my advisers); 'There is a difference between me and my brother. I have no aversion for rank, 'tis true; but I forego my rights, so that you (my brother) may enjoy the plenitude of yours. (But yet in the race of honours) I must surely hold the second place, if I consent to yield you up the first.'"

On the death of Sayf al-Dawlah (an event of which we shall give the date in his life), a great change was produced in the character and disposition of his brother Nasir al-Dawlah, who loved him dearly; his intellectual faculties became so weak, that his children and domestics no longer retained for him any respect, and he was at length arrested at Mosul by his son Abu Taghlib Fadl Allah, surnamed 'Uddat al-Dawlat (strength of the empire), and commonly called al-Ghadanfar (the lion). Fadl Allah, who in this action was seconded by the approbation of his brothers, sent his father to the castle of al-Salamah in the fortress of Ardumusht<sup>1</sup>. (My professor Ibn al-Athir says, in his History, that this fortress is now called Kawashi.) This event took place on Tuesday,* the 24th of the first Jumada, A.H. 356 (May, A.D. 697)† Nasir al-Dawlah remained in confinement till his death, which happened on the afternoon of Friday, the second of 1 "Ardumusht, a strong fortress near Jazirah Ibn 'Umar on mount Judi or Ararat, to the east of the Tigris. "Below the fortress lies another fortress, Di'yr al-Za'faran (saffron convent), which is also called Lawashi لرواشي. It is one of the dependencies of Mosul." (Marasid). In the MS. of Ibn al-Athir, the name of this place is written Kawashi كواشي, see t. II, f. 21 verso, and f. 23, v.

* In the autograph السبت is written beneath الثلاثاء. -Ed.

† 7 May--Ed.

the first Rabi', 358 (January A.C. 969)**. His corpse was borne to Mosul, and interred at Tall Tawbah,<sup>1</sup> a hill on the east side of the city. Some say that he died in 357. Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadani<sup>2</sup> says, in his Unwan al-Siyar, towards the end of the life of Nasir al-Dawlah: "He continued to govern the province of Mosul and others places, till the year 356, when he was arrested by his son al-Ghadanfar; he had been emir over those countries for thirty-two years. He died on Friday, 12th of first Rabi', 357 (February, A.D. 968)*; "His father Abu 'I-Hajja 'Abd Allah was slain at Baghdad on the 17th Muharram, A.H. 317 (March, A.D. 929)$ whilst protecting the khalifah al-Qahir Billah. The history of this event is well known<sup>3</sup>, When 'Adad al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh slew his cousin Bakhtyar and took possession of Baghdad, Abu Taghlib al-Ghadanfar, who had fought on the side of the latter, was embroiled in an affair with the conqueror, the circumstances of which would be too long to relate; we shall only state in a summary manner, that 'Adud al-Dawlah went to attack him at Mosul, from which al-Ghadanfar retreated and encamped outside of Damascus, which was in the possession of Qassam al'Ayyar<sup>4</sup> (al-Ghadanfar) then wrote to the sovereign of Egypt, al-Aziz Ibn Mu'izz, soliciting the government of Syria, to which al-Aziz gave ostensibly his consent, but secretly opposed obstacles to the fulfilment of his promise. After this, al-Ghadanfar ** 24 January; but the day according to Mahler should be Sunday-Ed.

1 "Tall Tawbah تل توب (the hill of repentance) lies opposite to Mosul on the Ninevah side (of the river Tigris) a chapel is there which is visited by the pious. This place was so named, it is said, because the people at Ninevah went out to it and repented when Jonas threatened them with God's vengeance" (Marasid)

2 This writer died A.H. 521 (A.D. 1127).-(Ibn al-Athir, Hajji Khalifah).

14 February-Ed.

$ 2 March-Ed.

3 The khalif al-Muqtadir had been deposed by Munis the eunuch, Nazuk (نازوك) chief of the police guards (Sahib al-Shurtah) and Abu 'I-Hayja Ibn Hamdan, who had come from the province of al-Jabal with a large body of troops to assist the conspirators. On the accession of the new khalif, al-Tahir, the imperial guards الرجالة المصانية came in arms to demand the customary donation and an additional year's pay. As they did not obtain immediately what they required, they reinstated al-Muqtadir on the throne, after massacring Nazuk and Abu 'I-Hayja. A full relation of the event is given by Ibn al-Athir in his Annals, from which Abu 'I-Fida has extracted his abridged account of the same revolution.

4 This Qassam had succeeded Ifikin as governor of Damascus. He acknowledged the authority of the Fatimite khalif al-Aziz, and had prayers said for him in the mosques of that city-(Ibn al-Athir, year 368.)

proceeded to Ramlah, in the month of Muharram A.H. 369 (August, A.D. 979)<sup>1</sup>; but as that place was in the hands of al-Mufrij Ibn al-Jarrah al-Badwi al-Ta'i<sup>2</sup>, he retreated from it, and collected fresh troops to attack the place. He then returned and gave al-Mufrij battle, at the gate of the city, on Monday, 1st of Safar; but his partisans having been defeated, he was made prisoner and put to death on Tuesday, 2nd of the month of Safar of the year (September, A.D. 979).* His birth took place on Tuesday, 11th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 328 (August, A.D. 940#). I have given the genealogy of this family on the authority of the vizir Abu 'I-Qasim Ibn al-Maghribi, who has inserted it in his work entitled Anab al-Khawass. The genealogist Muhammad Ibn Asad al-Asadi says: "Taghlib (the progenitor of the tribe so called) was named Dithar, but he obtained the surname of Taghlib for the following reason: His father Wa'il was beset in his dwelling by (the tribes of) Yemen, who had the intention of making his family prisoners, but he called aloud on his people and companions, and with their assistance he defeated the tribe of Yemen. Taghlib was then a child, and his father prognosticated well of him and said: 'This is Taghlib, (thou shall conquer,) and such was the name by which he was called ever after."

168. RUKN AL-DAWLAH IBN BUWAYH

Abu Ali al-Hasan Ibn Buwayh Ibn Fannakhusraw al-Daylami, surnamed Rukn al-Dawlah (pillar of the state): the rest of his genealogy has been already given in the life of his brother, Mu'izz al-Dawlah Ahmad (No. 71, Vol. I). He was lord of Isfahan, Rayy, Hamadan, and all Persian Iraq, and father of the three princes, 'Adud al-Dawlah Fannakhusraw, Mu'ayyad al-Dawlah Abu Mansur Buwayh, and Fakhr al-Dawlah Abu al-Hasan Ali. Rukn al-Dawlah was a powerful

1 The MSS. of Ibn Khallikan have 367, س for س but this is a fault, probably of an early copyist. The facts are fully related and the true dates given in Abu 'I-Fida and Ibn al-Athir.

[In the autograph the date س is given on the margin; the full account appears to be added afterwards—Ed.]

2 This was the phylarch of the Bedwin Arabs. He and his family resided at Ramlah, and were devoted to the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt. Ibn Khaldun, in his notice on the Arabian tribes which settled in Africa, gives this history of this family.

* 29 August, but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Friday--Ed.

18 August--Ed.

and aspiring prince; he had for vizir Ibn al-'Amid<sup>1</sup>, on whose death he appointed Abu al-Fath 'Ali, the son of Ibn al-'Amid, to the same situation. The Sahib Ibn 'Abbad was vizir to his son Mu'ayyad al-Dawlah, and, on that sovereign's death, to Fakhr al-Dawlah; this circumstance we have already mentioned in the life of the Sahib (No. 93, Vol. I). Rukn al-Dawlah reigned prosperously, and was favoured by fortune in possessing three such sons; it was between them that he shared his possessions, and they governed with the greatest ability. He had two brothers; Abu al-Hasan Ali Imad al-Dawlah, who was older than himself, and Abu al-Husayn Ahmad Mu'izz al-Dawlah, who was younger. The life of the latter has been already given. Rukn al-Dawlah died at Rayy on Friday night, 18th of the month of Muharram, A.H. 336 (September, A.C. 976), and was buried in the mausoleum which bears his name. "His birth is placed, by conjecture, in the year 284 (A.C. 897);" such are the words of Abu Ishaq al-Sahib. He reigned forty-four years, one month, and nine days, and was succeeded by his son Muw'ayyad al-Dawlah.

169. AL-HASAN IBN SAHL THE VIZIR

Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn Sahl Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Sarakhsi succeeded his brother al-Fadl Dhu 'l-Riyasatayn as vizir to al-Ma'mun, whose favour he thenceforward enjoyed to a high degree. We have already made mention (no. 117) of his daughter, Buran, of her marriage with al-Ma'mun, and of the heavy expense to which her father al-Hasan went on that occasion; we shall therefore abstain from repeating the same account here. Al-ma'mun gave him the government of all the provinces conquered by Tahir Ibn al-Husayn, as we shall mention in the life of the latter. Al-Hasan was of a noble disposition and very generous in his donations to poets and other (literary) men: a poet once went to him and recited in his presence these verses:

"When my wife<sup>2</sup> saw me saddle my camels, although I had just

1 The life of Ibn al-'Amid is given in this work: In the preceding pages I have written the name Omaid, in consequence of having misunderstood a grammatical observation made by Ibn Khallikan.

2 Notwithstanding the authority of the MSS. I read خليلتي not خليلتي

[For خليلتي ] it is not a correct rendering. It should be dear or darling. It is true however that the poet had his wife in his mind and refers to her as خليلتي

In the autograph and printed text we have خليلتي which gives better sense —Ed.]

ungirthed them, she said: 'Can a distant journey await camels, now that al-Fadl<sup>1</sup> is no more? 'Yes' I replied, 'they must (bear me) to al-Hasan Ibn Sahl.'"

For this piece the poet received a rith present. He went forth, one day, to accompany to some distance al-Ma'mun, who was setting out on a journey; and when they were about separating, al-Ma'mun said to him: "Abu Muhammad! do you desire any thing?"—Yes, Commander of the faithful;" replied al-Hasan, "that you preserve towards me those favourable feelings of your heart, the possession of which I cannot ensure to myself but with your concurrence." One of those (who knew him) relates the following anecdote: "I was present at an audience given by al-Hasan Ibn Sahl, and a person came to thank him for a letter of recommendation which he had written in his favour; on this, the vizir replied: 'Why thank me? I consider (the duty of) intercession as the legal alms (which render the capital) of my honourable feeling (acceptable of God).<sup>2</sup> The same narrator says: "I was present, one day, whilst he dictated (to his secretary) a letter of recommendation, and he himself wrote at the end of it these words: 'I have been told that, on the day of judgment, a man will be questioned respecting the use he made of the influence given him by his rank in the world, in the same manner as he will be questioned respecting the use he made of the superfluity of this wealth<sup>3</sup>. He said to his sons; 'My sons! learn the use of language; it is by it that man holds his pre-eminence over other animals, the higher the skill which you attain in the use of language, the nearer you approach to the ideal of human nature.' Al-Hasan continued to act as vizir to al-Ma'mun till he had an attack of black bile (melancholy), caused by excessive grief on learning the murder of his brother al-Fadl; (we shall narrate this event in the life of the latter.) His melancholy overcame him so far, that he had to be confined to his house, and was unable to fulfil the duties of his office.

"In the year 203 (A.D. 818-9)," says al-Tabari in his History, "Al-Hasan Ibn Sahl was overcome by black bile, occasioned by a fit of 1 That is: Why undertake a long journey to solicit favours, now that the best of patrons, the vizir al-Fadl Ibn Sahl is no more?

2 By the Muslim law, property is liable to a yearly tax of 2.5 percent. This tax is called Zakat (alms), and the payment of it is necessary to render the possession and use of the remaining capital agreeable to God. In Hamilton's Hidayah, vol. I, will be found an account of this tax and its primitive object.

3 This phrase in the original Arabic is expressed with singular concision, and is yet perfectly clear.

sickness; this sickness impaired his reason to such a degree, that it was necessary to chain him and confine him a chamber. Al-Ma'mun then took for his vizir Ahmad Ibn Abi Khalid." Al-Hasan died at Sarakhs on the first of Dhu 'T-Hijjah, A.H. 236 (June, A.D. 851)*, (some say 235). The following verses were made in his praise by Yusuf al-Jawyari:

"Could Zuhayr see Hasan and the manner in which his generosity employs his wealth, Zuhayr would say, at the sight; 'It is he who is the liberal man despite of misfortunes, and not Harim!'"

Towards the end of this work, in the life of Yahya Ibn 'Isa Ibn Matruh, we shall give the anecdote of Zuhayr and Harim Ibn Sinari.<sup>1</sup> In the life of Abu Bakr Muhammad al-Khwarazmi mention is made of al-Hasan Ibn Sahl. Sarakhsi means belonging to Sarakhs, which is a city in Kharasan.

170. AL-WAZIR AL-MUHALLABI

Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad Ibn Harun Ibn Ibrahim Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Yazid Ibn Hatim Ibn Qabisah Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah al-Azdi al-Muhallabi al-Wazir (the vizir descended from al-Muhallab and member of the tribe of Azd), was appointed vizir by Mu'izz al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh (see his life, no. 71) on Monday, 27th of the first Jumada, A. H. 339 (November, A. D. 950);** his powerful influence, generous disposition, lofty spirit, and firm administration have rendered him celebrated, whilst his acquaintance with literature and his friendship of men of learning reached to an extreme. Previously to the period at which he was attached to the service of Mu'izz al-Dawlah, he had suffered greatly from want and distress: in one of his journeys, after undergoing severe fatigue, he had a longing for flesh-meat, and not being able to procure any, he recited extempore the following verses:

"Where is death sold, that I may buy it? For this life is devoid of good. Oh! let death, whose taste (to me) is sweet, come and free me from a detested life! when I see a tomb from afar, I wish to be its inhabitant. May the Being who granteth tranquillity, have compassion on the soul of the generous man who will bestow death, as a charity, upon one of his brethren!"

* 5 June-Ed.

<sup>1</sup> Some time anterior to the Islamism, a destructive warfare existed between the tribes of 'Abs and Dhubyān, but the feud was at length appeased by Harim Ibn Sinan and al-Harith Ibn 'Awf, who generously paid the price of blood to the relations of those who had fallen in the contest. For this, Zuhayr Ibn Abi sulma praised them both in his celebrate Mu'allaqah.

** 11 November-Ed.

These verses were heard by a person, who was traveling (in the same caravan) with him, and whose name was 'Abd Allah al-Sufi, or, by another account, Abu T-Hasan al-'Asqalani; this man bought for him a dirhim's worth of meat, and cooked it and gave it to him to eat. They then separated, and al-Muhallabi having experienced a change of fortune, became vizir to Mu'izz al-Dawlah at Baghdad, while the person who had travelled with him and purchased the meat for him, was reduced to poverty; having then learned that al-Muhallabi was a vizir, he set out to find him and wrote to him these lines:

"Repeat to the vizir, for whose life I would sacrifice my own—repeat to him the words of one who reminds him of what he has forgotten. Do you remember when, in a life of misery, you said: Where is death sold, that I may buy it?"

The vizir, on reading the note, recollected the circumstance, and, moved with the joy of doing a generous action, he ordered seven hundred dirhims to be given to the writer, and inscribed these words on the paper: The similitude of those who lay out their substance in the service of God, is as a grain of corn which has produced seven ears and in every ear a hundred grains; for God giveth many-fold to whom he pleaseth.<sup>1</sup> He then prayed God's blessing on him and clothed him in a robe of honour, and appointed him to a place under government, so that he might live in easy circumstance. Al-Muhallabi, on being raised from penury to the vizirat, composed these lines:

"Fortune pitied (me) for my misery, and lamented the length of the sufferings which consumed me; she has granted me what I hoped for, and delivered (me) from what I apprehended. I shall therefore pardon her former wrong, and even the crime of turning my hair to gray."

By the same:

"In the haste of our separation, whilst my heart was enflamed (with anguish), the person whom I loved said to me: 'What will you do on the way after (leaving) me? And I replied: 'I shall weep for your (loss) the length of the way.'

Among the verses said to have been composed by him in the

---

1 Qur'an, surah 2, verse 263.

time of his poverty and addressed to a person in high authority, are the following, which some, however attribute to Abu Nuwas:

"If I asked you to increase my afflictions, such an augmentation would be beyond your power. Were a life such as I have led offered to the dead, they would refuse it."

Abu Ishaq al-Sabi, the author of the epistles,<sup>1</sup> says: "I was one day with the vizir al-Muhallabi, and he took a sheet of paper to write, on which I said extempore:

'He has a hand of surpassing liberality by its gifts, and a discourse of which he scatters the pearls upon the paper. Hatim is concealed in his hand,<sup>2</sup> and Sahban in his fingers<sup>3</sup>

Mu'izz al-Dawlah had a Turkish mamluk of singular beauty, named Tikin al-Jamdar; <sup>4</sup>he was extremely fond of him and sent him as the commander of a military expedition against one of the Hamdan family. On this, the following lines were made by the vizir al-Muhallabi, who found the youth handsome enough to adorn a court,<sup>5</sup> but not suited to sustain the toils of war:

"(There is) a child with the waters (of youth) mantling in his face, and the wood of his (body) yet tender; he is so like a girl that his bosom might be expected soon to swell; yet to his slender waist they have hung a sword, and tied around it a belt which hurts him; they have made him chief of an army, but the troop and the leader of it will both perish."

And so it really was, the mamluk being unsuccessful in his expedition. A singularly sentimental line of his is the following:

(My) eye-lids parted when you parted with me, and they met not again but over a flowing tear.

The traits of his generous character abound. He was born at Basrah on Monday* night, 26th Muharram, A.H. 291 (December,

1 See No. 14.

2 The generosity of Hatim is well known.

3 Sahban was an ancient Arab celebrated for his eloquence. (Al-Hariri p. 42; Rasmussen's Addimenta, p. 74).

4 Jamdar; officer of the wardrobe.-(De Secy's Chrestomathie, t. I, p. 135; t. II. p. 186.)

5 The Arabic scholar will perceive that a modification is here made in the sense of the original text.

* ثلثاء means Tuesday—Ed.

A.D. 903),# and he died on Saturday, 26th Shā'ban, A.H. 352 September, A.D. 963),$ whilst making a journey to Wasit. His body was borne to Baghdad, where it arrived on Wednesday night, 5th Ramdan$$ of the same year, and was interred in the part of the Nubakhtiyah cemetery which is called the burial-ground of the Quraysh-Muhallabi means descended from al-Muhallab, of whom we shall give the life. On the death of this vizir, the following elegy was composed by the poet al-Husayn Ibn al-Hajjaj (whose life will be found farther on):

"People of poets! (hear) the cry of one afflicted; of one for whom the joy of consolation can no more be hoped. Give solace to poetry for the loss of the vizir; poetry weeps blood over him after (exhausting) its tears. He is dead! the man behind whom praise toiled ineffectually, and before whom proceeded clemency (like) the clemency of God. In his death, fortune has overthrown the fortress to which we retired for protection against fortune's wrongs. Let the sons of Buwayh know, that the days (of their prosperity) are now crossed by affliction.

171. THE VIZIR NIZAM AL-MULK

The vizir Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ishaq Ibn al-'Abbas al-Tusi (native of Tus) was surnamed Nizam al-Mulk, Qawwam al-Din (the regulator<sup>1</sup> of the state, upholder of religion). Al-Sam'ani says in his Kitab Al-Ansab: "Radhkan: a small village near Tus; it is said that Nizam al-Mulk was from its neighbourhood." He was son to a dihqan<sup>2</sup> and, after studying the traditions and jurisprudence, he entered as katib<sup>3</sup> into the service of 'Ali Ibn Shadhan, governor of the city of Balkh; but as heavy sums were extorted from him every year by his employer, he abandoned his post and fled to Daw'ud Ibn Mika'il al-Saljuqi, the father of Alp Arslan. This prince received from him such

---

19 November; but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Friday--Ed.

$ 19 September--Ed.

$$ 27 September--Ed.

1 The word nizam, here rendered by regulator, means the thread or string of a pearl necklaec. This title indicated that the existence of the Vizir was as necessary for the maintenance of order in the state, as the string of a necklace is, to hold the pearls together.

2 See no, 34, note on dihqan.

3 He appears to have been director of the revenue office, or collector of taxes.

proofs of fidelity and attachment, that he gave him over to his son, Alp Arslan, saying: "Consider him as a parent, and disobey not his counsels." When Alp Arslan succeeded to the empire, Nizam al-Mulk took the direction of affairs, and administered with great talent; he remained in Alp Arslan's services ten years. On the death of the prince, his sons pressed forward to seize on the empire, but Nizam al-Mulk secured it to Malik Shah, son of Alp Arslan. From that period and during twenty years, all the power was concentrated in the hands of the vizir, whilst the sultan had nothing more to do than show himself on the throne and enjoy the pleasures of the chase. The khalifah al-Muqtadi Billah, having received a visit from Nizam al-Mulk, allowed him to be seated in his presence, and addressed him in these terms: "O Hasan! May God be pleased with thee in as much as the commander of the faithful is pleased with thee." The court of the vizir Nizam al-Mulk was greatly frequented by doctors of the law and sufis, towards the latter of whom he was very beneficent. Being asked the reason of the favour which he showed them, he answered: "I was in the service of a certain amir, when a sufi came to me and made me a pious exhortation, and said: "Serve Him whose service will be useful to you, and be not taken up with one whom dogs will eat tomorrow." I did not understand his meaning; but the amir used to drink from morning to evening, and had some dogs which were ferocious like beasts of prey, and devoured strangers at night; now, it happened that being once overcome with intoxication, he went out alone, and was torn to pieces by the dogs, which did not recognize him. I then knew that this sufi had received a revelation on the subject, and I therefore treat these people with respect, in hopes that I may obtain a similar grace." On hearing the call to prayers, he immediately abandoned whatever occupation he might be engaged in; and when the Imam al-Haramayn Abu T-Ma'ali, and the author of the Epistle,<sup>1</sup> Abu T-Qasim al-Qushayri, came to visit him he treated them with the utmost respect and made them sit down on the sofa with himself. He built a number of colleges, convents, and mosques in different provinces. He was the first who set the example of founding a college,<sup>2</sup> and he commenced, A.H. 457 (A.D. 1065), the construction of that of Damascuss; in the year 459, it was agreed on by every class of persons that Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi should teach therein; but he did not present himself, and Abu Nasr Ibn al-Sabbagh, the author of the Shamil, taught for twenty days in his place, after which, Abu Ishaq accepted.<sup>3</sup> We shall give the full details of 1 This Epistle (al-Risalah) is a treatise on sufism.

2 This, as may be seen in the introduction, is not exact.

3 (جلس) Literally: Sat.

this circumstance in the life of Ibn al-Sabbagh, which see. At the hour of prayer, Abu Ishaq used to quit the college and perform his devotions in a mosque; "Because," said he, "I have been informed that the grater part of the material employed in the constriction of the college has been procured illegally." Nizam al-Mulk learned and taught the traditions, and he used to say: "I am conscious of not deserving that honour, but I wish to establish myself in the series<sup>1</sup> of persons who have transmitted the sayings of the Prophet." The following verses are declared to be his:

"After four-score, strength exists not; and the alacrity of youth is departed. With staff in hand I resemble Moses, but have not the gift of prophecy[ نبوة ].

Some persons say, however, that these verses are by Muhammad Ibn Abi T-Saqr, whose life shall be given farther on.

Nizam al-Mulk was born on Friday, 21st of Dhu'l Qa'dah, A.H. 408 (April, A.D. 1018),* at Nuqan, one of the two cities of which Tus is composed.<sup>2</sup> In A.H. 485, he set out with Malik Shah for Isfahan, and on Friday# night, 10th of Ramadan (October, A.D. 1092),$ he broke his fast and mounted in his palanquin; on reaching a village called Sahnah near Nahawand, he remarked that a great number of the companions of the Prophet had been slain at that place in the time of the khalifah Umar Ibn al-Khattab,<sup>3</sup> "and happy," said he, "is the man who is with them!" He was then accosted by a boy of the province of Daylam, in the dress of a sufi, who called to him to receive a memorial, and when the vizir reached out his hand to take it, he stabbed him to the heart with a dagger. Nizam al-Mulk was borne to his pavilion, where he expired, and the murderer took to flight, but having stumbled over a tent-rope, fell and was immediately taken and put to death. The Sultan rode forth without delay to tranquilize the army and console them. The body of the vizir was transported to Isfahan, and there interred. It is said that the assassin was suborned against him by Malik shah, who was fatigued to see him live so long, and coveted the numerous fiefs which he held in his possession. The Sultan survived him for thirty-five days

1 In the Arabic text, for اقطار read قطار

* 11 April-Ed.

2 See no. 37.

i.e. the night intervening between Friday and Saturday-Ed.

$ 15 October-Ed.

3 The battle of Nahawand was fought A.H. 21 (A.D. 642). See Price's Retrospect, vol. I.

only. This vizir was the ornament of the age in which he lived; his son-in-law, Shibl al-Dawlah Abu T-Hayja Muqatil Ibn al-'Atiyyah al-Bakri, whose life will be found farther on, lamented his death in an elegiac poem containing the following passage:

"Nizam al-Mulk was a precious pearl, formed of pure nobleness by the merciful God: it was so fine that the age knew not its worth, and the Maker, jealous for [guarding] its honour, restored it to its shell.

The assassination of Nizam al-Mulk has been attributed also to Taj al-Mulk Abu T-Ghana'im al-Marzuban Ibn Khusrav Firuz, surnamed Ibn Darist; he was an enemy of the vizir and in high favour with his sovereign Malik Shah, who, on the death of Nizam al-Mulk, appointed him to fill the place of vizir. Ibn Darist was himself slain on Monday night, 12th Muharram, 486 (February, A.D. 1093);* having been attacked and cut to pieces by the young mamluks belonging to the household of Nizam al-Mulk. He was aged forty-seven years: the tomb over the grave of the shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi was erected by him.

172. FAKHR AL-KUTTAB AL-JUWAYNI

Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ibrahim al-Juwayni, surnamed Fakhr al-Kuttab (pride of the katibs), was a native of Juwayn, but his family came from Baghdad. This celebrated katib (scribe) wrote a great deal, and copied books which are now found in the hands of the public, and for which a high price is asked, on account of the beauty of the writing and the eagerness of purchasers. 'Imad al-Din praises him highly in the Kharidah and then says: "He was one of the convivial companions, of the atabek Zinki when that prince was in Syria, and afterwards remained under a shelter of honour near his son Nur al-Din Mahmud. He then travelled to Egypt during the administration of Ibn Ruzzik, and he dwells there till this day. There is not at present, in Misr, a person who writes like him." 'Imad al-Din then cites some passages of a poem addressed by him to al-Qadi T-Fadil, which, were it not so long, we should give here. Fakhr al-Kuttab died at Cairo, A.H. 584 (A.D. 1118-9), or 586. Juwayni means belonging to Juwayn, which is a large region near Naysabur [Nishapur]: a great number of learned men bore this patronymic. The following * 12 February; but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Saturday—Ed.

---

verses, composed by a native of 'Iraq, were often recited by Fakhr al-Kuttab.

"Men feel regret when unable to accomplish their desires and you see them rejoice and look gay when they succeed, (although their projects are then) as if they had never been fulfilled.<sup>1</sup> Projects and the dreams of sleep are, in my opinion, nearly related".

173. AL-KARABISI

Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Yazid al-Karabisi was a native of Baghdad, and one of the Imam al-Shafi'i's most distinguished disciples, having replaced him occasionally at his course of lectures, and possessing a most extensive knowledge of his doctrine. He composed many works on the main principles of jurisprudence and its particular application; he was skilled in dogmatic theology, and learned in the Traditions. He wrote works on that branch of science which is called al-Jarh wa'l-Ta'dil (impeachment and justification),<sup>2</sup> and on other subject. A great number of persons were instructed by him in jurisprudence. He died A.H. 245, or, according to a statement which appears more correct, in 248 (A.D. 862-3).

Karabisi is formed from Karabis, which word designates clothes made of a sort of coarse cloth; the singular is kirbas: it is a Persian word, altered in its pronunciation to suit the genius of the Arabic language.<sup>3</sup> This doctor sold cloth of that sort, and was therefor called al-Karabisi (the clothier),

174 ABU 'ALI IBN KHAYRAN

'Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn Salih Ibn Khayran was a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shafi'i and most eminent for his piety; he was also one of their most talented teachers. The place of qadi at Baghdad was 1 He means probably that when a project is executed, it is no longer a project. The verse is very obscure and I may be perhaps mistaken.

2 The science of al-Jarh wa'l-Ta'dil treats of the credibility of Traditionists.-See Hajji Khalifah, No. 4009, This term serves also to designate the inquest made by the qadi into the character of witness. See Hamilton's Hidayah, vol. II, p. 672, In the Arabic text of Ibn Khallikan, for <sup>الجرح</sup> الحرج read <sup>الجرح</sup> الحرج. I was led into this mistake by a note of Reiske's in the Annals of Abu 'l-Fida, vol. II, p. 691, and by a passage in M.de Sacy Chrestomathie, t. I. p. 39. They are both in the wrong.

3 The original Persian word is Kirpas.

(For further reference see Ansab, f. 476 b) offered to him in the khālifāt of al-Muqtadir, and on his refusal to accept it, he was kept under arrest<sup>1</sup> in his house by order of the vizir 'Alī Ibn 'Isa, who, when remonstrated with on the subject, answered: "My sole intention was to have it said of our epoch, that there existed in it one who was kept under arrest in his house, in order that the might be constrained to accept the place of qadi." Ibn Khayran reproached Ibn Surayj his acceptance of that office, and told him that such a thing was not fitted for persons of their sect, but for those of Abu Hanifa's.<sup>2</sup> According to Abu T-'Ala' Ibn al-'Askari, this doctor died on Tuesday, 16th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 320 (December, A.D. 932);* but the hafiz Abu T-Hasan al-Daraqutni places his death in the year 310; this statement is declared by the Khātib to be correct, and he pronounces Abu T-'Ala's erroneous.

175 THE QADI HUSAYN

Abu 'Alī al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Marwarrudi, a jurisconsult of the Shafite sect and known by the title of the qadi<sup>3</sup>, was a doctor of high authority and author of the treatise on law, entitled al-Ta'liqah (notes). In treating some points of doctrine, he followed a system peculiar to himself, and when the Imam al-Haramayn and al-Ghazzali say (the former in his Nihayat al-Matlab, and the latter in his Basit and Tawsit)**, "The qadi says," it is he whom they mean and no other. He learned jurisprudence from al-Qaffal al-Marwazi (whose life will be found among those of the 'Abd Allahs), and he composed works on the main principles of jurisprudence, on its particular applications, and on controverted subject. He continued

1 The word ترسيم signifies, to put under arrest. This meaning, though perfectly certain, is not given in the dictionaries.

2 The Shafite doctors frequently reproached those of the sect of Abu Hanifa with meddling in worldly matters and accepting places under government.

* 18 December—Ed.

3 "When the Shafites speak of the qadi, they mean the Husayn here mentioned, but in treating of the "principles of jurisprudence" اصول this denomination is given by the learned in the sunnah to Abu Bakr al-Baqilani. When the two qadis are spoken of, it is the latter and 'Abd al-Jabbar al-Mu'tazili who are meant; and the shaykh is either Abu al-Hasan al-Ash'ari or Abn Muhammad al-Juwayni; the word imam designates either the Imam al-Haramayn or Fakhr al-Din al-Razi." (Al-Yafi'i).

(for further reference see Ansab, f. 522 b.)—Ed.

** In autograph al-Basit wa 'l-Wasit; Hajji Khālifah says al-Wasit is an abridgment of al-Basit (Kashf, col. 2008).

(till his death) to act as judge, professor, and mufti, and he taught the science of the law to a number of eminent men, amongst whom were al-Farra al-Baghawi, the author of the Tahdhib, the commentary on the Sunnah, and other works. The qadi Husayn died A. H. 462 (A.D. 1069-70), at Marwarrud, of which place we have already spoken (see page No. 22).

176. ABU 'ALI AL-SINJI

Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn Shu'ayb Ibn Muhammad al-Sinji, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i and one of their most eminent imams, studied jurisprudence in Khurasan under al-Qaffal al-Marwazi; he had for condisciples the qadi Husayn, (see the preceding article,) and Abu Muhammad al-Juwayni, the father of the Imam al-Haramayn (whose lives we shall give later). He wrote a commentary on Abu Bakr Ibn al-Haddad al-Misri's Furu' (or development of the Shafite doctrines); this commentary has not been equalled, although many others have been composed on the same work, one of which is by his own professor al-Qaffal, and another by the qadi Abu 'I-Tayyib al-Tabari. He is also author of a great commentary of the [Kitab al-] Talkhis of Abu 'I-Abbas Ibn al-Qass; [It is a large commentary and] this work is rare. Another of his productions is the Majmu' or collection (containing an exposition of the Shafite doctrines)<sup>1</sup> He is cited by Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali in the Wasit. Al-Sinji was the first who possessed an equal acquaintance with the system of jurisprudence followed in Iraq and that practised in Khurasan. The people of Marw, at that period, considered him as their chief jurisconsult. He died some time after the four hundred and thirtieth year of the Hijrah (A.D. 1038-9). Sinji means belonging to Sinji a large village near Marw.*

177 AL-FARRA AL-BAGHAWI

Abu Muhammad al-Husayn Ibn Mas'ud Ibn Muhammad more generally known by the title of al-Farra al-Baghawi, was doctor of 1 Hajji Khalifah.

(for further reference see Ansab, f. 313a)--Ed.

* [There is an addition of a sentence in the autograph which runs thus; it was said that in his time in Khurasan there were three accomplished scholars, one of them of extensive studies and deep insight and it was Abu 'Ali al-Sinji and another with limited information and deep insight and it was Abu Muhammad al-Juwayni, and the third had extensive studies to his credit but no penetrating insight and it was (the name is illegible)--Ed.

the sect of al-Shafi'i, a Traditionist and a commentator on the Qur'an: in the different sciences he was a sea of knowledge. He learned jurisprudence from the qadi Husayn (see his life. no 176), and composed a commentary on the Word of God (the Qur'an), and an explanation of the obscurities in the sayings of the Prophet (the Sunnah); he taught the Traditions and professed (jurisprudence), in which he never gave lessons but in a state of legal purity.<sup>1</sup> He is author of many works, such as the Tahdhīb (arrangement) treating of jurisprudence; an explanation of the Sunnah or Traditions: The Ma'alim al-Tanzil (marks of revelation), which is a commentary on the Qur'an: the Masabih (lights)<sup>2</sup>; the Jamu'bayn al-Sahlhayn (the conjunction of the two Sahlhs)<sup>3</sup>; etc. He died in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 510 (February, A.D. 1117, at Marwarrud, and was interred in the cemetery of Talaqan, close by the grave of his master the qadi Husayn. His tomb is famous among the people of that country. I have read (however) in a work compiled by the Shaykh 'Abd al-'Azim al-Mundhiri, and entitled al-Fawa'id al-Safariyah (travelling notes?), that al-Farra al-Baghawi died A.H. 316 (A.D. 1122-3); this I found written in his own hand. He relates also; "A wife of this doctor died, and he refused to accept any portion of the inheritance left by her: he used also to live on dry bread, but having been blamed for this (as an affectation of abstinence). He ate his bread with olive oil." Farra means a preparer or seller of furs.

Al-Sam'ani says in his Kitab al-Ansab: "Baghawi is the relative adjective derived from Bagh or Baghshur, which is the name of a town in Khurasan, lying between Marw and Herat; this adjective is formed irregularly".

178. AL-HALIMI

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Hysayn Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad Ibn Halim a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i and known by the name of al-Halimi, was born in Jurjan, A.H. 338 (A.H. 949-50). whence he was carried (when yet a child) to Bakhara. He wrote down the Traditions under the dictation of Abu Bark Muhammad Ibn Ahmad

1 See the Tableau general del' Empire Othoman, tom. II, p. 7.

2 This is the work which was remodelled by the shaykh Wali al-Din Mahmud, and entitled by him Mishkat al-Masabih, (the niche for the lights). The Mishkat has been translated into English by Capt. Matthews.

3 That is: The union of the Traditions found in Sahih of al-Dukhari and in that of Muslim.

(for further reference see Ansab, f. 174a)—Ed.

Ibn Habib and other masters. After studying jurisprudence under Abu Bakr al-Udani and al-Qaffal al-Shashi, he became an imam on high consideration and authority in Transoxiana. He had an excellent manner of treating points of the Shafite doctrine. When at Naysabur, he taught the Tradition and al-Hafiz al-Hakim (Ibn al-Baiyi) and others gave Tradition on his authority. His death took place in the month of first Jumada (some say of the first Rabi'), A.H. 403 (end of A.D. 1012). Halimi is derived from Halim, which was the name of his great grandfather.

179. AL-WANNI AL-FARADI

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad al-Wanni al-Faradi<sup>1</sup> was a skilful accountant, a doctor of the highest authority in the science of partitions, and a composer of many excellent works. He learned the Traditions from the disciples of Abu 'Ali al-Saffar and others, and taught them to the Khatib al-Tabrizi, to Abu Hakim, al-Khabri,<sup>2</sup> the author of the Talkhis fi 'T-Hisab (treatise on arithmetic) and others. He was al-Khabri's master in arithmetic and the science of partitions. His instructions and his books were profitable to great numbers. He died a martyr at Baghdad in the month of Dhu T-Hijjah, A.H. 451 (January, A.D. 1060), having been slain in the troubles caused by al-Basasiri (No. 78). Wanni means belonging to Wann, a village in one of the cantons of Quhistan; I imagine that it was his native place.

---

1 Al-Faradi; learned in the science of Partitions (Furud); by which term is designated that branch of knowledge which is requisite for the solution of questions relative to the partition of inherited property amongst heirs. Those nearest related to the deceased are entitled to a larger share than the others, and the amount of each share depends upon the degree of relationship. As it therefore frequently happened that such questions could not be resolved but by the aid of the arithmetic of fractions and the first principles of algebra, that were then but few doctors capable of treating them, and when they possessed that talent, the honourable title of al-Faradi was conferred on them by their contemporaries. the science of partition is coeval with Islamism.

2 Abu Hakim 'Abd Allah Ibn Ibrahim al-Faradi al-Khabri (native of khabr a place in or near Nishapur), studied jurisprudence under the shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi, but he became eminent as an arithmetician and a doctor in the science of partitions, on which he wrote some works. He was well acquainted with pure Arabic and composed a commentary on the Hamasah and another on the poem of al-Mutanabbi. He had learned a great number of the Traditions, and was a man of holy life. His writing was beautiful and correct. He died suddenly, A.H. 476 (A.D. 1084).—(Tabaqat al-Shafi'in.)

[For further reference see Ansab, f. 586 b.]—Ed.

180 IBN KHAMIS AL-JUHANI

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn Ibn Nasr Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Husayn Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Khamis Ibn 'Amir al-Ka'bi al-Juhani was a native of Mosul, and is generally known by the name of Ibn Khamis. This doctor, who belonged to the sect of al-Shafi'i and bore the titles of Taj al-Islam (crown of Islamism) and Majd al-Din (glory of religion), studied jurisprudence at Baghdad under Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali and other masters; he (then) became qadi of Rahabat Malik Ibn Tawq,<sup>1</sup> and afterwards returned to Mosul, where he settled. He composed many works, such as the Manaqib al-Abrar (Merits of the saints), written in the style of al-Qashayri's Epistle<sup>2</sup>; the Manasik al-Hajj (rites of the pilgrimage); and the Akhbar al-manamat (accounts of dreams). He is mentioned with commendation by Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ani in his History. He died in the month of the second Rabi', A.H. 552 (May, A.D. 1157). Khamis was the name of this great-grandfather's grandfather. Juhani means belonging to Juhaynah, a village near Mosul and in the proximity of that other village in which is the celebrated well called 'ayn Qayyarah, the waters of which, when taken in baths, are salutary in cases of palsy and scrofula<sup>3</sup>; it lies in the country of Mosul, and lower down than that city, from which it is father off than Juhaynah. Juhani is also the relative adjective derived from Juhaynah, the name of a great tribe descended from Quda'ah. Ka'bi means belonging to Ka'b; there are four tribes of this name, but I do not know to which Ibn Khamis belonged.

181. AL-HALLAJ

Abu Mughith al-Husayn Ibn Mansur al-Hallaj, a celebrated ascetic [ زاهد ], was a native of al-Bayda', a town in the province of Fars, but he passed his youth in Wasit and 'Iraq. He was a disciple

---

1 This town, called also al-Rahabah, was situated on the Euphrates, between al-Raqqa and 'Anah. It is mentioned in the Geography of Abu 'I-Fida.

2 The Epistle (risalah) of 'Abd al-Karim al-Qushayri treats of sufism; it is divided into three sections and contains fifty-four chapters. It is considered a work of the highest authority on the subject. A number of doctors have composed commentaries upon it (Hajji Khalifah). A list of the chapters contained in the celebrated risalah is given by M. de Hammer, in the Catalogue of his original manuscripts, under the No. 291.

3 Scrofula, so I have translated by conjecture the words al-riyah al-baridah, which signify literally cold winds, or perhaps could humours.

of Abu T-Qasim al-Junayd, and people are still at variance respecting his true character; some extolling him to the utmost, whilst others treat him as an infidel. I read in Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali's Mishkat al-Anwar a long chapter on him, justifying the singular expressions which he uttered, such as *I am the Truth; there is nought in Paradise* but God*, and assertions of a similar nature, the very mention of which is shocking to the ears.<sup>1</sup> Al-Ghazzali places all these expressions in a good light, and gives them an interpretation (by which their impiety is removed); he says also that he was led into them from excessive love (towards God) and extreme desire (to enjoy His presence), and that these expressions may be assimilated to the following:

"I am he whom I love, and he whom I love is I; we are two souls dwelling in one body. When thou seest me, thou seest him, thou seest us."

Among the verses attributed to al-Hallaj, and containing allusions expressed in the mystical style of the sufis, are the following (which, however, are said to have been written by Abu T-Qasim Samun Ibn Hamzah the ascetic<sup>2</sup> to a person who wrote to inquire from him how he was):

Thou didst send to ask how I was, and what care and sadness I felt in thy absence.<sup>3</sup> I had not been, did I know how I was; and there were no I had not been, did I know how I was not<sup>4</sup>.

Such also is this verse in the same style.

"He threw him into the ocean with his hands tied behind his back, and said to him; 'Beware' beware! lest thou gettest wet<sup>5</sup>!"

* Perhaps de Slane's MS. had  in the autograph and published text. Ed.

1 The chief point of the sufi doctrine seems to be that the human soul is an emanation, or perhaps a portion of the Divinity. On the death of the body the soul is absorbed into the Creator; and this sometimes happens even in life during the state of excitation called hal by the sufis. Most of the singular expressions which shocked the orthodox Muslims are easily explained on this principle. One of the clearest accounts of sufism is given by M. de secy in the Notices et Extraits, tom. XII.

2 Samnun was a sufi and contemporary with al-Junayd. Jami has given a short account of him in the Nafahat al-Uns,

3 In the Arabic text, this verse and the foregoing parenthesis are not given till some lines lower down.

4 Such is the literal translation of this strange verse; its meaning is above my comprehension.

5 This is manifestly directed against the doctrine of predestination.

Other verses of the same cast have also been attributed to him. Abu Bakr Ibn Thawab al-Qasri relates that he heard al-Husayn Ibn Mansur al-Hallaj say, when undergoing the torture of the rack<sup>1</sup>:

"I sought through every land a place of repose, but found it not; I obeyed my desires, and they made of me a slave; had I been content (with my lot), I had been free."

In a word, the history of al-Hallaj is long to relate, his fate is well known, and God knoweth all secret things! The grandfather of al-Hajjaj was a Magian; he himself was a disciple of al-Junayd and others of that class, and most of the learned doctors of the time gave their formal opinion that it was lawful to put him to death.<sup>2</sup> It said that Abu T'-Abbas Ibn Surayj, on being asked what he thought of him, returned this answer: "He is a man whose true character is hidden from me, and I shall therefore abstain from giving any opinion respecting him". At an assembly held by Hamid Ibn al-'Abbas, vizir to al-Muqtadir, a discourse was held by al-Hallaj, and the qadi Ibn 'Umar, who was present, gave a Fatwa (or Judicial opinion) that he merited death; this he wrote down with his own hand, and the same declaration was signed by the other doctors who were there. On this, al-Hallaj said to them: "You cannot flog me, neither can you spill my blood<sup>3</sup>; and it is not lawful for you to take hold of a pretext against me so that you may authorize the shedding of my blood my belief is Islamism, founded on the Sunnah; I admit the preeminence of the four Imams, of the well-directed Khalifs<sup>4</sup>, and of the rest of the ten Companions<sup>5</sup>; may the favour of God be upon them! I have besides composed works on the Sunnah, which are to be found at the booksellers'. So on God-on God (ao I call) that he protect my blood." He continued repeating these words whilst they were writing down their opinions, and when they had finished and withdrawn, al-Hallaj was taken to prison. The vizir then informed al-Muqtadir, by letter, of the result of the meeting, and sent him the decisions of the doctors; to this, answer was made, that since the

---

1 Literally: When on the wood.

2 Some doctors of very high authority have considered him as a great saint, and he was looked on as a martyr by Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali, Abd al-Qadir Muhi al-Din, and Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardt. (Al-Yaff'i.)

3 Literally: My back is under protection and my blood is prohibited.

4 The well-directed Khalifahs, al-Khulafa al-Rashidin, were Abu Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthman, and 'Ali.

5 The others were Talhah, Zubayr, Sa'd Ibn Abi Waqqas. 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn 'Awf, Abu Ubaydah Ibn al-Jarrah, and Sa'id Ibn Zayd. Muhammad had declared to them that they should enter paradise.

qadis had given their opinion that he merited death, he should be handed over to the chief of the police guards, who should inflict on him one thousand strokes of a whip, and another thousand if his death did not ensue, and that he should then behead him. The vizir, in consequence, handed al-Hallaj over to the chief of the police guards, whom he informed of the orders given by al-Muqtadir; he said to him also: "If al-Hallaj does not expire under the bastonnade, cut off one of his hands, then one of his feet, then strike off his head and burn his body. And if he try to beguile you, and say to you that he will make the Euphrates and Tigris run gold and silver, do not hearken to him nor suspend his punishment." The chief of the police received the prisoner that night, and the next morning which was Tuesday, 23rd (or, as some say, 24th) of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 309 (March, A.D. 922)* he brought him to the Bab al-Taḡ (the gate of the dome), where an immense multitude of people was assembled. The executioner inflicted one thousand strokes on al-Hallaj, who did not utter a groan, but said to the chief of the police guards, towards the six hundredth: "Let me be brought near you, for I have an advice to give you which will be worth the capture of Constantinople."—"I have been already told," replied the other "that you would say this and more; and it is not in my power to suspend your punishment." After the infliction of the bastinado, his four limbs were cut off; he was then beheaded, his body was consumed by fire, the ashes were cast into the Tigris, and the head was stuck up at Baghdad, on the bridge. His disciples flattered themselves with the hopes of his returning (on earth) after forty days and as a great inundation of the Tigris occurred the same year, they pretended that it was produced by the ashes of al-Hallaj which had been thrown into the river. Some of his partisans asserted that he had not been put to death, but that his likeness had been given to one of his enemies (who thus suffered in his stead.) It would be too long to enter into a full account of his conduct, but what we have here said may suffice. He received the surname of al-Hallaj because he used to sit by the shop of a cotton-carder (hallaj) whom he one (one day) asked to do some business for him. "But I myself am busy carding;" answered the other. "Do my business," said al-Hallaj, "and I will card for you." The man then went off, leaving him there, and on his return he found all his cotton carded.

After finishing this notice, I found in a work on the principles of religion, composed by the Imam al-Haramayn Abu 'I-Ma'ali l'Abd al-Malik b. al-Shaykh Abi Muhammad] al-Juwayni, and entitled al-* Tuesday, 23 Dhu'l Qa'dah, A.H. 309 (26 March)--Ed.

---

Shamil, a passage which it is necessary for me to mention, and in which I am obliged to point out an error. That doctor says: "Some of our best and soundest authorities state that the three persons (named below) conspired to overthrow the (Muslim) empire, and undertook to disorganise the state and gain over the hearts of the people to themselves. Each of them then proceeded to a particular region: al-Jannabi went to the province of al-Ahsa<sup>1</sup>; Ibn al-Muqaffa' penetrated into the country of the Turks; and al-Hallaj repaired to Baghdad, the sovereign of which city condemned him to death; the failure of the project was caused by the difficulty of seducing the people of 'Iraq. "Now, this statement cannot be received by any historian; for these three persons were not contemporaries; as for al-Hallaj and al-Jannabi, they lived, it is true, at the same period, but I do not know that they ever met<sup>2</sup>. In the following article we shall relate who this al-Jannabi was.

182. AL-JANNABI.#

Abu Tahir Sulayman Ibn Abi Sa'id al-Hasan Ibn Bahram al-Qarmati was the chief of the Qarmats, whose wars and revolts against the khalifs and (Muslim) princes are sufficiently known to dispense with our lengthening this article by giving an account of them<sup>3</sup>; but if God enable me to compose my great history<sup>4</sup>, I shall give a detailed

---

1 Al-Ahsa, called by Europeans Lahsa, is a town in Arabia, to the south-west of the Persian Gulf.

2 The author now proceeds to give the lives of al-Jannabi and Ibn al-Muqaffa', neglecting, in this case, the alphabetical arrangement of his work. In his account of the latter he concludes his refutation of the Imam al-Haramayns' statement.

These are not independent notices in the autograph—Ed.

(For further reference see Ansab, (f. 181 b.)—Ed.

M. de Slane has given the accounts of al-Jannabi and al-Muqaffa' as independent notices against the arrangement of the author who has, however, subjoined them to the notice of al-Hallaj. In the text of Egyptian edition; they have not been splitted.

Ibn Khallikan wants to establish that Ibn al-Muqaffa' was put to death about one hundred and sixty-four years before al-Hallaj's execution and so he could not have met al-Hallaj and al-Jannabi.—Ed.

3 For the history of the Qarmats, the reader may consult the Annals of Abu al-Fida; Price's Retrospect of Muhammadan History; and, above all, M. de Sacy's Exposé de l'Histoire des Druzes.

4 This work was never completed.

narrative of their proceedings. It is incumbent on me, however, since I have spoken of them here, to state briefly what they were; (as it is my desire) that some mention of them should be found in this work. My professor 'Izz al-Din 'Ali, surnamed Ibn al-Athir, gives in his great historical work, the Kamil, a long account of the origin of this sect, and, under each year, he relates what happened to them during that period. It is this source which supplied me with the following passages, in extracting which, I was attentive to aim at concision. He makes the first mention of them under the year 278 (A.D. 891-2), where he says: "In this year, some people of the Sawad, or cultivated country, around Kufah, and who are called the Qarmats, became disorderly." He then gives the particulars of the rise of this sect, and the following is a summary extract from his relation: "There appeared a man who made an outward show of devotion, self-mortification, and austerity of life; he plaited (baskets and other objects) with palm-tree leaves, and subsisted on the produce of their sale. For some time he invited the people to (join) an imam belonging to the blessed family of the Prophet and his appeal was answered by great numbers<sup>1</sup>, who were induced, from different circumstances in his conduct, to place a perfect reliance on his sincerity. The report of their proceedings spread throughout the territory of Kufah". He then says under the year 286 (A.D. 899): "In this year appeared, in (the province of) al-Bahrayn, a man of the Qarmat sect, who bore the name of Abu Sa'id al-jannabi, and who was joined by a number of Qaramats and of the Arabs of the Desert; his party having thus become strong, he (attacked and) slew the people of the neighbouring villages<sup>2</sup>. This Abu Sa'id used to sell food, and he persuaded his purchasers that in buying it, they did an act agreeable to God<sup>3</sup>. Their strength then became great and they approached the region of Basrah, on which the khalif al-Mu'tadid billah sent against them an army under the command of al-'Abbas Ibn 'Amr al-Ghanawi. A vigorous action ensued, in which the troops of al-'Abbas were routed and he himself taken prisoner. This happened towards the end of the month of Sha'ban, 287, between Basrah and Bahrayn. Abu Sa'id put his prisoners to death and burned their bodies, but he spared the life of al-'Abbas, and dismissed him after a lapse of some days, telling him to go, to his master and inform him of what he had witnessed. Al-'Abbas arrived at Baghdad in the month of Ramadan

---

1 The Expose de l'Histoire des Druzes is the best commentary that can be given on these proceedings.

2 This was of course a most agreeable pastime for the nomadic Arabs, who detested, and detest still, the dwellers in towns.

3 Compare this with a passage in the Expose, introduction, page 187.

of that year and entered into the presence of the khalif, who clothed him in a robe of honour. The Qarmats then penetrated into Syria in A.H. 289, and a number of combats, too long to be related, ensued between the two parties. In the year 301 (A.D. 913-4), Abu Sa'id al-Jannabi was slain in a bath by one of his eunuchs, and was succeeded by his son Abu Tahir Sulayman. At the period of his death, Abu Sa'id was in possession of Hajar, al-Qatif, al-Ta'if, and the rest of the province of Bahrayn. In the month of the second Rabi', A.H. 311 (commencement of August, A.D. 923). Abu Tahir marched his army to Basrah and occupied that city without meeting any serious resistance. They scaled its walls during the night by means of rope-ladders, made of (camels') hair, and having been attacked on the first alarm, they slew the governor of the city and put a part of their adversaries to the sword; the rest took to flight. During the seventeen days that Abu Tahir remained at Basrah, he was occupied in sending off the property taken from the inhabitants, after which he returned to his own country. The Qarmats continued, till the year 317 (A.C. 929), to fill the provinces with devastation, and lay them waste with fire and sword, captivity and pillage. In that year, the pilgrims, arrived safely at Makkah, but they were there attacked on the day of Tarwiyah<sup>1</sup> (8th Dhu 'l-Hijjah), by Abu Tahir Qarmat, who plundered their property and slew them even in the precincts of the Sacred Mosque and in the House of God itself. They tore the black stone out of the wall of the Ka'bah and sent it to Hajar; and they slew the emir of Makkah and a number of Sharifs who had sallied out to attack them. They broke down the door of the Ka'bah, and one of them mounted up to pull away the water-spout<sup>2</sup>, but he fell and was killed. They threw some of the slain into the well Zamzam, and buried the others in the Sacred Mosque, without winding sheets, or washing or prayers<sup>3</sup>. The cloth covering of the Ka'bah was taken off by their chief and shared among his followers, and they plundered the houses of the people of Makkah. When intelligence of this reached al-Mahdi 'Ubayd Allah lord of Ifriqiyah<sup>4</sup>, he wrote to al-Jannabi, condemning his conduct and reprehending him most severely<sup>5</sup>. By what you have committed, said he, you have justified the accusation of infidelity brought against our sect, and the title impious given to the missionaries acting for our dynasty; and if you of restore not that

---

1. See Reiske's Abu 'l-Fida, tom. II p. 643.

2. The celebrated water-spout, or Mizab, was of gold.

3. All of which are essential in a Muslim interment.

4. See Druzes, introduction, page 218.

5. Literally: He raised up the resurrection upon him. See note on resurrection no. 1.

which you have taken from the inhabitants of Makkah, from the pilgrims, and from others,—if you replace not the black stone and the covering of the Ka'bah, we shall renounce you both in this world and in the next. On the receipt of this letter, he replaced the stone, and restored to the people of Makkah as much of their property as he could get back from his followers. 'We took it,' said they, 'by order, and by order we give it back'" Bajkem<sup>1</sup> al-Turki, who was emir of Bagh<sup>h</sup>dad and 'Ira<sup>q</sup> at that time, had offered them fifty thousand dinars to induce them to restore the black stone, but they [had] refused; now, however, they gave it back. Another historian says: "They restored it to its place in the Ka'bah on the 5th of Dhu 'I-Qa'dah, or "Dhu 'I-Hajjah, of that year (A.H. 339), in the khalifat of al-Muti' lillah. When he (Abu Tahir) carried it off, three strong camels could scarcely bear its weight, but when they restored it, one weak camel bore it back without suffering (from fatigue)<sup>2</sup>."

I must (now) observe that the statement of my master (Ibn al-Athir) respecting al-Mahdi's letter to al-Qirmiti on the subject of the black stone and its restoration in consequence, cannot be correct; for al-Mahdi died A.H. 322 (A.D. 934), and the stone was sent back A.H. 339 (A.D. 950-1), seventeen years after his death. A little farther on, my master says; "When they restored the stone, they first carried it to al-Kufah and hung it up in the mosque, for public inspection; and they then bore it to Makkah, after its having remained with them twenty-two year."—It is said, however, by another historian that it was restored by Ibn Shabr, one of Abu Sa'id (al-Jannabi's) favourite partisans. My master then says, under the year 360 (A.D. 970-1) "The Qarmats came to Damascus, took it and slew the Egyptian governor, Ja'for Ibn Falah." (We have already made some mention of this in the life of Ja'far No. 134.) "Then the Qarmat army reached 'Ayn Shams near the gates of Cairo and defeated the Egyptian troops, but it subsequently retired, having been vanquished in its turn by the people of Misr" On the whole, no Muslims, either before or after

---

1 Bajkam <sup>بجكم</sup> such is the true orthography of the name, not Yahkum <sup>يأحكم</sup> as in the printed text, nor Bahcam, as Reiske has it in the Annals of Abu 'I-Fida. The autograph MS. of that work, and which is in the Bib. du Roi, writes this name correctly, and al-Dhahabi, in his Annals, year 391 (MS. No. 646), place it under the letter B, in his alphabetical list of the men of note who died in that year. The letter J <sup>ج</sup> is clearly marked in both MSS.—Bajkam was grand emir of the Khalifat. For his history, see Abu 'I-Fida's Annals, years 326, 327, 329. Consult also Price's vol. II page 179 et seq.

2 If this be true, they must have broken off and kept a large portion of the stone, but the fact itself is considered by the Muslims as miraculous.

them, committed such crimes against Islamism as they; most of 'Iraq, and of the land of the East<sup>1</sup>, the province of Hijaz, Syria, and the country up to the gates of Misr fell into their power. When they took away the stone, they left it at Hajar, their headquarters. Abu Tahir was killed A.H. 332 (A.D. 943-4). Qirmiti is a relative adjective; the word qarmata, when employed as a noun common, signifies the closeness of one part of a thing to another part; thus they say of writing and of a mode of walking that they are muqarmit, when the letters of the writing are close to each other, and when a person takes short steps in walking<sup>2</sup>; the Abu Sa'id of whom we are speaking was a short squat man, of a tawny colour and ill-looking; and for this reason he was called Qirmiti. A long chapter on the proceedings of the Qarmats is given by the qadi al-Baqilani in his work, entitled Asrar al-Batiniyah (secrets of the Batinites). Jannabi means belonging to Jannabah, which is a town in one of the cantons of Fars, contiguous to Bahrayn, and situated near Siraf; the Qarmats came from this place, and were therefore called Jannabites. Al-Ahsa is a tract of country in the same region, containing many towns such as Jannabah, Hajar, and al-Qatif. Ahsa is the plural of Hisi, which word denotes water absorbed by a sandy soil till it reaches a hard stratum by which it is retained; the Arabs dig away the sand till they find the water and extract it. When a place contains much land of this nature, it is called al-Ahsa and becomes known by no other name. Relative to Bohrayn, al-Jawhari says in his Sahah: "Al-Bahrayn is a town; the adjective derived from it is Bahrani." (Abu Mansur Muhammad) al-Azhari says; "Al-bahrayn (the two seas) is in the dual number and it was so named for the reason that in the region where its towns are situated and near the gate of Al-Ahsa and the villages of Hajar lies a lake at ten parasangs' distance from the Great Green Ocean (the Persian Gulf); this lake is three miles long and as many broad; it does not overflow, and its waters are tranquil and salt." All the above-mentioned places are in the part of Arabia which is behind Basrah, and reaches to the confines of Hijaz; they lie on the coast of the sea which touches Yemen and India; and are near the island or Qays Ibn 'Umayrah, called vulgarly Kaish; this island is situated between 'Uman and Fars. In the same neighbourhood are Ramhurmuz and other towns.

We shall now speak of Ibn al-Muqaffa'.

---

1 The land of the East; that is, Mesopotamia, the land to the east of Syria.

2 I have here paraphrased the original, which merely says when it is so.

'Abd Allah Ibn al-Muqaffa', the Katib so renowned for the elegance of his style, and the author of admirable Epistles<sup>1</sup>, was native of Fars and a Magian, but he made his profession of Islamism to 'Isa Ibn 'Ali, the uncle of the two first 'Abbasid khalifs, al-Saffah and al-Mansur. He then became his secretary and was admitted into his intimacy. One of his sayings was: 'I drank of misfortunes till I was filled, but did not perceive any regularity in their arrival; they disappeared, then they overflowed and although they are not uniform as are the lines of poetry, it is they alone which are (an) instructive discourse.'<sup>2</sup> Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adi relates of him this anecdote: 'Ibn al-Muqaffa' came to 'Isa Ibn 'Ali and said: 'Islamism has entered into my heart, and I wish to make profession of it to you'. 'Isa answered: 'Let it be done in the presence of the leaders, and of the chiefs of the people; come therefore tomorrow.' On the evening of that very day, he went to dine with 'Isa and having sat down, he began to eat and to mutter according to the custom of the Magians. 'How', said 'Isa, 'you mutter (like the magians), although resolved to embrace Islamism?' To this Ibn al-Muqaffa' replied: 'I do not wish to pass a night without being of some religion.' The next morning he made to 'Isa his solemn profession of Islamism.' Notwithstanding the eminent merit of Ibn al-Muqaffa', he was suspected of Zindiqism<sup>3</sup>, and al-Jahiz related that he, Muti' Ibn Iyas<sup>4</sup>

1 These Epistles are not noticed by Hajji Khalifah, but the author of the Fihrist mentions a Kitab al-Yatimah fi al-Rasa'il by Ibn al-Muqaffa'.

2 Such seems to be the idea which Ibn al-Muqaffa' wishes to express in an Arabic phrase of singular obscurity, the word khutab خطب signifies misfortunes and pulpit discourses; rawiya رويّا which I have paraphrased by regularity in his arrival, means also rhyme by which seems to be denoted that they come not regularly like rhymes in poetry and elegant prose compositions, but without rhyme or reason. The same sentence may, however, signify: "I have been drenched with sermons, and yet have not been able to seize on their rhyme; they came and they went, and if not regular in their composition, yet they, and no other were really discourses."

3 See D'Herbelot's Bib-Orient, Zendik, and Price's Retrospect, vol. II, page 43.

4 Abu Salmah Muti' Ibn Iyas, a member of the tribe of Kinanah and a native of Kufah, His mother was the celebrated Umm Kharajah, whose hasty marriages became proverbial (see Freytag's Proverbs of al-Maydani, tom. I. p. 636). Accustomed to the favour of the last Umayyad Khalifahs, he complained of the neglect with which he was treated by the 'Abbasids. He was a Zindiq at heart, and it appears that his irreligion was well known. He died A.H. 168 (A.D. 784), three months after the accession of the Khalif al Hadi.-(Kitab al-Aghani.)

and Yahya Ibn Ziyad were persons the sincerity of whose religious sentiments was doubted; and one of the learned, on hearing this, said: "How is it that al-Jahiz forgets to count himself,?" The Khalif al-Muhtadi Ibn al-Mansur sometimes said: "I never found a book on Zindiqism which did not owe its origin to Ibn al-Muqaffa'," Al-Asma'i mentions that Ibn al-Muqaffa' composed some fine works, such as the al-Durrat al-Yatimah (the precious pearl), a production without a rival on the subject;<sup>1</sup> he says also that Ibn al-Muqaffa', on being asked who was his instructor, answered: "I myself; when I saw any thing good done by another, I did the same, and if I saw what was bad, I avoided it." He and al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad, the inventor of the system of prosody, once met together, and when they had separated, al-Khalil was asked how he found him "His learning," replied al-Khalil, "is greater than his wit." The same question was then addressed to Ibn al-Muqaffa' respecting al-Khalil, and he answered; "His wit is greater than his learning". It was Ibn al-Muqaffa' who composed the book entitled Kalilah and Dimnah, but some state that he is not the author of it; this work, they say, was in Pehlavi<sup>2</sup>, and he translated it into Arabic and put it in an elegant style, but the discourse at the beginning of the work is by him. He used to make free with Sufyan Ibn Mu'awiya al-Muhallabi, the governor of Basrah, whom he very frequently addressed by the name of Ibn al-Mughthalamah (son of the lascivious female); an appellation injurious to the honour of Sufayn's mother. About that time, Sulayman and 'Tsa, the sons of 'Ali, and the uncles of the Khalif al-Mansur, arrived at Basrah, to have a pardon drawn up for their brother, 'Abd Allah. This 'Abd Allah had revolted against his nephew al-Mansur and aspired to the khalifat, but being defeated by Abu Muslim al-Khurasani, who had been sent against him at the head of an army, he took to flight, and, dreading the vengeance of al-Mansur, lay concealed at the house of his brother. Sulayman and 'Tsa then interceded for him with the Khalif, who consented to forgive what had passed; and it was decided that a letter of pardon should be granted by al-Mansur. (This is an event noticed

---

1 "The al-Durrat al-Yatimah has been condensed by one of the sufis, and entitled Izat al-Albab was Dhakhirat al-Iktisab (admonition of hearts and treasure of acquired spiritual merits); which work is arranged in twelve sections, containing the truths and essence of the spiritual life, and the history of 'the principal saints.'" (Hajji Khalifah)—M. de Sacy speaks of Ibn al-Muqaffa' in the preface to his edition of Kalilah and Dimnah. In the Notices et Extraits, t. I, he gives a list of his works, taken from the Fihrist.

2 I have rendered the word الفارسی by Pahlavi, because the works translated by Ibn al-Muqaffa' were written in that language. Had they been in Persian, Ibn Khalikan would have said المعبی!

in historical works<sup>1</sup> and generally known, but I shall give here some particulars of it, as they are necessary for establishing a regular connection in this relation.) On coming to Basrah, the two brothers told Ibn al-Muqaffa', who, as we have said, was secretary to 'Isa, that he should draw up the letter of pardon and word it in the strongest terms, so as to leave no pretext to al-Mansur for making an attempt against 'Abd Allah's life. Ibn al-Muqaffa' obeyed their directions and drew up the letter in the most binding terms, having even inserted in it the following clause, amongst others: And if at any time the Commander of the faithful act perfidiously towards his uncle 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ali, his wives shall be divorced from him, his horses shall be confiscated for the service of God (in war), his slaves shall become free, and the Muslims loosed from their allegiance towards him. The other conditions of the deed were expressed in a manner equally strict. Al-Mansur, having read the paper, was highly displeased, and asked who wrote it, and on being informed that it was a person called 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Muqaffa', who acted as secretary to his uncles, he sent a letter to Sufyan, the governor of Basrah (him of whom we have spoken above), ordering him to put Ibn al-Muqaffa' to death. Sufyan was already filled with rancour against Ibn al-Muqaffa' for the motive we have mentioned, and the latter having, some time after, asked to see him, he did not allow him to enter till every person present had withdrawn. He then took him apart into another room and put him to death.

Al-Mada'ini<sup>2</sup> says: 'Ibn al-Muqaffa', on appearing before Sufyan, was addressed by him in these terms; 'Do you remember what you used to say of my mother?' 'Emir!' exclaimed Ibn al-Muqaffa', 'I implore you in the name of God to spare my life!' 'May my mother,'

---

1 See Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, A.H. 137; al-Makin, p. 100; Price's Retrospect, vol. II, p. 7.

2 Abu 'Hassan 'Ali Ibn Muhammed Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Mada'ini (native of Mada'in) was a client by enfranchisement (mawla) to the family of ('Abd) Shams Ibn 'Abd Manaf. He was born A.H. 135 (A.D. 752-3) and died at the residence of Ishaq Ibn Ibrahim al-Mausili, to whom he was most particularly attached, A.H. 225 (A.D. 839-40) or 228. He was disciple of the Mu'tazilite doctor Ma'mar Ibn al-Ash'ath. He wrote upwards of twenty works on Muhammad; nearly as many on the history of the tribe of Quraysh; a great number on the matrimonial alliances مناجات of the descendants of Muhammad; a series of works on the history of the Umayyad and Abbassid Khalifs; a miscellany of various treatises; the victories and conquests of the Muslims, in many volumes and other works besides; the titles of them all are given in the Fihrist, from which this notice also has been extracted. (MS. No. 874, fol. 139 et seq.) replied Sufyan, 'be really mughtalamah (lascivious,) if I do not kill thee in a manner such as none were ever killed in before! On this, he ordered an oven to be heated, and the limbs of Ibn al-Muqaffa' to be cut off joint by joint; these he cast into the oven before his eyes, and he then threw him in bodily, and closed the oven on him, saying: 'It is not a crime in me to punish you thus, for you are a Zindiq who corrupted the people.'" Sulayman and 'Isa having made inquiries about their secretary, were informed that he had gone into the palace of sufyan in good health, and that he had not come out. They therefore cited Sufyan before al-Mansur, and brought him with them in chains; witnesses were produced, who declared that they saw Ibn al-Muqaffa' enter Sufyan's palace and that he never came out after; and al-Mansur promised to examine into the matter. He then said to them; 'Suppose that I put Sufyan to death in retaliation for the death of Ibn al-Muqaffa', and that Ibn al-Muqaffa' himself then come forth from the door (pointing to one which was behind him), and speak to you; what should I do to you in that case? I should put you to death in retaliation for the death of Sufyan.' On this, the witnesses retracted their evidence, and 'Isa and Sulayman ceased to speak of their secretary, knowing that he had been killed with al-Mansur's approbation. Ibn al-Muqaffa' lived (it is said) thirty-six years.

Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adi says; 'Ibn al-Muqaffa' treated Sufyan with great contempt, and as Sufyan had a large nose, he used to say to him on going to see him; 'How are you both?' meaning him and his nose. One day he said to him 'Your opinion is requested respecting a person who died and left a husband and a wife;<sup>1</sup> meaning to turn him into ridicule before the company. Sufyan once said: 'I had never reason to repent keeping silence;' and Ibn al-Muqaffa' replied; 'Dumbness becomes you; why then should you repent of it?' Sufyan frequently threatened to cut him limb from limb whilst his eyes looked on<sup>2</sup>, and he had resolved to attack him by surprise, when he received the letter from al-Mansur with orders to put him to death, which he did.

---

1 This is parody on a very common form of question addressed to a mufti. For instance, a man dies leaving a wife and collateral heirs: they disagree respecting the division of the property left by the deceased, and they apply to the mufti for his opinion. This application is worded nearly as follows: Your opinion is requested respecting a man who died and left a wife and a certain number of collateral heirs, etc. How is the inheritance to be shared between them? See similar questions in the English translation of Muhammad Ibn Musa's Algebra.

2 That is: And he alive.

Al-Baladhuri<sup>1</sup> says: "When 'Tsa Ibn 'Ali came to Basrah for the affair of his brother 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ali, he said to Ibn al-Muqaffa'; 'Go to Sufyan on such and such a business.' 'Send some other person,' answered he, 'for I am afraid of him'. 'Go,' replied 'Tsa, 'you are under my safeguard!' " Ibn al-Muqaffa then went, and Sufyan did with him what we have related. According to another account, he threw him into the well of the privy, and replaced the flagstone which covered it; others again say that he sent him into the bath and kept the door locked till he was suffocated. My master Shams al-Din Abu T-Muzaffar Yusuf, the grandson of Abu T-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi and the famous preacher<sup>2</sup>, relates the adventures and death of Ibn al-Muqaffa' in his great historical work, entitled Mir'at al-Zaman (the mirror of time), under the year 145 (A.D. 762-3); and it is his custom to mention each occurrence under the year in which it happened; this would seem to indicate that Ibn al-Muqaffa' was put

1 "Abu Ja'far, or Abu 'I-Hasan, Ahmad Ibn Yahya Ibn Jabir al-Baladhuri was a native of Baghdad, His grandfather Jabir was secretary to al-Khasib, minister of the finances of Egypt (for the khalif al-Rashid). He himself was a poet and a transmitter of historical information رايه. Towards the end of his life he went deranged and was confined and chained in the hospital, and died there" in the Khalifat of al-Mu'tamid, between A.H. 256 (A.D., 870) and 279 (A.D. 892.) "He composed many satires, and was one of those who translated (works) from the Pahlavi الفارسي into Arabic."—(Fihrist, fol. 157. See Hamaker's Specimen cod, Lugd Bat. for more ample details.

2 The learned professor, imam, preacher, and historian, Shams al-Din (sun of religion) Abu 'I-Muzaffar Yusuf Ibn Qizaghli قزاعلي was grandson by the mother's side of the hafiz Abu T-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (Sibt Ibn al-Jawzi) His father Qizaghli was a mamluk belonging to the vizir 'Aun al-Din Yahya Ibn Hubayrah by whom he was treated like a son and to whose affection he was indebted for his liberty and education. Shams al-Din Yusuf was born at Baghdad, A.H. 587 (A.D. 1200-1), and made his studies in that city. He was follower of the sect of Abu Hanifah. As a preacher, his talent, unction, and delivery gained him universal admiration. He began to preach in his native place, but removed later to Damascus, where he fixed his residence. He there taught in the 'Izziyah and Shibliyah college, and was treated with great favour by persons of the highest rank, and especially by al-Malik al-Mu'azzam 'Isa. He then travelled into different countries to learn the Traditions and to preach. He died in Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 654 (January, A.D. 1257). His great historical work, the Mir'at al-Zaman, extends to nearly forty volumes, and is highly esteemed: Abu T-Mahasin acknowledges that he was much indebted to it when composing his al-Nujum al-Zahirah, and he states that, in his biographical dictionary, the al-Minhal al-Safi, he has given the life of Shams al-Din Yusuf with many details; but it unfortunately happens that the last volume of this work, containing, no doubt, the article of which he speaks, is wanting to complete the copy of which five volumes are in the Bib, du Roi.—(Abu T-Mahasin's Nujum; Durrat al-Aslak fi Dawlat al-Atrak, MS. No. 688, Hajji Khalifah) to death in the year, but it appears from the expressions of 'Umar Ibn Shabbah, in his History of Basrah, that this event took place A.H. 142 or 143; it is besides unanimously admitted that the Sulaman Ibn 'Ali above mentioned died A.H. 142; and we have already said that he joined his brother 'Isa in endeavouring to avenge Ibn al-Muqaffa's murder; this is proof that the date of the latter's death must be A.H. 142 (A.D. 759-60); but God knows best.

Ibn al-Muqaffa' is author of some poetry which is given in the Hamasah<sup>1</sup>, and an elegy of his composition, on the death of the Qur'an-reader Abu 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala, is inserted by us in the life of the latter, although some attribute it to his son Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Muqaffa', as shall be there noticed, with other contradictory statements. Be it as it may, his death could not have been posterior to A.H. 145; it must have been either in that year or in one of the preceding years: and this being the case, how can it be supposed that he, al-Hallaj and al-Jannabi met together, as the Imam al-Haramayn has stated?<sup>2</sup> To this we may add another observation; Ibn al-Muqaffa' never left Iraq; how then could any person say that he penetrated into the country of the Turks? He dwelt at Basrah and visited occasionally different provinces of Iraq (it is true), but Baghdad was not then in existence (although the words of the Imam al-Haramayn would denote that it was). This city was built by al-Mansur when khalif; he laid out its foundations in the year 140 (A.D. 757-8), and finished its construction A.H. 146 (A.D. 763-4), in which year he took up his residence there. In the year 149 all its edifices were completed. This was Old Baghdad, situated on the western bank of the Tigris, between that river and the Euphrates, as it has been said by the blessed Prophet, according to a tradition related by the Khatib in the beginning of his great history of Baghdad.<sup>3</sup> The city which now exists on the east bank of the Tigris is New Baghdad. It contains the palaces of the Khalifs and continues, till the present time, to be the seat of government. (The Khalif) al-Saffih and his brother al-Mansur at first fixed their residence at Kufah, but al-Saffan then built a town near al-Anbar and called it al-Hashimiyah. To this place he and his brother removed, but they

---

1 I do not find them in Freytag's edition, unless they be those attributed there to al-Muqanna' al-Kindi, whose name may have been confounded with that of Ibn al-Muqaffa'.

2 See no. 181. I suppress the next words of the text as they are evidently out of their place; they are these; and from this the error has arisen.

3 This tradition is not in the Mishkat al-Masabih, neither is it to be found in the Abridgement of the Khatib's History of Baghdad, MS. No.-634.

left it for al-Anbar, in which city al-Saffah died: his tomb is still to be seen there. Al-Mansur remained at al-Anbar till Baghdad was built, and then removed thither.--The real name of Ibn al-Muqaffa's father was Daduyeh:* al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf, when governor of Iraq, appointed him as receiver of the revenue of Fars, but having discovered that he embezzled the public money, he put him to the torture. Daduyeh's hand was shrivelled up (from the tortures he underwent), and he was then called al-Muqaffa' (the shrivelled). Some say, however, that this is not exact, but that he was appointed receiver by Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qasri, and punished by Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi when the latter succeeded Khalid as governor of Iraq: God knows best which statement is true. Ibn Makki says, in his Tathqif al-Lisan<sup>1</sup> (rectification of the tongue); "People say Ibn al-Muqaffa', but the right pronunciation is Ibn al-Muqaffi'; for he was a maker and seller of baskets (qifa'), and muqaffi' has that signification. Qifa' is the plural of qafa'h, which is a thing made of palmleaves, like a basket but without a handle.--"But the pronunciation Muqaffa' is that which is current among the learned."--After reading the words of the Imam al-Haramayn<sup>2</sup>, and being convinced that Ibn al-Muqaffa' could not have been one of the three persons of whom he there speaks, I said to myself that it might be al-Muqanna' al-Khurasani whom he meant; that impostor who pretended to be the Divinity and caused the moon to appear, as we shall relate in his life (which will be found under the letter 'Ayn ( ع ) his name being 'Ata); and I thought that the copyist might have altered the Imam's words and written unintentionally al-Muqaffa' for al-Muqanna'; but on reflection, I found that it could not be so, for al-Muqanna' al-Khurasani poisoned himself in the year 163 (A.D. 79-80. as we shall mention in his life, and he could not therefore have been contemporary with al-Hallaj and al-Jannabi. But if we are to admit as true what the Imam says of three persons having met together and made the agreement of which he speaks, the third person can be no other than Ibn al-Shalmaghani, who lived at the same time as al-Hallaj and al-Jannabi, and whose whole conduct was a tissue of deceptions. A number of historians speak of him, and our shaykh 'Izz al-Din Ibn al-Athir has a long chapter on him in his great history (the Kamil, under the year 322 (A.D. 934); this chapter we here give with some abridgements: 'In this year was put to death Abu Ja'far Muhammad Ibn 'Ali al-

* It should be Dadawayh--Ed.

1 There is a work of this name by Ibn al-Qatta; but that by Ibn Makki is not noticed by Hajji Khalifah. I have not yet been able to discover any thing respecting the author mentioned here by Ibn Khallikan,

2 See no. 181

Shalmaghani, generally known by the name of Ibn 'Abi T-'Azaqir,<sup>1</sup> the reason of this was, that he introduced a doctrine in which the Shi'ite poinions were carried to an excess<sup>2</sup>, and taught the transmigration of souls and the residence of the Divinity in himself," (with other opinions which are state by Ibn al-A'hir.) "Abu T-Qasim al-Husayn Ibn Ruh<sup>3</sup> who was called by Imamites al-Bab (the door), manifested by his conduct that he held the same doctrines. Search was therefore made after Ibn al-Shalmaghani, who was obliged to conceal himself; he then fled to Mosul, where he sojourned some years, after which he descended (by the river) to Baghdad, where it was discovered that he declared himself to be the Divinity. It is said that he had amongst his disciples al-Husayn Ibn al-Qasim Ibn 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Sulayman Ibn Wahb (the same who was vizir to al-Muqtadir), the two sons of Bistam, and Ibrahim Ibn Ahmad Ibn Abi 'Awn. When Ibn Muqlah was vizir to al-Muqtadir, efforts were made to discover Ibn al-Shalmaghani, but without success; however, in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 322, he appeared in public, and was seized on and imprisoned by Ibn Muqlah. On making perquisitions in his house, papers and letters were discovered, written by persons who stated that they were believers in his doctrine, and in which they addressed him with titles such as are not given by one mortal to another. Those letters were produced to Ibn al-Shalmaghani, who admitted that they were in the hand-writing of the persons, but

---

1 This is also the orthography of al-Dhahabi's Tarikh al-Islam, MS no. 646.

2 See Druzes, introduction 1.

3 Abu T-Qasim al-Husayn Ibn Ruh was a holy shaykh and one of the doors lending to the Sahib al-Zaman the lord of the time, or last grand Imam, according to the Shi'ite doctrine; see Druzes introd. Vol. I. p. 31n. 1) He was chosen by Abu Ja'far Muhammad Ibn 'Uthman al-'Umari as his lieutenant, and when the latter classed the Shi'ites according to their degrees (of initiation), Abu T-Qasim was authorised to enter into his presence the first of them all. He then went to see Ibn al-Shalmaghani, and gained over so many proselytes, that the vizirs, ex-vizirs, and other persons of high rank crode (publiely) to visit him. He continued to be treated with the greatest deference till Hamid Ibn Abbas became vizir (to al-Muqtadir) and ordered him to be arrested. He remained in prison for five years, but was liberated immediately after the deposition of al-Muqtadir, A.H. 317 (A.D. 929). From that time till his death, which took place A.H. 326 (A.D. 937-38), he never ceased to be highly respected but at the moment in which his influence had attained its utmost pitch, and his plans were ripe for execution, God preserved (the Khalifat) from his evil designs. He had been accused of inviting the Qarmats by letter to lay siege to Baghdad, but he defended himself with great ability, presence of mind, and learning. He was benefactor to the Shi'ites, and held a very high rank among them.-(Al-Dhahabi's Tarikh al-Islam, No. 646, in anno.)

denied that he held the doctrines of which he was accused, and he professed his belief in the Muslim faith. Ibn Abi 'Awn and Ibn 'Abdus were then brought with him before the Khalif, and these two persons were ordered to strike Ibn al-Shalmaghani on the cheek, but they refused; being forced however to do so, Ibn 'Abdus stretched forth his hand and struck him, but Ibn Abi 'Awn's hand trembled violently as he reached it forth towards Ibn al-Shalmaghani's head and beard, on which he kissed them and called him my God! my Lord thou who givest me sustenance! The Khalif al-Radi Bi'llah then said; 'You pretend that you did not pass yourself for the Divinity; what then does this mean? Ibn al-Shalmaghani replied: 'I am not responsible for the words of Ibn Abi 'Awn; God knows that I never told him I was god.' Here Ibn 'Abdus said; 'He did not pass himself for the Divinity; he only said that he was the door which led to al-Imam al-Muntazar (the expected imam).' They were afterwards brought forth a number of times, and examined in the presence of the doctors of the law and the qadis; the result was that the doctors declared Ibn al-Shalmaghani worthy of death, and he was burned by fire in the month of Dhu T-Qa'dah, A.H. 322 (October, A.D. 934)."

Ibn al-Najjar makes mention of him in the History of Baghdad, in the life of Ibn Abi 'Awn; he says; 'Ibn Abi 'Awn was severely scourged, and then beheaded for being a follower of Ibn al-Shalmaghani; his body was exposed on a cross and afterwards burned; this was on Tuesday, 1st of Dhu T-Qa'dah' (of the above mentioned year). This Ibn Abi 'Awn is author of some fine works, such as the Tashbihat (comparisons), al-Ajwibat al-Muskitah (silencing answers), and some others; he was a kitab of eminence--Shalmaghani means belonging to Shalmaghan, which is a town near Wasit; the same remark is made also by al-Sam'ani in his Kitab al-Ansab.

184 AL-RA'IS IBN SINA (AVICENA)<sup>1</sup>

Al-Ra'is (the chief)<sup>2</sup> Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn 'Abd Allah In Sina, a celebrated physician: his father was a native of Balkh, but he removed from that city to Bukhara; and having displayed great

1 The life of Avicena is given in the Tarikh al-Hukama'. The commencement is in Avicena's own words, and contains his history up to the time of his arrival at Jurjan. He there met with Abu 'Ubayd 'Abd al-Wahid, by whom the remainder of his life is related.

2 This title was probably given to him in his official capacity as vizir, or as 'amil: see next note.

abilities as an 'amil,<sup>1</sup> he was appointed to fill that office in* (a town called Kharmaythin), one of the government estates (diya') in the dependencies of Bukhara, and a place of great antiquity.<sup>2</sup> It was there that Abu 'Ali and his brother were born: their mother, Sattarah, was a native of Afshanah, a village near Kharmaythin. They afterwards went to inhabit Bukhara, and Abu 'Ali then travelled abroad to study the sciences and acquire a knowledge of their different branches. # At the age of ten years, he was a perfect master of the Qur'an and general literature, and had attained a certain degree of information in dogmatic theology, the Indian calculus (arithmetic), and algebra. The hakim (physician) Abu Abd Allah al-Natili<sup>3</sup> having visited them about that time, Abu 'Ali's father lodged him in his own house, and Abu 'Ali studied, under his tuition, the Isagoge of Porphyry, mastered the art of logic, the Elements of Euclid, and the Almagest; he even far surpassed his master, and explained to him difficulties and obscurities in these works which he, al-Natili, had not comprehended. Besides these studies, he frequented the lessons of Isma'il the Sufi,<sup>4</sup> from whom he learned jurisprudence, and he exercised himself in acquiring the readings of the Qur'an<sup>5</sup> making learned researches and holding discussions. On the departure of al-Natiri, who went to visit Khawarazm Shah Mamun Ibn Muhammad<sup>6</sup> Abu 'Ali laboured in the acquisition of

1 The 'amil (agent) was an officer to whom the governor of a province delegated the executive authority in one of the cantons under his jurisdiction. His chief duty was to collect the poll-tax, the revenues arising from tithes, government lands and houses, etc.

* In a town called Kharmaythin, is not in the autograph—Ed.

2 Literally: one of the mothers of its (Bukhara's) towns. It is thus that Makkah, for its antiquity, is called Umm al-Qur' (mother of the towns).

From 'At the age' to 'proci-gy of his age' on p. 258, l. 25, not in autograph.—Ed.

3 The Turikh al-Hukama' writes this name التالي al-Nail; some of the MSS. of Ibn Khallikan have al-Bibili. I find in the Marasid: "Natilah, a city in Tabaristan at five parasangs from 'Amul."

4 The Sufi (al-Zahid). This ascetic is not noticed by Jami in his lives of the Sufis.

5 See no. 68, note (1)

6 Mamun Ibn Muhammad was prince of Jurjanah and Nasa; which latter city was given to him by Nuh Ibn Mansur the Samanid. In the year 386 (A.D. 996) he took prisoner Abu 'Abd Allah, prince of Khawarazm, and having put him to death, he united the province of Khawarazm to his empire. He died A.H. 387 (A.D. 997) (Kitab Yamini.) in the Notices at Extraits, vol. IV.; Mirkhawnd's History of the Samanids, by Wilkens; Prices Retrospect, Vol. II, page 249.

natural philosophy, divinity, and other sciences; he read the texts with the commentaries, and God opened for him the gates of knowledge. He then felt an inclination to learn medicine, and studied the works composed on that subject; he also treated patients, not for emolument but for instruction, and in a very short time he surpassed in that art the ancients and moderns, and remained without a rival or an equal. In the sixteenth year of his age, physicians of the highest eminence came to read, under his tuition, the works which treat of the different branches of medicine, and learn from him those modes of treatment which he had discovered by his practice. During the period of his studies he never slept an entire night, nor passed a day in any other occupation but study; and when he met with an obscure point, he used to perform a total ablution and proceed to the great mosque, where he would pray Almighty God to facilitate its comprehension to him and unlock the gate of the difficulty. The emir Nuh Ibn Mansur al-Samani<sup>1</sup>, prince of Khurasan, having heard, during a fit of sickness, of Abu 'ali Avicena's talent, sent for him and was restored to health under his treatment. Abu 'Ali was then received into the favour of that prince and he frequented his library, which was of incomparable richness<sup>2</sup>, as it contained not only all the celebrated works which are found in the hands of the public, but others not to be met with any where else, and of which not only the titles but the contents were unknown. Here Abu 'Ali discovered treatises on the sciences of the ancients<sup>3</sup> and other subjects, the essence of which he extracted and with the greater part of which science he became acquainted. It happened, some time afterwards, that this library was consumed by fire, and Abu 'Ali remained the sole depository of the knowledge which it contained. Some persons even said that it was he who set fire to the library, being induced to do so for the reason that he alone was acquainted with the contents, and that he wished to pass off as his own the information which he had there acquired.

1 Ibn Khallikan has Nuh Ibn Nasr, but this is a mistake; as that prince died twenthy-seven years before Avicena's birth.

2 Here is Avicena's own account of this library; "Having requested and obtained permission from Nuh Ibn Mansur to visit his library, I went there and found a great number of rooms filled with books packed up in trunks. One room contained philological and poetical works; another, jurisprudence, and so on, each particular science being kept in a room by themselves. I then read the catalogue of the ancient (Greek) authors الأوائل and found therein all I required: I saw many books, the very titles of which were unknown to most persons, and others which I never met with before nor science." Tarikh al-Hukama') Avicena was not then eighteen years of age.

3 See no. 101, note on The Sciences of the ancients.

He had not reached his eighteenth year when he had completely mastered all the sciences to the attainment of which he had directed his studies. At the age of twenty-two, he lost his father, in the vicissitudes of whose fortune he had partaken, and with whom he acted as 'amil for the Sultan. When the affairs of the Samanid dynasty fell into disorder, Abu 'Ali left Bukhara and proceeded to Kurkanj, the capital [a town?] of Khwarizm, where he frequented the court of Khawarazm Shah 'Ali Ibn Mamun Ibn Muhammad<sup>1</sup>: he wore the dress of a jurisconsult with the taylasan<sup>2</sup>, and obtained a monthly stipend for this support. He afterwards departed from Kurkanj and visited Nasa, Abiward, Tus, and other cities during which period he paid his court to the emir Shams al-Ma'ali Qabus Ibn Washmakir. When Qabus was arrested and confined in the castle where he died, (a circumstance of which we shall give the particulars in his life), Abu 'Ali went to Dihistan, where he had a severe illness, and then returned to Jurjan, where he composed his kitab al-Awsat (medium treatise)<sup>3</sup> and which is called for that reason al-Awsat al-Jurjani (the Jurjanian Medium). It was there that the doctor (Abu 'Ubayd 'Abd al-Wahid al-Jurjani<sup>4</sup>) made his acquaintance. From Jurjan, Abu 'Ali proceeded to Ray and was attached to the court (of Majd al-Dawlah, son of Fakhr al-Dawlah); he afterwards went to Qazwin, and thence to Hamadan, where he became vizir to Shams al-Dawlah<sup>5</sup>, but the troops having revolted against him, they pillaged his house, arrested him, and required Shams al-Dawlah to put him to death. This, however, the prince refused to do, and Abu 'Ali effected his escape and concealed himself. Some time afterwards, a violent attack of colic obliged Shams al-Dawlah to have recourse to his medical skill, and therefore recalled him and re-appointed him to the vizirat, after having made excuses to him for what had happened. On the death of this prince, his son

---

1 Khawarazm Shah succeeded his father Mamun as prince of Kurkanj or Jurjaniah and Khawarizm, in the year 387 (A. D. 997).

2 The taylasan seems to have been a short hooded cloak, or else a simple hood which was hung down the back. It was generally worn by men of the learned profession.

3 Hajji Khalifah notices this work without specifying its contents. The author of Avicenna's life, given in the Tarikh al-Hukama', only mentions it incidentally, without any observation: It treated perhaps of mathematics or philosophy.

4 'Abd al-Wahid al-Jurjani (not al-Jurjani as Ibn Khalikan has it) was Avicenna's disciple, and remained with him for twenty-five years.—(Tarikh al-Hukama'.)

5 Shams al-Dawlah Abu Tahir, amir of Hamadan, was son of Fakhr al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh. He became master of Ray A.H. 405 (A.D. 1014-5). (Ibn al-Athir. Murkhwand.)

and successor Taj al-Dawlah (crown of the empire) refused Abu 'Ali's services as vizir. He therefore went to Isbahan where he met with a kind reception from 'Ala' al-Dawlah Abu Ja'far Ibn Kakuyah<sup>1</sup> Avicena's constitution was naturally strong, but he mined and weakened it by his extreme addiction to sexual pleasure, and as he was never careful of his health, he was seized with a colic for which he took eight injections حقن in a day: the result was an excoriation of the intestines and a dysentery. It happened also that he had to make a journey with 'Ala' al-Dawlah, during which he experienced that prostration (of strength)<sup>2</sup> which attends colic; to relieve himself, he ordered the third of a drachm of parsley (or parsley seed) to be put into the mixture which he employed for injections; but the physician who attended him put in five drachms, and the result was that the dysentery increased from the acrid nature of the parsley. A great quantity of opium was also thrown into one of his medicines by his boys<sup>3</sup> who had deceived him

1 'Ala' al-Dawlah Abu ja'far (and not Ibn Ja'far, as erroneously printed in the Arabic text) Shahryar, and surnamed Ibn Kakuyah, because his father was maternal uncle to Majd al-Dawlah, was appointed governor of Isbahan by the mother of that prince; but during the dissensions which arose between her and her son (see Price's Retrospect. vol. II, page 266), he was obliged to take refuge under the protection of Baha' al-Dawlah. He afterwards conquered Hamadan. A.H. 414 (A.D. 1023-4); he entered Ray in 420; in 421 he took possession of Isbahan and other cities; in 422 he was confirmed in the government of Isbahan by the Sultan Ma'sud Ibn Mahmud the Ghaznawid; the next year he revolted and was defeated by that prince; he continued the war, and was again defeated by Abu 'I-Sahl al-Hamduni, the governor of Persian Iraq, who took Isbahan in 425; in 427 he made an unsuccessful attack against Abu Sahl at Isbahan; he gained possession of that city at a later period and died A. H. 433 (A.D. 1041-2).--(Ibn al-Athir, Abu 'I Fida, Price's Retrospect, vol. II, p. 228). The following passage is extracted from the life of Avicena given in the Tarikh al-Hukama': "One evening in 'Ala' al-Dawlah's presence, the conversation turned on the errors which had crept into the astronomical tables drawn up after ancient observations; and he ordered Avicena to observe the stars, and provided him with the requisite funds. Avicena began by constructing instruments and hiring artists, and he succeeded in clearing up many doubtful points, although the series of his observations was frequently interrupted by the journeys which he was obliged to undertake; some of the instruments he employed were of his own invention. "This work which he composed at Isbahan, and named the Kitab al-Ala'i العلانى in honour of his sovereign 'Ala' al-Dawlah, contained probably the results of his observations.

2 Such is the true meaning of the word صرع in this case, and not epilepsy, as it has been rendered by some orientalist, Reiske among others in his Abu 'I Fida, tom. II. p. 95. It is singular enough that Reiske, who was well acquainted with medicine, could have made such a blunder.

3 Boys; in Arabic غلمان perhaps slaves.

in some manner<sup>1</sup> and were apprehensive of being punished by him if he recovered. From the commencement of his illness he continued to support the burden of business<sup>2</sup> and give public audiences from time to time; he neglected the necessary regimen, and did not even abstain from intercourse with the other sex. One week, he was well: the next, ill. At this period, 'Ala' al-Dawlah left Isbahan for Hamadan and took Abu Ali with him; during the journey, the colic returned, and on arriving at the latter place, Abu 'Ali was in a state of extreme weakness, and his strength was almost totally prostrated. He now discontinued every medical application, and said: "The director which is in my body is unable to control it any longer, and no treatment can avail." He then made his ablutions غتسل turned himself to God تاب gave his wealth in alms to the poor, and redressed the grievances of all those whom he could recollect; he manumitted also his mamluks, [slaves] and read the Qur'an through once every three days till he expired. The date of this event we shall give at the end of this article. By his learning, penetration, and writings, he was the prodigy of his age: he composed a treatise on philosophy, entitled al-Shifa' (the remedy)<sup>3</sup>; and is the author of the Najat (or preservative)<sup>4</sup>; the Isharat (or indications)<sup>5</sup>; the Qanun (canon medicinae), and other works, both short and long, amounting to nearly one hundred; besides epistles are beautifully written, such as Hayy Ibn Yaqzan, Salaman and Absal<sup>6</sup>, and the Rsalat al-Tayr (epistle of the bird)<sup>7</sup> Great profit has been derived from his writings. He was one of the 1 From the life given in the Tarikh al-Hukama', and which Ibn Khallikan has here abridged, it appears that one of his servants embezzled a sum of money.

2 Such seems to be the meaning of the verb تحامل but it may perhaps signify: To be obliged to be carried.

3 The Shifa' is a large work in eighteen volumes, on physics metaphysics and mathematics.—(See Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, Vol. II. p 581)

4 This medical treatise has been inserted at the end of the Arabic editions the Qanun; printed at Rome, A.D. 1593.

5 The Isharat is a treatise on logic and philosophy. See Hajji Khalifah, No. 743.

6 Pocock says in his edition of Hai Ebn Yokdhan; Elenchus, p. 3: "Epistolae seu libellos quosdam elegantes ab eo (Avicena) compositos recenset Ibn Chalecan: atque inter eos Epistolam Hai Ebn Yokdhan et Epistolam Absal et Epistolam Salaman. (Pocock should have said Epistolam Salaman et Abasal; Hajji Khalifah mentions a work bearing this title.)" Dubito an haec tre (duae) epistolae fuerint, an una quae trium istorum historiam contineret, ut haec nostri authoris ad ipsius imitationem composita." The doubt here expressed by Pocock I am unable to resolve.

7 There is a senonce in the autograph which is omitted by de Slane philosophers of the Muslims. There exists some poetry composed by him; among the rest, the following piece on the soul<sup>1</sup>:

(Cont. on page 237)

"It descended upon thee from the lofty station (heaven); a dove rare and uncaptured, curtained from the eyes of every knowing (creature); yet 'tis it which is manifest and never wore a veil<sup>2</sup>. It came to thee unwillingly, and it may perhaps be unwilling to abandon thee, although it complain of its sufferings. It resisted (at first) and would not become familiar, but when it was in friendly union (with the body), it grew accustomed to the desert waste (the world). Methinks it then forgot the recollections of the protected park (heaven) and of those abodes which it left with regret; but when, in the spiral descent, it arrived at the centre of its circle in the terrestrial (world), it was united to the infirmity of the material (body)<sup>3</sup> and remained amongst the monuments and prostrate ruins<sup>4</sup>. It hath now forgotten the remembrance of the protected park and weepeth with tears which flow and cease not, till the time for setting out towards the protected park approacheth; till the instant of departure for the vast plain (the spiritual world) draweth nigh. It then cooeth on the top of a lofty and which runs thus. He was nonoured by kings and 'Ala al-Din Ibn Kakuyah conferred a robe of honour on him and he was held in high esteem.—Ed.

This is probably the same work which is mentioned in the Tarikh al-Hukama' under the title of al-Shabakat was 'I-Tayr (the net and the bird); it was perhaps a mystical treatise, descriptive of the bird detained in the net (the body).

1 This little piece, of which only some ill-joined fragments are here given by Ibn Khallikan, is founded on the Sufi doctrine that the soul pre-existed in union with the Divinity, that it comes down reluctantly from heaven to be united to the body, and that it returns after death to the happy seat it left. The poet represents the soul metaphorically by a dove, and his images and expressions are borrowed from the pastoral poetry of the ancient Arabs. It would require a long commentary to elucidate the allusions and mysticisms with which it abounds, but such a task is inconsistent with the duty of mere translator. An edition of this poem with some additions, and the verses arranged in a different order, has been given with a translation by von Hammer Purgastall in the Wiener Zeitschrift for 1837, No. 94.

2 This probably means that the existence of the soul, although not to be perceived by the senses, is yet too manifest to leave any doubt.

3 This verse runs literally thus: So that when it was united by the h (ه) of its hubut هبوط (descent) with the m م of markaz مركز (centre) in the terrestrial; then the th ث of thaqil ثَقِيل (heavy material) was attached to it, etc. The spiral form of ه represents its descent, the form of the ث indicated the central point to which it tended; the word ث signifies infirmity; it is also the name of the first letter (th) in the word ثَقِيل (the material body) I have given the sense of the verse as I understand it: but it may most likely contain some mystic illusions above my comprehension.

4 He means the world, which is a place of desolation.

(pinnacle of heaven); (for knowledge can exalt all who were not exalted); and it has come to the knowledge of every mystery in the universe, while yet her tattered vest hath not been mended<sup>1</sup>. Its descent was predestined, so that it might hear what it had not heard; but why then did it descend from the high and lofty (heaven) to the depth of the low and humble (earth)? If God sent it down by a decision of his will, his motive is concealed from the intelligence of man. (Why did it descend) to be withheld from the spacious, exalted summit (heaven) by the course net (of the body), and to be detained in a cage? It is like a flash of lightning shining over the meadow, and disappearing as if it had never gleamed."

The following lines are attributed to him, but I am unable to verify their origin:

"Take one meal each day, and avoid food till your food be digested. Preserve with care the seminal liquid; it is the water of life, to be poured into the womb."

Two verses mentioned by al-Shahrastani in the beginning of the Nihayat al-Iqdam, and which we here give are attributed to Avicenna:

"I have roamed through all these memorials, and glanced my eyes through these monuments<sup>2</sup> and I have only seen wretches clasp their beards with the hand of despair, or gnash their teeth with remorse."

The great merit of Avicenna is well known; he was born in the month of Safar, A.H. 370 (August or September, A.D. 980), and he died at Hamadan on a Friday, in the month of Ramadan, 428 (June or July, A.D. 1037): he was buried in that city. My shaykh Ibn al-Athir states in his great historical work (the Kamil), that he died at Isbahan; but the first is the more general opinion. It is stated by the shaykh Kamal al-Din Ibn Yunus, that the prince in whose service Avicenna was employed, having been irritated against him, caused him to be imprisoned till he died; and he recited the following verses in proof of his statement:

"I saw Ibn Sina take mankind in hatred and die miserably in a prison. His Shifa<sup>3</sup> could not cure the misfortune which befel him, neither could his Najat<sup>4</sup> preserve him from death."

1 The tottered vest of the soul, or the body destroyed by death, is not mended till the day of resurrection; and yet the soul is in heaven and in the enjoyment of all knowledge.

2 He means probably the world; see the preceding piece on the soul."

3 Or remedy; the book so called.

4 Or preservative; another work of Avicenna's.

185 AL-HUSAYN IBN AL-DAHHAH AL-KHALI'

The poet Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn al-Dahhak Ibn 'Asir, generally known by the appellation of al-Khali' (the liberatine),* was born at Basrah; he descended from a native of Khurasan, who was an enfranchised slave to Salman Ibn Rabi'ah al-Bahili, one of the Companions of Muhammad. This author had a natural talent for pleasantries, but he composed equally well in all the different styles of poetry. He was admitted into the society of the khalifs, and enjoyed their intimacy to a higher degree than any other poet, with the exception of Ishaq Ibn Ibrahim al-Nadim al-Mausili, and even by him he was hardly surpassed in favour. The first of the khalifs whom he frequented was Muhammad al-Amin, son of Harun al-Rashid, with whom he became acquainted in the 198th year of the Hijrah (A.D. 813-4), which was also the year of al-Amin's death; he then attached himself to the succeeding khalifs, and continued to be a favourite with them till the reign of al-Musta'in. He was an able poet of the first class, and had some diverting adventures with Abu Nuwas al-Hakami. The surname of al-Khali' was given to him for his gay and licentious humour (khala'at). Mention is made of him by Ibn al-Munajjim in the work called al-Kitab al-Bari', and by Abu 'I-Faraj al-Isbahani [d. 966] in the Kitab al-Aghani: both these writers quote some fine passages from his poetry, out of which we select the following lines:

"Join thy cheek to mine, and thou wilt then understand a novel idea which perplexes intelligence; the vernal roses on thy cheeks render them a garden, and tears render mine a lake."

By the same:

"O thou whose looks are magic and whose lips are wine! thou wert a tyrant to me; and, when my patience was overcome, I revealed to the world that thou wert the object of my love. It is however right that the veil which conceals thee should be torn away; for if people blame my fondness, thy face will be my excuse."

By the same:

"I swear by my love for thee, that I will not turn away my face, to conceal my tears. Grief, however painful, is allayed by weeping. My heart, through love for thee, is too enfeebled to be broken. The violence of my malady hath left no room in me for sickness."

* In autograph: Abu 'Ali al-Husayn b. al-Dahhak al-Sha'ir al-Basri a ma'ruf bi'l Khali--Ed.

It is state in the Kitab al-Aghani that Abu'l-'Abbas Tha'lab, the grammarian, (see his life no. 42) in reciting the preceding verses, attributed them to al-Khali', observing that there was not then a person in existence capable of expressing the thought so well:

By the same:

Since you have been unfaithful during my absence, why act as the maid who, though sincere in her attachment, treats her lover with affected scorn? Love me, and then trifle with my affections: or else reject me, and then act as one who loves me not.

One of his qasidahs contains this line:

"What a happy time<sup>1</sup> was that in which I never spent a night without expecting from my beloved the fulfilment of her promise (to visit me)".

This poet died A.H. 250 (A.D. 864), having nearly attained his hundredth year: the Khatib says, in his History of Baghdad, that he was born A.H. 162 (A.D. 778-9).

186 IB AL-HAJJAJ THE POET

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ja'far Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Hajjaj, the Katib and poet, was noted for the licentiousness, humour, and gaiety<sup>2</sup> of his poetical productions. In this branch he was without a rival, and he had no predecessor in the style of composition which he cultivated, embellished as it was by the beauty of the expressions and the easy turn of the verses. He celebrated the praises of the khalif al-Ma'mun,* the emirs, vizirs, and men of rank: the collection of his poetical works is so great, that it is generally found in ten volumes. The prevailing character of his writings is gaiety, but some good pieces of a grave cast have been composed by him. He was for some time muhtasib or police-magistrate<sup>3</sup> at Baghdad, and was superseded, it is said, by Abu Sa'id

1 Literally; Mad God shed his blessings on the time.

2 The words سُخْف and مَزَل resemble each other in their primitive and secondary significations: the primitive is leanness, and the secondary gaiety.

* This name is not mentioned in the autograph, nor in the published texts: they have simply الملوك والامراء والوزراء والروساء

3 See note 4 under no. 150.

al-Istakhri, the Shafi'ite doctor. His ghazals, or amatory pieces, are so well known that it is needless to insert any of them here. As a poet, he has been put on a rank with Imru 'I-Qays, for each of them introduced an original species of composition, and, in the intervening time, none existed to equal them. The following verses are a good specimen of his graver styles:

"Awake, my two friends<sup>1</sup>, from your slumber! slumber degrades the mind of the sage and ingenious. There are the Milky Way and the pleiades; it is like a rivulet flowing through a garden of lilies. I perceive the zephyr<sup>2</sup> arriving as the shades of night withdraw; why then should the wine-cup not arrive when darkness retires? Ariste, and pour me out me Grecian liquor نحوه روميه drawn from a cask which has not been touched since the days of the Caesar! a pure liquor of which the powerful effect gives death to the reason and life to the heart."

By the same:

"People said (to me): "You pay constant court to Hamd, and neglect the other "princes." And I answered in the words of a poet who, long before my time, has well expressed my thought<sup>3</sup>: The bird alights where it can pick up the grain, and the dwellings of the generous are visited (by the needy)."

The verse* which he here inserts was composed by Bashshar Ibn Burd. Ibn al-Hajjaj died on Tuesday, 27th of the latter Jumada, A.H. 391 (May, A.D., 1001), at the town of al-Nil, whence his body was transported to Baghdad. He was interred near the sepulchral chapel of Musa Ibn Ja'far and he had directed by his will that he should be buried at the feet of that imam, and that the following words should be inscribed on his tomb: And their dog lay with his fore legs stretched forth at the entrance of the cave.<sup>4</sup> He was one of the greatest poets among the Shi'ites, and after his death, he appeared in a dream to one of his companions, and recited these lines on being asked what was his state in the other world;

1 See page 115, note I under no. 52.

2 The zephyr, literally the east wind; it is highly celebrated by Arabian poets for its mildness.

3 Literally; Who obtained (that is, who attained) the thought.

* In autograph, 'the third couplet' البيت الثالث

4 Al-Qur'an, surah 18, verse 17. He compares himself to the dog of the seven sleepers; the Muslims believe that this faithful dog was admitted into paradise with his masters.

The evil cast of my religious principles ruined the excellence of my poetry; my lord ['Ali]# was displeased that I reviled the Companions of his Prophet<sup>1</sup>.

Sharif al-Rida deplored his death in a qasidah containing this passage:

"They brought tidings of his death when I had still good hopes; how excellent was he whose death was announced by these two harbingers.<sup>2</sup> He was my foster-brother by friendship, and he possessed a portion of my heart as if he were really my foster brother.<sup>3</sup> I did not think that time could blunt the edge of that (cutting) tongue. I weep for thee and for those verses, fugitives throughout the world, in which the words give immortality to the thoughts. Let time itself long deplore thy loss, for by thee was enlivened the spirit of (thy) time."

Al-Nil is a town on the Euphrates, between Baghdad and Kufah; it has produced a number of learned and of eminent men. This place owes its origin to a canal excavated by al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf from the Euphrates to this spot, and called by him al-Nil (the Nile) after the river of Egypt. There were numerous villages on its banks.

187 AL-WAZIR AL-MAGHRIBI

Abu T-Qasim al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn Yusuf Ibn Bahram Ibn al-Marzuban Ibn Mahan Ibn Badhan Ibn Sasan Ibn al-Harun Ibn Balash Ibn Jamas Ibn Firuz Ibn Yazdajard Ibn Bahram Jur (i.e. Gur); (such is the genealogy of the person generally) known by the appellation of al-Wazir al-Maghribi (the Maghribite vizir). I have heard it said by many persons of erudition, that Abu 'Ali Harun Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Awariji,<sup>4</sup> he in whose honour al-Mu'anabbi composed the qasidah beginning thus:

See printed text, p. 144; also see Tehran ed, p. 171—Ed.

1 It was quite natural, however, for a Shi'ite to revile those Companions of Muhammad who abandoned and betrayed 'Ali.

2 See no. 25, note 1.

3 Literally: foster-brother by milk.

4 The Katib Abu 'Ali Harun Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Awariji (the book-keeper) died A.H. 364 (A.D. 975) aged 66 years. He was receiver of the land tax in some important districts. A written collection of the traditions was made by him. He frequented the society of the Sufis and of al-Hallaj, but on discovering the real religious opinions of the latter, he informed the vizir Ali Ibn 'Isa and Abu Bakr Ibn Mujahid (of his pernicious doctrines).—(Al-Dhahabi's Tarikh al-Islam.)

Maiden! the watchmen well know that thou canst not visit me by night, for wherever thou art, in the darkness, light is there.<sup>1</sup>

(These persons, I say, pretend) that this Abu 'Ali was his maternal uncle but, on examination, I discovered that he was a maternal uncle to al-Wazir al-Maghribi's father. As for al-Wazir al-Maghribi, he himself mentions, in his Adab al-Khawass (Instruction for those intimate with princes), that his mother was daughter to Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Ja'far al-Nu'mani, and that the al-Awariji above mentioned died in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 344 (September, A.D. 995).

Al-Wazir al-Maghribi is the author of a diwan containing pieces in verse and prose; he composed also an abridgement of the Isikh al-Maatiq<sup>2</sup>; the Kitab al-Inas (familiar discourses), a small but very instructive work, and a proof of the extensive information of its author; the Adab al-Khawass; the Kitab al-Mathur fi Mulahal-Khudur,<sup>3</sup> etc. I read the following passage in a collection of divers pieces:

"These words were found written in the handwriting of al-Wazir al-Maghribi's father, on the cover of the abridgment of the Islah al-Mantiq: 'He (my son) (may God preserve him and enable him to attain the rank of the Saints!) was born at first dawn of day, on Sunday, 13th Dhu l-Hijjah 370 (June A.D. 981.) He learned by heart the Qur'an, a number of grammatical and philological text-books without the comments, and about fifteen thousand verses selected from the composition of the ancient Arabic poets. He composed poetry, was skilled in prose-writing, and surpassed all his contemporaries in penmanship, in the calculation of nativities حساب الولد and in algebra, with other accomplishments of which even an inferior portion would suffice for any Katib: and all this was before he had completed his fourteenth year. He abridged this work with superior judgment; having given every explanation contained in it, and not omitting a single word (of those which are therein explained); he changed also the order of the chapters as far as was necessary to suit the plan of his abridgment, and classed the matters under their proper heads. When he had finished his abridgment, I proposed to him that

---

1 That is: By thy presence, thou turnest darkness into light, and thou wilt then be surely discovered.

2 According to Hajji Khalifah, this philological work was composed by Abu Hanifah Ahmad Ibn Dawud al-Dinwati, who died A.H. 290 (A.D. 903).

3 This title signifies literally. The memorable, treating of curtain-anecdotes. Probably a philological work: as fair ladies are always concealed by a curtain or a veil, so the beauties of Arabic style are hidden under the veil of allusion.

he should put it into verse, and he accordingly began that undertaking and composed a number of sheets in a single night. All this was before the completion of his seventeenth year; and I beseech Almighty God to spare him and to prolong his health."

The following is a specimen of the vizir's poetry:

"Whilst the camels were saddling for their journey, I said to my mistress: Prepare all your firmness to support my absence. I shall spend, with unconcern, the best of my youth and renounce the pursuit of rank and fortune. Is it not a serious loss that our days should pass away without profit, and yet be reckoned as a portion of our lives?"

By the same:

"I look on man in this world as a shepherd by whom every pasture-ground is rejected, and who at last finds none to feed his flock. Here is water, but no herbage; there, herbage, but no water; and where thou seest water and herbage, that is the haunt of beasts of prey."

On a handsome youth whose hair was cut off:

"They cut off his hair to render him ugly; jealous as they were (to save him from being admired). (In face) he was a morning covered by the dark night (of his hair); they dispelled the night, but left him the morning."

By the same:

"I shall relate to you my adventure, and adventures are of various kinds. I one night changed my bed and was abandoned by repose; tell me then how I shall be on the first night which was in the grave?"

As birth of Abu Yahya 'Abd al-Hamid, the son of al-wazir al-Mughribi, the following lines were addressed to the father by Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Ahmad, chief of the army office at Cairo:

"In him appears an omen of which the meaning cannot escape the learned and intelligent: seeing that the child's grandfather (jadd) was 'Ali, I said: the fortune (jadd) of the child shall be exalted ('ali')."

This vizir was a man of great shrewdness and abilities. When his father, unluckily, and two brothers were put to death by al-Hakim, the sovereign of Egypt<sup>1</sup>, he fled to Ramlah and joined Hassan Ibn

---

1 See M. de Sacy's Exposé de l'histoire des Druzes, tom. I. page 350.

Mufrij* Ibn Dagħfal Ibn al-Jarrah of the tribe of Tai, who assisted by his sons and cousins, had seized on that city; these he succeeded in inspiring with hostile designs against al-Hakim. He then proceeded to Hajaz and excited the ambition of the governor of Makkah, giving him hopes of overthrowing al-Hakim and conquering Egypt. These intrigues gave great uneasiness to the prince of Egypt and awoke his apprehensions for the safety of his empire. It would be too long to relate the conduct of al-Hakim under these circumstances, but the result was, that, by a large donation of money, he gained over the family of al-Jarrah, who had already, by the management of the vizir, drawn to Ramlah Abu T-Futuh al-Hasan Ibn Ja'far al-'Alawi<sup>1</sup>, the sovereign of Makkah, and proclaimed him khalif under the title of al-Rashid. By his unremitting efforts, al-Hakim succeeded in conciliating the family of al-Jarrah; and Abu T-Futuh, being frustrated in his projects, fled to Makkah, whilst the vizir, to avoid al-Hakim's vengeance, retired to Traq and broke off his intercourse with the Jarrah family. Al-Wazir al-Maghribi then visited the vizir Fakhr al-Mulk Abu Ghalib Ibn Khalif<sup>2</sup> [Khalaf?]; but the Khalif al-Qadir Bi'llah, having received intelligence of the circumstance, and suspecting that he had come to plot against the 'Abbasid dynasty, wrote to Fakhr al-Mulk, ordering him to expel al-Wazir al-Maghribi from the states of the khalifat, Fakhr al-Mulk did not, however, withdraw his support from al-Maghribi; and he succeeded in obtaining for him al-Qadir's indulgence. Happening afterwards to go down from Baghdad to Wasit, he took al-Wazir al-

---

* Mufarrij in autograph—Ed.

1 He returned to Makkah and, having made his submission to al-Hakim, he was reinstated in his government, and died there A. H. 430 (A.D. 1038-9), the forty-sixth year of his administration. Ibn Khaldun. M.S. of the Bib du Roi, No. d'entrec. 2402C (fol. 44.)

2 Abu Ghalib Fakhr al-Mulk Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Khalif was vizir to the Daylamite prince Baha' al-Dawlah and to his son Sultan al-Dawlah. His talents, liberality, and noble character entitled him to be considered as the greatest vizir who ever served the Buwayh dynasty, with the exception of Abu T-Fadl Ibn al-'Amid and the Sahib Ibn 'Abbad. His father was a money changer, and he himself underwent many vicissitudes of fortune before he was raised to the vizirate. He was put to death A.H. 407 (A.D. 1016-7) by his sovereign Sultan al-Dawlah, for some reason or other (Al-Yafi'i's Mirat; Abu T Mahasin's al-Nujum al-Zahirah.) Ibn al-Athir says in his Kamil, In the year 412 the Khutbah was said throughout Traq with the substitution of Musharraff al-Dawlah's name for Sultan al-Dawlah's. The Davlamite troops (in the service of the latter) then obtained permission from Musharraff al-Dawlah to return to their homes in Khuzistan. He ordered his vizir Abu Ghalib to accompany them; but on arriving at al-Ahwaz, they murdered him. I should suppose this not to be the same person as the preceding.

Maghribi in his suite: during his stay at Wasit he treated his guest with every attention, and did not discontinue his protection till he himself was put to death. Al-Wazir al-Maghribi then endeavoured to conciliate the khalif al-Qadir Bi'llah and disculpate himself from the imputations cast upon him; in this he succeeded to a certain degree, and he returned to Baghdad. Having made a short stay in that city, he proceeded to Mosul, where he was chosen by Abu 'T-Muni' Qirwash Mu'tamid al-Dawlah, prince of the 'Uqaylite dynasty<sup>1</sup>, to fill the place of secretary of state, which had become vacant by the death of Abu 'T-Hasan Ibn Abi 'T-Wazir. He afterwards directed his intrigues بسی to obtain the post of vizir under the Daylamite sovereign Musharraf ad-Dawlah<sup>2</sup>, and he did not cease his machinations until that prince arrested his vizir Mu'ayyad al-Mulk Abu 'Ali. Al-Maghribi then received a letter from Musharraf al-Dawlah, by which he was invited to leave Mosul and come to court; (he in consequence proceeded to Baghdad, where Musharraf al-Dawlah was Amir al-Umara') and was installed in the vizirate, but did not receive either the title of honour or the pelisse, neither was he allowed to discontinue wearing the durra'ah.<sup>3</sup> He continued to fill this office till circumstances obliged Musharraf al-Dawlah to quit Baghdad,<sup>4</sup> when they both went to Awana<sup>5</sup> and stopped with Abu Sanan Gharib Ibn Muhammad Ibn Maqn.<sup>6</sup> Whilst things were in this state, al-Wazir al-Maghribi was induced to quit the service of Musharraf al-Dawlah by his apprehension of that prince's dissatisfaction, and he went to reside with Abu 'T-Muni' Qirwash at Mosul. About this period, the dislike

---

1 Qirwash Ibn al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyib succeeded his father as sovereign of Mosul, A.H. 391 (A.D. 1000-1). He died A.H. 444 (A.D. 1052-3). His history may be traced in Abu 'I-Fida, tom II p. 603, and tom. III, pp. 5, 51, 53, 141. For the pronunciation of his name, I have followed the MS of Ibn al-Athir; it is found written with the vowel points in Vol. III, fol. 24. Ibn Khaldun has a long chapter on the history of the Uqaylite dynasty, (MS. No. 2402 C, fol. 116 verses.)

2 See Price's Retrospect, vol. II, p. 269, and Abu 'I-Fida's Annals, tom. III, pp. 51, 65, 69.

3 According to al-Maqrizi, the Durra'ah was a sort of vest in woollen cloth worn by vizirs Chrestomathic, t. I p. 125). I do not understand, however, why al-Maghribi was obliged to wear it constantly.

4 He left Baghdad through apprehension of the turbulent spirit of the Turkish troops, to whom large arrears of pay were owing.

5 Awana lay at ten parasangs from Baghdad, higher up the river, — (Marasid)

6 Ibn Maqn; such is the orthography of the MSS, and of Ibn al-Athir in the Kamil. Mention is made of this amir by Abu 'I-Fida' in his Annals, A.H. 411.

which al-Qadir had borne towards him was again excited, and the letters written (by that khalif) to Qirwash and Gharib respecting him, put him under the necessity of quitting his protector. He then went to Abu Nasr (Ahmad) Ibn Marwan<sup>1</sup> at Mayyafariqin, and during the rest of his life, he remained with him as a guest. But according to another account, when he proceeded to Diyar Bakr, he became vizir to Ahmad Ibn Marwan, the sultan of that province, and died in office the 13th Ramadan, (October, A.D. 1027). Some say that his death happened 428: but the first statement is more correct. He died at Mayyafariqin and his body was transported to Kufah in pursuance of an injunction contained in his will. There is an anecdote on this subject which is too long to be related here.<sup>2</sup> He was interred in a tomb near the chapel of 'Ali Ibn 'Abi Talib; and on it the following verses were inscribed by his own directions:

"I had long travelled in the path of error and ignorance; it was time for me to arrive at my journey's end. I have repented of all my sins, and this last part of my conduct may perhaps efface the former. After five and forty years, I had hoped for longer respite. did not know that my creditor is generous."

His son, his uncle, and his two brothers were put to death on the 3rd of Dhu T-Qa'dah, A.H. 400 (June, A.D. 1010).

I have read in some compilation that he was not a native of Maghrib (Maghribi), but that one of his ancestors, Abu T-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Muhammad, filled a place under government in that part of Baghdad which lies on the west side of the Tigris (in Karkh): and he was named al-Maghribi (the Western) for that reason: this title then continued to be given to his descendants. I have also heard a great number of persons make the same observation, but I since found the following passage at the beginning of the work composed by the vizir, and entitled Adab al-Khawass: "Al-Mutanabbi, the poet whom our 1 His life, no. 72.

2 When al-Wazir al-Maghribi felt that his death was inevitable, he wrote to all the amirs and chiefs of his acquaintance who were (living) between Mayyafariqin and Kufah. In these letters, he informed them that one of his concubines had died, and that he intended sending the coffin to the chapel of 'Ali; he therefore asked their protection for the persons who accompaniend the body, and desired them, on no account, to stop it or the escort. When he expired, his people proceeded with his body to the place of burial; the amirs thought that it was the body of the concubine, and none attempted to stop it on its progress. The truth was not discovered till after his interment.-(Ibn al-Athir).

* مجاوره lit. neighbourhood.

brothers of Maghrib call all-Mutanabbih (the wide awake), says with elegance:

"When Time was in his youth, his children came and he made them happy, but we came to him his old age."

This seems to prove that he was in reality a native of Maghrib. Further on, when speaking of al-Nabigha al-Ja'di<sup>1</sup> and his poetry, he makes use of the very same expression, when quoting this verse of al-Mutanabbi's:

"In my body is soul which has not, like it, become decrepit; although grayness has ruined (the dark honours) of my face."

His genealogy, as given at the commencement of this notice, was taken by me from a note in the handwriting of Abu 'I-Qasim 'Ali Ibn Munjib Ibn Sulayman al-Misri, surnamed Ibn al-Sirafi,* who mentions that he copied it from the handwriting of the vizir himself.

188 IBN KHALAWAYH

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn Ibn Ahmad Ibn Khalawayh, the grammarian and philoger, was a native of Hamadan, but (when still a youth) he went to Baghdad and frequented some of the eminent scholars who then inhabited that city. Among the number were Abu Bakr Ibn al-Anbari, Ibn Mujahid al-Maqqari, Abu 'Umar al-Zahid and Ibn Durayd. He also learned the readings of the Qur'an from Abu Sa'id al-Sirafi, and having removed to Syria, he took up his abode at Aleppo. He then became unrivalled by his acquirements in every branch of literature; (students) journeyed to him from all countries, and the members of the Hamdan family (which then reigned at Aleppo), treated him with honour, studied under his direction, and profited by his tuition. It was he who related the following (well known) anecdote: "I one day went to see Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Hamdan, and

* In autograph: العروف بابن الصمير في المصري

1 Hassan Ibn Qays, a descendant of 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah, a member of the tribe of Ja'd Ibn Ka'b, and generally known by the name of al-Nabighah al-Ja'di, was one of the most celebrated of the poets contemporary with Muhammad. He was born before the promulgation of Islamism, to which he became a convert, and was devoted partisan to 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, on whose side he fought at the battle of Siffin. He died during the period in which 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr, the anti-Khalif, ruled at Makkah. It is to his song that he is chiefly indebted for his reputation. He did not give any proof of possessing a talent for poetry, till after his thirteenth year, and it was for this reason that he received the surname of al-Nabighah. (See Chrestomothic, tom. II. p. 410.). (al-Suyti; Sharh Shawahid al-Mughni, MS. No. 1238, fol. 133).

when I stood up before him (after making my salutation), he said to me: Sit down, making use of the word uq'ud, and not ijlis: from this I perceived that he was an amateur of philological studies<sup>1</sup> and well acquainted with the secrets of the language spoken by the desert Arabs."

Ibn Khalawayh made this observation because philologists consider it preferable to say uq'ud to a person who is standing up, and ijlis to a person who is lying down or making a prostration;<sup>2</sup> and some of the learned give the following reason for making the distinction: the verb qa'da* implies the idea of passing from up to down (and it is for this reason that a person deprived of the use of his limbs is called muq'ud (seated), but the verb jalas# denotes the action of passing from down to up, (for which reason it is that the high land of Najd is called Jalsa (the seated up) or that they say of a person who goes to that country: he is a jalas (sits up). It is thus that Marwan Ibn al-Hakam, when governor of Medina, addressed the poet al-Farazdaq (in these terms).

"Say to the idiot al-Farazdaq<sup>3</sup>: Proceed to Najd (ujlus)" if you obey not my orders."

This is taken from a piece of verse relative to which a long anecdote is related<sup>4</sup>. The foregoing observations are not here in their

1 Literally: I was aware of his attachment to the fringe (of the robe) of philology.

2 From this it would appear that the verb قامد qa'da signifies to sit down, and جلس jalasa to sit up. This distinction is now neglected in common discourse.

* In autograph: qu'ud—Ed.

In autograph: julus—Ed.

3 Literally: Say to al-Farazdaq, (and folly is as hateful as its name). The expression between parentheses was used by the ancients to denote that the person of whom they were speaking was a blockhead. The poet al-Nabighah al-Dubyani has used it in this sense at the commencement of his fifth qasidah. (see Yusuf al-Shantmari's Commentary on the Diwan of the six Poets; MS, of the Bib du Roi.)

** In autograph: fa ajlis—Ed.

4 This anecdote is given by M. Caussin de Perceval in his life of al-Farazdaq, Journal Asiatique, t. XIII. pp. 516, 517, and 518. The verse mentioned here by Ibn Khallikan was composed by Marwan in answer to that recited by the poet, and which is mentioned in page 518 of that periodical. Ibn Khallikan has omitted the next verse of the piece composed by Marwan; and I give it here after the Kitab al-Aghani:

دع المدينة انما حظرة . والحق بكه لوبيت القدس

"Quit Medina; it is for thee a forbidden city, and go to Makkah or Jerusalem."

proper place, but discourse will run into digression. Ibn Khalawayh is author of a large philological work, entitled Kitab lays (the book of lays non east), which is a proof of his vast erudition; from the beginning to the end it is drawn up in this manner. In the language of the pure Arabic race there is not (lays) such and such an expression, etc.; whence its name. He composed also a little book which he called al-Al<sup>1</sup>, and in the beginning of it he says: The Al is of twenty-five divisions (or sorts). This treatise is composed with no inferior talent. He mentions in it the twelve imams, the dates of their birth and death, and the names of their mother; what induced him to speak of them was, that in describing the different sorts of Al (or mirage), he came to speak of the al (or family) of Muhammad, the Banu Hashim. His other works are the Kitab al-Ishtiqaq (book of derivations), the Kitab al-Jumal fi'l-Nahw (the grammatical summary), a treatise on the readings of the Qur'an, the parsing of thirty surahs of the Qur'an, the Kitab al-'Aziz<sup>2</sup>, a treatise on the short and the long final alif, another on the two genders, one on the different kinds of alif, a commentary on Ibn Durayd's poem the Maqsurah; a work (containing pieces descriptive) of the lion, etc. Ibn Khalawayh had some conferences and discussions with al-Mutanabbi at the court of Sayf al-Dawlah, and were I not desirous of avoiding prolixity, I should give an account of them. He composed some good poetry, and the following verses were written by him, as it appears by al-Tha'libi's statement in the Yatimah:

"If the president of an assembly be not a man of family, he whom the assembly have chosen for president is good for nothing. How often has it been said to me; 'Why do I see thee on foot?' And I replied: 'Because you are on horseback.'"

Ibn Khalawayh died at Aleppo, A.H. 370 (A.D. 980-1.)

189. ABU 'ALI AL-GHASSANI

Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Ghassani (descended from the tribe of Ghassan) al-Jayyani (a native of Jaen in Spain) was a tradionist of the first authority and a philoger. He is the author of the Taqyid al-Muhmal (fixation of doubtful orthographies), a book in which he gives the right spelling of all

---

1 This word signifies family, and mirage. I am inclined to think that the latter meaning is here intended.

2 This work is not noticed by Hajji Khalifah.

the names of Traditionists cited in the Sihah [Sahihayn in autograph] of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, when these names are liable to be pronounced erroneously; in this work, which forms two volumes, he has treated the subject with no inferior talent. He was an able critic in judging of the authenticity of traditions, and one of those great men of learning whose labours have been useful to the public. His handwriting was good, his orthography correct, and he was acquainted with the rare and elegant expressions of the Arabic language, and with poetry and genealogy. When teaching the Traditions, he used to sit in the mosque of Cordova, and there had the most eminent men of that city for auditors. I have not met with the particulars of his life<sup>1</sup>, or I should mention them. He was born in the month of Muharram, A.H. 427 (A.D. 1035); in the year 444, he began his travels for the purpose of learning the Traditions, and he died on Thursday night, the 12th of Sha'ban, 498 (April, A.D. 1105). Jayyani means belonging to Jayyan (Jaen), a large city in Spain. There is another place of this name in the dependencies of Rayy.

190 AL-BARĪ

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn was son to Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Husayn Ibn 'Ubayd Allah Ibn al-Qasim Ibn 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Sulayman Ibn Wahb al-Harithi: this Sulayman Ibn Wahb was a vizir and a descendent of Harith: Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Amr.<sup>2</sup> This celebrated poet bore the surnames of al-Dabbas, al-Badri, al-Barī' (the pre-eminent), and al-Nadim al-Baghdadi (the boon-companion from Baghdad); he was also a learned grammarian, a philologist, and a teacher of the Qur'anic readings; he possessed besides a good acquaintance with the various branches of polite literature. Great numbers profited under his tuition, and particularly in the reading of the Qur'an. He descended from a family conspicuous in the vizirate, as his ancestor al-Qasim was vizir to the khalif al-Mu'tadid and to al-Muktafi his successor; this was the vizir who poisoned Ibn al-Rumi, as we shall relate in that poet's life; 'Ubayd Allah, the father of al-Qasim, had been already vizir to al-Mu'tadid; and as for Sulayman Ibn Wahb, his celebrity is such that it is needless

---

1 I hoped to have found some further particulars respecting al-Ghassani in the Silah or gift, the celebrated biographical dictionary composed by Ibn Bashkuwal, and of which a copy is preserved in the library of the Asiatic Society of Paris. His life is indeed given in that work, but I perceived that Ibn Khallikan had already extracted from it every interesting fact.

2 This 'Amr was son of 'Ullah بن ابن Khald Ibn Malik ibn 'Udad, the descendant of Kahlan.

to speak of him here; we shall merely refer the reader to his work. Al-Bari was gifted with diversified talents and is that author of some good works, such as compositions in the lofty style<sup>1</sup> an poetical pices. He was an intimate companion and friend of the Sharif Abu Ya'la Ibn al-Habbariyah, and the pleasantries which passed between them are most amusing لطيف. It happened that al-Bari' entered 'into the service of a certain amir and made the pilgrimage to Makkah; on his return, the Sharif went, at different times, to see him, but did not find him at home; he in consequence addressed to him a long qasidah, in which he reproached him for his conduct, and hinted that the place which he had obtained caused him to disdain his old acquaintance. This poem begins thus:

"O son of my affection! but alas, how far (estranged) from me is the son of my affection; This place of authority, obtained since my departure, has altered the (kind) looks (with which he once received me)."

I should give this piece here, were it not for the ribaldry and obscenity of some passages. It was answered by al-Bari' in a long epistle containing also some indelicate expressions, and beginning thus:

"The Sharif Abu Ya'la's letter has arrived, and it has met with as kind a reception as would be given to himself. I received it with a hearty welcome, and I applied it to my eyes and to my cheek.<sup>2</sup> I broke the seal and found—what think you of honey mixed wormood? Kind reproaches tinctured with bitterness, such as he better deserved: folly and seriousness: false accusations against me who have committed no crime, and blame such as nearly consumes my heart. He pretends that ha came to visit me many times, and that I refused to admit him: may he never meet with a foul repulse! Cease then to accuse the place I fill, and lay not the fault on my pilgrimage; can a person, (frank) like me, effect condescendence or disdain?<sup>3</sup> I implore you, by Allah! tell me how you can perceive that I forget you or that my affection is altered? Such as you see me, whether acting as an'amil<sup>4</sup> or a vizir to a prince, or passing troops in review, I am still that libertine (khall) whom you knew, and whom you yet might easily

1 Compositions in the lofty style; this is not the literal translation, but it expresses the sense tolerably well, the origianl word is غريبه which means rare or strange expressions, such as are used by the Arabs of the desert, but unintelligible for towns-people.

2 In sign of honour.

3 Literally: An mihiest solutio dedignations aut constrictio ejus?

4 See note 3, under no. 184.

recongnize.<sup>1</sup> When a handsome (girl) is true to (her promise and visits) me, that day is my holiday, (as if) the prince himself came to my house. Were I in the garden of eternal happiness and you in the fire of hell with Haman,<sup>2</sup> do you think I could forget you? were my head encircled with a diadem and you a prisoner in chains, could I fell indifferent for you? I fulfil manifold my promised affection to you, but you do not repay my friendship. (Do you reproach me) because I am solely devoted to one single person among men, the first among the generous: one who has spared my self-respect the humiliation of (soliciting succour from) the vile, and has loaded me with unbounded favours? I desire no more: I let my days glide smoothly away, and adopt the maxim of keeping within bounds. And you I am not too proud to beg; but where are the generous men whose bounty I implore?"

We shall confine ourselves to the foregoing citation, as the qasidah from which it is taken contains obscene passages not fit to be given, and others unsuited to our purpose.

The following piece is by the same author:

"I have lost my self-respect<sup>3</sup> from having long solicited the favours of a man devoid of self-respect. I sent to him a statement of my misery, would that I had died before I sent it. His gifts brought me no honour, and I could hardly recover from his contumelious treatment. Death is better than (to live in) an age when men of talent must hold out their hands to blockheads."

Al-Bari' was born at Baghdad on the 10th of Safar, A.H. 443 (A.d. 1061), and he died on Tuesday, 17th of the latter Jumada; some say the first, A.H. 524 (April, A.D. 1130).

Dabbas means a maker or seler of dibs.<sup>4</sup>

1 Literally: Whose country you might know were it even by the manner in which his camels ruminate. This seems to be a proverbial expression, but I have not been able to find it in al-Maydani. It may be, however, that I have misunderstood the words, as the last hemistich of the verse many very well signify: Who, as thou knowest, is easily pleased, were it even with a flask of muddy wine.

2 Haman was the chief minister of Pharaoh. The Qur'an says: "Verily Fir'awn and Hamna were sinners."

3 Literally: I have spent the water of my face; see note under no. 49.

4 The inspissated juice of the ripe grape is much used by the natives (of Aleppo). It is named dibs, and has much the appearance of coarse honey, but is of a firmer consistence. It is brought to town in goat-skins and retailed in small quantities in the bazars, serving for the common people instead of honey. (Russell's Aleppo, Vol. 1. p. 82, quarto edition.)

Badri signifies belonging to al-Badriyah, a part of Baghdad so called, and in which al-Bari' resided; for which reason he obtained this surname.

191 AL-TUGHRAI

Abu Isma'il al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Samad, surnamed al-'Amid (or 'Amid al-Dawlah, pillar of the state'), Fakhr al-Kuttab (the glory of the Katibs),<sup>1</sup> Mu'ayyad al-Din (sustained in religion), and generally known by the name of al-Tughra'i, was a celebrated munshi<sup>2</sup> and a native of Isbadan. He possessed great talents, a subtle genius, and surpassed all his contemporaries in the art of composing in prose and verse, Al-Sam'ari speaks of him in the Kitab al-Ansab under the article, munshi, and after making his eulogium, he gives an extract from one of his poems descriptive of a wax-light, and states that he was put to death in the year 515 (A.D. 1121-2). Al-Tughra'i has left behind him a diwan (or collection) of good poetry, and one of his finest pieces is the qasidah entitled the Lamiyat al'Ajam,<sup>3</sup> which he composed at Baghdad in the year 505 (A.D. 1111-2). In this poem he describes his own situation and complains of the time in which he lived. It begins thus:

"My strength of mind has preserved me from frivolity, and I was adorned by my talents, though decked with no other ornament."

This qasidah, which consists of more than sixty verses,<sup>4</sup> contains every beauty of style<sup>5</sup> and is the very essence and excellence of poetry; it is too long to be given here, but it is generally known and in the hands of the public.*

One of his sentimental pieces is as follows:

"O my heart: what hast thou to do with love? It is long since indifference had settled in thee, and since the lover's ardour has been restrained. Dost thou not feel pleasure in repose, now that those with whom you passed round the cup of burning passion have

1 See note under no. 10.

2 Munshi, a person employed by government to draw up state papers.

3 This poem is well known to European readers, having been repeatedly published, but the edition given by the illustrious Pocock is decidedly the best.

4 Fifty-nine in the printed editions. [In the autograph; sixty couplets.]

5 In Arabic غريبة see note 2, under no. 190.

* In the printed texts (Cairo and Tehran eds) the entire qasidah has been reproduced—Ed.

recovered their reason? The zephyr fell into langour and revived again, but from the malady of which thou complainest, no deliverance can be hoped. I behold the wavering of the lightning flash, and the heart within my bosom wavers and beats.<sup>1</sup>

By the same:

"Eyes! treasure up your tears; it will surely come, the threatened moment of separation (from my beloved). If tomorrow unite (us) lovers, shame then be on the eyes which have not been fatigued with weeping."<sup>2</sup>

Abu T-Ma'ali mentions al-Taghra'i in his Zinat al-Dahr and cites some fragments of his poetry; he is also spoken of by (Abu T-Barakat Ibn al-Mustawfi), in his History of Arbela, who says that he acted for some time as vizir in that city; and the katib Tmad al-Din states, in his history of the Saljuqs, entitled Nusrat al-Fatrah wa 'Usrat al-Fitrah, that al-Tughra'i was styled al-Ustad (the master) and that he was vizir at Mosul to the Saljuq sultan Mas'ud Ibn Muhammad; "When this prince," he continues, "gave battle to his brother the sultan Mahmud near Hamadan, he was defeated, and among the first prisoners taken, was the ustad Abu Isma'il, Mas'ud's vizir. News of this circumstance was brought to Kamal al-Mulk Nizam al-Din Abu Talib 'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn Harb al-Sumayrami, the vizir to Mahmud, on which Shihab al-Din Asa'd (who was then deputy tughra-writer to al-Nusayr the kitab), made the remark that the man, meaning the ustad, was an atheist; and the vizir here observed that atheists should be put to death. Al-Tughra'i was thus slain unjustly; they dreaded his superior abilities, and put him to death on this pretext, without having any regard for his personal merit. This was in A.H. 513 (A.D. 1119-20)." But other accounts assign his death to the years 514 and 518. He was then aged upwards of sixty years, and in his poetry are found these two verses, composed on a new born son who had been brought to him, and which indicate that he had then attained his fifty-seventh years:

---

1 In the poems of the ancient Arabs, the lover frequently describes his joy in watching the lightning, which presages a fertilising shower to the plains where his mistress dwells. See the Diwan Imru' al Qays, p. 93, notes Al-Tushra'i here reproduces that idea, which was quite classical; and says that the lightning makes him think of his mistress, and that this recollection causes his heart to beat.

2 Because true lovers should be always weeping when separated.

* In autograph: Kamal Nizam al-Din Abu Talib 'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn Harb al-Sumayram.

"This little one has come in my old age; it rejoices my sight, but increases my pensiveness; a lapse of seven and fifty years would make impression even on a rock."

How long he lived after composing these verses, God knows best. The vizir al-Kamal al-Sumayrami was killed on Tuesday, the last day of the month of Safar, A.H. 516 (May, A.D. 1122), in the bazar (suq) of Baghdad near the Nizamiyah college; it is said that he fell by the hand of a black slave who had belonged to al-Tughra'i<sup>1</sup>, and who slew him to revenge his master's death. Tughra'i means a Tughra-writer; the Tughra is the flourish written with a broad-nibbed pen, at the beginning of (official) papers, over the Bismi'llah, and containing the titles of the prince from whom the document emanates. Tughra is a Persian word.

Sumayrami means belonging to Sumayram, a town between Isbahan and Shiraz, on the extreme limit of the Isbahan district.

192 IBN AL-KHAZIN THE KATIB

Abu T-Fawaris al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali al-Husayn, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Khazin the katib, was the first copyist of his time: he surpassed all others by the quantity of his transcriptions, having made five hundred copies of the Qur'an some of a compact form and some of a folio size. He composed also some good poetry, of which we may cite the following specimen:

"Fortune torments him who pursues her, but the man of prudence despises the world and enjoys repose. The prince who obtains her delusive favours must at last be contented with a shroud. He gathers wealth with pain, and with pain he leaves it after him. My only wish is to feel assured that I shall meet God. I detest the world, and why should I love it, since its gifts are lethargy (to the soul)? It has not endured for any man before me; why them this care and sadness?"

The historian Muhammad Ibn Abi T-Fadl ('Abd al-Malik) al-Hamadani says, in his supplement to the Tajarib al-Umam of (Ibn)

---

1 Ibn al-Athir, in his Annals, notices the death of al-Tudhra'i, and says that he composed some alchemical works which have been the ruin of many. One of these works, entitled Sirr al-Hikmah (the secret of philosophy), and containing a commentary on a treatise of Jabir Ibn Hayyar, entitled Al-Rahmah (mercy), is in the Bib, du Roi, fonds Asselin.

Miskawayh,<sup>1</sup> that Ibn al-Khazin died suddenly in the month of Dhu T-Hijjah, A.H. 502 (July, A.D. 1109), and the Sharif Abu Ma'mar al-Mubarak Ibn Ahmad al-Ansari states that his death took place on Monday night, and that he was buried the next day, Tuesday, the 26th of the above month.

193 ABU 'ABD ALLAH THE SHI'ITE

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Husayn Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Zakariya, surnamed al-Shi'i (the Shi'ite), was the assertor of the rights<sup>2</sup> of 'Ubayd Allah al-Mahdi, the ancestor of the (Fatimid) sovereigns of Egypt. His revolt in Maghrib is a celebrated event, and works have been specially composed on that subject. We shall give an account of some of his proceedings in the life of 'Ubayd Allah al-Mahdi.

Abu 'Abd Allah the Shi'ite, a native of San'a' in Yaman, was one of those crafty men who knew how to regulate their conduct so as to obtain their ends; for he entered Ifriqiyah alone, without money and without men, yet by his unremitting efforts, he succeeded in obtaining possession of that kingdom and expelling its sovereign 'Abu Mudar Ziyadat Allah, the last of the Aghlabid princes, who fled to the East and there died. The history of these events would be long to relate. When he had established the affairs of al-Mahdi on a solid foundation, and reduced the country under his authority and made it ready for his reception, al-Mahdi set out from the East, but being unable to join the Shi'i, he proceeded to Sijilmasah, where he was discovered and thrown into prison by the sovereign of that city, al-Yasa', the last of the Midrar, dynasty. Abu 'Abd Allah the Shi'ite' having marched thither, delivered him from confinement and placed the supreme authority in his hands. Abu T-'Abbas Ahmad, the Shi'i elder brother, then arrived and reproached him for what he had done: "How!" said he to the Shi'i, "you were master of the country, and

1 According to Hajji Khalifah Abu 'Ali Ahmad Ibn Miskawayh, the author of the Tajarib al-Umam, or experience of nations, died A.H. 421 (A.D. 1030). Abu T-Faraj gives a short account of him in the Historia Dynastiarum, p.216 of the translation.

2 The assertor of the rights; literally: The establisher of the mission. Mention has been already made of the missions established for political purposes. See note 9. under no. 10. A full account of Abu 'Abd Allah's proceedings will be found in Made Sacy's Expose de l'histoire des Druzes, t. I. p. 237.

In autograph Abu T-Mu'ammam-Ed.

uncontrolled arbiter of its affairs, yet you have delivered it over to another, and consent to remain in the rank of an inferior!" By a repetition of such discourses, he induced his brother to repent of his conduct, and to meditate treason, but al-Mahdi's apprehensions were awakened, and he suborned persons who murdered them both at the same time. This event happened in the middle of the latter Jumada, A.H. 296 (February, A.D. 911), at al-Raqqadah, between the two castles.<sup>1</sup>

Shi'i is the denomination given to the partisans of the Imam 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. Raqqadah was a town in the dependencies of Qayrawan in Ifriqiyah. As for Ziyadat Allah, mention is made of him in these terms by al-Hafiz Ibn 'Asakir, in his history of Damascus: "Abu Mudar Ziyadat Allah Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Aghlab Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Salim Ibn 'Iqal Ibn Khafajah: this is Ziyadat Allah the less", the last of the princes descended from al-Aghlab al-Tamimi. He came to Damascus in the year 302 (A.D. 914-5), on his way to Baghdad, after his defeat in Ifriqiyah and the loss of his kingdom." He then says at the end of the article:

"I have been informed that Ziyadat Allah died at Ramlah, in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 304 (November, A.D. 916); he was buried at Ramlah, and his grave having sunk in, it was covered over (with boards) and left so. He was descendant of al-Aghlab Ibn 'Amr al-Mazini al-Basri:<sup>2</sup> 'Amr had been appointed governor of Maghrib by al-Rashid, on the death of Idris Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Hasan Ibn al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. He continued in Maghrib till his death, and had for successor his son, al-Aghlab, who was succeeded by his descendants, till at last the authority devolved to this Ziyadat Allah."

His genealogy is again given in the life of 'Ali Ibn al-Qatta'; there is some slight difference between it and that mentioned here by Ibn 'Asakir and I have set them down just as I found them. Another historian says:

"Abu Mudar Ziyadat Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn al-

1 Between the two castles; perhaps the author means the place called al-Qasr al-Qadim (the old castle) and al-Raqqadah. Ibn Khaldun merely states that he was slain at al-Qasr (the castle). The Two castles are mentioned by at-Nuwayri, MS. No. 702, f. 28 v, but he does [not?] say where they lay.

* In original Arabic: زيادة الله الأصغر [Ziyadat Allah, the junior]-Ed.

2 This and what follows is quite erroneous; Ibn 'Asakir must have been very badly informed respecting the origin and history of the Aghlabites.

Aghlab died at Raqqah: his body was borne in a bier to Jerusalem and there interred in the year 296 (A.D. 908-9). A space of five years, nine months, and fifteen days elapsed from the time of his accession till he abandoned Qayrawan, when (his general) Ibrahim Ibn al-Aghlab was defeated by Abu Abd Allah al-Sh'i. On learning this event, he packed up his wealth, and taking with him the principal ladies of his harem, he left Raqqadah during the night. Ibrahim Ibn al-Aghlab was then proclaimed sovereign. The Aghlabid dynasty reigned two hundred and twelve years, five months, and fourteen days".

Such is the summary of these events which it would be too long to relate in full.<sup>1</sup>

194 ABU SALAMAH HAFS AL-KHALLAL

Abu Salamah Hafs Ibn Sulayman al-Khallal al-Hamdani was a client, by enfranchisement, to al-Sab' (a branch of the great tribe of Hamdan), and vizir to Abu T-'Abbas al-Saffah, the first of the 'Abbasid Khalifs. Abu Salamah was the first person under the 'Abbasids who received the name of vizir and was publicly addressed as such; for this appellation was not known before, either under the Umayyad dynasty or any other. Being versed in literature and skilled in politics and government, his conversation was both amusing and instructive, for which reason Al-Saffah took pleasure in his society. He possessed a large fortune, having followed the profession of money-changer at Kufah; and he spent great sums in support of (the cause of) the 'Abbasids. He went to Khiurasan for that object with Abu Muslim to second him, and he there called<sup>2</sup> the people to support the cause of Ibrahim, al-Saffah's brother. When Ibrahim was put to death at Harran by Marwan Ibn Muhammad the last of the Umayyads, the call was made in favour of al-Saffah, and Abu Salamah became suspected of a leaning towards the descendants of 'Ali. When al-Saffah on his accession to the Khalifat, nominated Abu Salamah as vizir, he still retained some doubts of his fidelity; and it is said that he sent to Abu Muslim in Khurasan, informing him of Abu Salamah's

1 In my translation of al-Nuwayri's history of Maghrib, will be found a fuller account of the Aghlabid dynasty.

2 The da'wat دعوة or call was an invitation to espouse the party of the person who pretended to be the true imam, and who, as such, claimed spiritual and civil authority over the Muslims. The call was made by those agents or missionaries du'at, of whom mention has been made in note 9, under no. 13.

evil intentions, and urging him to put him to death. But according to another account, it was Abu Muslim who discovered the vizir's perfidy, and informed al-Saffah, by letter, of the circumstance, advising him at the same time, not to let him live. This, however, the khalif refused to do, saying: "That man has spent his wealth in our service and has hitherto served us faithfully; wherefore we pardon him this slip." On perceiving al-Saffah's unwillingness to follow the counsel given him, Abu Muslim sent a band of men to lie in wait, during the night, for Abu Salamah, who used to pass the evening in conversation with the khalif. When the vizir was retiring home unaccompanied, the assassins set upon him and cut him down with their swords; this was at al-Anbar, the khalif's capital; the next morning the public said that he had been murdered by the Kharijites. This event happened four months after the accession of al-Saffah to the khalifat; he had been proclaimed khalif on the eve of Friday, 13th of the latter Rabi' A. H. 132 (November, A.D. 749). When al-Saffah was informed of his death, he pronounced this verse:

"To hell with him and those who resemble him; we should regret that, in any point, he escaped our vengeance."<sup>1</sup>

It is stated in the History of the Vizirs,<sup>2</sup> that Abu Salamah was murdered in the month of Rajab, A. H. 132 (February or March, A.D. 750). He was styled the vizir of the family of Muhammad. The following lines were composed on his death by Sulayman Ibn al-Muhajir al-Bajali:

"Crimes are sometimes rejoiced at, but joy were fitter for that which you disliked. The vizir has perished, the vizir of the family of Muhammad, and one who detests you now fills his place."<sup>3</sup>

Abu Salamah was not a khallal (vinegar-maker), but his house in Kufah was situated in the street of the vinegar-makers, and he used to sit with them as neighbours; it was for this reason that he received the surname of al-khallal.

1 This verse is not reconcilable with what is stated above of al-Saffah's indulgence towards Abu Salamah.

2 Hajji Khalifah mentions several works bearing this title.

3 This piece seems intended as a reproach to al-Saffah; the poet gives him to understand that he should not rejoice at the murder of Abu Salamah, and that it had been better for him to have allowed him to live, although he disliked him. A devoted friend to the family of Muhammad had perished, and was now replaced by a man who detests it; meaning Khalid Ibn Barmak, sprung from a race of fire-worshippers.

Hamdani means belonging to Hamdan, a great tribe in Yaman. We shall speak of Sabi' in the life of Abu Ishaq al-Sabi'i.

Philologists disagree respecting the derivation of the word wizarat (vizirate): some derive it from wizr, a burden, because the vizir relieves the prince from the burden of affairs; this is also the opinion of Ibn Qutaybah; but others say that it comes from wazar a mountain, to which people fly for refuge from danger. According to this, the vizir is one to whom the spiritual or temporal prince has recourse, and to whom he betakes himself for advice; this is the opinion of Abu Ishaq al-Zajjaj.

195 HAMMAD IBN ABI HANIFAH

Abu Isma'il Hammad, son of the Imam Abu Hanifah al-Na'man Ibn Thabit, followed the sect<sup>1</sup> established by his father, and was highly venerated for his holy life. His father, in dying, had in his possession a great quantity of precious objects in gold, silver, etc., which had been confided to his care, and the proprietors of which ware, some absent, and the others, orphans under age. All those objects were brought by Hammad to the qadi that he might receive them, but he refused to accept them, saying that they could not be in better hand than those in which they then were. On this, Hammad begged of him to weigh them and set down the weight in writing, so as to the disengage Abu Hanifah's responsibility, "and then," said he, "you may do as you please." The qadi consented, and passed some days in weighing these deposits; but when he had done, Hammad was not to be found, neither did he quit his place of concealment till they had been given in care to another person. His son Isma'il was qadi of Basrah till replaced by Yahya Ibn Aktham. I have read in the history of Abu Hanifah كتاب اخبار ابي حنيفة that when the qadi Yahya Ibn Aktham arrived at Basrah, Isma'il Ibn Hammad left the city and was accompanied by him to some distance, and the people implored blessings on Isma'il, saying: "You abstained from our wealth and from our blood;" to which Isma'il rejoined: "and from your sons;" making a sarcastic allusion to the suspicions which had been cast on Yahya's character. The following fact is related by Isma'il: "One of our neighbours, a heretic<sup>1</sup> miller, had two mules, which he called Abu Bakr and 'Umar; a certain night he received

* كان على مذهب ابيه رضي الله عنه rendering of madhhah than sect.--Ed.

: School would be a better

1 Literally: a Rafidi; a name given to all the Shi'i sects.

a kick from one of these animals and died, and my grandfather Abu Hanifah said, when he heard it: 'See into it, for I suspect that it was the mule he called 'Umar by which he was killed.'"<sup>1</sup> and this was found to be the case."

Hammad died in the month of Dhu 'I-Qa'dah, A.H. 176 (February or March, A.D. 793). We shall give the life of his father.

196 HAMMAD AL-RAWYAH

Abu 'I-Qasim Hammad Ibn Abi Layla Sabur (or Maysarah) Ibn al-Mubarak Ibn 'Ubayd al-Daylami al-Kufi (descended from a native of Daylam and born at Kufah) was client, by enfranchisement, to the tribe of Bakr Ibn Wa'il, and is generally known by the surname of al-Rawiyah (the narrator). Ibn Qutaybah mentions in his Kitab al-Ma'arif and Tabaqat al-Shu'ara' that Hammad was client to Muknif, son of Zayd al-Khayl, of the tribe of Ta'i, the Companion of the Prophet. Hammad was one of the best-informed of men respecting the days, or adventures of the desert Arabs, their history, poetry, genealogy, and idioms; and according to Abu Ja'far Ibn (Muhammad) al-Nahhas, it was he who united in one collection the seven long poems (or Mu'allaqahs). The princes of the Umayyad family treated him with marked preference and honour; they invited him to visit them, and when he waited on them, they gave him tokens of their favour, and questioned him respecting the adventures and sciences of the desert Arabs. Being one day present at a public audience given by the Khalif al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, he was asked by that prince in what way he merited the surname of al-Rawiyah, and he returned this answer: "Because I can recite the poems of every poet whom you, O Commander of the faithful! have ever known or heard of; and I can rehearse moreover the compositions of many poets whom you will acknowledge that you did not know, neither did you hear of; and no one can quote to me passages of ancient and modern poetry without my being able to tell the ancient from the modern. Al-Walid then asked him how much poetry he knew by heart, and Hammad replied: "A great deal (more than I can tell); but I can recite to you, for each letter of the alphabet, one hundred long opens rhyming in that letter, without taking into count the short pieces; and all that letter, without taking into count the short pieces; and all that composed exclusively by poets who lived before the promulgation

1 The severity of the Khalif 'Umar against infidels is well known.

* In autograph: "who lived in the days of jahiliyah besides the poets of Islam" (من شعراء الجاهليت دون شعراء الاسلام) of Islamism." On this al-Walid told him that he intended to make a trial of his talent, and he ordered him therefore to begin his recitations. Hammad commenced, and continued till the khalif, having grown fatigued, withdrew, after leaving a person in his place to verify the truth of the assertion and hear him to the last. In that sitting, he recited two thousand nine hundred qasidahs by poets who flourished before Muhammad, and al-Walid, on being informed of the fact, ordered him a present of one hundred thousand dirhams. The following anecdote is related in the Durrat al-Ghawwas by Abu Muhammad al-Hariri, the author of the Kitab al-Maqamat:

"Hammad al-Rawiyah said<sup>1</sup>: I attached myself exclusively to Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik whilst he was khalif and his brother Hisham used to treat me harshly for that reason. On the accession of Hisham, I apprehended his resentment, and remained in my house during a year without stirring out, unless privately to visit a trusty friend. Not hearing any one mention my name during that year, I took confidence and went out one day to say me [Jum'ah] prayers in the mosque at Rusafah,<sup>2</sup> when I was suddenly accosted by two soldiers of the police guards, who said: 'Hammad! answer the summons of the Amir Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi.' (Yusuf was then governor of Iraq). And I said to myself: This is the very thing I dreaded. I then asked them permission to go home to my family and bid them an everlasting adieu, after which I should accompany them, but to this they refused positively to accede; and I delivered myself up into their hands. I was then brought before Yusuf Ibn 'Umar in his audience hall, named al-Ahmar (the red), and having made him my salutation he returned it and handed me a letter, containing these words: In the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement: Hisham, the servant of God and the Commander of the faithful, to Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi. When you have read this, send a person to bring you Hammad without putting him in fear, and give him five hundred dinars with a Mahrah<sup>3</sup> camel, so that he may arrive at Damascus in twelve days. I took the money, and looking out, I saw a camel ready saddled, on which I mounted and set off. Twelve nights afterwards I arrived at Damascus, and alighted at the door of Hisham's palace, where I asked admittance. I was let in, and I found him in a large hall paved with marble, each flag of which was separated from the

---

1 This anecdote is given in the extract from the Durrat published by M. de Sacy in his Anthologic Grammaticale. See page 107.

2 See De Sacy's Anthologie, page 147.

3 Mahra was a province in south Arabia, celebrated for its breed of camels.

other by a band of gold: Hisham was seated on a red carpet, dressed in red silk and perfumed with musk and amber. I saluted him, and he returned my salutation, and told me to draw near, on which I went up and kissed his foot. I then remarked two slave-girls, the like of whom I had never before seen; each of them wore double ear-rings, and in each ear-ring were two effulgent pearls. 'How art thou, Hammad?' said he, and how is thy health? 'Well, Commander of the faithful', I replied. 'Dost thou know,' said he 'why I sent for thee?' 'No', said I. 'I sent for thee', said he, 'on account of a verse which came to my mind, and the author of which I do not know.' I asked to hear it, and he recited to me this line:

'One day, they called for their morning draught, and a mind came, bearing a ewer.'

'That verse,' said I, 'belongs to a qasidah by 'Adi Ibn Zayd al-Tbadi'.<sup>1</sup> He then ordered me to recite it, and I began:

'From the very dawn of morning, the friends, who blame my conduct, say: Wilt thou never return to reason? They blame me for the love I bear you, O daughter of 'Abd Allah! you who hold my heart enchained! They censure me so often on your account, that I doubt whether those who reproach me be enemies or friends.'

I continued then till I came to these verses:

'One day, they called for their morning draught, and a maid came, bearing an ewer. She held it out to be filled with wine bright as the eye of a cock, and clarified by the filter; rough till mixed with water, but, when mixed, delicious to the taste of the drinker. On its surface floated bubbles, like rubies which, as it was poured out, received fresh lustre. With it was then mixed the water of the clouds, no stagnant, foul, nor troubled water' Here Hisham was in an ecstasy of delight and said, 'Bravo!'

Some other circumstances are now mentioned in the narration; for instance, that the khalif told the slave-girl to pour out a drink (of wine) for Hammad, which she did: this however, is not true, for Hisham never drank wine; it is therefore unnecessary to repeat them.<sup>2</sup> The prince then told me," continued Hammad, "to ask for what I liked. 'May I ask for it,' said I, 'be it what it may?' 'Yes,' he replied. I then asked for one of the slave-girls, and he gave them both to me, with what they wore, and all that belonged to them" Hisham then lodged Hammad in his palace, and the next morning he sent him to a dwelling which had been prepared for him, and in which he found the two slave-girls with all they possessed, and ever thing which he required. He then prolonged his stay, and received one hundred thousand dirhams from the khalif.

1 The life of 'Adi Ibn Zayd, translated from the Arabic of the Kitab al-Ashani, will be found in the journal Asiatique.

2 The anecdote will be found entire in the Anthologic Grammaticale.

Such is the story as related by al-Hariri; but the fact could not have happened with Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Jhaqafi, for it was not he, but Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qasri (see his life, no. 204), who governed 'Iraq at the time; this results from the dates of Khalid's appointment and removal, and the nomination of Yusuf. Hammad's adventures and the anecdotes related of him are very numerous. He was born A.H. 95 (A.D. 713-4), and his death took place in the year 155 (A.D. 772): Some say, however, that he died during the khalifat of al-Mahdi, who was inaugurated on Sunday, 6th Dhu 'l-Hijrah, A.H. 158 (October, A.D. 775), and who died on the eve of Thursday, the 23rd Muharram, A.H. 169 (August, A.D. 785), at a village called al-Radhah in the dependencies of Masa badhan;<sup>1</sup> a fact to which Marwan Ibn Abi al-Hafsa<sup>2</sup> alludes in the following verses:

"The noblest tomb after that of Muhammad, the prophet of the true direction, is a tomb at Masabadhan. I wonder how the hand which filled it with earth did not lose its fingers!"

The death of Hammad was lamented in the following verses by the poet surnamed Abu Yahya Muhammad Ibn Kunasah,<sup>3</sup> but whose real name was 'Abd al-A'la Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Khalifah Ibn Nadiah Ibn Unayf Ibn Mazin Ibn Dhuwaybah Ibn Usamah Ibn Nasr Ibn Qu'ayn:

1 Masabadhan or Sirwan, a town in Persian 'Iraq. (Abu 'l-Fida').

2 M de Sacy has given a short account of this poet in the Chrestomathic, tom. III, p. 318.

3 The poet surnamed Ibn Kunasah and respecting who real names great uncertainty prevails, was a member of the Arabic tribe of As'ad, and born at Kufah, A.H. 123 (A.D. 740-1). From that place he removed to Baghdad, where he settled. He had studied under the most eminent philologists of the school of Kufah, and learned by heart the poems and pieces of eloquence composed by the tribe of As'ad. He was a sister's son to the celebrated ascetic, Ibrahim Ibn Adham ادهم. Died at Kufah, the 3rd Shawwal, A.H. 207 (February, A.D. 823). The Fihrist gives the titles of three of his works; one treats of the influence of the stars on the weather, Kitab al-Anwa; another on the ideas usually reproduced in poetry; and the third on the poet al-Kumay's plagiarisms from the Qur'an and other sources. (Fihrist, fol. 98).

"Could precaution suffice against death, precaution had saved thee from what befel thee. May God have mercy on thee, trusty friend! the sincerity of whose affection was never sullied. It is thus that time works ruin; by it knowledge is destroyed and the memorials of history are effaced."

Hammad possessed but a slight acquaintance with the true genius of the Arabic language, and it is said, that having learned the Qur'an by heart from a written copy, he mistook the pronunciation of upwards of thirty words (harf).<sup>1</sup>

197 HAMMAD 'AJRAD THE POET

Abu 'Amr (or Abu Yahya) Hammad Ibn 'Amr Ibn Yunus Ibn Kulayb was a native of Kufah, or of Wasit by some accounts, and a client by enfranchisement to the family of Suwat بنی سواة a descendant of 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah.<sup>2</sup> This Hammad, who is better known by this surname of 'Ajrad, was a celebrate poet and one of those, called Mukhadrams who flourished under the Umayyad and the 'Abbasid dynasties. He did not, however, attain his reputation till after the accession of the 'Abbasids; before that, he had been a boon companion to the Umayyad prince al-Walid Ibn Yazid. (نادم الوليد) and it was only in the reign of al-Mahdi that he went to Baghdad. 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd<sup>3</sup> relates as follows: "In the reign of al-Mahdi, the following persons came to Baghdad: Hammad 'Ajrad, Muti' Ibn Ilyas al-Kinani<sup>4</sup>, and Yahya Ibn Ziyad. They stopped in our neighbourhood and were in tolerabel for their wickedness and profligacy." Hammad 'Ajrad was a poet of a superior order; he and Bashshar Ibn Burd composed satires of flagitious nature, one against the other; the pieces which he made on Bashshar abound in originality of thought, but their indecency will not allow me to insert any of them. Bashshar was so much annoyed by Hammad, that he composed on him these lines:

"On going to his tribe, you will find his door locked<sup>5</sup>, and it is

1 See note 13, under no. 144.

2 See Eichhorn's Monumenta Hist. Ar. Tab. VII.

3 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd, a hafiz, a traditionist, a mawla to the family of Hashim and a native of Baghdad, died A.H. 230 (A. D. 844-5), aged ninety six years. During the last sixty years of his life, he fasted every second day. (Al-Yafi'i; Al-Dhahabi, Tabaqat al-Huffaz.)

4 See note 4, under no. 185.

5 He locked his door to avoid giving hospitality to the strangers who might arrive.

only by lying concealed that you can meet him. Ask Abu Yahya how he can obtain glory, he who has taken an oath against every generous deed."

The following verses also were made on him by Bashshar.

"An excellent man that Hammad, did he but adore his Lord and say his prayers. His face is pale<sup>1</sup> from drinking wine, but on the day of judgement, that whiteness shall become black."<sup>2</sup>

He was an arrow-maker by trade; some say, however, that he followed no profession, and that it was his father who made arrows. Gay and witty in his humour, licentious in his conduct, he was suspected to be a zindiq<sup>3</sup> in religion. It is related that an intimacy subsisted between him and an eminent imam whose name it is not right to mention, and that they afterwards quarrelled; he then learned that the imam spoke of him contemptuously, on which he wrote him these lines:

"If you cannot complete your devotions without reviling me, go toil with restless animosity before friends and strangers. Yet for a long time you gave me a good character, although I persisted in disobedience to God's law; it was in those days when we passed something about in leaden ewers.<sup>4</sup>

By the same:

"You swore, (my friendly monitor,) that if I again became love's prisoner, you would blame me no more, but strive to excuse me. But what annoys me in you is this: you give counsel without being aware that you know not (the person whom I love)."

The poetry and the adventures of Hammad 'Ajrād are well known. He died A.H. 161 (A.D. 777-8). (Accounts vary as to the manner and time of his death). Some say that he was a native of Wasit, and that he was put to death, as a zindiq, outside the gate of Kufah, by Muhammad Ibn Sulayman Ibn 'Ali, the governor عامل of 1 Literally: white [ ابيض ]—Ed.

2 That is: he will be punished as an infidel, See al-Qur'an, surah 3, verse 102.

3 Zindiq, synonymous with atheist.

4 That something was wine, and they drank it out of leaden ewers lest it should be seen.

[In Tehran ed. (p. 182) it is added on the authority of Ibn Qutaybah that the imam referred to was Abu Hanifah. It would however be absurd to think that he drank wine, and had intimacy with a confirmed zindiq.]—Ed.

Basrah, in the year 155 (A.D. 772). Others state that as he was going from al-Ahwaz to Basrah, he died on the way, and was buried on a hill near the spot. By another account, his death is placed in the year 168 (A.D. 784-5). When Bashshar Ibn Burd, whose life has been already given (no. 110), was put to death* in the Batihah, his body was removed and interred in the tomb of Hammad 'Ajrād, and the following lines were inscribed on the grave-stone by Abu Hishām al-Bahili, who happened to pass that way:

"The blind followed the naked ('ajrad), and they therefore sojourn in the same abode. They are both in the hands of Malik<sup>1</sup> and in hell; infidels go to hell. The regions of the earth said: How unwelcome to us is the neighbourhood of Hammad and Bashshar!"

He received the surname of 'Ajrād from the following circumstances: When a boy, he was playing on a very cold day, quite naked, with some other children, and an Arab of the desert, who was passing by, said: "My boy! you are "ajrad." This word means naked.

Mukhadram, or mukhadrim, is a term generally employed to designate a poet who, like Labid, al-Nabighah al-Ja'di, and others, lived before and after the promulgation of Islamism. It is sometimes made use of in a more general sense, and applied to poets who flourished under two different dynasties. (Arabs of the desert) have been heard to pronounce this word muhadram and muhadrim (and their example is a good authority).

198 ABU SULAYMAN AL-KHATTABI

Abu Sulayman Hamd Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn al-Khattabi al-Busti was a jurisconsult, a philologist, and a traditionist. He is the author of some clever works التصانيف البديعة such as the Gharib al-Hadith (explanation of the difficult expressions found in the Traditions Muhammad); Ma'alim al-Sunan (the distinctive marks of the Traditions), being a commentary on the Sunan, or body of Traditions compiled by Abu Da'wud; the A'lam al-Sunan (signs of the Traditions), containing an explanation of al-Bukhari's collection of Traditions; the Kitab al-Shahah<sup>2</sup>: a treatise on the object of prayer كتاب شان الدعاء

* In autograph and printed texts: 'When al-Mahdi had Bashshar killed.

1 Malik is the name of the angel who guards hell.

2 This word is pointed differently in each manuscript, and the work itself is not noticed by Hajji Khalifah. I suspect that not being able to read the title, he omitted it. In the autograph MS. it is written in autograph]—Ed.

الشجاع الشجاع

a work in which he corrects the mistakes of Traditionists كتاب اصلاح غلط المحدثين etc. When in 'Iraq, he learned the Traditions from Abu 'Ali al-Saffar, Abu Ja'far al-Razzaz, and others, and his own authority was cited for Traditions by al-Hakim Ibn al-Bayy', 'Abd al-Ghaffar Ibn Muhammad al-farisi, Abu 'I-Qasim 'Abd Al-Wahhab Ibn Abi Sahl al-Khattabi, etc. (Al-Tha'libi) mentions him in the Yatimah, and gives the following verses of his composition:

"It is not the pains of absence, but the want of a sympathizing friend, which is the greatest affliction man can suffer. I am as a stranger to Bust and its people, yet Bust is my birthplace and the residence of my family."

He gives also as his, the fragments which follow:

"Man may find a refuge from the most ferocious beasts, but there is no refuge from the wickedness of men. How many have escaped the lion, and yet you will not see one man uninjured by another."

"Be indulgent, and exact not the whole amount of that which is your due. Spare the unfortunate; for the generous man never requires full payment. Avoid excess in every thing and keep a medium; efforts well directed, are fortunate in their commencement and their end."

Other verses of his are quoted by the same author.

Abu Sulayman al-Khattabi was the Ibn Sallam<sup>1</sup> of his time for learning, philology, rigid devotion, and fear of God; he resembled him also as a professor and an author. He died at the town of Bust, in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 388 (March, A.D. 998).

Khattabi is derived from the name of his ancestor al-Khattab; but some say that he was descended from Zayd Ibn al-Khattab<sup>2</sup> for which reason it was that he bore this surname. Busti means belonging to Busi, a well-watered and wooded city in Kabul مدينة من بلاد كابل between Herat and Ghaznah. Some persons have been heard pronounce Abu Sulayman's name of Hamd as if it were Ahmad, but in this they are wrong. Al-Hakim Ibn T-Bayy' says: "I asked a native of Bust, the doctor Abu 'I-Qasim al-Maza'far Ibn Tahir Ibn Muhammad whether Abu Sulaman's name was Ahmad or Hamd, some persons having said it was Ahmad; to which he replied that he heard Abu Sulayman

* In autograph: الحاكم لبو عبدالله ابن البيه نيسابوري

1 The life of Abu 'Ubayd al-Qasim Ibn Sallam is given in this work.

2 See note 1. under no. 112.

himself say: 'Hamd is the name by which I was called, but as people wrote it Ahmad, I gave it up. 'Abu T-Qasim said also; 'He recited to me these verses of his own composition:

"Whilst you live, flatter all men, for you are in the abode of deceit. He who knows my dwelling, and he who knows it not, will soon be seen with repentance for their companion."<sup>1</sup>

199 HAMZAH IBN HABIB AL-ZAYYAT

Abu 'Umar al-Hamzah Ibn Habib Ibn 'Umarah Ibn Isma'il a native of Kufah, and a client, by enfranchisement, to the tribe of Tkramah Ibn Rab'i al-Taymi, is more generally known by the surname of al-Zayyat. He was one of the seven readers of the Qur'an and had Abu T-Hasan al-Kisai for a pupil; he himself had been taught to read the Qur'an by al-A'mash. The appellation of al-Zayyat (the oil-man) was given to him because he used to transport oil from Kufah to Hulwan, and bring back cheese and walnuts. He died at Hulwan A.H. 156 (A.D. 772-3), aged seventy-six years.

Hulwan is a city at the farther extremity of Babylonian Iraq, on the borders of Persian Iraq (Bilad al-Jabal, in autograph).

200 HUNAYN IBN ISHAQ AL-TBADI

Abu Zayd Hunayn Ibn Ishaq al-Tbadi, the celebrated physician, was the most eminent man of his time in the art of medicine. He possessed a perfect acquaintance with the language of the Yunanis (Greeks), and it was by him that the work of Euclid was translated into Arabic. Thabit Ibn Qurrah,* who came after him, cleared up the difficulties of this work and put it into better order و نقحه هذب. This was also the case with the Almagest البسطى # and the greater part of those books, composed in Greek by physicians and philosophers, which have been rendered into Arabic. Hunayn was the most laborious of all those who were engaged in this business of translating; some works (it is true) were executed by others. Were it not for this, persons unacquainted with Greek could have derived no benefit from such works, and it is certain that those which remain

1 The sole merit of the original lines consists in alliteration.

* In autograph: notice has been given earlier. See no. 125.

Ptolemy's well-known work on astronomy.

untranslated are useless except to him who understands that language. Al-Ma'mun was particularly anxious to have books of this kind turned into Arabic, written out and corrected; before him, Ia'far and other members of the Barmak family had encouraged the undertaking, but the efforts of al-Ma'mun were much more successful than theirs. Hunayn himself composed a great number of useful treatises on medical subjects. The life of his son Ishaq has been already given (no. 85). I have read in the History of the physicians اخبار الاطباء that Hunayn went to the bath every day after his ride, and had water poured on himself; he would then come out, wrapped up in a bed-gown, and after taking a cup of wine with a biscuit, lie down, and sometimes fall asleep, till such time as perspiration should cease; he would then get up, burn perfumes to fumigate his person, and have dinner brought in; this consisted in a large fattened pullet stewed in its gravy and cake of bread two hundred drachms in weight: after supping the gravy and eating the fowl and the bread, he took a sleep, and on awaking he drank four pints (rattl)* of old wine; if he felt a desire for fruit freshly gathered, he took Syrian apples and quinces. This was his habit till the end of his life. He died on Tuesday, 7th Safar, A.H. 260 (December, A.D. 873).

In the life of his son, the meaning of the word 'Ibadi has been already given.

The Yunanites were physicians who lived before the time of Islamism; they were sons of Yunan,<sup>1</sup> the son of Yafith (Jephet), the son of Nuh (Noah).

201 IBN HAYYAN

Abu Marwan Hayyan, a native of Cordova, was the son of Khalaf Ibn Husayn Ibn Hayyan Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hayyan Ibn Wahb Ibn Hayyan; this last was a slave enfranchised by the emir (and Spanish Umayyaid prince), 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan. This Ibn Hayyan is the author of the work entitled Kitab al-Muqtabis fi Ta'rikh al-Andalus (the book of him who desires information respecting the history of Spain), and forming ten volumes: he composed also, on the same subject, the Kitab al-Mubin (the discloser)<sup>1</sup> in sixty volumes. Abu 'Ali al-Ghassani speaks of him in these terms:

* If we read it as ritle it might mean four coups of wine, which is more probable—Ed.

1 Yonan is most probably an altered form of Ionla.

"He was a man advanced in age, profound in knowledge, eminent by his information in polite literature wherein he was deeply versed, the standard-bearer of history in Spain, the most elegant writer, and the ablest composer on that subject. He was an assiduous disciple of the shaykh Abu 'Amri Ibn Abi T-Hubab,<sup>2</sup> the grammarian and pupil of Abu Ali T-Qali, and Abu T-'Ala Sa'id [Ibn al-Hasan al-Rab'i] al-Baghdadi, whose work, the Fusus, he got by heart under this tuition. He learned also the Traditions, and I heard from him this one: 'To felicitate, three (days) after the occurrence of a fortunate event, is to make light of friendship; and to offer consolation, three (days) after a misfortune, is to encourage ill luck, to come'. He died on Sunday, 27th of the first Rabi' A.H. 469 (October, A.D. 2076), and was buried, on the same day after evening عصر prayers,<sup>3</sup> in the cemetery of al-Rabad (the suburb). He was born in 377 (A.D. 987-8)."

Al-Ghassani calls him a faithful historian, and Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Awn<sup>4</sup> mentions him in these terms: "Ibn Hayyan spoke with elegance and wrote with precision; he never intentionally admitted a false statement or narration into his history. After his death, I had a dream in which I saw him come towards me; and I rose up and made him my salutation, which he returned

1 For the title of this work, I followed the orthography of my manuscripts and of Hajji Khalifah's Bibliographical Dictionary, but the autograph manuscript writes it الستين al-Matin,

2 Abu 'Umar Ahmad Ibn 'Abd al-Aziz Ibn Faraj Ibn 'Abi T-Habib the grammarian and native of Cordova, was the favourite pupil of Abu 'Ali al-Qali. His information in the sciences of philology, grammar, history and the Traditions placed him in the first rank among the most eminent of shaykhs, and he merited general esteem by his piety and virtue. He died at Cordova on the eve of Friday the 30th of Muharram, A.H. 400 (September, A.D. 1009), aged nearly ninety years. He was buried the next day in the Rusafah cemetery, and the funeral service was said over him by the Qadi Ahmad Ibn Zikwan. He drew his origin from the Berber tribe of Masmuda. (Ibn Bushkuwal's Silat.)

* As in autograph—Ed.

3 Literally: After the 'asr' See note 11, under no. 141.

4 Abu 'abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Awn al-Ma'afiri, born at Cordova, A.H. 440 (A.D. 1048-9), was celebrated as a Traditionist and a jurisconsult; pious and humble, he avoided society and passed most of his time in prayer at the great mosque of Cordova; and ardently devoted to the study of the different branches of science, he spared no pains in augmenting his library and searching for rare books. He died A.H. 512 (A.D. 1119) (Ibn Bushkuwal's Silat.) in smiling. I then said to him: 'What has thy lord done to thee'<sup>1</sup> To which he answered: 'He has had mercy on me.' 'And the history,' said I, 'which you wrote: did you repent of it?' 'It is true,' he replied, 'I repented of it, but the Almighty received my excuses with kindness, and pardoned me.'

Mention is made of Ibn Hayyan by Abu 'Abd Allah al-Humaydi in his Jidhwat al-Muqtabis, and Ibn Bashkuwal in his al-Sila].

ح

202 KHARIJAH THE JURISCONSULT

Abu Zayd Kharijah Ibn Zayd Ibn Thabit al-Ansari was one of the seven jurisconsults of Madinah; in the life of another of them, Abu Bakr Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman, we have given two verses which contain the names of all these doctors (see no. 114). Kharijah was a tabi'i,<sup>3</sup> of high eminence; he was a child in the latter days of the khalif Uthman, and his father Zayd Ibn Thabit<sup>4</sup> was one of the greatest among the Companions of Muhammad. The Prophet said, in speaking of Zayd: The most skilful among you in calculating the shares of property to which heirs are entitled is Zayd (afradukum Zaydu), Kharijah died at Madinah, A.H. 99 (A.D. 717-8), or 100. It is mentioned by Muhammad Ibn Sa'd (Katib) al-Waqidi, in his Tabaqat, that Kharijah said: "I had a dream and methought I built up a flight of stairs containing seventy steps, and when I had finished, it fell down, and I am now in my seventieth year:" and that very year he did. al-Zuhri has given Traditions on his authority.<sup>5</sup>

1 The usual question in such cases.

2 His history was merely a wordly book, and such compositions might not be acceptable in the eyes of God.

3 See note 2, under no. 3.

4 See note 2, under no. 148.

5 The Tabaqat al-Fuqaha gives a short notice on Kharijah containing some facts not mentioned by Ibn Khallikan, for which reason it may find a place here: 'Abu Zayd Kharijah Ibn Zayd Ibn Thabit, one of the seven jurisconsults of Madinah, was an imam whose authority and eminence were universally admitted. He died at Madinah, A.H. 100, aged seventy years. As a mufti he gave opinions on points of law; he drew up also bonds and conveyances and was consulted on questions relative to the division of inherited property, such as houses, date-trees, and money اموال. This last word may perhaps here signify flocks.

203 KHALID IBN YAZID THE Umayyad

Abu Hashim Khalid Ibn Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan al-Umawi (member of the Umayyad family), was the most learned of the tribe of Quraysh in all the different branches of knowledge. He wrote a discourse on chemistry and on medicine, in which sciences he possessed great skill and solid information, and (on which) he composed some epistles رسائل which show his profound instruction and superior talent. He learned the art (of chemistry) from a Greek monk (al-Rahib al-Rumi), whose name was Maryanus, and he treated of it in three epistles, one of which contains the relation of what passed between Maryanus and himself, the manner in which he learned the science, and the enigmatical allusions employed by his master. On this art he composed numerous pieces of verse, both long and short, which testify his abilities (as a poet) and his capacity (as a chemist); besides which he wrote some good poetry on other subjects, as, for instance, the following:

"The bracelets which ornament the ankles of other females, play loosely around the leg; but I see that the bracelets of Ramlah move not, neither doth her heart. I love the family of al 'Awwam for the love I bear her, an for her sake, I love her maternal uncles of the tribe of Kalb."

The poem from which these verses are taken is of considerable length; there is an anecdote told about Ramlah and 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, which is so well known that I abstain from relating it.<sup>1</sup>

---

1 Ramla etait fille de Zobayr Ibn Elawwam Ibn Khouwaylid et d'Oumm Errebad, femme Kelbite; elle etait soeur-germaine de Mossab Ibn Zobayr. Ramla fue d'abord epousee par un Coraychite nomme Othman fils d'Abdallah dont elle eut un fils nomme Abdullah Ibn Othman qui devint l'epoux de Soucayna fille de Hossayn fils d'Ali. Apres la defaite et la mort d'Abdallah Ibn Zonayr, qui disputait le califat a Abdelmalik fils de Merwan, Khalid fils de Yazid ayant etc. en pelerinage a la Mekke, dont Hadjadj etait gouverneur, y epousa Ramla alors venue. Soucayna se montrait fort indocile a son mari Abdullah fils de Ramla. Un jour Ramla se present a au calife Abdelmelik, se plaignit vivement de l' humeur de Soucayna et dermadna au calife qu'il employat son autorite pour la rendre plus soumise a son mari. Abdelmalik refuse et dit: "Que veux-tuy fair? "C'est Soucayns "fille de Housayn. Que ce soit Soucayns, repliqua Raml, je la vauz been. My famille (la maison de Khouwaylid) a donne le jour a la plus noble fille (Fatima), un meri (Elawwam) a la plus illustre femme (Safiyya fille d'Abdelmottatib), une femme (Khadidja) al'homme le plus eminent (Mahomet), que la famille de Soucayna (la maison de Haehim) puisse se giorifier d'avoir produits." Abdelmelik, surpris de sa

Khalid had a brother called 'Abd Allah, who came to him one day and complained that he had been treated with contempt and insult by al-Walid, son of 'Abd al-Malik. Khalid went immediately to 'Abd al-Malik. [and Walid was there] and said: "Commander of the faithful! al-Walid, the Commander of the faithful's son, has treated his cousin 'Abd Allah with contempt and spoken disdainfully of him." 'Abd al-Malik reflected a moment, and then held up his head and said: "Verily kings, when they enter a city (by force), waste the same and a base the most powerful of the inhabitants thereof, and so will these do."<sup>1</sup> To this Khalid replied: "And when we resolved to destroy a city, we commanded the inhabitants thereof, who lived in affluence, (to obey our Apostle); but they acted corruptly therein: wherefore the sentence was justly pronounced against that (city); and we destroyed it with an utter destruction"<sup>2</sup> "Is it of 'Abd Allah that you are speaking?" said 'Abd al-Malik; "by Allah! he came into my presence just now, and he did not open his mouth to utter a single fault of language." "Is it of al-Walid that you are speaking?"<sup>3</sup> retorted Khalid. "If al-Walid speak badly," replied the Khalif, "his brother Sulayman does not." "And if 'Abd Allah speak badly," answered the other, "his brother Khalid does not." Here al-Walid said: "Be silent, Khalid! for, by Allah! you are not counted as one of the caravan or one of the troop."<sup>4</sup> "Hearken, O Commander of the faithful!" said Khalid; and turning then towards al-Walid, he addressed him thus: "Fie upon thee! and who more than I is of the caravan and the troop? My grandfather Abu Sufyan commanded the caravan,<sup>5</sup> and my grandfather 'Utbah Ibn Rabi'ah commanded the troop. Hadst thou spoken of little sheep and little mountains, and Ta'f, and said: 'God have mercy on Uthman!'<sup>6</sup> we had acknowledged that thou wast in the right."

---

fierte, lui dit: 'Ramla, je vois qu' Orwa fils de Zobayr m'a trompe a ton egard (en m' engageant a per-mettre ton mariage avec Khalid). Il t'a donne au contraire un avis until, reprit Ramla; car tu as tue mon frere germain Moss b, et Orwa pensait avec raison que (sans le lien que mu'unit maintenant a ta famille) je saurais me venger de toi." (Aghani IV, f. 35 vo et 36.) Note communicated by M. Gaussin de Perceval.

* As in autograph—Ed.

1 Al-Qur'an surah 27, verse 34.

2 Ibid., surah 17, verse 17.

3 Alluding to al-Walid's well-known importance of pure Arabic, See Abu 'Fid's Annals, A.H. 96.

4 A proverbial expression, signifying, That is none of your business, you are not considered as one of us or of our family.

5 At Badr in A, H. 2.

6 This will be explained further on.

This requires some explanation: the caravan was that of the Quraysh, which Abu Sufyan was conducting from Syria when the blessed Prophet marched out with his Companions to seize on it; the news of this reached the inhabitants of Makkah, and they went forth to defend the caravan, having at their head 'Utbah Ibn Rabiah. On reaching the Muslims, the combat of Badr ensued. Abu Sufyan and 'Utbah were both ancestors to Khalid; Abu Sufyan by the father's side, and 'Utbah by the mother's for Hind, 'Utbah's daughter, was the mother of Mu'awiyah, Khalid's grandfather. The words little sheep and little mountains, etc. are an allusion to al-Hakam Ibn Abi-'I-'As, the grandfather of 'Abd al-Malik, who had been banished to Ta'if by the blessed Prophet; he there kept a flock of sheep and took refuge in a little mountain called al-Karmah, where he remained, till 'Uthman, on his accession to the khalifat, recalled him; for al-Hakam was 'Uthman's uncle. It is said that the blessed Prophet [had] authorised 'Uthman to do so as soon as he came to power. Numerous anecdotes are related of Khalid, but what is here given may suffice. He died A.H. 85 (A.D. 704).

204 KHALID IBN 'ABD ALLAH (AL-BAJALI) AL-QASRI

Khalid al-Qasri, surnamed Abu Yazid and Abu T-Haytham also, was son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Yazid Ibn Asad Ibn Kurz, a descendant of the tribe of Bajilah through that of Qasr. Ibn al-Kalbi mentions him in the Jamharat al-Nisab, (and traces up his genealogy) thus: Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Yazid Ibn Asad Ibn Kurz Ibn 'Amir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn Ghamghamah Ibn Jarir Ibn Shiqq Ibn Sa'b Ibn Yashkur Ibn Ruhum Ibn Afrak Ibn Afsa Ibn Nudhayr Ibn Qasr Malik Ibn 'Abqar Ibn Anmar Ibn Arash Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ghawth Ibn Nabt Ibn Malik Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlān Ibn Saba Ibn Yashjub<sup>1</sup> Ibn Ya'rub Ibn Qahtan.

Khalid was appointed governor أمير of Arabian and Persian Iraq [the two Iraqs in autograph] by Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik the Umayyad; [before that, in the year 89 (A.D. 707-8), he was governor of Makkah]. His mother was a Christian, and his grandfather Yazid was one of the Companions of Muhammad. Khalid was counted among the most elegant and correct pulpitorators of the Arabian nation: he

1 Arabian genealogists are not agreed respecting the pronounce action of this name; some say it is Yashjub.

* In autograph: كان خالد معوداً من خطباء العرب المشهورين بالفتوحات was also very beneficent and generous to profusion in his donations. On one of the days in which he gave public audience to poets, a person who had composed two verses in his praise entered the hall, but on hearing the long poems which the others recited, he thought his own too trifling, and therefore remained silent till they had withdrawn. Being then asked by Khalid what he wanted, he replied: "I composed a piece in praise of the Amir, but on hearing those of the others, I considered my own two verses as an unworthy tribute." On this, Khalid asked to hear them, and the poet recited these lines:

-Ed. البلاغة

"You showered gifts upon me till you restored me new life; you bestowed on me with such abundance, that I thought you were in jest. But you are beneficence itself; you are the son of beneficence and its father! Sworn brother to beneficence! that quality cannot abandon you."

Khalid then asked him what he required, and on learning from him that he was oppressed with debts, he ordered them to be paid and made him a present to a similar amount. (The Khalif) Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik wrote to him a letter, in which he said: "I am told that a man stood up in your presence and spoke these words: 'God is beneficent, and so art thou! God is generous, and so art thou! and that he thus summed up ten qualities common to you and God. Now, I swear by Allah! that if you do not exculpate yourself, I shall declare it lawful to shed your blood.'" To this Khalid wrote in reply: "It is true, O Commander of the faithful! that a man stood up before me and said: God loves the generous, and I love thee for the love God bears thee. But there is something worse than this: Ibn Shaqi T-Bajali<sup>1</sup> stood up before the Commander of the faithful and said: 'Which do you like best, your lieutenant (khalif) or your ambassador (apostle)?' to which you replied: 'My lieutenant, most certainly.' And then that man said: 'You are the khalif (lieutenant) of God, and Muhammad is his apostle (ambassador).'<sup>2</sup> Now the punishment of death, inflicted on a (poor) man of the tribe of Bajalah (such as I am), is a less grievous thing to the world at large than hat the Commander of the faithful should be an infidel." It is al-Tabari who relates this anecdote in his History. Doubts were cast on the sincerity of Khalid's religious belief, as he had built a church for his mother to pray in: it was alluding to this, that al-Farazdaq said:

"God curse the camel which came with swinging trot, and bore

1 I have been unable to procure any information respecting this person; and I doubt if this be a proper name. It may signify the son of the wretched Bajalite and that the writer of the letter meant his own son.

2 Consequently, God loves you better than Muhammad.

to us Khalid from Damascus! How can he be an imam<sup>1</sup> to the people, he whose mother believes not in the unity of God? He has built for his mother a convent, wherein is a cross; and through hatred, he has destroyed the minarets of mosques."

In the month of first Jumada, A.H. 120 (May, A.D. 733), Hisham deposed Khalid from the government of the two 'Iraqs; al-Tabari says in his History: "Hisham deposed 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, governor of 'Iraq, and confided the administration of that province to khalid, in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 105 (March, A.D. 724): he afterwards replaced Khalid by Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi, cousin to al-Hajjaj. He deprived Khalid of his office for the following reason: A woman went to him (Khalid) one day and said: 'May God direct the amir! I am a Muslim woman, and your 'amil<sup>2</sup> such and such a one, the Magian, seized upon me and forced me to the evil deed, and has made me hateful to myself.' To this Khalid said: 'How did you find his prepuce?'"<sup>3</sup> Hassan al-Nabati (the Nabatean) wrote to Hisham informing him of the circumstance, and at the moment (the letter came), Hisham had with him an envoy sent to him on business by Yusuf Ibn 'Umar, the governor of Yaman: he detained him till night had set in, and then called for him and gave him a writing, by which (his master) Yusuf was named governor of 'Iraq, empowered to exact from Khalid and his agents a strict account of their administration, and authorised to leave behind him his son al-Salt to govern the province of Yaman. On receipt of this document, Yusuf set out from San'a', accompanied by a few persons, and proceeded, on the camels (of the post establishment) to Kufah; where he arrived on the morning of the seventeenth day. He immediately seized on Khalid and his 'amils, cast him into prison, examined into his conduct, tortured him, and finally put him to death in the reign of al-Walid Ibn Yazid. It is said that he placed the feet of his prisoner between two pieces of wood, which he then forced together until the feet were crushed to pieces; he next placed the pieces of wood on the legs, which he broke in the same manner; then on the things; and lastly on the back; when the back was broken, his victim died. During these tortures, Khalid neither uttered a groan nor spoke a word."

He was put to death at Hirah, in the month of Muharram, A.H. 126 (October-November, A.D. 743); some say, however, in the month

1 The imam presided at public prayers; and governors of provinces, such as Khalid was, acted as imams by virtue of their office.

2 See note 3, under no. 184'

3 It is needless to call to the reader's recollection that Muslims are circumcised.

of Dhu T-Qa'dah, 125 (September, A.D. 743). He was buried during the night somewhere in Hiraḥ. This city lies at one parasang's distance from Kufah; and was the residence of the Mundhir family, the kings of the Arabs. When Khalid was in Yusuf al-Thaqafi's prison, the poet Abu T-Shaghb al-'Absi composed in his praise the following verses, which are to be found in the Hamasah.<sup>1</sup>

"Lo! the best of men, living or dead, is a prisoner to a Thaqafite, and kept by them in bonds! By Allah! though you make Khalid inhabit a prison, in which you allow him to walk but as one oppressed with the burden (of his chains); yet 'was he who dispelled the misfortunes of the wretched, and poured forth his donations copious as a torrent. He erected for his family an edifice of honourable deeds, and bestowed his gift on the worthy and the undeserving. Though you imprison al-Qasari, you cannot imprison his name; you cannot imprison the bounty which he shows towards the Arabian tribes."

"[Yusuf required of Khalid the daily payment of a fixed sum, and he put him to the torture when he did not comply. Abu T-Shaghb having composed these laudatory verses, transmitted them to Khalid, and received in return seventy thousand dirhams, which sum the prisoner was holding in readiness for the payment he had to make that day. At the same time, Khalid excused himself for the inadequacy of the present, saying, "You see what state I am in;" and the poet returned the gift, with these words: "It is not for money that I celebrated your praises whilst you were in this state, but through gratitude for your kindness and your bounty." Khalid sent it back to him conjuring him to accept of it, and Abu T-Shaghb at length consented to receive it. When Yusuf was informed of this, he called in Khalid and said: "What induced you to do so? are you not afraid of the torture?" "It is easier for me," replied Khalid, "to die under the torture, than to abstain from lavishing wealth, especially on those who celebrate my praise."]

Abu T-Faraj al-Isbahani says that Khalid was a descendant of Shiqq al-Kahin (the diviner), and that he was the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Asad Ibn Yazid Ibn Kurz. "Kurz," says he, "was a (mere) pretender (to an Arabic descent); he was in reality a Jew, but, on the commission of some crime, he fled to the tribe of Bajilān, and then entitled himself a Bajalite. Some say that he was a slave to the tribe of 'Abd al-Qays and a son of 'Amir Dhu T-Ruq'ah ('Amir with the patch'), who was so called because he had lost the sight of one eye, and covered it with a patch. 'Amir was son to 'Abd Shams, the son of Juwayn, the son of Shiqq, the diviner, the son of Ka'b." Shiqq was son to the aunt of Satih the diviner, who foretold the coming of the Prophet: a full account of his interpretation of the dream relative to that event is given in (ibn Hisham's) Sirat al-Rasul (life of the Prophet).<sup>1</sup> Shiqq and Satih were two of the wonders of the world: Satih's form was that of a human body deprived of its members and lying prostrate on the ground; his face was in his breast, and he had neither head nor neck.<sup>2</sup> He could not sit up except when angry; he then swelled and took a sitting posture. Shiqq was half a man, for which reason he was named Shiqq (half); he had only one arm and one leg. Those two beings were empowered to make the predictions which are so celebrated.<sup>3</sup> They were both born on the day in which Tarifah the divineress died; Tarifah was the daughter of al-Khayr al-Himyarî and wife of 'Amr Muzayqia<sup>4</sup> the son of al-'Amir Ma's-Sama'.<sup>5</sup> On their birth, she had them brought to her and spat in their mouths pretending that she thus made them the heirs of her knowledge and her art of divination. She died immediately after, and was buried at al-Juhfah.<sup>6</sup> Shiqq and Satih both lived six hundred years.<sup>7</sup> Qasri means belonging to Qasr Ibn 'Abqar, a branch of the tribe of Bajilah.

1 See Hamasah, page 419.

* This paragraph is not given in the autograph.

205 AL-KHIDR IBN 'AQIL AL-ARBILI

Abu 'T-Abbas al-Khidr Ibn Nasr Ibn 'Aqil Ibn Nasr al-Arbili (native of Aabela) was a Shafi'ite doctor, eminent for his knowledge of the law and of the doctrines peculiar to his sect; he was skilled

1 This most veracious narrative is reproduced by Abu 'T-Fida' in his Annals, Vol. I, p. 5 et seq.

2 Ibn Khalikan inserts these absurd fables, because they were currently believed by the Muslims, and are gravely related by their ancient authors as circumstances corroborative of the divine mission of Muhammad.

3 Those were predictions relative to the coming of Muhammad, as has been already said, and the rupture of the dike of Mareb. see M. de Sacy's Memoire sur divers Evenemens de l'Histoire des Arabes avant Mahomet, page 165.

4 See the extract from al-Mas'udi given in the Memoir just cited, page 151 and 208.

5 See Rasmussen's Hist. arab. ante Islam. p. 43.

6 This place is situated between Madinah and Makkah.

7 This could not be otherwise if they foretold the rupture of the dike of Mareb; and were still living at the time of Muhammad's birth, as grave doctors say.

in controversy and in the art of calculating the shares of inherited property to which each heir is entitled. He studied at Baghdad under al-Kiya al-Harrasi (Abu 'I-Hasan 'Ali) and Ibn al-Shashi (Abu Bakr), and he there became acquainted with a number of the chief doctors مشايوخها

He then returned to Arbela, where a college was built for him to profess in by Abu Mansur Saraftikin al-Zayni, the lieutenant-governor of that city نائب صاحب اربيل. This college is the one called Madrasat al-Qal'ah (the college of the fortress). It was founded in the year 533 (A.D. 1138-9). He gave lessons in it for some time, and was the first who ever professed at Arbela. A great number of excellent works were composed by him on the interpretation of the al-Qur'an, jurisprudence [al-tafsir wa 'I-fiqh], and other sciences. One of his works contains six and twenty sermons, stated to have been pronounced by the Apostle of God (Muhammad), and all of them supported by good authorities.<sup>1</sup> Great numbers studied under him and derived profit from his tuition. He was a man of holiness, mortified life, devotion, and piety; careless of worldly goods, and animated with a soul sanctified by God. Ibn 'Asakir mentions him with high commendation in his History of Damascus; he had visited that city and resided in it for some time, but returned afterwards to Arbela. Amongst those who finished their education under him was the doctor Dia'al-Din [Abu] 'Uthman [Ibn 'Isa Ibn Dirbas], al-Hadhbani<sup>2</sup> the expositor of (Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi's work) the Muhadhdhab. (His life will be found in the letter 'ayn). Another of his pupils who attained eminence was his brother's son, 'Izz al-Din Abu 'I-Qasim Nasr Ibn 'Aqil Ibn Nasr. Al-Khidr was born A.H. 478 (A.D. 1085-6); he died at Arbela on the eve of Friday, 14th of the latter Jumada, A.H. 567 (February. A.D. 1172) and was buried in his own college situated in the suburb. His tomb stands there alone and is an object of pilgrimage: I have visited it frequently. On his death, the vacant professorships in the two colleges were filled by his nephew 'Izz al-Din (glory of religion); a man of talent, born at Arbela in the year 534 (A.D. 1139-40). He was banished from that city by the Sovereign al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muzaffar al-Din, whose displeasure he had incurred, and proceeded to Mosul, where the following lines were addressed to him from Baghdad by his friend Yaquf al-Rumi (whose life shall be given later):

"O son of 'Aqil! dread not the violence of the enemies, though

1. Supported by good authorities; that is, accompanied with the names of the Traditionists by whom they had been handed down.

2. Hadbani is correct, not Hadiani, as in the Arabic text. [Hadhbani, in autograph]—Ed.

they betray that hatred which was hidden in their bosoms. The day has come in which some men oblige thee to depart thy land, because they see in thee such merit as their own land never possessed. It is thus that the ravens detest the presence of the white falcon, whose plumage appears to advantage when contrasted with the darkness of their own."

In this he alluded to the persons who traduced him and turned the sovereign against him. This occurred, as far as I know, in the year 602 or 603 (A.D. 1206-7), but Ibn Batish says that it took place in 606. That same year, the Georgians sallied forth and took Marand, a city in the dependencies of Adharbayjan, near Arbela; they plundered it, massacred part of the inhabitants, and led the rest into captivity. As this happened at the time of 'Izz al-Din's expulsion from Arbela; his son Sharaf al-Din (nobleness of religion) Muhammad was induced by the circumstance to compose the following verses:

"If (those of Arbela) drive unjustly (our) females from their homes and act with an excess of tyranny, we have before us a similar example, in those whom the Georgians treated with cruelty and drove from Marand.

This Sharaf al-Din had a great talent for the dubayt (or couplet); I should give here some specimens of his composition, were I not afraid of lengthening this notice too much. 'Izz al-Din dwelt outside of Mosul in the convent of Ibn al-Shahrzuri and received a pension from the lord of that city صاحب الموصل. He remained there till his death, which happened on Friday, 13th of the latter Rabi' or of the latter Jumada, A.H. 619 (May or July, A.D. 1222), and was interred at Tall Tawbah.<sup>1</sup> His mother was aunt to 'Imad al-Din Muhammad Ibn Yunus;<sup>2</sup> his son Sharaf al-Din died at Damascus on the eve of Sunday, 28th Muharram, A.H. 633 (October A.D. 1235), and was interred in the cemetery of the sufis: he was born at Arbela, in the month of Rajab, A.H. 572, (January, A.D. 1177). He studied jurisprudence under his father and 'Imad al-Din Ibn Yunus, and was taught belles-lettres by Abu 'I-Haram Makki, Sarafikin was a mamluk belonging to Zayn al-Din 'Ali, the lord of Arbela and the father of Muzaffar al-Din; he was an Armenian by birth, and a virtuous man, for which reason his master gave him his liberty, took him into favour, placed the highest confidence in him, and made him his lieutenant

1 See note 2, under no. 167.

2 His life is given in this work.

• [Abi 'I-Hazm, in autograph]—Ed.

in the government. He built a number of mosques in Arbela and the neighbouring villages, and founded the college of which we have spoken: he raised also the walls of the town of Fayd, situated on the road from Baghdad to Makkah,<sup>1</sup> and left many other monuments of his piety, all erected at his own expense. He died in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 559 (August, A.D. 1164).

206 IBN BASHKUWAL

Abu T-Qasim Khalaf Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Mas'ud Ibn Bashkuwal Ibn Yusuf Ibn Dahah Ibn Dakah Ibn Nasr Ibn 'Abd al-Karim Ibn Wafid al-Khazraji al-Ansari al-Qurtubi (descended from the Ansars of the tribe of Khazraj and a native of Cordova), was one of the great learned men of Spain. He composed a number of useful works, amongst others, the Silat (gift), intended by him as a continuation to Ibn al-Faradi's<sup>2</sup> history of the learned of Spain, and in which He has collected (the lives of) a great many persons. he composed also a short history of Spain, in which he displayed his usual ability, and a work called the Kitab al-Ghawamid wa 'I-Mubhamat (book of obscure and doubtful allusions), in which he mentions and specifies the names of the persons to whom allusion is made in the Traditions: in this work he followed the plan adopted by the Khatib of Baghdad in his treatise written on the same subject. He is also the author of a little volume, in which he mentions those Traditionists who handed down the Muwatta' (when yet unpublished), on the authority of (their master) Malik [Ibn Anas] (who composed it). He has classed their names in alphabetical order, to the number of seventy-three. Another small volume of his is entitled: The suppliants for God's assistance under trouble, those humbly resigned to him in their wishes and desires, and those to whose prayers he hearkened, and whom he blessed with miraculous favours. Besides the above, he composed other works. Abu T-Khattab Ibn Dihyah says: "I learned from a note in the handwriting of my master", meaning Ibn Bashkuwal, "that he finished his Silat in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 534 (January, A.D. 1140), and that he came into the world on Monday, the 3rd (some say the 8th) of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 494 (October, A.D. 1101). He died at Cordova on the eve of Wednesday, 8th Ramadan, A.H. 573 (January, A.D. 1183), and was buried on that Wednesday, when the afternoon prayers were over, in the cemetery of Ibn 'Abbas, near the tomb of

1 This place, which lies half-way between Kufah and Makkah, is noticed by Abu 'I-Fida' in his Geography.

2 His life is given by Ibn Khalikan.

Yahya Ibn Yahya<sup>1</sup>. His father Abu Marwan 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Mas'ud died on the morning of Sunday, and was buried on the evening of the next day, Monday 25th of the latter Jumada, A.H. 533 (February, A.D. 1139), at about the age of eighty.<sup>2</sup>

207 KHALIFAH IBN KHAYYAT

Abu 'Amr Khalifah Ibn Khayyat Ibn Abi Hubayrah Khalifah Ibn Khayyat al-'Usfuri, surnamed Shabab, a member of the tribe of Shayban a native of Basrah, and the author of the Tabaqat,<sup>3</sup> was a hafiz versed in history acquainted with the adventures of the ancient Arabs, and gifted with great talents. Al-Bukhari gives traditions on his authority in the Sahih and in his historical work,<sup>4</sup> and he is cited also by 'Abd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn Hanbal, Abu Ya'la of Mosul,<sup>5</sup> al-Hasan Ibn Sufyan al-Nasawi<sup>6</sup>, and others في الآخرين he himself quoted as his authorities Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah, Yazid Ibn Zuray',<sup>7</sup> Abu Dawud al-Tayalist,<sup>8</sup> Durust Ibn Hamzah, and others of the same

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 Abd al-Malik was a Traditionist, jurisconsult of the sect of Malik, and an assiduous reader of the Qur'an—(Ibn Bashkuwal't Silat.)

3 This is probably the work mentioned by Hajji Khalifah under the title of Tabaqat al-Ruwat (Classification of the historical Traditionists); a sort of Biographical dictionary.

4 Noticed by Hajji Khalifah in his Bibliography. see no. 2174.

5 See note 2, under no. 92.

6 The hafiz Abu 'I-'Abbas al-Hasan Ibn Sufyan Ibn 'A. nir al-Shaybani al-Nasawi (of the tribe of Shayban and native of Nasa in Khurasan), studied jurisprudence under Abu Thawr (see no. 2), and learned the Traditions from Ibn Hanbal and others. He was chief Traditionist of Khurasan while he lived, and he composed a celebrated Musnad (see note 7 under no. 130). Died in Ramadan 303 (Marth, A.H. 916), at Balouz بالوز a village situated at three miles from Nasa. (Al-Dhahabi's Ta'rikh al-Islam: MS. No. 646.) In the printed Arabic text of Ibn Khallikan, the hafiz Abu 'I-'Abbas is surnamed al-Nasri, not al-Nasawi; the autograph manuscript has also al-Nasri, but this reading, I am inclined to think, is erroneous.

7 Abu Mu'awiyah Yazid Ibn Zuray' al-'Absi (member of the tribe of 'Abs) al-Basri (native of Basrah) was a Traditionist of great exactitude and information, learned, talented, and varacious. On the death of his father, who was governor of Basrah, he refused (through religious scruples) to accept any part of the inheritance which devolved to him, and supported himself by making baskets. He died A.H. 172 (A.D. 788-9). (Al-Nujum al-Zahirah).

8 The hafiz Abu Dawud Sulayman Ibn Dawud Ibn al-Jarud of Tayalisi was born at Basrah, A.H. 121 (A.D. 739). He possessed a high reputation as a Traditionist. Died A.A. 203 (A. D. 818-9) (Tabaqat al-Buffer).

class. He died in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 230 (May, A.D. 845). Ibn 'Asakir says, in his Ma'jam, or alphabetical list of the great jurisconsults who followed the doctorines of the six imams,<sup>1</sup> that he died A.H. 240 (A.D. 854-5) or 246.

The relative adjective 'Usfuri is derived from 'Usfur (carthamus tinctorum), a substance used for dyeing cloth red.

It is not known with certainty for what reason he was surnamed Shabab. His grandfather Abu Hubayrah Khalifah Ibn Khayyat died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 160 (April-May, A.D. 777). Abu 'Amr himself said that his grandfather Khalifah and Shu'bah Ibn al-Hajjaj<sup>2</sup> died in the same month.

208 AL-KHALIL IBN AHMAD

Abu 'Abd al-Rahman al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamim al-Farahidi, or al-Furhudi al-Azdi al-Yahmadi was one of the great masters in the art of grammar, and the discoverer of the rules of prosody, which art owes to him its creation. These rules he included in five circles دوائر (or classes), from which he deduced fifteen seas (or measures);<sup>3</sup> to these was added a sixteenth by al-Akhfash (Sa'id Ibn Masada), who named it al-khabab. It is related that al-Khalil, when at Makkah, prayed God to bestow on him a science hitherto undiscovered, and which none were to learn but from him; and that on his return from the pilgrimage, the science of prosody was

1 The six imams, founders of the six orthodox sects, were Abu Hanifah, al-Shafi'i, Malik, Ibn Hanbal, Sufyan al-Thawil, and Abu Sulayman Dawud al-Zahiri.

2 The imam Abu Bistam بسطام Shu'bah Ibn al-Hajjaj Ibn al-Ward, surnamed the Amir al-Mu'minin (or commander of the faithful) in the science of Traditions, was a mawla to the tribe 'Atik عتيك a branch of that of al-Azd; his patron 'Abd al-Ataki عبد العتكي having been himself a mawla to Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab the Azdite. He learned the Traditions from Mu'awiyah Ibn Qurra and a great number of the Tabi'is. Shafi'i said of him, Were it not for Shu'bah, the Traditions extant in Iraq had remained unknown. Al-Madini stated that he knew two thousand of them, and Sufyan declared that the death of Shu'bah was fatal to the Traditions. He was a man of great learning, piety self-denial, tenderness of heart, and holy life; a master of the elegancies of pure Arabic, and a poet. Died A.H. 160 (A.D. 776-7), aged 73 years. (Al-Yafi'i, Tabaqat al-Muhaddithin) revealed to him. The knowledge which he possessed of musical rhythm and harmony must, however, have led him to the discovery of prosody, in consequence of the close analogy which exists between them, Hamzah Ibn al-Isbahani<sup>1</sup> speaks of al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad in his Tanbih 'al Huduth al-Tashif,<sup>2</sup> and expresses his opinion respecting him in these terms:

3 These technicalities will be better understood from a perusal of the chapter. page 147, of Freytag's Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst, or Samuel Clerke's Prosodia Arabica.

"To enter now into the subject we intend to treat, it must be observed that Islamism never produced a more active spirit than al-Khalil for the discovery of sciences which were unknown, even in their first principles, to the learned among the Arabs. Of this, no clearer proof can be adduced than the science of prosody: a science not taught to him by any philosopher, nor drawn up by him on the model of some other previously known, but invented as he walked past a coppersmith's, on hearing the strokes of a hammer upon a basin; two objects devoid of every quality which could serve as a proof and illustration of anything else than their own form and shape, and incapable of leading to any other knowledge than that of their own.

1 Hamzah son of al-Hasan (or of al-Husayn, according to Hajji Khalifah) was a native of Isbahan, as appears by his surname. The best known of his works, entitled Ta'rikh al-Umam (History of Peoples), was composed, according to his own statement, in the year 330 of the Hijrah (A.D. 961-2). His other works were, a History of Isbahan Ta'rikh Isbahan (see Hajji Khalifah, No. 2142), a History of great men (Tarikh Kibar al-Umam), and the Tanbih, here mentioned by Ibn Khallikan. None of the Arabic authors whom I have consulted, furnish any additional information respecting him, the author of the Fihrist excepted. We read in that work; Hamzah Ibn al-Hasan, a native of Isbahan, was كان a man of learning and an author, He then gives the list of his works, eight in number; three of which were collections of proverbs, the fourth contained similes: the fifth was a treatise on prayers or imprecations, كتاب انواع الدعاء the sixth, a collection of epistles; the seventh, a History of Isbahan, and the eighth, a treatise on the words in the Al-Qur'an which may be read in different manners: كتاب التفسير على حروف المصحف This last is probably the work from which the passage on al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad is taken. It would appear, from what the author of the Fihrist says, that at the period in which he composed his work. Hamzah was no longer living, and as we know that the Fihrist was written A.H. 377, we must suppose that Hbmzah, died before that year. M.de Sacy, in the 10th volume of the Memoires de l'Institut, Academic des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, has inserted a memoir on the first of the works above mentioned.

2 This work is not mentioned by Hajji Khalifah. Its title signifies. The warning respecting the novelty of the Tashif. The last word bears the signification of logograph and false reading of the al-Qur'an. The three manuscripts which gives this passage—for the autograph does not—all agree in the orthography of the title, which seems, however, to be an alteration of that which is indicated in the preceding note.

nature. Had he lived in days of old and were the traces of his existence distant from observation persons would have doubted that such a man had been: one who effected what none had ever done since God created the world; the production, namely, of the science just mentioned; the foundation laid by him for that structure, the Kitab al-'Ayn, which contains the language of a whole people, and the aid which he gave to Sibawayh by furnishing him with that grammatical information of which he composed the celebrated book (Kitab) which is the ornament of Islamism."

Al-Khalil was a holy, sagacious, sage, and grave man; one of his sayings was: "A man knoweth not wherein his preceptor is wrong, till he taketh the lessons of another." It is related by [his pupil] al-Nadr Ibn Shumayl that al-Khalil dwelt in one of the (common) reed-cabins of Basrah without having two pence فلين at his command, whilst his scholars اصحابه were gaining wealth by the science he had taught them. He states also, that one day he heard him say: "I lock the door upon myself, so that my thoughts wander not abroad. He used also to remark that a man's reason and intelligence reach perfection, when he attains the age of forty, the age of Muhammad when God sent him forth on his mission; but that they undergo alteration and diminution when the man reaches sixty; the age in which God took the Prophet's soul to himself. He said again, that the intelligence is clearest at the dawn of day. Sulayman Ibn Habib Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah, [al-Azdi] the governor of Fars and Ahwaz, settled a pension on him and invited him by letter to come and see him, to which al-Khalil wrote in reply:

"Let Sulayman know that I can dispense with his assistance; that I am rich, though possessing no wealth: the treasure which I husband is my honest pride; believing, as I do, that none ever die of mere poverty, and that no state of life can continue unchanged. (True) wealth comes from a power subject to no weakness: and with all the craft of the cunning, you cannot increase your store. Poverty consists not in (the want of) money, but of soul; that we well know: and riches are in the mind, not in the purse." Sulayman having, on this, stopped al-Khalil's pension, the latter said:

"He, who formed me with a mouth, engaged to give me nourishment till such time as he takes me to himself. Thou hast refused me a trifling sum, but that refusal will not increase thy wealth."

These lines gave Sulayman great uneasiness, and induced him to write an apology to al-Khalil and double his pension; the poet then pronounced these lines:

"Sulayman has committed a slip which would fill Satan with amazement, did he hear it. Marvel not, if by chance a good deed comes from him; an inauspicious constellation sometimes sheds on the earth a genial shower."

Al-Khalil and 'Abd al-Allah Ibn al-Muqaffa' once met together and passed the night in conversation; the next morning they separated, and al-Khalil was asked what he thought of his companion ابن السقفة. His learning is greater than his wit عقل was the reply. A similar question was then addressed to Ibn al-Muqaffa', who answered: "His wit is greater than his learning."

Among the works composed by al-Khalil must be noticed the celebrated Kitab al-'Ayn, of which the subject is philology;<sup>1</sup> the Kitab al-'Arud (his treatise on prosody); the Kitab al-Shawahid (examples of grammatical rules) the Kitab al-Nuqat wa 'I-Shakl (treatise on the diacritical points and the vowel-signs); the Kitab al-Nagham (on musical intonation), and the [Kitab fi al-'Awamil] (treatise on those parts of speech which govern others). The great majority of the learned in philology say that the Kitab al-'Ayn was not composed by al-Khalil, although it bears his name; he merely began it, and having drawn up a portion of the commencement, he named it the 'Ayn, [and then he died] but its completion was due to his pupils, al-Nadr Ibn Shumayl, al-Mu'rij al Sadusi, Nasr Ibn 'Ali al-Jahdami<sup>2</sup>, and others of the same class; but the learning of which they there made proof was by no means proportionate to that displayed by al-Khalil in the beginning of the work; they in consequence suppressed that portion, and replaced it by a new one of their own composition. To this must be attributed certain mistakes into which al-Khalil could hardly have fallen. This has been fully treated of by Ibn Durustuwayh, in an instructive work which he wrote on the subject. Al-Khalil had a son whose intellect was very backward; this boy went one day into the room where his father was, and on finding him scanning a piece of verse by the rules of prosody, he ran out and told the people that his father had lost his wits. They went in immediately and related to al-Khalil what they had heard, on which he addressed his son in these terms:

1 A copy of this celebrated lexicon is in the Escorial library. It begins with the letter 'ayn ع whence its name.

2 Abu 'Amr Nasr Ibn 'Ali al-Jahdami, a celebrated hafiz and a vase of science, was a native of Basrah. The Khalif al-Musta'in having sent for him with the intention of naming him qadi, he obtained permission of the governor to confer with God about it. Having withdrawn, he offered up a prayer of two rakahs and said: "O my God! if I have any value in thy sight, take me to thyself." He then went to sleep and never woke again. This happened in the year 250 (A.D. 864). (Al-Yafi'i).

"Had you known what I was saying, you would have excused me; and had you known what you said, I should have blamed you. But you did not understand me, so you blamed me; and I knew that you were a fool جامل so I pardoned you."

It is said that he frequently recited the following verses, but without stating whether they were his own or not:

"The mansion of your friends is near," said they, "how strange then that you should be in sorrow!" 'What avail the mansion and their nearness,' I replied, 'if the hearts themselves draw not near?'"

The following anecdote, related by himself, has been handed down to us: "A person of a slow understanding came to me during some time to take lessons in prosody, but I could not impress any portion of it on his mind; so I said to him one day; "Scan this verse:

'If you cannot accomplish a thing, leave it and pass to another which you can accomplish.' And he began to scan it to the best of his abilities, but he then went away, and never came back. I was quite astonished that, with all his stupidity, he perceived my drift in proposing to him that verse."

Numerous anecdotes are related of al-Khalil; it was from him that ('Amr Ibn 'Uthman) Sibawayh, whose life we shall give in the letter 'ayn ع received his knowledge of the different branches of philology. It is said that al-Khalil's father was the first person, after the time of the Prophet, who bore the name of Ahmad; al-Marzubani, in his work called the Kitab al-Muqtabis, makes a similar statement on the authority of Ahmad Ibn Abi Khaythamah. Al-Khalil was born A.H. 100 (A.D. 718-9), and died at Basrah, A.H. 170 (A.D. 786-7), or 175; at the age, it is [also] said, of seventy-four years. It is mentioned, however, by Ibn Qani', in his Annals, that he died in year 160; and Ibn al-Jawzi, in his Shudhur al-Uqud, gives the year 130 as that of his death; this flagrant error has been copied by al-Waqidi. He came by his death in the following manner. Having resolved on inventing a method of calculation so simple, that any servant-girl (who knew it) could go to a shopkeeper's without incurring the least possible risk of being deceived by him in the sum she would have to pay, he entered the mosque with his thoughts occupied on the subject, and he there struck against a pillar, which his preoccupation hindered him from perceiving; the violence of the shock threw him on his back, and death was the result. Some say, however, that he was scanning verses when the accident happened.

Farahidi means belonging to Farahid, a branch of the tribe of Azd. Farahid is the plural of furhud, a word which signifies a lion's whelp in the dialect of the Azd Shanuwah tribe.<sup>1</sup> Some say that farahid means little sheep.

Yahmadi is derived from Yahmid, the name of another branch of the tribe of Azd, from which great numbers have sprung.

Al-Khalil frequently repeated this verse of al-Akhtal's:

"If thou wantest treasures, thou wilt find none equal to a virtuous conduct."

209 KHUMARAWAYH [IBN TULUN]

Abu T-Jaysh Khumarawayh was the son of Ahmad Ibn Tulun, whose life we have already given (no. 70) with some account of his father Tulun. On the death of Ahmad, he was unanimously chosen by the troops as his successor, and he thus became governor (of Egypt) at the age of twenty years. His appointment took place in the days of the Khalif al-Mu'tamid. In the year 276 (A.D. 889-90) a-Ifshin Muhammad Ibn Abi T-Saj Diwdad Ibn Yusuf marched a large army from Armenia and Persian Iraq against Egypt;<sup>2</sup> but Khumarawayh gave his battle in the neighbourhood of Damascus and put him to flight. The greater part of the invading army surrendered, and Khumarawayh advanced to Euphrates, (over which); some of his troops (passed) and took possession of Raqqah. He then returned to Egypt, master of all that tract of country which extends from the Euphrates to Nubia. On the death of al-Mu'tamid and the accession of al-Mu'tadid, Khumarawayh hastened to conciliate the new khalif by rich presents, and he thus obtained the confirmation of his appointment as governor of Egypt. He then expressed the wish that his daughter Qatr al-Nada (dew-drop) [and her name was Asma'] should marry the khalif's son, al-Muktafi Bi'llah, who was then khalif elect; but al-Mu'tadid said that he would marry her himself, and she became his wife in the year 281 (A.D. 894-5). Towards the end of that year, or, as some say, in the next, he consummated his marriage; the dowry settled on her by her father amounted to one million of dirhams.<sup>3</sup> It is stated that she possessed wit and beauty to an extreme degree: one day, whilst al-Mu'tadid was enjoying the pleasures of her society in a saloon specially reserved for her used and into which no other dare enter, he handed her the wine-cup and fell asleep on her lap فخذ. To relieve herself from his weight, she placed a cushion under his head, and went into the court of the palace, where she sat down. When he awoke and perceived her absence, he got into a passion and called her by name; her answer proved that she was not far off, and (when she entered) he addressed her thus: "Have I not given you a mark of honour in choosing you for the companion of my private moments? Have I not given you the surest tokens of my affection and withheld it from the other females of my harem? and yet you place a pillow under my head and leave me thus." To this she made answer: "Commander of the faithful! I am fully sensible of the high favour you conferred on me; but one of the lessons given me by my father was, not to sleep with those who sit, or sit with those who sleep."

1 See M. de Sacy's Memoire sur l'Histoire des Arabes avant Mahomet, p. 157.

2 For the history of al-Ifghin, see Freytag's Selecta ex Historia p. 24 et seq.

3 The manuscripts of Ibn Khalikan and Abu T-Mahasin have dirhame in this place, but dinars is probably the right reading.

It is related that al-Mu'tadid, in marrying her, had the intention of reducing the Tulun family to poverty, and such was in fact the result, for her father made her marriage-present the like of which had never been given before; it is said that (amongst other objects) she received one thousand mortars of gold.<sup>1</sup> Al-Mu'tadid required of him also to pay an annual tribute of hundred thousand dinars<sup>2</sup> after defraying the salaries of all the government officers in Egypt and the pay of the troops. He continued to fulfil this obligation till the year 282, when his pages murdered him in his bed at Damascus, on Saturday night, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (January, A.D. 896). He was then thirty-two years of age. The assassins were all put to death, and his body was borne in a bier to Egypt and deposited in the tomb of his father near the foot of mount Muqattam. His penmanship was most beautiful. He had for vizir Abu bakr Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ahmad al-Maridani, of whom we shall have again occasion to speak. When his daughter Qatr al-Nada was conducted to al-Mu'tadid, she was accompanied as far as the Syrian frontier by her aunt al-'Abbasah, the daughter of Ahmad Ibn Tulun. They made a halt there, and their tents having been set up, a town was built on the same spot and received the name of al-Abbasah. It is still inhabited and possessed a handsome mosque and a well-frequented market-place. This statement is given on the authority of many well informed persons.

1 Mortars were an important article of the female toilet; they were used for pounding perfumes.

2 The dinar of that period had an intrinsic value of about ten shillings British.

Qatr al-Nada died on the 9th of Rajab, A.H. 227 (July, A.D. 900), and was buried in the Rusafah palace at Baghdad.

Al-Ifshin, the son of Abi T-Saj, died in the month of the first Rabi', 288 (March, A.D. 901), at Barda'ah, the capital of one of the provinces of Adharbayjan; Arran, it is said. His father, Abu T-Saj, after whom the Sajite junds (or troops) were so called.<sup>1</sup> died A.H. 226 (A.D. 879-80: at Jundi Sabur, in the province of Khuzistan.

210 KHAYR AL-NASSAJ AL-SUFI

Abu T-Hasan Khayr al-Nassaj al-Sufi lived a long life, He was known as al-Nassaj although weaving was not his profession, because, as he has related himself, 'I had taken a vow never to eat dates, but once strong desire (nafs) overpowered me and I procured half a pound رطل (of dates). I had taken only one, when a man looked at me and said: 'O Khayr, you have run away from me.' He had a slave named Khayr to whose appearance I seemed to resemble. In the meantime people had assembled there; they said: 'This is your slave, Khayr.' I was wonderstruck and realized (the reason) for which I was condemned, and I knew my sin. He caught hold of me and carried me to his shop where his slave used to do weaving. He said to me, 'O wicked slave, you escaped from me?' For a number of months I stayed with him weaving for him. One night I rose to offer my morning prayers and while prostrating I said: 'O God: I shall not repeat what I did.' The resemblance vanished from me and I regained my old appearance. Then I was set free, but this appellation (nassaj) became a part of my name. That man said to me: 'Neither you are my slave nor is your name Khayr,' and then he went away." He (Al-

1 The historians whom I have consulted furnish no information respecting these troops. I learn only from Ibn al-Athir that Abu T-Saj was appointed by al-Mutawakkil to guard the road leading from Iraq to Makkah, A.H. 244 (A.D. 858-9). He was consequently protector of the pilgrim caravans. In 253 he received the command of the province of Kufah; in 261 that of al-Ahwaz, where he was defeated by the Zanj (see Abu T-Fida's Annals's, A.A. 255); he then proceeded to Askar Mukram, and died at Jundisapur (A.H. 266) on his return from the camp of 'Amr Ibn al-Layth, to whom he had been probably sent by the khalif with letters of investiture. (Ibn al-Athir).

* This notice is not to be found in de Slane, nor in autograph; but it is given in the Cairo (1299 H.; 1948) and Tehran editions. We have translated it from the Cairo ed. and included it in our text.

For further information see Al-Sulami, Kitab al-Tabaqat al-Sufiyyah (iden, 1960), pp. 324-27—Ed.

Nassaaj) also said to himself; "I shall not change the name given to me by a Muslim."

He used to say: "No birth — is nobler than one created by God with his own hand. But he did not remain innocent. No one is a greater 'alim than the person whom Allah taught the names of all things, but this did not benefit him when fate (i.e., death) overtook him.

In his old age he had become hump-backed but when he heard (adhan) his back used to straighten and he regained his strength.

He lived for 120 years and died in A.H. 322 (A.D. 932); when he was on the point of death he fell in a swoon at the time of Maghrib (sun-set) prayers; when he regained his consciousness, looking to a side of the door he said; "Wait, may God give you comfort! you are a commissioned slave and I am also a commissioned slave, let me carry out what I am commanded to do; then you should carry out what you are commanded to do." Then he asked for water and made ablutions for offering prayers. Then he began his prayers and prolonged them; he recited tashahhud (the concluding part of the prayers) and then he breathed his last.

One of his friends saw him in a dream and asked him, "How did God treat you?" He replied, "Do not put this question to me; but I am comfortable as far as your trouble-giving world is concerned." [Some additional information is given in the Tehran ed.]

211 ABU SULAYMAN DAWUD AL-ZAHIRI

Abu Sulayman Dawud Ibn 'Ali Ibn Khalaf al-Isbahani (native of Isbahan), generally known by the surname of al-Zahiri,<sup>1</sup> was a man of great piety and self-mortification. He learned the science (jurisprudence) from Ishaq Ibn Rahawayh and Abu Thawr, and was a most ardent partisan of the Imam al-Shafi'i whose merits and praise he celebrated in two works. He was the founder of a particular sect<sup>2</sup>,

1 Al-Zahiri (the exteriorist); he was so called because he founded his system of jurisprudence on the exterior, or literal meaning of the Qur'anic text and the Traditions; he thus rejected the jam (general consent of the ancient imams), and the qiyas, or analogical deductions. See note 2 under no. 2. In this, he and his followers incurred the disapprobation of the most eminent doctors of the other orthodox sects. Tabaqat, al-Hukama, fol. 50 etc.)

2 This was one of the six orthodox sects already mentioned in note 7. under no. 207.

and had many followers, who received the name of Zahirites: his son Abu Bakr Muhammad, whose life shall be given, professed the same doctrines. Abu Sulayman was nominated chief professor at Baghdad,<sup>1</sup> and it is said that he had among his auditors four hundred wearers of green hoods.<sup>2</sup> The following anecdote so related by himself: "There came one day to my public conferences a native of Basrah, whose name was Abu Ya'qub al-Shariti; he was dressed in two ragged cloaks,<sup>3</sup> and having advanced of his own accord to the place of honour, without being invited to take it, he sat down by my side and said: 'Question me about what you please.' As I was almost provoked by his conduct, I told him, sneeringly, to treat of cupping.<sup>4</sup> He immediately invoked the benediction of God, and related the mode in which this Tradition had been handed down; He who cups and he who is cupped (in the month of Ramadan) have broken the fast.<sup>5</sup> He then gave the names of the Traditionists who traced it up as far as the Tabi'is;<sup>6</sup> of those who traced it up through an uninterrupted succession of narrators to Muhammad himself, of those who explained it, and of the jurisconsults who cited it as an authority for their doctrines. He then stated the various channels through which the following Tradition has passed down: The blessed Prophet was cupped, and he gave the cupper his pay; and were cupping a thing forbidden, he had not given it to him.<sup>7</sup> He next related the different modes of transmission by which this Tradition was received: The Prophet was cupped with a horn. He mentioned also other genuine Traditions respecting cupping, and some of middling authenticity,

1 رياسة العلم

See note 1, under no. 25.

2 Hoods were generally worn by doctors of the law- Al Sharishi says however, in his commentary on the Maqamats to al-Hariri, p. 236, that the green taylasan, or hood, was worn by persons, of respectability خراس

3 This was a proof of his being a sufi, and that two great shayks of that sect had left him their cloaks, science, and authority as legacies. The transmission of the cloak by the master to the disciple is a custom of great antiquity. The cloak worn by the sufis was called by them ldirqaq (rag),

4 He told him to treat of cupping, because he thought him mad; and a madman should know well what that operation was.

5 The rest of the Tradition is as follows. The one, on account of weakness which will arise from loss of blood: and the cupper because he is not safe from some of it going into his mouth: (Al-Bukhari's Sahih, MS. No. 244, fol. 78 verse.

The ancient Arabs performed cupping by scarifying the part and sucking out the blood by means of a horn. This Tradition is given in Matthew's Mishkat at Mosabih, vol. I. p. 474.

6 See note 2, under no. 3.

7 Al-Bukhari's Sahih, fol. 72.

such as these: I passed not by any band of the angels without their saying: Order thy people to use cupping:<sup>1</sup> The healing of my people is by three means; cupping, drinking honey, and cauterizing with fire,<sup>2</sup> and others of a like import. He then gave the Traditions of feeble authenticity, as, for instance: Be not cupped on such and such a day; at such and such an hour; after which he mentioned the opinions expressed by physicians of every age on the subject, and he concluded his discourse with the remark that the use of cupping originated at Isbahan. I then said to him: 'By Allah! I shall never scorn any person again.'

Dawud was a man of a powerful mind, and it was said of him by Abu 'I-'Abbas [Ahmad Ibn Yahya known as] Tha'lab, that his intellect was greater than his learning. His birth took place at Kufah, A.H. 202 (A.D. 817-8); some say, however, 201 or 200; he was brought up at Baghdad, and died there in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 270 (May. A.D. 884), or by another account, in Ramadan of that year. He was buried in the Shunizi cemetery; but some state, however, that he was interred in (the court before) his house.

His son Abu Bakr Muhammad related that he saw his father in a dream, and asked him what God had done to him, and that he replied: "He hath shown mercy to me and indulgence." He then asked him if God had shown him mercy for the faults which He (God) had treated with indulgence? and his father answered: "O my son! the case of him who hath not obtained God's indulgence is terrible; it is the greatest of woes!" His family was of Isbahan. We have already spoken of this place and of the Shunizi cemetery in some of the preceding articles (see nos. 32 and 140).

*[Abu 'Abd Allah al-Mahamili narrates: "I offered my 'Id 'l-Fitr prayers at the jami' Mosque of Madinah and said to myself that I should go to Dawud Ibn 'Ali to offer ('Id) greetings. I went to him and found that he had a tray of endive leaves and chaff before him and he was eating from it I greeted him, but I was surprised to see him in this condition and thought to myself that worldly possessions

---

1 I give here the whole tradition, of which the first words alone are mentioned by Ibn Khallikan. It was handed down by Ibn Mas'ud, who stated that the Prophet said so when relating his night-journey to heaven. See Masabih, MS. fonds Ducaurrci. No. 5 fol. 291.

2 The Khallikan gives the first words only of this Tradition, The Masabih enables me to complete it.

* This anecdote is not included in M. de Slane's edition nor is it to be found in the autograph. It is included in the Cairo (1940 ed. Vol. II, p. 209) and Tehran editions--Ed.

were worthless. When I emerged from there I went straight to a philanthropist known as al-Jurjani. He received me bare-footed and bare headed and said to me; 'Qadi! what has brought you here?' to which I replied, 'an important affair.' He asked me, 'What is that?' I said: 'Dawud is living in your neighbourhood; you know about his erudition and you happen to be philanthropist but you take no care of him.' Then I related to him what I had seen. Then he said: 'Dawud is extremely ill-tempered. Only last night I sent one thousand dirhams for his expenses; he returned the amount and said to my slave: Go and ask him with what eyes he looked at me and how could he know my requirements that he sent this money to me' I was surprised at this and said to him: 'Bring the money, and I shall carry it to him.' He gave the money to me and asked his slave to bring another purse of equal amount, and said to me: 'This is for the kindness of the Qadi. I took the amount of two thousand dirhams from him and went to Dawud. I knocked at his door and I was admitted. I sat before him for a short while; then I placed the money before him. He said: 'Is this the reward for one who trusted you with one's secret? I admitted you to my presence because of your erudition. I am not in need of what you have brought, so take it back.'

Al-Mahamili adds; 'I returned from there, and the world had become a trifling in my eyes. In informed al-Jurjani accordingly and he said to me: 'I have dedicated this money to "God, so do not return it to me, you should spend it on pious people."']

212 AL-MALIK AL-ZAHIR MUJIR AL-DIN

Abu Sulayman Dawud, surnamed al-Malik al-Zahir Mujir al-Din (the brilliant prince, the protector of the faith),<sup>1</sup> was a son of the Sultan Salah al-Din Ibn Ayyub, and lord of al-Birah, a fortress situated on the Euphrates. Men of talents and learning travelled from all parts to visit him, in consequence of this predilection for their company. He was the twelfth son of Salah al-Din, and came into the world at Cairo. His father, who was then in Syria, was congratulated by al-Qadi al-Fadil on the happy event in a letter which contained the following passage: 'This child, whom the blessing of God has brought into the world, completes the number of twelve sons, or rather twelve brilliant stars; God has thus presented to you,<sup>2</sup> one star more than to the patriarch Joseph; your majesty saw them and you awake,

1 This fortress lies to take north-est of Aleppo.

2 Literally: To him. The third person was generally used in addressing princes.

whilst Jacob only saw his in a dream;* he saw them making obeisance unto him, but your majesty saw them making obeisance unto you, whilst the people bowed down before them. And He, may He be extolled! has the power of augmenting your majesty's happiness in making you live to see them fathers and grandfathers." In these last words, al-Qadi al-Fadil expresses a thought which coincides with that contained in the following verse, taken from a poem composed by al-Buhturi in praise of [caliph] al-Mutawakkil, just after the birth of al-Mu'tazz, that Khalif's son:

"May you live to obtain the light of his counsels, and see his children grey and aged men."

It has been handed down by a number of persons that he used to say: "If any one has a wish to see Salah al-Din, let him look at me, for I resemble him more than any of his other sons."

Al-Malik al-Zahir was born on the 22nd of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 573 (June, A.D. 1178), or, by another account, in the Dhu 'l-Qa'dah of that year. He and his brother, al-Malik al-Zahir<sup>1</sup> (Ghazi), of whom we shall make mention under the letter ghayn غ were sons of the same mother. He died at al-Birah on the eve of the ninth day of Safar, A.H. 632 (November, A.D. 1234). I was at Aleppo when the news of his death arrived, and al-Malik al-'Aziz, the son of his brother al-Malik al-Zahir, set out immediately and took possession of the castle of al-Birah. This place is situated on the Mesopotamian side of the Euphrates, and lies near Somaysat, a fortress on the Greek confines. Sumaysat is on the Syrian side, between Qal'at al-Rum and Malatyah; it is separated from al-Birah by the river.

213 DAWUD AL-TA'L<sup>2</sup>

Abu Sulayman Dawud Ibn Nasr<sup>3</sup> al-Ta'i (belonging to the tribe of

1 Ghazi's surname is written الظاهر and that of his brother الراهر. The pronunciation of both is nearly the same; it is only a practised ear which can perceive the difference between them.

* [In autograph: وراي نلك الا نجم حلسا راهم السولى يقظه -Ed.]

It may be noted that according to the verses of the Qur'an it was Joseph and not his father Jacob who saw eleven stars in a dream which were interpreted to mean his eleven brother. Thus Jacob also had twelve sons. See al-Qur'an, 12:4.

2 This notice is not to be found in de Saine's trans. nor in the autograph. It is, however, given in other printed editions.—Ed.

3 Tehran edition gives Nussayr in the text and Nasr on the Margin—Ed.

Tayy) al-Kufi engaged himself in the pursuit of knowledge and acquiring proficiency in jurisprudence.<sup>1</sup> Afterwards he took to a life of retirement, solitude and loneliness, and devoted himself to prayers. He used to visit Abu Hanifah (may God be pleased with him). One day in the course of discussions he took pebbles and threw them at a man. Thereupon he (Abu Hanifah) said, "O Abu Sulayman? your tongue has been sharp, and now you have stretched your hand." After that he continued visiting him for a year but he did not put any question nor answered one. Subsequently when he realised that he had acquired proficiency (in jurisprudence) he threw his books in the Euphrates and retired to solitude for prayers. Dawud<sup>2</sup> had three hundred dirhams on which he lived for twenty years spending them on himself. He had inherited a house from his mother, which he never repaired, but kept on shifting from one room to the other until it became uninhabitable. Finally he had to live in the courtyard of the house.

When Muhammad Ibn Qahtabah came to Kufah he said; "For my children I want a tutor who must be well versed in the Book of God, the Sunnah of the Prophet (May God bless him), jurisprudence, syntax and poetry. He was informed that none possessed all these qualities except Dawud al-Ta'i. Thereupon he sent to Dawud a purse containing ten thousand dirhams with the message: 'Spend this money on your maintenance'. Dawud returned the same. Then he (Ibn Qahtabah) sent two purses with two slaves who were promised freedom if they succeeded in making Dawud accept the money. They went to him with that money, which however, he declined to accept. The slaves then said: "In the acceptance of these two purses lies our freedom from slavery." He replied: "In returning them lies my deliverance from the fire of hell. Tell your master to pay this money to one who will accept it more readily."<sup>3</sup> He was informed<sup>4</sup> that his

1 Tehran edition gives the names of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, Hasb Ibn Abi 'Umrah, Syalayman al-A'mash and Muhammad and Abu Nu'aym 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn 'Abi Layla as his masters; and the names of the Isma'il Ibn 'Uyaynah, Mus'ab Ibn al-Muqaddam and Abu Nu'aym Fadl Ibn Dukayn as his disciples.—Ed.

2 In Tehran edition this statement has been ascribed to 'Ubayd Ibn Janad.—Ed.

3 In the Tehran edition, the anecdote is given on the margin and a note is prefixed to it. It runs thus; "In the manuscripts of this book there are many differences. The portions common to all the manuscripts (before me) have been incorporated in the body of the text but I have given on the margin what is found in some manuscripts only e.g., the anecdote of Muhammad Ibn Qahtabah and Dawud.—Ed.

4 Tehran edition ascribes it to 'Abd Allah Ibn Mubarak.—Ed.

wall had cracked, and he could order (its repairs). He replied: "Unnecessary use of glances is disliked."*

It is related<sup>1</sup> that he fasted for forty years, and the members of his family did not know it. (During this time) he worked as a cobbler and carried his meals with him which he distributed in alms on the way and returned in the evening to break his fast; so they did not know that he was fasting.

A man said to him:<sup>2</sup> "Why do you not comb your beard?" He replied: "I am too busy."

Abu 'I-Rabi' al-A'raj (the lame) relates; "I entered the house of Dawud al-Ta'i; he entertained me with dry crumbs; (after eating which) I felt thirsty and came by a vessel containing hot water. I said to him: 'May God pardon you! can't you have another vessel?' He replied: 'If I do not drink but cool water, nor eat other than dainty food, and do not wear but fine clothes, then what shall I preserve for the next world.' He (Abu 'I-Rabi') said 'I asked him to give me a piece of advice,' (Dawud) said to him 'Keep fast (abstain) from world and break it at the time of your death and escape from people as you escape from beasts, keep company with the pious who are less troublesome and of great assistance, and do not secede from the community and this is enough if you act on it."

Once Harun al-Rashid came to Kufah and cause the names of the readers of the Qur'an including Dawud al-Ta'i to be written down; he ordered two thousand dirhams to be given to every one of them. Harun called Dawud by name but he was informed that Dawud did not know it. He ordered the money to be sent him. Ibn al-Simak and Hammad Ibn Abi Hanifah said: "we will carry the money to offer it to him." On the way, Ibn al-Simak said to Hammad: "Scatter this money before him so that the eye may be delighted by it and there is no one who would decline to accept two thousand dirhams." When they were admitted before him they scattered the money before him. Thereupon Dawud said: "This is done with the children." He then declined to accept it.

A maid servant serving Dawud once said to him: "If I prepare food cooked in fat will you eat it?" He replied: "I like it" She prepared food in fat and served it before him. Then he said: "What is the * i.e. people are not supposed to look at what does not concern them.

---

1 Tehran edition ascribes this anecdote to Ibn 'Abi 'Adi.--Ed.

2 Tehran edition ascribes it to Abu 'I-Walid Ibn 'Uqba: Ed.

condition of such and such orphan?" She said: "They are in their usual condition." Then he said to her: "Take this to them." Thereupon she said: "You have not taken food cooked in fat for such and such time." Then he said: "If those orphans take this food it will be raised to the Throne ('Arsh) and if I take it, it will pass to a lavatory." Then she said to him: "Don't you like bread?" He said: "O Madam, fifty verses (of the Qur'an) can be recited during the time one chews a piece of bread and drinks water."

Muharib Ibn Daththar<sup>1</sup> says: "Had Dawud been among the past peoples, God would have spoken of him."<sup>1</sup>

Dawud died in A.H. 160 or 165 (A.D. 772 or 782).

214 DUBAYS IBN SADAQAH

Abu 'I-A'azz Dubays Ibn Sayf al-Dawlah Abu 'I-Hasan Sadaqah Ibn Mansur Ibn Dubays Ibn 'Ali Ibn Mazyad al-Asadi 'al- Nashiri, surnamed Nur al-Dawlah (light of the state), was prince of the Arbas,<sup>2</sup> and lord of the city called al-Hillah al-Mazyadiyah (the mansion of the Mazyad family).<sup>3</sup> Dubays was distinguished for his munificence, generous character, and profound knowledge of belles-letters and poetry. He consolidated his authority during the khalifat of al-Mustashid, and obtained possession of many cities in 'Iraq. The family to which he belonged was of the first rank, his father and his ancestros (having possessed great power, as) we shall mention hereafter under the letter sad -ud- (see Sadaqah). This is the person whom al-Hariri meant, in his thirty-ninth maqamat, by the words: Or else Dubays of the tribe of Asad<sup>4</sup>. They were contemporaries, and al-Hariri's object was not only to gain his favour by mentioning his name in the Maqamat, but also to render homage to his merit.<sup>5</sup> Dubais

1 In the Tehran edition there are additional anecdotes after this.—Ed.

2 See note 3, under no. 78.

3 The town of al-Hillah lies between Baghdad and Kufah.

4 The following is the passage from which these words are taken; "The crowd surrounded Abu Zayd and extolled him; they kissed his hands and thought to gain a blessing by touching his tattered raiment; this made it seem to me that I had Uways al-Qarani before my eyes, or else Dubays of the tribe of Asad. See M. de Sacy's Hariri, page 439. Uways was one of the Tabi is, and noted for his piety.

5 It is related by al-Sharishi, that Dubays, on hearing the compliments paid him by al-Hariri, sent to him a great quantity of rich robes and presents to an immense value (De Sacy's Hariri, page 440).

composed some good poetry, and I have read in 'Imad al-Din's Kharidah, in the History of Arbela by Ibn al-Mustawfi, and in other works besides, that he was the author of the piece of verse rhyming in e,* which contains this line:

"The love he bears your Sulayman has made him the slave of a passion, the slightest pains of which are mortal.

I have found, however, that Ibn Bassam, in his al-Dhakhirah, attributes this poem to Ibn Rashīq, of Qayrawan, and we have already spoken of it in that person's life; it also seems evident that it was composed by Ibn Rashīq, for he is stated in the Dhakhirah to have written it in the year 502, and it is improbable that Dubays, who was at that time a youth, could have produced verses of sufficient merit to become known in Spain and to be attributed to so eminent an author as Ibn Rashīq: it is also to be observed that Ibn Bassam was perfectly well acquainted with the poetry of the western Arabs. Ibn al-Mustawfi relates, in his History, that Dubays received the following lines from his brother Badran, who was then far away from him:

"Tell Mansur,<sup>1</sup> Musayyab,<sup>2</sup> and Dubays that I am stranger in a distant land. May they enjoy the Euphrates and the sweetness of its waters, since a share of it is withheld from me!"

To which he returned this answer:

"Tell Badran, who now, in a distant country, sighs for his native land (and the man of noble soul is never disappointed in his wishes)--tell him to enjoy the pleasures of the moment, for care turneth grey the dark ringlets of hope. God holdeth control over the events which afflict mankind, and the (parched) earth itself obtains a libation from the cup of the generous man."

Another historian informs us that Badran, the son of Sadaqah, bore the honorary title of Taj al-Muluk (the diadem of princes), and that he left Baghdad when his father was put to death, and retired into Syria, where he resided for some time; from thence he removed to Egypt, and died there in the year 502 (A.D. 1108-9). He possessed a talent for poetry, and the Katib 'Imad al-Din has mentioned him in the Kharidah. Dubays was in the service of the Saljuq Sultan,

---

* <sup>e</sup> seems to be a misprint for I J as is from the autograph and the couplet quoted in the text--Ed.

1 Man us was grandfather to Dubays and Badran.

2 Musayyab was probably a near relative to Badran.

Mas'ud Ibn Muhammad Ibn Malik Shah, when that sovereign was encamped outside of the town of al-Maraghah in Adharbayjan; the khalif al-Mustarshid Bi'illah was then with them, having been obliged to accompany the Sultan for reasons which we shall explain in the life of al-Mas'ud. On Thursday the 28th, or according to Ibn al-Mustawfi, the 14th of Dhu T-Qa'dah, A.H. 529 (A.D. 1135), a band of assassins broke into the khalif's tent and murdered him. Apprehensive of incurring the odium excited by this event, the Sultan resolved on representing Dubays as the author of the crime; he therefore waited till the latter came to present his respects, and was seated at the entrance of the imperial tent; he then gave directions to one of his mamluks, who immediately slipped up behind Dubays and struck off his head with a sword. After this execution, the Sultan endeavoured to persuade the public that Dubays was the author of the khalif's death, and had therefore drawn on himself the just vengeance of his sovereign. Dubays was murdered one month after the assassination of the khalif.

(Abu Muhammad Harun Ibn al-'Abbas) al-Ma'muni says in his History: "Dubays was put to death on the 14th of Dhu T-Hijjah of that year, at the Gate of Khuwayy.<sup>1</sup> He had perceived a change in the Sultan's conduct towards him since the murder of al-Mustarshid, and was frequently inclined to take to flight; but his destiny prevented him."

It is stated, however, by Ibn al-Azraq in his History (of Mayyafariqin) that he was slain at the Tabriz Gate, and that his body was borne in a bier to his wife Kuhar Khatusun, who was then at Maridin. This princess had it interred close to the tomb of her father, Naim al-Din al-Ghazi, sovereign صاحب of Maridin, in the funeral chapel erected over his remains in that city. The Sultan then married the daughter of Dubays; her mother, Sharaf Khatusun, was daughter to 'Amid al-Dawlah Ibn Fakh al-din Muhammad Ibn Jahir by his wife Zubaydah, the daughter of the vizir Nizam al-Mulk; of this we shall again speak in the life of Ibn Jahir. Al-Nashiri means descended from Nashirah Ibn Nasr, the chief of a branch sprung from the tribe of Asad Ibn Khuzaimah. هذالنبته الى ناشرة بن نصر بطن اسد بن خزيمه

215 DI'BIL IBN 'ALI AL-KHUZA'I

Abu 'Ali Di'bil Ibn Razin Ibn Sulayman, the celebrated poet, was a member of the tribe of Khuza'ah. The author of the Aghani [Abu al-Faraj al-Isbahani] gives his genealogy as follows: "Di'bil, surnamed Abu 'Ali, was son to 'Ali Ibn Razin Ibn Sulayman Ibn Tamim Ibn Nahshal, or Nahbas,<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khuras Ibn Khalid Ibn Di'bil Ibn Anas Ibn Khuzaimah Ibn Salaman Ibn Aslam Ibn Afsa Ibn Harithah Ibn 'Amr Muzaiqyya."<sup>2</sup> The khatib al-Baghdadi says, however, that he was the son of 'Ali Ibn Razin Ibn 'Uthman Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Budayl Ibn Warqa' al-Khaza'i. His family, which had settled at Baghdad, was originally from Kufah, or, by another account, from Qarqisiya. It is again said that Di'bil was a nickname لقب his real name being al-Hasan, or, according to others, 'Abd al-Rahman, or Muhammad, and that his surname كنية was Abu Ja'far. It is stated also that he was deaf and had a scrofulous swelling on the back of his neck. Di'bil was a good poet, but scurrilous and addicted to satire; always ready to slander men of merit, and sparing none, not even the khalifs. He lived (however) to an advanced age, and he used to say: "For fifty years past I have gone about with my cross on my shoulder, but could find none to crucify me on it." When he composed on Ibrahim Ibn al-Mahdi the piece of verse which we have inserted in that prince's life and which begins thus, 'The son of Shiklah' and his gang', etc. (see no. 8); Ibrahim waited on al-Ma'mun and complained to him, saying: "Commander of the faithful! Almighty God hath favoured thee above me, and inspired thee to show compassion and mercy unto me; we are both of the same family, yet Di'bil insults me in his satires; I therefore pray thee to avenge me." "And what has he said," replied al-Ma'mun; "perhaps, The son of Shiklah, etc.?" repeating the verses. "That is only part of his aspersions," answered Ibrahim, "he has made on me worse than that." "Take example by me," replied al-Ma'mun, 'I have borne in patience a satire made by him against myself, in which he said:

<sup>1</sup> This was one of the gates of Marashah; the road from that city to the town of Khuwayy passed through it, whence its name.

"Does al-Ma'mun take me for a fool? Did he not see, the other night, the head of Muhammad? I belong to the same tribe as those whose swords slew thy brother and ennobled thee with the throne. They raised thy reputation long abased, and drew thee forth from the depth of thy abjectness."

To this Ibrahim replied: "Commander of the faithful! God hath

1 In the autograph MS. this name is written نهنس Nahnas.

* In autograph: Khiraah-Ed.

2 'Amr ['Amir] Muzayqiya was the ancestor of the tribe of Khuza'ah. (De Sacy's Memoire sur l'Histoire des Arabes avant Muhammad, page 188; Rasmussen's Hist. Ar. anteislam. p. 42.

** In autograph and published texts: Ibn Shaklah--Ed.

given thee increase of forbearance and knowledge; none of us speak but out of the superabundance of thy knowledge, and it is in following thy example that we show forbearance."

In the preceding verses, Di'bil alludes to the conduct of Tahir Ibn al-Husayn, of the tribe of Khuza'ah in besieging Baghdad and killing al-Amin Muhammad, the son of al-Rashid, by which he secured the khalifat to al-Ma'mun. The history of this event is well known. It must be recollected also that Di'bil himself belonged to the tribe of Khuza'ah. When these verses came to al-Ma'mun's knowledge, he exclaimed: "May the course of God fall on Di'bil! how impudent he must be to say such a thing of me, who was born in the bosom of the khalifat, suckled at its breast, and brought up in its cradle!"

A close friendship subsisted between Di'bil and Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Ansari,<sup>1</sup> under whose instruction he had attained proficiency in the art of poetry; and it happened that al-Fadl Ibn Sahl (Whose life we shall give), nominated Muslim to a place under government in a certain town in Khurasan or in Fars, called Jurjan. Di'bil went then to visit him, trusting to their mutual friendship for a good reception; but as Muslim took no notice of him, he left him and composed these verses:

"You were false in your friendship and it fell to ruin; you exposed the ties of our mutual attachment till they were broken asunder. Yet I had lodged between my bosom and my heart a treasure of affection which long remained untouched. Spare me your reproaches; I expect nought of you! your honour is lost and can never be retrieved.<sup>2</sup> Consider yourself as a gangrened right hand, which I have cut off; I bear its loss with firmness and my heart has taken courage."

He is the author of the following amatory piece (ghazal):

"Marvel not, (fair) Salma (Salmah)! at a man who weeps (from love) although grey hairs cover his head<sup>3</sup> O my friends! how will you sleep when once my blood is shed? Blame none then for the wrongs I suffered; it was my heart and my eyes which conspired against my life!"

---

1 See note 3. under no. 10.

2 Literally: You are torn to pieces, and I see no means of mending you.

3 Literally: Whilst grayness smiles (or is bright) on his head. The Arabic poets associate with smiles the idea of brightness, because the brightness of the teeth appears in smiling.

A poem of his composition in honour of al-Muttalib Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Malik al-Khuza'i,<sup>1</sup> the amir of Egypt, contains this passage:

"O for the days I passed with al-Muttalib! days on which I pray heaven to shower its blessings! They were to me as a meadow and a paradise. All other favours but yours were ungrateful to me; of all who existed, you alone were my delight. You bettered me, or rather spoiled me, by your kindness; for you caused me to detest the kindness of others."

One of his sayings was: "If a man tell a lie, he incurs public abhorrence; but it is the advantage of poetry, that the more the poet lies, the more he is praised: that is even not sufficient; the auditors swear: 'By Allah! you have done well! So that each false witness borne in his favour is accompanied with a solemn oath.'"

He related also the following anecdote: "Sahl Ibn Harun,<sup>2</sup> the eloquent Katib, was excessively avaricious; we were one day with him at his house, and we kept up the conversation so long that hunger forced him to call for his dinner. A dish was brought up, containing an old dry cock, which no knife could carve and on which the teeth could make no impression. He took a piece of bread, and dipped it in the gravy, and turned over all the contents of the dish, but the cock's head was absent. He reflected some time; then, looking up, he said to the cook: 'Where is the head?' 'I threw it away,' replied the other. 'Why so?' 'Because I thought that you would not eat it.' 'Thou didst think wrong, thou scoundrel,' said Sahl. 'By Allah! I hate the man who would throw away the claws; judge then how I must

---

1 Al-Muttalib was appointed governor of Egypt by al-Ma'mun, A.H., 198 (A.D. 813-4); he was deposed seven months afterwards, but was reinstated in his office the same year. Nineteen months later he was driven out of Egypt by al-Sari Ibn al-Hakam. The country was then in a very unsettled state, in consequence of the civil war between al-Ma'mun and his brother al-Amin. (Nufus.)

2 Sahl Ibn Harun was born in Dastamisan دستیمان an extensive province lying between Wasit, al-Ahwaz, and Basrah. He entered into the service of al-Ma'mun and served him with fidelity as librarian صاحب خزانه الحکمت. By his wisdom and prudence, his talent for poetry, and his literary information, he acquired great celebrity. He composed a number of works on different subjects, the titles of which are given in the Fihrist and the 'Uyun al-Tawa'rikh'; one of them was an imitation of Kalidjah and Dimnoh, and another a treatise in praise of avarice, his ruling passion. He was of a Persian family and showed a strong prejudice against Arabs. Died A.H. 245 (A. D. 859-60). He was equally remarkable for the elegance of his style and the merit of his poetry. (Marasid; Fihrist; 'Uyun al-Tawa'rikh, tom VIII), feel towards him who through away the head. The head is the chief part of the body; in it are four of the senses; by means of it the animal croweth, and were it not for his crowing he would have no merit. The head beareth the comb on which the cock prideth himself; it containeth the two eyes which have given rise to the proverb: Wine bright as the eye of the cock. Moreover the brain is a marvellous specific for pain in the kidneys [kidneys], and never was a softer bone seen than that of the head; didst thou not know that it is better than the pinion of the wings, better than the leg, better than the neck? If it be the result of thy sapient judgement that thou hast not eaten it, go and look for it.' 'By Allah!' exclaimed the cook, 'I know not where it is; I threw it away.' But I know where it is,' said Sahl; 'thou hast thrown it down thy throat; but God shall call thee to an account for it.'

Di'bil was cousin to the celebrated poet Abu Ja'far Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Razin al-Khuza'i, surnamed Abu 'I-Shis,<sup>1</sup> who was one of those who celebrated the praises of al-Rashid and composed elegies on his death; he made also poems in honour of al-Amin, that khalif's son and successor. Di'bil was born A.H. 148 (A.D. 765); he died A.H. 246 (A.D. 860-1), at Tib, a town situated between Wasit in Iraq and the provinces كور of al-Ahwaz. His grandfather Razin was a mawla belonging to 'Ubayd Allah.<sup>2</sup> Ibn Khalaf Khuza'i, the father of Talhat al-Talahat.<sup>3</sup> 'Ubayd Allah ['Abd Allah] was a katib in the service of the khalif 'Umar Ibn al-khattab and chief of the government office<sup>4</sup> at Kufah. Talhat was governor of Sijistan and died in that province. The death of Di'bil was preceded by that of Abu Tammam (Habib), whose life has been given (no. 143): his friend, the poet al-Buhturi, lamented his loss in an elegy which contains the following passage ابيات

"The abode of death, the dwelling of Habib and of Di'bil, has increased my sadness and inflated my grief. Dearest brothers, may the heavens never withhold from your tombs their genial rains; may they overshadow you with a dark cloud, shedding grateful showers. Long was the journey of him who announced to me your death; a tomb is in distant Ahwaz, and mouldering bones repose at Mosul."

1 The printed text has al-Shis, not Abu al-Shis. The letter is the true reading. This poet died A.H. 196 (Mira'at al Zaman) [In autograph--ابوالشيمس Abu al-ghis]-Ed.

2 'Ubayd Allah; not 'Abd Allah, as in the printed text. ['Abd Allah in autograph.]-Ed.

3 See in the life of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir.

4 See note 17, under no. 117.

Di'bil means a tall camel. He used to relate that one day as he was passing along, he saw a man is a fit of epilepsy; on which he went up and shouted in his ear, as loud as he could, the word Di'bil, and that the man rose up and walked away as if nothing had happened.<sup>1</sup>

216 *DA'LAJ IBN AHMAD AL-SIJISTANI

Da'laj Ibn Ahmad Ibn Da'laj Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sijistani was the master of riches and so he dedicated a large portion of his wealth for alms.<sup>2</sup> A person narrates: "One Friday I entered the Mosque in the city of al-Mansur and saw a man in front of me, looking respectable, humble and regular in prayers: he did not cease offering supererogatory prayers from the moment of his entering the mosque to the time of the Imam's standing to lead the prayers; then he sat down. The prayers were offered and he did not join the congregation. this action of his appeared to be strange and I was surprised at it, It annoyed me.

"When the prayers were over I said to him: 'I have not seen a thing stranger than your affair; you offered supererogatory prayers very nicely for a long time but you missed the prescribed prayers and lost them.'" Thereupon he said: 'I have an excuse which prevented me from offering prayers. I said, 'what is that?' He said: 'I owe money to a person for which reason I remained concealed in my house; today I came to the Jami' mosque to offer prayers, but I saw my creditor before the starting of prayers. Fearing him I made my clothes soiled, so I ask you to keep it a secret, for God's sake.' Then I asked who was the person to whom he owed money He said: 'Da'laj Ibn Ahmad.' By his side was an acquaintance of Da'laj whom he did not know. He heard these words and went immediately to Da'laj and related the story before him. Then Da'laj said to him: 'Go to the man and make him enter the bath and cover him with

---

1 This is note very intelligible; it means, perhaps that Di'bil's satirical character rendered him an object of general apprehension, and that the terror inspired by his name was sufficient to compel the evil spirit with which the epileptic man was possessed.

* This notice is note given in de slane, nor is it to be found in the autograph. The printed editions have it.

2 In Tehran edition this anecdote is given on the authority of Al-Khatib who narrated it on the authority of Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'abd Allah al-Haddad, Our rendering is based on Cairo (1948) edition clothes from me,' and made him sit. He showed him his account and said that he owed 5000 dirhams to him. Then he said to him: 'Examine it, if there is any error in it, or if you have paid any thing.' He said: 'No. The account is correct.' Then Da'laj crossed his accounts and noted clearance of the amount. He weighed 5000 dirhams and said to him: 'I offer (lit. make lawful) this to you and request you to accept this money and relieve me of the responsibility of that fear which prevented you from offering congregational prayers.'" Da'laj died in A.H. 351 (A.D. 953).

217 ABU BAKR DULAF AL-SHIBLI

Abu Bakr Dulaf Ibn Jahdar (or Ja'far) Ibn Yunus, (his name is thus inscribed on his tomb), surnamed al-Shibi, a celebrated saint, <sup>الصالح</sup> was born and brought up at Baghdad, but his family belonged to Khurasan <sup>الخراساني</sup>. This highly respected sufi* followed the doctrines of the sect of malik and had for masters (in the spiritual life) [Abu al-Qasim] al-Junayd* and other holy men of that epoch <sup>رضي الله عنهم</sup>. He renounced the world at one of Khayr al-Nassaj's<sup>1</sup> assemblies, and then proceeded to Dunbawand (Demavend), of which he was governor at the time, and asked of the inhabitants immunity for his past conduct; (he then gave in his dismission). The mortifications

* [In autograph the term sufi is not mentioned].--Ed.

[In autograph and published texts: He was extremely particular about respecting Shari'ah <sup>كان يبالغ في تعظيم الشرع الطهره</sup> ]--Ed.

1 The celebrated ascete and great sufi doctor. Abu 'I-Hasan Muhammad Ibn Isma'il, more generally known by the name of Khayr al-Nassaj, was a native of Sammara, and an inhabitant of Baghdad. He had for masters in the spiritual life Sari al-Saqati and the famous Abu Hamzah Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim. Many anecdotes are related of his miraculous gifts. He died A.H. 322 (A.D. 934), aged upwards of one hundred years. (Al-Dhahabi; Ta'rikh al-Islam, MS No: 646.). Khayr al-Nassaj as al-Dhahabi pronounces it, means Khayr or Good, the weaver. This historian related that he came by his name in the following manner. On his return from a pilgrimage to Makkah, he passed through Kufah, where, as his complexion was very dark, a man stopped him and said: "Thou art my negro slave --arbi-- and thy name is Khayr." He remained in captivity for some years and worked as a silk weaver, whence his name. His master at length relented and gave him his liberty, saying: "Thou wast not slave," But Jami, in his lives of the Sufis [Nafahat] (MS. fonds Anquetil, No. 115), gives a different account of the origin of this appellation according to him, our doctor was named Khayr al-Nussaj (excellent among weavers), because he had been obliged to take to weaving in order to gain his livelihood, and his first essays proved him to be already--by a miraculous interference of Providence--an able workman at the trade. [See no. 210].--Ed.

مجاهداته which he practised at the outset (of his religious career) surpassed all bounds: he used to apply a certain quantity of salt to his eyes in place of kuhl or antimony,<sup>1</sup> so as to accustom himself to waking and to aid in keeping away sleep. He held the pure and holy law (the Qur'an) in extreme reverence, and at the beginning of the blessed month of Ramadan he renewed his devotional practices with increased fervour. "This," he would say, "is a month which my Lord hath honoured; how much more therefore should I honour it!" Towards the close of his life, he frequently recited this verse:

"There are many stations in life, in which, had I filled them, my death would have been considered by the (sufi) brethren (not as a reward but) as a punishment."<sup>2</sup>

He went in one day to al-Junayd and, standing before him, clapped his hands (with grief) and spoke these verses:

"The objects of my love accustomed me to union with them, and union is sweet; but they have since repelled my advances, and a repulse is painful. When they resolved (to reject me), they pretended that my crime was my extreme love for them; but that is not a crime. No! as true as the submission (of the lover) when he meets his mistress! No! the beloved can only repay (the lover's passion) by loving (him)."

To this Al-Junayd replied:

"I longed to see thee, (O my beloved!) but when I saw thee, sudden joy overcame me, and I could not refrain from tears."

The Khatib relates in his History that Abu 'I-Hasan al-Tamimi said: "I went one day into the house of Abu Bakr al-Shibli and found him in a state of excitation, reciting these verses:

1 See Lane's Modern Egyptians: vol. I, p. 41.

2 Death is considered by the sufis as the greatest blessing which can happen to him who loves God, or, as they express themselves (to the lover); his soul is then delivered from the prison of the body, and obtains at length its long-sought union وصل with the beloved. Had al-Shibli therefore filled an eminent place موضع in the world, his love for the Creator would have been less fervent, and his recompense in after-life less ample. Such appears to me to be the meaning of this very obscure verse. I must observe also, for the intelligence of the lines which follow, that the sufis admit two modes of union with the beloved; the one temporary and the other eternal. The temporary union takes place during the ecstatic fits حال which the lover experiences, from time to time, in the practice of his devotional exercises; but these are mere transient favours, which the beloved sometimes grants and often withholds, whilst the union effected by death remains unbroken and eternal.

"He who was accustomed to be near thee, cannot support thy absence. The slave of love cannot sustain thy estrangement. His heart sees thee, though his eye does not."

In the life ترجمه of the preacher Abu Sa'id Isma'il Ibn 'Ali the Khatib speaks as follows: "Abu Sa'id repeated to me the following lines which, by his account, he had heard from Tahir al-Khath'amī who mentioned that they had been recited to him by their author, al-Shibli:

"Youth abandoned me; my beloved also departed; and a double flow of tears gushed from my eyes. Fortune was unjust towards thee, (unfortunate lover)! two (friends) bade thee farewell, but thou hadst only one heart (to support the pains)."

Al-Shibli himself relates that, one Friday, he perceived a man out of his senses standing naked in [ عند or near] the mosque of al-Rusafah<sup>1</sup> and crying out: 'I am mad through love of God أنا مجنون الله. On which he said to him: "Why dost thou not go into the mosque and keep out of the sight and say thy prayers?" To which the mad man answered:

"They say to me: 'Visit us and pay us the homage to which we are entitled.' But my present state dispenses me from all such obligations. Those who see the state in which I am, and feel for it neither desire<sup>2</sup> nor dislike;--to love such persons I should consent even to hate myself."

Al-Shibli died at Baghdad on Friday, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 334 (July, A.D. 946), aged eighty-seven years, and was interred in the cemetery of al-Khayzuran: some say, however, that his death took place in the year 335, but the former is the correct date. It is stated also, that he was born at Surra-man-ra'a.

Shibli means belonging to Shiblih, a village in the despatches of Ushrushnah, a large town beyond Samarqand, in Transoxiana.--Dunbawand is a place situated in the canton of Rayy in Persian 'Iraq: some call it Dimawands [Damawand], but the first orthography is more correct.

1 Al-Rusafah was the name of a quarter in the city of Baghdad.

2 The expression يا شرأنا seems equivalent to لم يأتوا من الشرأنا who detest not their own state through the desire of being in Nine.

218 ABU'L-MUTA' DHU'L-QARNAYN IBN HAMDAN

Abu'l-Muta'dhu'l-Qarnayn al-Taghlibi (belonging to the tribe of Taghlib) was son to Abu'l-Muzaffar Hamdan, the son of Nasir al-Dawlah Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Hamdan [al-Taghlibi]. He bore the surname of Wajih al-Dawlah (honourable in the empire). We have already given the genealogy of the family in the life of his grandfather Nasir al-Dawlah (no. 167), and shall not therefore repeat it here. As a poet, Abu'l-Muta' was distinguished by the grace, expression and elegant turn of his ideas. The following verses are of his composition.

"When I see the letters i and a entwined in a close embrace, the word la (-ur-) excites my envy. To embrace so closely, they must have felt, methinks, the pains of love.<sup>1</sup>

Another of his pieces runs thus:

"I am ready to sacrifice my life for her whom I visited (in private); I was then armed with my sword (to protect me against jealous keepers), and her glances were sharper than its edge. I embraced her, and when my neck was encircled with her ringlets, then only did I (dare to disram and) free it from the sword-belt. In that moment, the happiest of us two in the enjoyment of our wishes, was the one who had suffered the greatest affliction from the cruelty of the other."

Al-Tha'libi, in his Yatimah, attributes to him the piece which we have given in the life of [Abi'l-Qasim Ahmad] Ibn Tabataba [al-'Alawi] (no. 52), and which begins thus:

"She said to fleeting image which visited me, etc."

But in his notice on Abu'l-Muta', he states that these verses were composed by Ibn Tabatabah; God knows best. Abu'l-Muta' is the author of the following lines:

---

1 I have read many couplets on this subject, and must acknowledge that Abu'l Muta' 's is decidedly the worst.

"When we met together, and the hour of midnight cast over us a veil of obscurity which shed pleasure when unfolded, none ever passed a chaster night than we; no witnesses were there except our eyes and our honour. No vile delator betrayed us to our foes; no traitor ran with active foot to denounce us."

By the same:

"When my mistress saw me as thin as a toothpick, she said: 'This meeting is but a dream, and thou art merely a fleeting image.'--'Not so, I replied; 'it is thy absence which altered my health so that thou canst not distinguish the reality of my appearance from a false illusion'."

The celebrated poet 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Nubatah composed a great number of pieces in honour of (Hamadan) Abu'l-Muta's father. Abu'l-Muta' died in the month of Safar, A.H. 428 (December, A.D. 1036). He visited Egypt according to al-Musabbihi in his History, during the reign of al-Zahir al-'Ubaydi, the son of al-Hakim, and was appointed by him to the government of Alexandria and its dependencies, in the month of Rajab, 414; he remained there a year, and then returned to Damascus.

219 RABI'AH AL-'ADAWIAH

'Umm al-Khayr<sup>1</sup> Rabi'ah, the daughter of Isma'il, a woman celebrated for her holy life and a native of Basrah, belonged to the tribe of 'Adi ('Adawiah), and was allied by enfranchisement to the family of 'Atik. She was one of the most eminent among the holy persons of the time, and the anecdotes related of her sanctity and piety are generally known. Abu'l-Qasim al-Qushayri says, in his treatise (on sufism)<sup>2</sup>: "She used to say, when holding converse with God: 'Consume with fire, O God, a (presumptuous) heart which loveth thee!' and on one of these occasions, a voice spoke to her and said: 'That we shall not do! think not of us an ill thought.' Sufyan al-Thawri exclaimed one day in her presence: 'O, what anguish is mine!' on which she said: 'Speak not a lie, but rather say: O, how little anguish is mine. If thou wert really in affliction, thou couldst not sigh.' One of the sufi brethren relates as follows: 'In my prayers I used to invoke

1 Umm al-Khayr means the mother of Khayr or of good.

2 See note, under no. 180.

Rabī'ah al-Adawiah, and she appeared to me in a vision and spake: 'Thy offerings were presented to us on trays of light and covered with napkins of light. 'She often said: 'If my (good) works appear (to the world), I count them as nought.' And one of her counsels was: 'Hide thy good deeds as closely as thou wouldst hide thy sins.' The Shaykh Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardi quotes the following verses of hers in the 'Awarif al-Ma'arif:

"I reserve my heart for thy converse, (O Lord!) and leave my body to keep company with those who desire my society. My body is thus the companion of the visitor, but my dearly beloved is the companion of my heart."

She died A.H. 135 (A.D. 752-3), according to Ibn al-Jawzi in the Shu'ub al-Uqud but in A.H. 185 (A.D. 801), according to another authority. Her tomb, which is situated on the mount of Tor [named, al-Tur] on the eastern side of Jerusalem, is an object of pilgrimage. Ibn al-Jawzi has an article on Rabī'ah in his Safwat al-Safwah, and he there gives the following anecdotes respecting her, the authenticity of which is certified by a list prefixed to them, in which he enumerates the names of the persons through whom they passed down successively from 'Abdah the daughter of Abi Shawwal to himself. He says: (Abdah), one of God's excellent handmaids and the servant of Rabī'ah relates as follows: 'Rabī'ah used to pass the whole night in prayer, and at morning dawn she took a slight sleep in her oratory till daylight: and I have heard her say, when she sprang in dread from her couch: O my soul! how long wilt thou sleep? When wilt thou awake? Soon thou shalt sleep to rise no more, till the call shall summon thee on the day of resurrection! This was her constant custom till the time of her death. On its approach she called me and said: O 'Abdah! inform none of my death and shroud me in this gown. This was a gown of hair-cloth which she wore when praying, at the time in which the eyes of others were closed in sleep. I shrouded her in that gown and in a woollen veil which she used to wear; and about a year afterwards, I saw her in a dream clothed in a gown of green satin and a veil of green silk, the like of which for beauty I never beheld. And I said: 'O Rabī'ah! what has become of the gown in which I shrouded thee, and of the woollen veil?' To which she answered: 'By Allah! it was taken off me and I received in exchange what thou seest on me; my shroud was folded up, a sea was put upon it and it was taken up to the highest heaven, that by it my reward might be complete on the day of resurrection. "It was for this," I observed, 'that thou didst work when in the world.' 'And what is this,' she rejoined, 'compared with what I saw of Almighty God's bounty to his saints!' I then asked her in what state was 'Ubaydah,<sup>3</sup> the daughter of Abu Kallab, and she replied: 'It cannot be described! by Allah! she has surpassed us, and reached the highest place in paradise.' 'And how so?' said I, 'When the people considered thee far, far above her.' To which she answered: 'Because, when in the world, she cared not what her state might be on the next morning or the next night.' 'And what doeth Abu Malik Daigham?' 'He visiteth Almighty God when he pleaseth.' 'And Bishr Ibn Mansur?'<sup>4</sup> 'Admirable! admirable! he hath received a recompense far beyond his hopes.' I then said to her: 'Tell me a means by which I may approach nearer to Almighty God.' And she answered: 'Think on Him often, and by that thou wilt, after a little while, be happy in thy tomb.'

220 RABI'AH AL-RAI

Abu 'Uthman Rabi'ah Ibn Abi 'Abd Rahman Farrukh, a mawla' of the Munkadir family which belongs to the tribe of Temim, and afterwards a mawla' of the tribe of Quraysh, was the great jurisconsult of Medinah (in the second century of Islamism), and is generally known by the surname of Rabi' al-Rai (Faqih ahl al-Madina).<sup>1</sup> In his youth he met a number of the Prophet's Companions (and received instruction from them in Traditions and legal matters); and from him Malik Ibn Anas drew some of his information. The following anecdote is related of him by Bakr Ibn 'Abd Allah al-San'ani (a native of San'a'): "Malik Ibn Anas came to our (town) and began to teach to us Traditions learned by him from Rabi'ah al-Rai; for we were desirous of obtaining from him as many as possible, founded on so good an authority as that 3 'Ubaydah, the daughter of Kallab, a celebrated saint, wept for her sins during forty years, and then lost her sight.--(Siyar al-Salihat M.S. No. 855, f. 28).

4 Abu Muhammad Bishr Ibn Mansur al-Sulaymi (belonging to the tribe of Sulaym) was celebrated for his intense application to the practice of devotion. As a Traditionist he is considered a sure authority, and is cited as such by Ahmad Ibn Hanbal. He died A.H. 209 (A.D. 824)--(Mira'at al-Zaman, No. 640, fol. 69).

1 Rabi'ah. al-Rai, or more regularly Rabi'at al-Rai, means private judgment Rabi'ah. He was so called because he draw many of his legal decisions from the fourth source of Muhammadan law, and which is entitled rai (view, private judgment) or qias (analogy). (See note, under No. 2. The same system was followed later by Abu Hanifah, whence the followers of his sect were called the partisans of private judgment (Ashab al-Rai).

of Rabi'ah. One day, he said to us: 'Why (then) do you leave Rabi'ah sleeping in that arcade over there?' We immediately went to a Rabi'ah, and having awaked him, we said: 'Art thou Rabi'ah?' 'Yes,' was the reply. 'Art thou the person on whose authority Malik Ibn Anas gives Traditions?' 'Yes,' 'How then does Malik enjoy (public) favour through thy means, although thou hast not acquired it for thyself?' 'Know ye not,' replied he, 'that an ounce of worldly wit goes farther than a camel-load of learning?'

Rabi'ah was a great talker, and he used to say that he who keeps silent should be classed between him who is asleep and him who is dumb. Whilst he was one day speaking at one of his public conferences<sup>2</sup> مجلس an Arab, fresh from the desert, came in and stood for a long time before him, listening to his words; Rabi'ah who thought that the stranger was in admiration at what he heard, said to him: "O Arab! how do your people define eloquence?" "The other answered: 'Brevity combined with precision.' And what is incorrection?"<sup>3</sup> "That which thou hast been engaged in all day." This answer covered Rabi'ah with confusion.

Abu 'Abd al-Rahman Farrukh, the father of Rabi'ah, went on a military expedition to Khurasan in the time of the Umayyad Rule. Rabi'ah's mother had conceived him; he left thirty thousand dinars with his wife. He came back to Madinah after twenty-seven years on a horse with a spear in his hand. He reached his home and knocked the door with his spear. Rabi'ah came out and said to him: 'O enemy of God! Do you enter my house?' Farrukh said: 'O enemy of God, you have entered my house.' Both of them grappled with each other till the neighbours assembled. The report reached Malik Ibn Anas. They (Malik with his disciples) came to help Rabi'ah and there was much noise. Each one of the two was saying: "I shall not spare you." But when they saw Malik they became quiet. Malik said: "O old man, there is room for you in a house besides this." The old man replied: "This is my house and I am Farrukh." His wife heard his words; she came out and said: "This is my husband, and this is my son who was in my womb and was born when he (Farrukh) had left." Both of them embraced each other and wept. Then Farrukh entered the house and said: "Is he my son?" She replied: "Yes". He said! "Bring out the money that is with you". She said: "I have buried it and now I shall dig it out." Rabi'ah went to the mosque and sat in his circle (halqah).

---

2 Literally: At one of his sittings.

3 The word عي here translated by incorrections, is employed to denote the contrary of eloquence; it consists in verbosity and ideas inadequately expressed.

Then Malik, Hasan<sup>4</sup> and other respectable persons of Madinah came to him and benefited by his talk. (In the meantime) his mother said to her husband, Farrukh: "Go and offer prayers in the mosque of the Prophet." Then he went there and noticed a great circle; he went there and stood nearby. Rabi'ah bent his head in a manner as if he had not seen him; he (Rabi'ah) had a long cap on his head. His father began to doubt about him, and said: 'who is this man?'. He was told that it was Rabi'ah Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman. Then he said: "God has exalted my son," and returned to his house. He said: "I have seen your son in a position which is not held by any scholar of Faqih." His mother said to him: "Which is dearer to you, 30000 dinars or this son?" He replied: "By God, this son". She said: 'I spent all the money on him,' to which he replied: "By God, you have not wasted it."

Sawwar Ibn 'Abd-Allah said, "I have not seen a scholar greater than Rabi'ah al-Rai," I said: "Neither Hasan, nor Ibn Sirin?" He replied: "no neither Hasan, nor Ibn Sirin."

There was none more generous than Rabi'ah towards his friends and others in Madinah; he spent 40000 dirhems on his brethren; then he begged them something. He was told that he had wasted his wealth and wanted to aspire for a position. He replied: "This condition of mine shall not last long, and I never found among them anyone envying my position."<sup>5</sup>

He died A.H. 136 (A.D. 753-4), some say 130, at al-Hashimiyah, a city built in the province ارض of al-Anbar by al-Saffah, who made it his place of residence, but afterwards removed to al-Anbar. It was said by Malik Ibn Anas, that the science of jurisprudence had lost its sweetness since the death of Rabi'ah al-Rai. I must observe that it is impossible to conciliate the statement made by some, that he died A.H. 130, with the fact of his burial at al-Hashimiyah, the city founded by (the khalif) al-Saffah; for that price, as it is agreed by all historians, did not obtain the khalifat till Friday, 13th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 132 (29th November, A.D. 749).

4 The famous scholar Shaykh Hasan Basri.

5 This anecdote is not given in the autograph, nor in de slane's translation. It has however been included in the published texts of the Cairo and Tehran editions and has been translated and added here by the editor-Ed.

221 AL-RABI' IBN SULAYMAN AL-MURADI

The mua'dhdhin Abū Muhammad al-Rabi' Ibn Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbar Ibn Kamīl, a native of Basrah, and allied by enfranchisement to the tribe of Murad (Muradi), was a disciple of al-Shafi'i, and through him, most of the works composed by that imam were handed down by oral dictation.<sup>1</sup> Al-Shafi'i said of him: "Al Rabi' is the special traditionist of my words and works."<sup>2</sup> He said again, that none ever served him (so dutifully) as al-Rabi';<sup>3</sup> and he sometimes addressed him in these words: "O Rabi' could I feed thee with science, علم I should do it." The following narration is attributed to al-Rabi' on good authority: "When al-Shafi'i was near his death, I went in and found with him al-Buwayti al-Muzani and Ibn al-Hakam.<sup>4</sup> He looked to us and then said: 'As for thee, Abu Ya'qub! (meaning al-Buwayti) thou shalt die in chains<sup>5</sup>; thou, Muzani! shalt meet with various adventures in Egypt, and shalt make the time be remembered in which thou wert the ablest reasoner of the age;<sup>6</sup> thou, O Muhammad! (addressing himself to Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam) wilt pass over to sect of Malik; and thou, O Rabi'! shalt be to me the most useful of all, in propagating the knowledge of the works which I have composed. Arise Abu Ya'qub! and take charge of my class." Al-Rabi' then related that all which al-Shafi'i foretold to them came to pass, and that he might be said to have looked, at that moment, through a transparent veil into futurity. In the History of Baghdad by the Khatib, (the same anecdote) is thus related, in the life of al-Buwayti: Al-Rabi' Ibn Sulayman said: We were sitting in the presence of al-Shafi'i, I, al-Buwayti and al-Muzani, when he looked at al-Buwayti and spoke these words: 'Observe this person; he will die in chains.' He then cast his eyes on al-Muzani and said: 'Look at this man; the time will be wherein he shall never explain a difficulty and be mistaken.' Turning then to me, he spoke thus: 'By Allah! there is not one of the fraternity more useful to me than he. I should like to fill him to the utmost with knowledge.'" This Rabi' was the last

---

1 This is an additional proof of a circumstance already known, that in the first ages of Islamism, many authors never put their work in writing, but taught them to their scholars viva voce.

2 Literally: Al-Rabi' is my rawi (or traditionist).

3 The disciples of learned men frequently filled the duties of servants of them.

4 The lives of these doctors are given by Ibn Khallikan.

5 Literally: In thy iron; that is, in the irons which shall bind thee.

6 Or the most skilful in making analogical deductions.

of those auditors of al-Shafi'i who handed down, in Egypt the sayings of their master. I found in the hand-writing of the Hafiz [Zaki al-Din] 'Abd al-'Azim al-Mundhiri, the following verses, which he gives as al-Rabi's:

“(Let thy) patience be exemplary (under misfortune), and how quick shall be thy deliverance! He shall be saved who, in all his actions, seventh God with a sincere heart. He who feareth God shall not be afflicted, and he who hopeth in God shall go to that place (heaven) for which he hoped”.

Al-Rabi' died in Egypt on Monday, the 19th of Shawwal, A.H. 270 (April, A.D. 884), and was interred in the Qarafah, near the north side, hard by (the mosque of) al-Fuqqa'i.<sup>7</sup> His tomb is surrounded by a railing, and at the head of grave there is a marble slab, bearing his name and the date of his death.

Muradi means belonging to Murad, a great tribe in Yaman from which many persons have sprung.

222 AL-RABI' AL-JIZI

Abu Muhammad al-Rabi' Ibn Sulayman Ibn Dawud Ibn al-A'raj al-Jizi, a native of Egypt and a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Azd, was one of al-Shafi'i's disciples, but handed down very little of his master's doctrines: numerous traditions are given by him, however, on the authority of Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam. His veracity as a traditionist is universally admitted, and he is quoted by Abu Dawud (the author of the Sunan) and by al-Nasai. “He died in the month of Dhu'i-Hijjah, A.D. 256 (November, A.D. 870), at Jizah, where his tomb is still to be seen.” Such are the words of al-Quda'i in his Khitat.

Jizi means belonging to Jizah; this is a village opposite to Cairo, from which it is separated by the Nile. In the canton of Jizah, and near to the village, are situated those stupendous erections, the pyramids.

---

7 The mosque of al-Fuqqa'i, a large edifice built by Kafur, bears the name of Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Hasan al-Fuqqa'i (over whose tomb it was probably erected). His father al-Hasan was a brewer (Fuqqa'i). (Al-Maqarizi.)

"(It has been stated that he passed one day through Egypt, ashes were poured on him from an urn. He got down from his beast and began to shake it off from his clothes, but did not utter a word. It was said to him; "Why do you not reproach them." He said: "He who deserves (hell) fire and he is made to reconcile with the ashes, really gains (something).

** (One of the sages says; "There is not a single edifice on the face of the earth on which I have not composed an elegy because of (the cruelty of) days and night except two pyramids from (the cruelty of which) I compose the elegy of days and nights.***

Abu'l-Tayyib al-Mutanabi says about them:

"Where is the person whose constructions are the two pyramids? Where is his abode? What about his time and resting-place? Sometimes relics survive their owners, and some times ruination overtakes them immediately after them."

It has been stated that the pyramids are the tomb of great kings, who wanted to be distinguished from all other kings after their death as they were in their life. They wanted that their memory should live on account of their pyramids, even after the lapse of long period and spans of ages. "When Caliph al-Ma'mun al-Rashid came to Egypt, he ordered (his architects) to pierce one of the two pyramids with holes. After hard labour and crushing toil one of them was pierced through. They found that inside it were ladders and awe-inspiring chasms. It was very difficult to walk through them, and above it they found a cubical construction, each side of which was about eight cubits. In the centre of it was a cistern of marble covered with decaying and wornout bones on which several ages had passed. Then he stopped the piercing of other pyramids; the expenditure incurred on piercing was excessive and toil very great.

It is stated that Hermes I who possessed the three attributes of prophet, kings and sages, and who is identified as the Propoet Henoah and he, in his turn, is Idris, inferred the coming of a deluge from the position of the stars. So he ordered the construction of the

---

* The statement is not found in the autograph or in de Slane's edition. It however, is included in subsequent editions--Ed.

** This anecdote is not to be found in the autograph or de Slane's edition. It is however, included in subsequent edition--Ed.

*** He refers to the fact that the passage of time brings decay and ruin to constructions however strong, they be; only the two pyramids defy the effects of weather--Ed.

pyramids and depositing there (the objects) the loss of which was feared. It is stated that he built them during a period of six months and covered them with dibaj (veriegated brocade), and inscribed there, "We have constructed them in a period of six months. Say to one who comes after us to demolish them in six hundred years (if he can), although demolition is easier than construction. We have covered them with dibaj, let him (who comes after us) cover them with mat; and it is easier to find mat than dibaj)." <sup>1</sup>

223 AL-RABI' IBN YUNUS

Abu'l-Fadl al-Rabi' was the son of Yunus Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Farwah al-Haffar. This last, whose real name was Kaysan, had been a slave (mawla') to al-Harith, by whom he was sold to (the Khalif) 'Uthman Ibn 'Affan. Al-Rabi' served (the Khalif) Abu Ja'far al-Mansur in the capacity of hajib,<sup>1</sup> and later, in that of a vizir on the deposition of Abu Ayyub al-Muriyani (whose life we shall give). Al-Mansur placed great confidence in him and treated him with signal favour; he said to him one day: "Ask me, Rabi! Whatever you please;" and al-Rabi' answered: "I should wish you to feel friendship for my son al-Fadl." "Alas!" replied al-Mansur, "know you not that friendship must have motives?" "But it depends on yourself," said al-Rabi', to have motives for loving him." "And how so?" asked the khalif. "Treat him with kindness," replied the other, "and he will love you; and when he loves you, you will love him." "By Allah!" exclaimed the prince, "I shall love him even before I have motives for doing so: but tell me why you asked for him my friendship rather than any thing else?" "For this reason:" replied al-Rabi' "when you bear him friendship, the slightest services he renders you will appear great in your eyes; and his greatest delinquencies will be looked on by you as slight errors; his faults will be (considered by you) as the faults of a child, and your protection will be for him as the naked intercessor." In this last expression, he alluded to the words of the poet al-Farazdaq":

---

1 The hajib was one of the principal officers at the courts of princes. He sat at the door of the great hall when his master gave audiences, and he might admit or exclude (hajib) whom he pleased. A curtain (hijab) was hung across the entrance of the hall, and the hajib merely raised the corner of it up, when he chose to let an applicant enter.

"The intercessor who goeth to thee clothed is not like the one who goeth to thee naked."

This verse belongs to a poem composed on 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwam, at the period in which he aspired to the khalifat and gained possession of Hijaz and Traq: this was in the reign of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan the Umayyad. Al-Farazdaq had then quarrelled with his wife al-Nawar<sup>2</sup>, and they both set out from Basrah and proceeded to Makkah, in order that 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr might decide between them. Al-Farazdaq, on arriving, went to stop with Hamzah, the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr, and al-Nawar with Ibn al-Zubayr's wife. The two hosts used their influence in favour of their guests, but Ibn al-Zubayr (yielded to that of his wife and) decided in favour of al-Nawar against al-Farazdaq. The poet then made the verses of which we have spoken, and his words, the naked intercessor, became proverbial to denote any person whose intercession cannot be withstood.

Al-Mansur said one day to al-Rabi': "How sweet should be the world, O Rabi'? were it not for death." "Say rather," replied al-Rabi', "that the world had not been sweet were it not for death." "And how so?" "Because were it not for death, you would never have been sitting on that throne." "You are right," replied the khalif. On the approach of death, al-Mansur said to him: "O Rabi'! we have sacrificed the life to come for a mere dream!" The following anecdote is related by al-Rabi': "We were one day standing behind al-Mansur (who was seated in his hall of audience), and a cushion had been placed on the floor for al-Mahdi, who had been nominated successor to the khalifat; at that moment entered Salih, another of al-Mansur's sons, who had been endeavouring to obtain from his father the concession of some post of authority for himself. He advanced between the double rank of courtiers which extended from the throne to the entrance of the hall<sup>3</sup>, and in which they all held places corresponding to the nobleness of their descent and the eminence of the posts they filled; he then stopped and addressed the khalif in elegant terms. When he had finished, al-Mansur held forth his hand and said: 'Come to me, my dear son!' He then took him to his arms, and looked towards the principal persons present, expecting to hear one of them celebrate the praises of his son and the high favour which his parent had shown him, but this none of them dare to do through dread

2 See the life of al-Farazdaq, inserted by M. Caussian de Perceval in the Journal Asiatique for 1834.

3 It was here necessary, for the sake of clearness, to paraphrase the text.

of al-Mahdi. Then Shabbah Ibn 'Iqal al-Tamimi rose up and said: 'Admirable is the flow of words which preceded from the orator who stood before thee, O Commander of the faithful! How eloquent a tongue! What fine expression! What sharpness of intelligence! What copiousness of language! and what an elegant turn of thought! But could it be otherwise in one whose father is the commander of the faithful, and who has al-Mahdi for brother? We must say of him in the words of the poet:

"That noble courser may, by exertions, come up with his two competitors; for a steed like him can keep pace with the best. Those two may outrun him if he abates his speed; but the excellent (Salih) horse such as they outrun, is able to distance all other rivals.'

The company were filled with admiration at the address displayed by the speaker in making simultaneously the eulogium of the two brothers, and by this means not only satisfying the desires of al-Mansur, but avoiding to offend al-Mahdi. Then, said al-Rabi', "the khalif told me not to suffer al-Tamimi to withdraw till he received a gift of thirty thousand dirhems, and this order I obeyed."

It is said that none knew who al-Rabi's father was, and that one day, a member of the Hashimite (imperial) family entered into the presence of al-Mansur and said repeatedly, whilst conversing with him: "My father, may God be merciful to him! did so and so." on which al-Rabi' said to him: "How often wilt thou implore God's mercy on thy father? Consider that thou art in the presence of the Commander of the faithful"<sup>4</sup> To this the other replied; "I can excuse thee, O Rabi'! for thou knowest not the value of ancestors." This retort covered him with confusion.

("The khalif) Abu Ja'far al-Mansur visited Madinah and said to al-Rabi' on entering the city: "Find me some learned and intelligent person who can point out to me the (chief) mansions of the place; It is now so long since I saw the dwellings of my family." A most intelligent and well informed youth was discovered by al-Rabi' and presented to the khalif; (during their excursion), the guide did not make any observations unless asked by al-Mansur to do so; but he then proceeded, with great precision and beauty of expression, to furnish every requisite information. Al-Mansur was so highly pleased with him, that he ordered him a considerable sum of money, but the payment was delayed so long, that the youth found himself under 4 Politeness and court etiquette required that no words should be uttered before the sovereign which might call to his mind the idea of death.

---

the necessity of asking for it, (and this he did in the following manner): As they passed by the house which belonged to 'Atikah, the daughter of 'Abd Allah and grand daughter of Abu Sufyan, the young man said. "This O Commander of the faithful! is the house of that 'Atikah to whom al-Ahwas Ibn Muhammad al-Ansari<sup>5</sup> alluded in these lines:

'Dwelling of 'Atikah! mansion which I avoid through dread of foes, although my heart be fixed on thee! I turn away and fly thee; but yet unconsciously I turn towards thee again."

Those words caused al-Mansur to reflect, and he said to himself that the youth must have here some reason for giving his information, without being asked for it. He therefore turned over the leaves of the poem from which the verses were taken, and examined it, passage by passage, till he came to the following line:

"We see that you do what you promise, but there are persons, with deceitful tongue, who promise, but never perform."

He immediately asked al-Rabi' if he had given the youth what had been awarded him, and was informed by him, that a particular circumstance, which he mentioned, had caused a delay in the payment. The khalif then ordered him to give him immediately the double of what had been promised. The youth had certainly taken a most delicate manner of hinting the circumstance, and al-Mansur showed great penetration in perceiving it.

The following anecdote is related by Faiqah, the daughter of 'Abd Allah and mother of 'Abd al-Wahid Ibn Ja'far Ibn Sulayman: "We were one day with the khalif al-Mahdi, who had just returned from al-Anbar, to which he had made an excursion for pleasure, when al-Rabi' came in, holding a piece of leather, on which some words were written in charcoal and to which was attached a seal composed of clay mixed with ashes and bearing the impression of the khalif's signet-ring. 'Commander of the faithful!' said al-Rabi', 'I never saw anything more extraordinary than this document; I received it from 5 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad al-Ansari, surnamed al-Ahwas <sup>الحوص</sup> and not al-Akhwas, as all the MSS of Ibn Khallikan have it, was a descendant, as his name indicates, of one of the Ansars. He cultivated poetry and such was the virulence of his satire, that 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al 'Aziz banished him to the island of Dahlak, in the Red Sea, on the death of 'Umar, his successor Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik recalled him and he died A.H. 179 (A.D. 795--6), 'Uyun al-Tawa'rikh. I perceive that in the autograph MS. his name is written correctly.

---

an Arab of the Desert who was crying out: This is the Commander of the faithfull's letter! show me where to find the man who is called al-Rabi', for it is to him that he told me to deliver it! Al-Mahdi took letter and laughed; 'It is true; this is my writting and this is my seal; shall I relate how it happened?' To this we replied: 'If it please the Commander of the faithful<sup>6</sup>. And he spoke thus: I, went out to hunt yesterday evening when the shower was over; the next morning a thick mist overwhelmed us and I lost sight of my companions; I then suffered such cold, hunger, and thirst as God only know, and I lost my way besides. At that moment came to my mind a form of prayer which my father (al-Mansur) had taught me, saying that his father (Muhammad) had learned it from his grandfather ('Ali'), who had been taught it by (his father 'Abd 'Allah') the son of 'Abbas'. It was this: He who sayeth morning and evening: In the name of God! and by the might of God! We have no power of force but in God! I fly to God for protection! I confide in God! God sufficeth me! we have no Power or force but in God, the High! the Mighty! He protecteth sufficeth, directeth, and healeth-from fire and flood; from the fall of house and from evil death! When I had uttered these words, God raised up a light before me, and I went towards it, and lo! I found this very Arab of the Desert in his tent, with a fire which he had been just lighting up.<sup>7</sup> 'Arab of the Desert,' said I, 'hast thou withal to treat a guest?' 'Dismount,' said he. And I dismounted, and he said to his wife: 'Bring here that barley.' And she brought it. 'Grind it,' said he; and she began to grind it. I then said to him. 'Give me a drink of water;' and he brought me a skin in which was a little milk, mixed with more water; and I drank thereof a drink such as I had never drunk before, it was so sweet! and he gave me one of his saddlecloths and I laid my head upon it. And never did I sleep a sounder or a sweeter sleep. On awaking, I saw him seize on a poor miserable sheep, and kill it, when his wife said to him; 'Beware, wretched man"! thou that hast slain thyself and thy children; your nourishment came from this sheep and yet thou hast killed it! What then have we to live on'? On this I said: 'Do not mind! bring the sheep here; 'and I opened it with the knife I wore in my boot and I took out the liver, and having split it open I placed it upon the fire, and I ate thereof. I then said to him: 'Dost thou want any thing? I shall give thee a written order for it.' On this he brought me that piece of leather, and I wrote on it with a bit of burnt wood which I picked up at his feet, that very note; I then set this seal on it, and told him to go and ask for one al-Rabi', to whom he was to give it. This note contained, an order for five hundred thousand dirhems and al-Mahdi exclaimed, on learning it: 'By Allah! I meant only fifty thousand, but since five hundred thousand are written in it, I shall not diminish the sum one single dirhem; and were there no more in the treasury, he should have it. So give him beasts of burden and let him take it away.' In a very short time, that Arab had numerous flocks of camels and sheep, and this mansion became a halting-place for those who were going on the pilgrimage, and it received the name of the Dwelling of 'the host of al-Mahdi منزل شيخ امير المؤمنين المهدي the Commander of the faithful.<sup>8</sup> al-Rabi' died towards the beginning of the year 170 (July, A.D. 786), but al-Tabari places his death in the year 169. Some say that he was poisoned by (the new khalif) al-Hadi; but, according to another statement, he was ill for eight days and then expired. His ancestor was called Abu Farwah because he wore a furred cloak (farwah) when brought to Madinah, where he was purchased by Uthman; having received his liberty from that khalif, he turned grave-digger (haffar). He was one of the captives taken at Jabal al-Khalil (the mountain of al-Khalil).<sup>9</sup> As for al-Fadl, the son of al-Rabi', we shall give his life. The great and well known quarter of Baghdad, the Grant of al-Rabi', was so called because the possession of it had been conceded to al-Rabi' by (the Khalif) al-Mansur.

6 Literally: The Commander of the faithful is predominant in opinion on the subject.

7 According to the old Arabic custom. The dwellers in the Desert lit fires at night to guide travellers to their hospitable tents.

*And he used to say, "He who has to talk to the kings, should choose such time that he can succeed in attaining his object, other wise he should not (talk to them).

224 RIB'I IBN KHIRASH AL-KUFI**

Rib'i Ibn Khirash al-Kufi Ibn Jahsh Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Abd Allah al-

8 Ten thousand pounds sterling, at the lowest estimation:

9 According to Abu 'l-Fida, the river Abu Fators or Auja has its source in the mountain of al-Khalil, which must therefore lie to the north of Jerusalem. The town of al-Khalil or Herbon is situated to the south of that city.

* This statement is not found in the autograph or in de Slane's edition. It is however, included in subsequent editions--Ed.

** This notice is not given by de Slane, nor is it to be found in the autograph. We are giving here the English rendering of the notice in the published text.--Ed.

'Abasi al-Kufi is reported never to have spoken a lie. He had two sons who had revolted against al-Hajjaj. It was as reported to Hajjaj that their father had never spoken a lie; he should be summoned and asked about them. He sent for him and asked him about his sons. "Both are in the house" was the reply. Thereupon al-Hajjaj said: "I forgive them for your veracity."

Rib'i Ibn Khirash had taken a vow not to show his teeth in smiling until he knew his last resting place. He smiled but after his death. Like-wise his brother had vowed not to smile unless he knew whether his abode was in heaven or in hell. The man who washed his corpse related: "He continued smiling till his body, was washed."

(Rib'i) died in A.H. 400 (A.D. 1009-1010).

225 RAJA' IBN HAYAT

Abu Miqdam Raja Ibn Hayat Ibn Jarwal al-Kindi (of the tribe of Kindah) was one of the learned (in the law), and the intimate companion of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz. "I was one night with 'Umar", said he, "and the candle was just going out, when I stood up to trim it; but the khalif insisted on my remaining seated, and he himself rose up to put it in order. On this I said: 'How, Commander of the faithful! thou doest it thyself?' 'I do it,' replied he, (not as the Commander of the faithful but) as 'Umar; and as 'Umar I return to my place.' "He related also the following circumstance "(One day), when 'Umar was preaching from the pulpit, I estimated that his dress was not worth more than twelve dirhems;<sup>1</sup> and he had on a waistcoat, a turban, a shirt, trousers, a mantle, a pair of boots, and a scull-cap." Many anecdotes are related respecting his intimacy with 'Umar. He was once with 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan when a person was spoken ill of in that khalif's presence: "By Allah!" said the prince. "if God deliver him up to me, I shall make him feel the weight of my anger!"<sup>2</sup> When he got the man into his power, he was about to wreak his vengeance on him, but Raja Ibn Hayat rose up and said to him: "Commander of the faithful! God has done what was pleasing to thee, so do thou what is pleasing to God and grant pardon." On hearing these words, the khalif not only pardoned the prisoner, but treated him with particular favour. Raja Ibn Hayat died A.H. 112 (A.D. 730-1). The colour of his hair was red and that of his beard white.<sup>3</sup>

1 About seven shillings.

2 Literally: I shall do and act. See note 13, under No. 31.

"(Raja) says "Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz asked me to purchase cloth worth six dirhams for him. When I brought it, he examined it and said; 'I would have preferred it if there had been no softness in it.'" (Raja) says: (Hearing this remark) I wept. 'Umar said to me; 'what makes you weep?' I replied: "When you were a governor I brought a piece of cloth worth six hundred dirhems and after examination you had said, 'I would have preferred it if it had not been coarse'; and now when you are Amir al-Muminin, and, I brought a piece of cloth worth six dirhams and after examination you remarked, 'I would have preferred it if it had not been soft.' Thereupon 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz said: 'O Raja! I have an ambitious soul which once desired (to possess) Fatimah Bint 'Abd al-Malik whom I married,; again it desired to have governorship (amarat) which I got; subsequently it desired caliphate which I obtained; and not it desired to attain paradise which I hope I'll get if God will."

"*When Ayyub the son and heir-apparent of Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was on the point of death, his father entered (the bedroom) in the company of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, Sa'id Ibn 'Uqbah and Raja' Ibn Haywah, and he was ready to offer himself to death (to save his son). Sulayman began to look into the face of Ayyub and his tears choked (his sobs in his throat); then he said; 'A servant cannot have self-control when grief over-takes him in the face of misfortune. But people are of several kinds, some of them are balanced; some 3 Raja Ibn Hayat was one of the most eminent doctors of the law in the days of primitive Islamism. He taught traditions on the authority of some of the principal Tabi'is, and others such as al Zuhri and Qatadah gave some traditions on his authority. All the doctors are unanimous in extolling his science and merits and it is the quite sufficient to say in his praise, that he was the companion, night and day of the virtuous 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz. The family of Raja inhabited Palestine, to which country they had removed from Maysan.--(Tab al-Fuqaha, fol. 29).

---

* This anecdote is not found in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition; it is however included in subsequent editions. The translation of the portions giving additional information is based on the Cairo edition.

** This anecdote is not found in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition; it is included in subsequent editions-Tr. is based on Cairo ed.--Ed.

others are those whose forbearance controls their grief, they are sturdy and self-confident; while in others grief dominates forbearance; they are weak and like 'to be controlled; but as far as I am concerned I find in my heart such pangs of fear that I do not soothe them, my liver will split because of pain'. 'Umar said to him: 'O Amir al-Muminin! forbearance is worthy of you so that you may not lose your reward. Sa'id Ibn 'Uqbah says; "Then he looked towards me and Raja Ibn Haymah with the looks of one seeking succor, so that we may help him as weeping had overtaken him. I declined from giving him permission or otherwise. But Raja said: 'O Amir al-Muminin there is no harm unless it goes to excess, and I have been informed that the Prophet, may God bless him! had tears in his eyes when his son Ibrahim died, and he (the Prophet) said; 'The eye sheds tears and the heart is afflicted' with grief, but we do not utter what does not please God and we are, O Ibrahim! afflicted with grief because of you' Thereupon Sulayman wept violently and we thought that the arteries of his heart were broken. Then 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz said to Raja Ibn Haywah: 'you have done an injury to the Amir al-Muminin.' He replied, 'O Abu Hafa! let him weep, this will relieve him (of his pangs). If what you see (coming out of his breast) does not emerge (fully), I am afraid, he will be ruined.' Then he ceased weeping and asked for water and washed his face (In the meantime) the youth (Ayyub) passed away and he ordered for his burial and walked in the company of his bier. When he had been interred he looked at his grave said:

'I am standing on the grave of one settled in a desolate land; he parted from a friend with little provision!'

Then he said, 'Ayyub peace be on you'; and added:

'You were associated with us, but now you have parted, so life after you is sour in taste.'

Then he said to his slave to fetch his horse on which he rode and turned towards the grave and said:

'If I have borne with patience (your separation it is not that) I have laid you to rest here because I had many children (lit: I have not ejected you because of satiation); and if I have expressed my grief (it is because) I have lost a valuable precious thing.'

Thereupon 'Umar said; 'Nay! forbearance is in close proximity with God.' He replied; 'it is true', and returned.

226 RU'BAH IBN AL-'AJJAJ

Abu Muhammad Ru'bah Ibn Abi'l Sh'a'tha 'Abd Allah Ibn Ru'bah* was a member of the tribe of Sa'd (al-Sa'di), which is a branch of that of Tamim (al-Tamimi), and a native of Basrah. He and his father (who was surnamed al-'Ajjaj) were both celebrated for their poetical pieces in that style of composition called rajas,<sup>1</sup> the production of each, forming two separate volumes, are all of the rajas class and testify the great abilities of their authors. Ru'bah was an able critic in philology and possessed a perfect acquaintance with the rare and obsolete terms of the language. The following anecdote is related by the grammarian Yunus Ibn Habib<sup>2</sup>: "I was at Abu 'Amr Ibn al-Ala's, when Shubayl Ibn 'Urwah al-Dabu'i entered. Abu 'Amr rose up to receive him, and having placed on the floor the saddle-cloth of his mule that his visitor might sit down on it, he entered into conversation with him. During their discourse, Shubayl said to Abu 'Amr: 'I asked your friend Ru'bah the derivation of his name, but he did not know it.' On hearing Ru'bah spoken of in this manner, I could not refrain from saying: 'You must (at least) suppose that Ma'd the son of Adnan spoke better Arabic than Ru'bah or his father<sup>3</sup>: now, do you know what four things are called ru'bah and that I am the humble disciple of Ru'bah?' Shubayl was unable to reply, and retired highly offended; on which Abu 'Amr turned to me and said: 'There is a respectable man who comes to our conferences and shows us due reference, yet you have offended him by the manner in which you addressed him.' 'But I could not contain myself,' replied I, 'on hearing him speak of Ru'bah as he did.' 'And are you authorised', said Abu 'Amr, 'to correct the faults of others?' Yunus then gave the four meanings of the word Ru'bah, which are: Any substance employed as rennet to coagulate milk; A portion of the night. The wants of a person, ex: He cannot supply the wants (ru'bah) of his

---

* According to the autograph his name was Sh'a'tha while 'Ajjaj was only an epithet--Ed.

1 "Cemetre et de tous les metres celui qui offre le plus de facilite et qui se rapproche le plus de la prose."--(de Sacy's Traite sur la Prosodie arabe). Its rules and decision may be found in Freytag's Arabische Verskunst and Samuel Clark's Prosodia Arabic.

2 His life is given in this work,

3 Ma'd Ibn 'Adnan was the progenitor of the tribes of Azd, Quraysh and Tamim. None ever spoke or understood Arabic better than he and his talent became proverbial. As Ru'bah descended from the tribe of Tamim, Ma'd was in his ancestor.--It appears from Qamus that Shubayl Ibn 'Urwah was son-in law to Qatadah Ibn Diama.

family, that is, things of which they stand in need and which they rely on him to procure; Semen admissari. The same word with a hamza on the second radical letter means, a patch put on a skin carrying water.

Ru'bah resided at Basrah till the revolt of Ibrahīm Ibn 'Abd Allah, the descendant of 'Alī,<sup>4</sup> against al-Mansur, an enterprise of which the results are well known: having then conceived apprehensions for his own safety, he withdrew into the Desert to avoid the scene of warfare, but died on reaching the very place which he had chosen as a refuge. This was in the year 145 (A.D. 762-3); he was the advanced in age.

When the word Ru'bah with a hamza on the second radical, serves as an appellative noun, it means wooden plug used to stop up a hole in a water-pot;<sup>5</sup> its plural is Ri'yab as a proper name, it designates the poet whose life is here given.

*Ru'bah used to eat the mice. When he was reproached for that, he replied; "The mice are cleaner than your domestic fowls and chicken which live on excrements. As regards the mice do they take any thing except clean wheat or pith of food." When he passed away Khalil said: We have buried (the embodiment of) poetry, philology and rhetoric."

227 RAWH IBN HATIM AL-MUHALLABI

Abu Hatim Rawh was the son of Hatim, the son of Qabisah, the son of al-Muhallab, the son of Abu Sufrah, of the tribe of Azd: the remainder of the genealogy shall be given in the life of his great grandfather al-Muhallab. Rawh was renowned for his nobleness of soul and his generosity. He served under five khalifs, namely: al-Saffah, al-Mansur, al-Mahdi, al-Hadi, and al-Rashid. There is no other example, it is said, of such a circumstance having occurred except

---

4 This revolt took place in A.H. 145. See Abu'l-Fida's Annals; Price's Retrospect, vol. II page 16.

5 It means also a wooden skewer employed to pin up a rent in water skin.

* This information, which is not to be found in the autograph, or in de Slane's edition, is subjoined to the notice in subsequent editions.

in the case of Abu Musa al-Ash'ari, who acted as governor for the Prophet, Abu Bakr, 'Umar, Uthman, and 'Ali رضي الله عنهم. In the beginning of his reign, al-Mahdi conferred the government of Kufah on Rawh Ibn Hatim, and afterwards, in the year 159 (A.D. 775-6), he confided to him that of Sind. It is stated however by some, that Rawh was nominated to the government of Sind in the year 160. Al-Mahdi recalled him in 161 and named him governor of Basrah, at the very time in which his brother Yazid Ibn Hatim was acting as that khalif's lieutenant in Ifriqiyah. Yazid died at Qayrawan on Tuesday, the 18th Ramadan, A.H. 170 (March, A.D. 787), after a government of fifteen years and three months, and was interred outside Bab Salm, one of the city-gates. The people of Ifriqiah then said; 'How far apart will the tombs of these two brothers be! The one is now governor in Sind and the other is here.' It so happened, however, that al-Rashid removed Rawh from the government of Sind and sent him to fill the place left vacant by the death of Yazid: he arrived in Ifriqiyah on the first of Rajab, A.H. 171, and continued to govern that province till his death, which took place on the 19th of Ramadan, A.H. 174 (end of January, A.D. 791). He was interred in the same tomb قبر with his brother, and people were much struck with the singularity of their meeting at last, after having been so far asunder. Rabi'ah Ibn Thabit al-Asadi al-Raqqi<sup>1</sup> went to Yazid and recited to him a poem in his honour, for which he was generously rewarded; he had also celebrated the praises of Yazid Ibn Usayd al-Sulami,<sup>2</sup> by whom he was treated in a manner inadequate to his merits: this induced him to compose a poem containing an eulogium on Yazid Ibn Hatim and a satire on Yazid Ibn al-Sulami; from this poem we extract the following passages:

---

1 Ilya dans l'Aghani, Vol. III, fol. 427, un article, our Rabia, fils de Thabit. Co pete etait appeal Communement Erraki Rabi'at prace qu'il etaitne a Rakka الرقة on le qualifie aussi d'Elansari, comme appartenate une famille de Medine. Rabia ful appele par le kalife Mahdi a la cour; it recut because up de presen de ce prince, qu'il loua dans un grand nombre de pieces de vers Ensuite quitta la cour, s'eloinna de l'Irak n' eut plus aucun commerce avec les autres poetes et tomba dans unsorted'oubli. Il etait aveugle. Sous le califat de Haroun Rabia fit un eloge d'Abbas fils de Mohammad fils d'Ali fils d'Abdallah fils d'Abbas fils d'Abdelmottalib. Cet Abbas lui envoya deux dinars. Rabia, irrite d'une telle parsimonie, s'en vengea par deus vers satyriques. Abbas se plaignit au calife, qui fit venier Rabia a avant lui. Instruit de la honteuse lesineric d'Abbas, Haroonile blama vivement, renonca a un-project qu'il avait alore d, epouser sa fille et renvonya Rabia comble de presens. A. CAUSSIN DE PERCEVAL.

2 This is probably the Ibn Usayd al-Sulami mentioned by Ibn el-Athir as having commended an expedition into Armenia in the year 162 (A.D. 778-9).

"How different in generosity are the two Yazids--he of the tribe of Sulaym and the illustrious son of Hatim. Profusion is the Azdite's only aim, but the Qaysite's<sup>3</sup> passion is to gather up dirhams. Let him not think, the dunce! that I design to make a satire on him; I am only extolling the men of generous deeds.

Son of Usayd! strive not to rivalize with the son of Hatim, or thou shalt gnash thy teeth with repentance, His generosity is an ocean, and if you dare to enter it, thou, shalt be overwhelmed by its impetuous waves. Fool that I was! I hoped to find honour in the tribe of Sulaym! What an idle, what a visionary thought! But the family of al-Muhallab is a brilliant constellation, and on the day of battle they lead them of Sulaym (into captivity) as camels are led by the halter fixed in their nose."

We shall confine ourselves to these extracts, as the poem is of a considerable length. Yazid had at first paid little regard to this poet, and was therefore attacked by him in a piece containing this verse:

"I render God due things; but here I am returning with the boots of Hunayn,<sup>4</sup> as a gift from the son of Hatim."

On his second visit to Yazid, he was received with extreme favour and attention. This Yazid was the ancestor of al-Wazir al-Muhallabi (see his life, no. 170).

The following passage, is in the autograph, but has not been included in de Slane's Translation, nor in Cairo and Teheran edition* However in no. 232 a different version if it is given.

[Abu Dulamah Zand Ibn al-Jawn, whose life-sketch will be given under latter, went on a military expedition with Ruh** Ibn Hatim against the Kharijites. (When the armies confronted each other) a Kharijite combatant came out of the file and challenged his adversary. Thereupon Ruh asked Abu Dulamah to accept his challenge: he declined saying:

3 The tribe of Sulaym was descended from that of Qays.

4 This is a common proverbial expression, it means: to be disappointed in one's expectations. Its origin and explanation are to be found in al-Maydani's Proverbs; Freytag's edition, tom.I. p. 539. See also De Sacy's Hariri, p. 104.

* Ruh laughed and excused him from the combat.

** There is a pun upon the word ruh, meaning, soul it was also the name of the commander.

"I take refuge with Ruh from sending me to combat as a consequence of which I will bring disgrace to Banu Ass verily, Muhallab left as a legacy for you the love of death; but such a legacy as that. I did not inherit from one.

I apprise him that my proximity with the enemy will make separate my soul from the body."

And this I apprise. That the act of my drawing near to enemies will produce a separation between souls and bodies.

228 AL-ZUBAYR IBN BAKKAR

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Zubayr Ibn Abi Bakr [Ibn] Bakkar Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Mus'ab Ibn Thabit Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Awwam, sprung from Asad (al-Asadi),<sup>1</sup> a member of the tribe of Quraysh, and a descendant of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr, was one of the most learned men of his time. He filled the place of qadi at Makkah and composed some useful works, such as the Genealogies of the tribe of Quraysh; a most comprehensive treatise and a standing authority on the subject. His other writings display the extensive information and superior abilities of their author. He taught the traditions which he had received from (Sufayan) Ibn 'Uyaynah and others of the same class, and his own authority was cited for traditions by Ibn Majah al-Qazwini, Ibn Abi'd-Duyya<sup>2</sup> and others. He continued to act as qadi

---

1 'Abd Allah fils de Zobayr fils d'Ellawwam est qualifié d' Acapi, parce qu'il appartenait, ainsi que Khadidja, première femme de Mahomet et sœur d'Elawwam, à la famille d' Abdelozza fils de Cossai, branche de Corach. A.C. DE PERCEVAL.

2 Abu Bakr 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ubayd, a member by adaptation of the tribe of Quraysh, a client (mawla) of the Umayyad family and surnamed Ibn Abi'd - Dunya composed some works on ascetic and other subjects. He learned the traditions from a great number of traditionists and taught them to others. He was preceptor to some of the young princes of the 'Abbasid family, and one of his pupils obtained later the khalifat and was surnamed al-Multadid. He received for his services a pension of fifteen dinars a month. Died A.H. 281 (A.D. 894) (History of Baghdad by the Khatib, MS fonds Asseline, No. 541, fol. 72).

at Makkah till his death, which took place on the eve of Sunday the 23rd (or according to others, the 21st of Dhu'i-Qa'dah, A.H. 256 (October, A.D. 870) aged 84 year. His father Bakkar Ibn 'Abd Allah died A.H. 195 (A.D. 810-1).

Zubayr Ibn Bakr

*[Jahazah narrates: "I was in the presence of the Amir Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir, when al-Zubayr Ibn (Bakr Ibn?) Bakkar, on his arrival from Hijaz, asked permission; he entered. (The Amir) received him with honour and respect, and said to him, "Although our descent is distant (not common) yet our training is related (similar), and verily the Amir al-Muminin has selected you as tutor for his son. He has ordered—ten thousand dirhams to be paid to you ten ward-ropes of clothes, and ten mules to carry your luggage to Surra Man Ra'a" He thanked him and accepted the offer. When he bade him farewell, he said to the shaykh: 'Speak something to us for which we may remember you.' He said; 'Should I relate what I have heard or what I have witnessed?' He (Amir) said; 'Nay! what you have witnessed. Thereupon he related: In the course of this journey of mine I was between two mosques.** I saw a dead antelope tied in a rope and in front of it a coffin with the dead body of a man, and by their side an afflicted woman running and saying.

The young maid of Banu Nahd exposed herself while her husband was given in the grip of death;

I liked to be tenacious about him, but from the side of white antelope death overtook him.'

Then he (the Shaykh) went out and Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir said 'How have we been benefited from this Shaykh?' We replied: The Amir knows better. He said; 'By his words in which he used علايه for ظاهره (meaning) and I never heard this word in the speech of Arab before."

Al-Zubayr (Ibn Bakr) Ibn Bakkar said: My niece (my sister's daughter) said to my wife; 'my uncle is very considerate to his wife since he does not marry a second wife nor purchases a maid-servant.' The women replied; 'His books are more trying than three fellow-wives.'" ]

---

* This anecdote is not in the autograph nor in the de Slane's edition. It is, however, included in subsequent edition—Ed.

** He means the Haramayn ie, the Ka'bah and the Mosque of the Prophet.

229 ABU 'ABD ALLAH AL-ZUBAYR

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Zubayr Ibn Ahmad Ibn Sulayman Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Asim Ibn al-Mundhir Ibn al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwam, surnamed al-Zubayri, was a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shafi'i, and the chief imam and professor of that time at Basrah his native city. Perfectly acquainted with the legal doctrines of his sect, he possessed besides some knowledge of belles-letters. Having removed to Baghdad, he thought the traditions on the authority of Dawud Ibn Sulayman al-Muwaddib, Muhammad Ibn Sinan al-Qazzaz<sup>1</sup>, Ibrahim Ibn al-Walid, and others of the same class: his veracity and exactitude were universally acknowledged, and his own authority was given for traditions by Al-Naqqash the author of the Commentary on the Qur'an by 'Umar Ibn Bishran al-Sukkari, 'Ali Ibn Harun al-Simsar, and others. This doctor, who was deprived of the sense of sight, composed many works, such as the Kafi (sufficient) on jurisprudence, the Kitab al-Naiyat (liber intentionis), the Kitab Satr il-Awrah (liber de tegendis pudendis), the Hidayah (guide), the Kitab al-Istisharah wa'l-Istikharah (on taking advice and gaining favour) the Kitab Riadat il-Muta'allim (instructions for a pupil), the Kitab al-Imarat (the signal), etc<sup>2</sup>. He treated some points of doctrine in a manner peculiar to himself. His death took place earlier than A.H. 320 (A.D. 932).

230 ZUBAYDAH THE WIFE AL-RASHID

Zubaydah, surnamed Umm Ja'far (mother of Ja'far), was daughter to Ja'far the son of (the khalif) Abu Ja'far al-Mansur 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Abbas al-Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib Ibn Hashim. She was the mother of Muhammad al-Amin, the son of Harun al-Rashid. Her charity was ample, her conduct virtuous, and the history of her pilgrimage to Makkah and what she undertook to execute on the way is so well known, that it is useless to repeat

---

1 Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn Sinan, a traditionist and native of Baghdad died A.H. 223 (A.D. 838) (Tab. al-Muhaddithin).

2 Those works treated, most probably, some of jurisprudence and others of Traditions.

it.<sup>1</sup> Abu'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi says in his kitab al-Alqab (book of surnames), that she furnished the city of Makkah with water, the scarcity of which had been so great some time before, that the contents of a water skin cost a gold piece (dinar). She had it brought thither from a distance of ten miles; this was effected by levelling hills and hewing through rocks, by which means a stream, situated without the sacred territory, was led into the precincts of it.<sup>2</sup> She constructed also the 'Aqabat al-Bustan,<sup>3</sup> and when her intendant observed her that the expense would be very great, she replied that she was decided to have it executed, were every stroke of a hatchet (given during the work) to cost a dinar. The same writer says that she had one hundred slave girls, who all knew the Qur'an by heart, and that each of them had the task of repeating one tenth of it daily; so that her place resounded with a continual humming like that of bees. He states also that her name was Amat al- 'Aziz (hand maid of the Almighty), and that, on account of her plumpness and freshness, the surname of Zubaydah was given her by her grandfather al-Mansur<sup>4</sup>. Al-Tabari says, in his History, that Harun al-Rashid expoused her in the year 165 (A.D. 781-2) and that she died at Baghdad in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 216 (June, or July, A.D. 834). Her father Ja'far died in the year 186 A.D. 802).

231 ZUFAR IBN AL-HUDHAYL AL-HANAFI

Abu'l-Hudhayl Zufar Ibn al-Hudhayl Ibn Qays Ibn Sulaym Ibn Qais Ibn Mukammal Ibn Dhuhl Ibn Dhu'ayb Ibn Jadhimah Ibn 'Amr Ibn Hunjur Ibn Jundub Ibn al-'Anbar Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamim Ibn Ma'dd Ibn Murr Ibn Udd Ibn Tahikah Ibn al-Yas Ibn Mudhar Ibn Nizar Ibn 'Adnan, surnamed al-'Anyari (the descendant of 'Al-Anbar) was a doctor of the sect of Abu Hanifah, and as pious as learned. He is

---

1 The historian Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzi says in his Mir'at al-Zaman, year 216, that Zubaydah spent one million of dinars in her pilgrimage, and that her gifts to the learned in Makkah and Madinah and the expense of the works executed by her orders in these two cities, amounted to two millions of dinars.

2 See Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, Vol. p. 195.

3 'Aqabat al-Bustan means the ascent to the garden. It is not mentioned in any of the historical and geographical works which I have consulted.

4 Zubaydah is the diminutive of zubdah, cream, or fresh butter.

considered as one of the great Traditionists, but he devoted himself principally to the solution of legal questions by means of private judgment (ra'i), which, with the Hanifites, holds the place of analogical deduction (Qiyas).<sup>1</sup> His father al-Hadhayl was governor of Isbahan. Zufar was born in the year 110 (A.D. 728-29), and died in the month of Sha'ban, A.H. 159 (June, A.D. 775).

232 ABU DULAMAH

Abu Dulamah Zand Ibn al-Jawn was a person celebrated for his wit, his amusing adventures, his acquaintance with general literature, and his talent for poetry. The hafiz Abu'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi says in his Tanwir al-Ghabash (darkness lighted up):<sup>1</sup> "Abu Dulamah was a black slave from Abyssinia, and one of his witty sayings is thus related: (The khalif) Abu Ja'far al-Mansur had a female cousin who died and whom he accompanied to the grave. He there sat down to preside at her burial and showed deep affliction at her loss. At that moment, Abu Dulamah went forward and sat down near him: 'Fellow! said al-Mansur, 'what canst thou have suited for this place?' pointing to the grave. The Commander of the faithful's cousin'; replied the other. On this the khalif was seized with such a fit of laughter that he fell backwards, and he said, on recovering: 'Fellow! thou hast exposed up to shame before the people! The Khatib says, in his history of Baghdad, that the deceased was Hammadah, wife of al-Mansur, and daughter of 'Isa, one of al-Mansur's uncles.-'Umar Ibn Shabbah relates, in his History of Basrah, that Abu Dulamah sent one of his

---

1 It has been already observed that the orthodox sects deduce the articles of the law from four sources; the Qur'an, the Sunnah or traditions of the Prophet, the common consent (Ijma) of the ancient imams, and analogical reasoning (qyas) founded on the principles furnished by the first three sources. The doctors of the school of Abu Hanifah had such a predilection for the qiyas, and went to such lengths in its application, that those of the other three sects often accused them of sacrificing the authority of the Qur'an, of the Sunnah, and of the ancient imams to that of their own private judgement (ra'i). We here find the Shafite Ibn Khallikan declare positively that, in place of the qiyas, or analogical deductions they substituted the Principle of private judgment, or as the word (ra'i) may well signify, of mere speculation.

1 According to Hajji Khalifah, the remainder of the title is as follows: fi fadl il-Sudan wa'l Habsh (being a treatise on the amimeni meri of the Negro and Abyssinian races).

cousins with the following lines to Sa'id Ibn Da'laj who was then employed as director of the Ahadth<sup>2</sup> at Basrah:

"When you meet the Amir greet him with a salutation, and pray that the mercy of God be upon him. Tell him then, that I have a credit or among the Arabs of the desert, a detested wretch<sup>3</sup> who has an old receipt of mine for one thousand dirhims and the half of a thousand and the half of that; a sum which served not for my use, but for gifts which I bestowed on the Shaykhs of the tribe of Tamim"<sup>4</sup>

Ibn Da'laj<sup>5</sup> sent him immediately the sum for which he asked.* When Ruh Ibn Hatim al-Muhallabi was governor of Basrah, he marched out to attack the Khurasanite troops<sup>6</sup>, and was accompanied by Abu Dulamah. (When the two armies were in presence of each other), a warrior sallied forth from the ranks of the enemy and slew successively a number of Ruh's soldiers in single combat. Ruh then ordered Abu Dulamah to go and fight him; his refusals and supplications were of no avail; Ruh insisted, and Abu Dulamah then pronounced these verses:

"I fly to Ruh for refuge; let him not send me to a combat in which I shall bring disgrace upon the tribe of Asad.<sup>7</sup> Your father al-

2 The word Ahdath is employed by the Arabic historians of the crusades in the sense of new levies, or recruits; but it seems to bear here a different signification. Ibn al-Athir says, under the year 257 (A.D. 870-1), that Sa'id Ibn Da'laj was at that time. والى الاحداث والجوالى والشرط at Basrah. As the word جوالى means tribute, or capitation tax, I am inclined to think that the شرط and the -ud- were some other species of revenue. Sa'id was deposed from his place in A.H. 259 (A.D. 872-3).

3 Literally: May be, as a creditor; be covered with ignominy.

4 Ibn Da'laj was a member of that tribe by enfranchisement (Kitab al-Aghani.)

5 All manuscripts have here Da'laj, not Ibn Da'laj.

6 According to Ibn al-Athir, Ruh, Ibn Hatim was appointed governor of Basrah. A.H. 165; and filled that place till 167, and before that, in A.H. 161 according to Ibn Khallikan; but none of the historians whom I have consulted, speak of this affair between Ruh and the Khurasanite. In the autograph MS. this anecdote and the preceding one are not to be found.

7 Abu Dulamah was mawla, or member by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Asad.-(Kitab al-Aghani.)

* This anecdote is given in the autograph in the notice on Ruh No. 227. There he says that Ruh laughed and excused Abu Dulamah.

Muhallab left you as a legacy the love of death, but such a legacy as that I have inherited from none. And then I know well, that the act of drawing near to enemies produces a separation between souls and bodies".

Ruh positively declared, however, that he should go forth and fight. "Why," said he to Abu Dulamah, "do you receive pay from the sultan"?--"To fight for him."--"And why not go forth and attack that enemy of God"? "If I go forth to him, O amir! I shall be sent to join those who are (dead and) gone; and the condition I made with the sultan was, to fight for him, but not to die for him."--"By Allah! you shall go and kill him, or take him prisoner, or be killed yourself"! Perceiving him to be in earnest, Abu Dulamah said: "You know that this day will be the first of (my) days in the next world; I must therefore have a stock of provisions for so long a journey." Ruh gave orders in consequence, and had him supplied with a pasty containing a fowl, with a piece of meat, a skin filled with wine, and some comfits for the dessert. Being thus well provided, Abu Dulamah sallied forth, sword in hand, on a noble charge; and being an excellent horseman in the hippodrome, he wheeled him about in different directions and brandished him about in different directions and brandished his lance with great skill. His adversary watched him for some time, spying a favourable moment to attack him, and then rushed in on him whilst a cloud of dust (dark) as night (overshadowed the combatants). Abu Dulamah then sheathed his sword and said to the man: "God forgive you! be not too hasty, but hear what I have to say; I come to you on important business."--"What business?" asked the other, who now stopped facing him. "I am Abu Dulamah."--"I have heard speak of you; but, God preserve you, what can have induced you to come out against me? Why hope to conquer me after seeing so many of your "people fall by my hand"?--"I come neither to kill you nor to fight with you, "but having observed your skill and activity, I longed to make you my friend; and I shall now point out to you what is better than fighting."--"Go on, with the blessing of God!"--"I see that you are tired, and must be both hungry and thirsty."--"That is the fact."--"What are Khurasan and Iraq to us? I have here some bread, meat, wine, and a dessert such as a man could desire, and there is not far off a pond of pure water: let us go there and breakfast, and I shall let you hear some of the songs which the Arabs of the Desert sing to their camels."--"I desire nothing better." "Here goes then; I shall retreat, and do you pursue, till we got out of the crowd of combatants." They both started off, and Ruh looked about for Abu Dulamah, but in vain; and the Khurasanites sought their valiant horseman, but found him not. (When the two worthies had taken their repast) (Abu Dulamah said to his new friend, who had now got into the best humour possible: "You known that Ruh is a most generous man; it is enough to say that Ruh is a most generous man: it is enough to say that he is descended from al-Muhallab; now he intends to give you a magnificent pelisse, a fine horse, a saddle<sup>8</sup> plate with silver, a sword mounted with precious stones, a long lance, a Berber girl, and other gifts in abundance; as a proof of what I say, I here given you his signet-ring which he sends to you." "How can you make me such a proposal? What am I to do with my family?" "Let God's will be done, and come with me? Leave your family there and God will give you another in its stead." "Well, let us go, with the blessing of God." They then entered at the rear of the army, and galloped up to Ruh, who exclaimed: "Abu Dulamah! and where were you?" "On business of yours. As for killing the man, I could not do it, and as for having my own blood split, I felt no inclination for it, and yet I dared not return without doing something: so I employed gentle means and have brought you the man (as a prisoner), captivated by your generosity; for I promised him, in your name, such and such things." "That promise shall be executed," said Ruh, "provided he give me security for his fidelity." "In what manner?" He asked: "Let him bring his family with him." he replied: On this the man said: "My family are far away, and it is impossible for me to bring them here now; but stretch forth your hand, I will place mine in it, and of my own free accord, make an oath to divorce my wife if I prove a traitor to you. Now if I do not act with good faith towards you, she is divorced by the very fact, and it would then be useless for you to have her in your power." "Your remark is true," said Ruh, who immediately received his oath and entered into a pact with him, after which he fulfilled the promises made to him by Abu Dulamah, and conferred on him, moreover, additional favours. The Khurasanite then fought on their side against his countrymen, and the extreme bravery which they displayed mainly contributed to the success of Ruh.

[Al-Mansur having once give orders to demolish a number of houses, among which was that of Abu Dulamah, the latter addressed to him these lines:

"Cousin of the Prophet! (hear) the prayer of one who is on the verge of death and whose dwelling is on the point of being destroyed. As she suffers calmly whom repeated pregnancies have

8 This signification of the word مركب has been omitted in the dictionaries. Other examples of this signification will be found in the course of this work. In Ibn Khaldun's History of the Berbers, MS. No. 2402, fol. 63, we find this passage. حدد على قصر بانه بالسراكب الشقيقة destroyed. As she suffers calmly whom repeated pregnancies have accustomed to the pains of parturition, so he is clam, but his tranquillity is affected. The whole earth belongs to you; lend then to your save that portion of it which is enclosed by the wall of his house."

*[Al-Mahdi ordered Abu Dulamah to go on an expedition against 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ali. Abu Dulamah said, "O Amir al-Mu'minin! I beseech thee by God, not to send me with your armies because I was present with nine armines; all the nine armies were defeated: and I am afraid your army may be the tenth." He (al-Mahdi) laughed and excused him.

Once Abu Dulamah came before al-Mahdi. He said, "Ask for what you require". "Give me a dog," said Abu Dulamah. He (al-Mehdi) got angry and said: "I told you as to what you require and you have asked for a dog to be given to you?" He replied. "O Amir al-Mu'minin! Is it my requirement or yours?" He (al-Mahdi) said: "Of course it is yours." "Then," he said "I ask you to give me a hound. "He ordered a hound to be given to him. Then he said, "O Amir al-Mu'minin! suppose I go a hunting, should I run on my legs?" He ordered a beast to be given to him. Then he said, "O Amir al-Mu'minin who will look after it?" He, then, ordered a slave to be given to him. Then he said: "O Amir al-Mu'minin! suppose I succeed in hunting a prey and bring it to my home; who will cook it?" He ordered a maid servant to be given to him. Then he said: "O Amir al-Mu'minin! will they live in wilderness?" He ordered a house to be given to him. Then he said: "O Amir al-Mu'minin! you attached them to my neck as members of a family; from where shall I feed them?" He said, "I assign to you one thousand Jarib of arable land and another one thousand waste land." Then he said: "I know what is --ud-- (arable land), but what is --ud-- (waste land)? He (al-Mahdi) said: "It is barren land which cannot produce anything." He (Abu Dulamah) said, I assign to the Amir al-Mu'minin one hundred thousand jaribs of desert, and I ask you to grant a jarib of arable land for every one thousand jaribs. He (al-Mahdi) said to him: "Where (do you want such land)? He replied, "Where your treasury (Bayt al-mal) is (situated)." Al-Mahdi said: "Shift the treasury from there and give him a jarib of land there." He (Abu Dulamah) said: "O Amir al-Mu'minin! when the treasury will be shifted, it will become a waste land." Al-Mahdi laughed and said: "Is there any more requirement?" He said: "Yes, permit me to kiss your hand." He said: "There is no way for you to it." He (Abu Dulamah) said, "By God have you not refused any requirement of mine which is easier than this?"

---

* From here to "his quick repartee" on p. 392, not in de Slane.

By chance Abu Dulamah remained absent from attending at the door of Abu Ja'far (al-Mansur); then he attended; so he (the Caliph) ordered him to remain in his palace, and obliged him to offer prayers in his mosque and appointed a person to watch him. One day Abu Ja'far's Wazir, Abu Ayyub al-Marzubani, passed by Abu Dulamah who handed over to him a sealed letter saying, "This is a petition to the Amir al-Mu'minin. Kindly deliver it" So he (Abu Ayyub) delivered it to him (the Caliph) sealed. It contained the following:

"Don't you know that the Caliph has fastened me to his mosque and palace: and I have nothing to do with the palace.

I always offer my after-noon prayers with that of 'asr; so woe to me from the after-noon and woe to me from the 'asr.

And by God I have no faith in these prayers, so there accrues no virtue, nor beneficence and benefit in my affair."

May God set his (caliph's) affairs right! What is his harm, if the sins of both the worlds are put on my back."

Al-Mansur burst into laughter and ordered him to be presented and said; "What is your affair?" He said; "I handed a piece of sealed paper to Abu Ayyub asking you to excuse me from the obligation which you have placed on me. Then Abu Ja'far said to him; "Read it?" He said: "I cannot read it nicely." He knew that he would be punished if he read it, because it contained (an adverse) remark against prayers. When he (the Caliph) noticed that he hesitated, he said to him: "I liked to inflict punishment on you if you had admitted." Then he added: "I excuse you from your compulsory attendance at the mosque." Thereupon Abu Dulamah said: "O Amir al-Mu'minin! if I had admitted would you have inflicted punishment on me?" He said: "Yes", Then he said: "In spite of God's saying: "That (poets) utter what they do not do." "He burst into laughter and was surprised at his quick repartee.]

*When al-Mahdi, the son of al-Mansur, returned to Baghdad

---

* (Al-Mahdi and 'Ali Ibn Sulaymah went a hunting; Abu Dulamah was with them. Al-Mahdi aimed at an antelope, and his arrow hit the target. 'Ali Ibn Abu Sulayman aimed at an antelope; but his arrow missed, and hit a dog. Al-Mahdi burst into laughter and said: "Abu Dulamah say something about it."

from Ray<sup>9</sup> Abu Dulamah went to salute him and congratulate him on his arrival. Al-Mahdi turned towards him and said: "How are you, Abu Dulamah?" "Commander of the faithful!" replied the other: 'I made an oath that if you returned in health and with riches to the abodes of 'Iraq, you should implore God's blessing on the Prophet and fill my lap with dirhams."

"For the first part, willingly" answered al-Mahdi, "but for the second, not "at all." "May I die to save you!" replied Abu Dulamah, "but the two parts cannot be separated." "Let Abu Dulamah's lap be filled with dirhams," said al-Mahdi. Abu Dulamah then sat down and spread out his knees till his lap was filled with dirhams. "Get up now," said al-Mahdi. "Commander of the faithful!" answered the other, "my robe will be torn with the weight; "allow me first to replace the money in the bags; then I shall be able to rise."

Abu Dulaamah composed a great deal of poetry, and mention is made of him by (Harun) Ibn (Ali) al-Munajjim, in his work entitled al-Bari, which contains a selection of pieces composed by poets who lived subsequently to the introduction of Islamism. He died A.H. 161 (A.D. 777-8); some say, however, that he lived till the reign of al-Rashid, who succeeded to the Khalifat, A.H. 170. It is said that his real name was Zabd, not Zand; but the latter is supported by better authority. The following is one of the numerous anecdotes related of him: He once called in a physician to attend his son who had fallen sick, and he agreed to pay him a certain sum of money in the event of the patient's recovery. When his son was restored to health, Abu Dulamah said to the physician: "By Allah! we have nothing to give you, but cite the rich jew (naming him) before the judge, for a sum equal to that which I promised you, and I and my son will serve as witnesses to prove the debt." The physician immediately took the Jew before the qadi of Kufah, Ibn Abi Layla<sup>10</sup> or, it is said Ibn Shuburmah<sup>11</sup> and claimed of him that sum. As the Jew denied the 9 This was perhaps in A.H. 166; Ibn al-A<sup>thir</sup> says that al-Mahdi visited Jurijan in that year.

10 His life will be found in this work.

11 'Abd Allah Ibn Shuburmah Ibn al-Tufail <sup>النفيل</sup> al-Dubbi, a celebrated imam and tabi'i, was an eminent jurisconsult of Kufa. He learned the Traditions from Anas, al-Sha'bi, and Ibn Sirin, and his own authority was cited for Traditions by Sufyan al-Thawri, Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah, and others. His veracity and his eminence as a doctor of the law were universally acknowledged. He was an abstemious man, intelligent, devout, generous, of a handsome countenance and possessing a talent for poetry. He acted under the Khalif al-Mamun, as qadi of the cultivated country (Sawad) around Kufah. Born A.H. 92 (A.D. 710-1) died A.H. 144 (A.D. 761-2). (Tab al-Fuq. Al-Yafi't).

debt, his adversary said: "I shall go and bring my proofs." He then brought Abu Dulamah and his son into court. As Abu Dulamah apprehended that the qadi would make an inquest into his character as a witness<sup>12</sup> he recited the following verses when in the anteroom, and pronounced them loud enough to be heard by the Qadi:

"If people wish to expose me, I shall expose them; if they search into my conduct, I shall search into theirs; If they remove the rubbish out of my well, I shall do the same to theirs, and let the public know what that rubbish is."

He then entered, and having given his evidence, the qadi said: "I have received your declaration and admitted your evidence." (Being convinced, however, that they were false witnesses), he paid the money out of his own purse and dismissed the Jew; but he did not dare to refuse Abu Dulamah's testimony through dread of his evil tongue. He thus quieted at the same time his fears and his conscience.

233 'IMAD AL-DIN ZANKI

Abu I-Jawd Zanki, surnamed al-Malik al-Mansur 'Imad al-Din (the victorious prince, the column of religion) was son to Aq Sunqur Ibn 'Abd Allah, generally known by the title of al-Hajib, and lord of Mosul. (The life of his father has been already given, no. 99) Zanki was one of the most eminent amirs under the Seljukides, and had been appointed governor of Baghdad in the year 521 (A.D. 1127), by Mahmud Ibn Muhammad Ibn Malik Shah, the reigning sultan of that dynasty. (At a later period, the city of Mosul was granted to him as a fief under the following circumstances). After the assassination of Aq Sunqur al-Bursuqi and the death of his son Mas'ud, which events we have already noticed (no. 99), a decree was issued by the sultan Mahmud, who was then in Khurasan, directing that the city of Mosul should be delivered over to Dubays Ibn Sadaqah al-Asadi, the lord of al-Hillah, who immediately prepared to proceed to his new government. (The life of Dubays will be found, no. 214). The citadel of Mosul was then in the hands of a powerful amir, named Jawili,

---

12 The inquest into the character of witnesses is an important part of the Muslim trial. It is called Tazkiyat (purification), and is instituted by the qadi when he has any doubts respecting the morality of the person who gives evidence. See Hamilton's Hedayah, chapter on Evidence.

who had been entrusted by al-Bursuqi with the command of the place. Promoted by the desire of obtaining the government of Mosul for himself, Jawili dispatched to Baghdad two emissaries, Baha' al-Din Abu 'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Qasim al-Shahruzuri and Salah al-Din Muhammad al-Yaghisani,<sup>1</sup> for the purpose of effecting that arrangement. On their arrival, they found that the khalif al-Mustashid was decidedly adverse to the nomination of Dubays, and would by no means give his consent to it; and a number of letters passed between him and the sultan Mahmud on the subject. He finally made choice of Zanki as a proper candidate for that office, and having called in the two emissaries sent from Mosul, he made an agreement with them that means should be taken to influence public opinion in favour of Zanki. To obtain this nomination, the khalif himself offered the sultan one hundred thousand dinars, and the two deputies also engaged to pay him a certain sum of money. The consequence was that the nomination of Dubays was annulled. Zanki then set out and obtained possession of Mosul on the 10th of Muharram, A.H. 521 (27th Januray, A.D. 1127). Such is the statement made by Ibn al-'Uqaymi in his History,<sup>2</sup> but some say that Zanki proceeded to Mosul in the year 522; this, however, is not exact. When Zanki was established in his government, the sultan Mahumud (whose life we shall give) confided to him his two sons Alp Arsilan and Farrukh Shah al-Khafaji<sup>3</sup> that they might be brought up under his care, and it was for this reason that he received the title of Atabek, which as we have already observed in the life of Jaqar (no. 137), means a bringer up of princes. Zanki then became master of all the country around Mosul, and took Edessa from Joscelin the Armenian<sup>4</sup>, on Saturday, 25th of the latter Jumada, A.H. 539 (23rd December, A.D. 1144). He afterwards marched against Qal'ah Ja'bar<sup>5</sup>, which was then in the possession of Sayf al-Dawlat Ibu al-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Malik, and having laid siege to it, he was on the point of taking

---

1 Fuller details of these proceedings are given by Ibn al-Athir in his Annals. This portion of Ibn al-Athir's work will be found, text and translation, in the first volume of the collection published by the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, and entitled Extraits des Histriens arabes relatifs aux Croisades.

2 This work is not noticed by Hajji Khalifah, and I have not been able to procure any information respecting its author.

3 In the life of Ghazi, the son of Zanki Ibn Khallikhan gives the title of al-Khafaji to Alp Arsilan. In so doing he must have followed the authority of Ibn al-Athir. See no. 137.

4 It is singular that Ibn Khallikhan should give the title of the Armenian to Joscelin count of Edessa.

5 The castle of Ja'bar. See no. 137.

it, when, on the morning of Wednesday, the 15th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 541 (22nd September, A.D. 1146), he was found dead in his bed; having been assassinated that night in his sleep by one of his eunuchs.<sup>6</sup> He was interred at Siffin. My preceptor 'Izz al-Din Ibn al-Athir says, in his History of the Atabeks, that Zanki was about ten years of age when his father was slain, and as this event happened in the year 487, as we have already said (no. 99), he must have been born about 477 (A.D. 1084-5). Siffin is a tract of land on the border of the Euphrates, at the distance of a parasang, or less, from Qal'ah Ja'bar; it is situated on the Syrian side of the Euphrates, and Qal'at Ja'bar on the Mesopotamian. At Siffin is a chapel erected on the spot where the celebrated battle was fought between 'Ali and Ma'awiyah (in the year 37 of the Hijrah); it contains also the tombs of a number of those Companions (of Muhammad) who fell in the action; that of 'Ammar Ibn Yasir, for instance. The qadi Baha' al-Din al-Shahrazuri died on Saturday, the 16th Ramadan,* A.H. 532 (28th May, A.D. 1138) at Aleppo, whence his body was borne to Siffin and there interred.

234 ZANKI IBN MAWDUD

Abu 'I-Fath Zanki, the son of Qutb al-Din Mawdud and grandson of Zanki (Ibn Aq Sunqur), whose life has been just given, was surnamed (like him) 'Imad al-Din and was usually entitled the Lord of Sinjar. He received the sovereignty of Aleppo on the death of his cousin al-Malik al-Salih Nur al-Din Isma'il Ibn Mahmud Ibn Zanki, in the year 577 (A. D. 1181-2). The sultan Salah al-Din Yusuf Ibn Ayyub then laid siege to Aleppo, A.H. 579, and obtained possession of it in the month of Safar of the same year (June, A.D. 1182): an arrangement having been made between him and Zanki, who received in exchange the city of Sinjar and its dependencies<sup>1</sup>. Zanki removed to Sinjar and remained there till his death which took place in the month of Muharram, A.H. 594 (November, A.D. 1197).

---

6 For a fuller account of Zanki and his enterprises, see M. Reinaud's Extraits des Historiens arabes relatifs aux Guerres des Croisades.

* M. de Slane gives 6th Ramadan—Ed.

1 Some account of the conquest of Aleppo is given by M. Reinaud in His Extraits des Auteurs arabes relatifs aux Croisades.

235 BAHĀ AL-DĪN ZUHAYR AL-MUHALLABĪ

Abū'l-Faḍl Zuhayr Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yahyā Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Ja'far Ibn Mansur Ibn 'Asim al-Muhallabī al-'Atakī<sup>1</sup>, surnamed the katib Bha al-Dīn (splendour of religion) was one of the most eminent men of the age for his talent in prose, verse, and penmanship, and the nobleness of his character. Having entered into the service of al-Malik al-Salih Najm al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faṭh Ayyub, the son of al-Malik al-Kamīl and (afterwards) sultan (of Egypt), he accompanied him from Egypt to the Eastern Countries (Mesopotamia), where he remained for some time and then followed him to Damascus, of which he had obtained possession. He continued to reside at Damascus till his master lost that city under the circumstances which are so well known<sup>2</sup>. Soon after, when al-Malik al-Salih was at Nablus (Naplous), his troops treacherously deserted him, and he was taken prisoner by '[his cousin] al-Malik al-Nasir Da'wud, prince of Karak, and imprisoned in the citadel of that place. As for Baha' al-Din Zuhayr, he remained at Nablus through respect for his patron, and abstained from entering into the service of another. When al-Malik al-Salih obtained possession of Egypt, Zuhayr accompanied him to that kingdom in the same capacity as before, and arrived there towards the end of the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 637 (June, A.D. 1240). We shall speak again of these events in the life of his father al-Malik al-Kamil Muhammad, to which article we therefore refer the reader. I was then dwelling at Cairo, and having felt a strong desire of meeting Baha'al-Din from what I had heard respecting him, I obtained an interview with him after his arrival, and I found that his noble character, profound instruction, and mildness of manners far surpassed what I had been told. He was in high favour with his master, by whom he was esteemed to such a degree, that he became the sole confidant of his secret thoughts, and with all this, he never employed his influence but to do good: many were the persons whom he obliged by his recommendations and protection. He often recited to me fragments of his own poetry, one of which was as follows:

"O thou (who art a) garden of beauty! take me to thee; thou shalt suffer no wrong. Didst thou ever see a garden without a little flower (Zuhayr)?"

1 Al-'Atakī means descended from al-'Atik, a member of the tribe of Azd.

2 See the Annals of Abū 'l-Fida under the year 637 of the Hijrah.

* This word not in the autograph. Ed.

*He recited to me also this piece, as being of his own composition:

"How can I be delivered from love, which is mixed and combined with my soul? I strived to control my passion for that fickle nymph, who never yielded me a favour. Did the moon wish to equal her (in beauty), I should say to the moon: 'Thy wish is vain.' And thou, pliant branch waving over the sands of the desert! (think not to rival the thinness of her waist); between her and thee how wide a difference! When my friends blamed the folly of my love, her face was for me an ample excuse. What divine pen hath traced on that neck the letter waw, 'with her ringlets! How express my admiration for the dimples on those cheeks! On passing by me, she turns round her head-didst thou ever see a gazelle<sup>3</sup>? There is nothing faulty in her but the lang or<sup>4</sup> of her eyes. O moon of happiness, at whose aspect my star has set! O thou who refusest me the sweetness of thy favour, and grantest me the bitterness of thy dislike! O desire not my death! and yet, if by chance thou showest me love, I die."

** I heard also from him these lines, which he told me were his own:

"I am truly your Zuhayr, for the Muzaynah<sup>5</sup> to whom I owe my existence is the liberality of your hand. I like to hear handsome (jamil) mention made of you; that is for me as a (beloved) Buthaynah.<sup>6</sup> Ask your recollection concerning my affection towards you; for therein your recollection is a Juhaynah<sup>7</sup>."

He recited to me also another of his pieces, but I recollect only two lines of it; they are as follows:

* The order of the Passages in the autograph is a bit different. The passage commencing with 'I heard' and ending with 'Juhaynah' comes here and this passage follows it.—Ed.

3 By this apostrophe he means that his mistress turned round her head with the grace of a gazelle. This is a very common image in Arabic poetry.

4 See no. 11, note on eyes.

** This passage precedes the fore-going passage.—Ed.

5 Zuhayr the author of the Mu'allafs, descended from Muzayna Ibn Udd Ibn Tabikhah.

6 Buthaynah was the mistress of Jamil. See the life of latter, no. 140.

7 An allusion to the ancient Proverb عند جهينة الخير اليقين Exact information may be had from Juhaynah. See Pocock's Specimen, p. 329.

"Narcissus of his eyes<sup>8</sup>! how long wilt thou drain my heart's blood? O, how thou art languishing! In beauty nothing resembles thee; nought in the world can equal thy perfection."

All his poetry is remarkable for its delicate turn of thought, and the graceful ease of its composition may be really called unattainable.<sup>9</sup> He gave me a certificate declaring that I was perfectly master of the poems contained in his diwan; but as this collection is of frequent occurrence in the hands of the public, I shall abstain from citing any further extracts. I was informed by an intimate friend of his, Jamal al-Din Yahya Ibn Matruh, (whose list shall be given in this work,) that he once addressed the katib in the following lines:

"When the marks of your kindness and favour came to me in a constant succession, I exclaimed: 'Mayest thou live for ever to do good.' Speak no more of Hatim's generosity; Zuhayr is more generous than he.<sup>10</sup>"

Baha' al-Din Zuhayr informed me that his master al-Malik al-Salih once sent him from the Eastern countries to Mosul on a mission, and that he there met with my friend the amir Sharaf al-Din Abu'l 'Abbas Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Abi 'l-Wafa, Ibn Khattab, surnamed Ibn al-Halawi, whose family were originally of that city, but who himself was born and resided at Damascus. This amir having gone to pay his respects to him, recited in his presence a long and most beautiful poem, of which one of the verses was:

"You compose in verse and you reward those who praise you in verse; tell us then whether you are Zuhayr of Harim."

"On my return from Mosul," said Zuhayr, "I met Jamal al-Din Ibn Matruh, to whom I gave the poem to read. He was much struck with this verse, and he afterwards wrote to me these two lines, When the marks of your kindness, etc." Ibn al-Halawi's verse is an imitation of the following, which were composed by Abu 'l-Qasim, an excellent poet, in honour of the missionary and prince of Yamen, Saba Ibn Ahmad al-Sulayhi<sup>11</sup>.

8 See Introduction.

9 This seems to be idea which the author meant to express by the words السهل المتنوع but some doubts remain on the translator's mind.

10 The poet Zuhayr celebrated in his Mo'allaqah the generosity of Harim. This is another play on the similitude of names.

11 Sketch of this prince's history is given in Johannsen's Historia Yemanaeae. p. 131.

"When I praise the noble chief Ibn Ahmad, he rewards me and gives me praise in return. For my poetry he gives me his, and presents bed-sides; so he repays me my capital with interest."

I learned from Baha al-Din that his birth took place at Makkah on the 5th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 581 (February, A.D. 1186;* and he informed me, on another occasion, that he was born at Wadi Nakhlah, a valley near that city. It was from his own mouth that I received the genealogy inserted above, and he told me that he descended from al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah. I had sketched out the foregoing notice whilst he was yet alive and confined to his house (from grief) after the death of his master (A.H. 647); but he was carried off later, by the dreadful sickness which prevailed in Egypt and Cairo, A.H. 656, and from which very few recovered. It began on Thursday, the 24th of Shawwal,** and Baha al-Din was one of those who were taken ill; he suffered a few days and then expired towards the afternoon of Sunday, *** (He composed excellent poetry. It includes a piece which he composed when his boat capsized; he lost his belongings but he remained safe:

"Do not frown at the Time which put you in distress, because during the long period that has passed, it bestowed much upon you.

Take stock of your time in the condition of its true changes, you will find that it bestowed on you multiples of what it seized from you.

God has made time a changing (phenomenon) and so you will not perceive pain or pleasure permanently.

Your capital (property) is your soul which is safe, do not feel sorry for any thing that is lost besides.

You are not the first to be crushed by a calamity, the time is passing in the same way and it is not new or stable.

Many a property has increased after its diminution; have you not seen the candle blazing after its which is trimmed."

* 27 February Ed.

** 24 October 1258.—Ed.

*** [ ] This additional information, (from here to 'nor ear' on p. 400) is given in subsequent editions, but it is not in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition.—Ed.

He wrote to Fakhr al-Din Ibn Qadi Dariya complaining of bad manners of his slaves:

"My love to any one besides you is lost, and my effort for any one except you is liked.

By God, I do not come to you but out of love, although I am liked by virtuous people.

I disseminate your fame, and its dissemination is agreeable; I lavish praises on you and enjoy them.

What is with me that I am turned away from your door, out of cruelty, the origin of which should be traced to others and the same should not be ascribed to you.

If I come to visit you I am refused (admission) by the banging of the door; I wish I had known where I will be called and welcome.

I am not he who does not know the times of visit, and I am not he whose coming close is avoided.

In the servant of a man are reflected type habits of him who taught him manners.

And why the manner you taught them did not make them good? Is it not that your servants have not imbibed the spirit of your politeness".

At the time of parting it is hard for me (to see you) but separation from you is harder still.

I abstain myself unwillingly from meeting you, and I struggle with my desire for you and my desire overpowers me.

I am angry with you for the sake of the eminence you possess, and it is in your interest and I do not feel angry with you for myself.

I abstain because of the honour I received from you and I feel angry because of the grace.

I had not enumerated these minor errors to you then the shame at my going back would have been sufficient for me. He has composed an enigma referring to lock:

"A black naked (object) whose body has been made lean by cold; but its qualities of greed and denial persist. The most strange thing is, that it always keeps watch, although it has neither eye nor ear."]

4th of 'l-Qa'dah of that year (November, A.D. 1258).* The next day, after the prayer of noon, his corpse was borne to the Lesser Qarafah and interred near the south side of the chapel which covers the imam al-Shafi'i's tomb. I was not able to attend his funeral service, being then confined with the epidemic; but on my recovery, I visited his grave, on account of our mutual friendship, and I prayed to God to have mercy on him; after which I read over him a portion of the Qur'an.

236 ZIYAD IBN 'ABD ALLAH AL-BAKKA'I

Abu Muhammad Ziyad al-'Amiri was the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tufayl Ibn 'Amir al-Qaysi,<sup>1</sup> and descended from the family of al-Bakka, a branch of the tribe of 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah. Ziyad knew by heart the Sirat al-Rasul, or History of the Prophet by Muhammad Ibn Ishaq and taught it with the permission of the author, and it is his authority which is cited by 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Hisham in the remodelled edition of that work, entitled Sirat Ibn Hisham. Al-Bakka'i was born at Kufah; his veracity and exactitude as a traditionist are well established, having been cited by al-Bukhari, in that chapter of the Sahih which treats on war with infidels, and by Muslim in different places of his work bearing the same title. Al-Bukhari mentions in his History this saying of Waki' (Ibn al-Jarrah): Ziyad is too eminent to have his veracity as a traditionist impeached: and al-Tirmidhi, having misunderstood it, wrote in his collection of Traditions; "Al-Bukhari states that Waki' said: Ziyad Ibn 'Abd Allah, notwithstanding his eminence, has had his veracity as a Traditionist impeached." This is, however, a mistake, as Waki' said nothing more of him than what al-Bukhari mentions, and had Waki' impugned his veracity, neither al-Bukhari nor Muslim would have cited a single Tradition on his authority; since they rejected that of al-Harith al-A'war and Abban Ibn 'Ayyash because al-Sha'bi accused them of

* 3 November--Ed.

1 M.de Slane gives al-'Absi, It is strange that he did not change his mind even after the perusal of the autograph. Vide his note. Ed.

It is impossible that Ziyad could have belonged to the tibe of 'Abs, as the surname here given him seems to indicate. There is every reason to think that, for 'Absi البسي we must read Qaysi القيسي (descended from Qais Ghaylan). The latter, as I have since discovered, is the reading of the anthograph MS.

falsehood. Ziyad received his Traditions from al-A'mash and transmitted them to Ahmad Ibn Hanbal and others, by whom his authority is cited. He died at Kufah, A.H. 183 (A.D. 799). Bakka'i is derived from Bakka (the weeper), a surname given to his ancestor Rabi'ah Ibn 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah on account of a circumstance too improper to be mentioned.<sup>2</sup>

237 TAJ AL-DIN AL-KINDI

Abu 'l-Yamn Zaid Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Zaid Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Sa'id al-Kindi (belonging to the tribe of Kindah), surnamed Taj al-Din (the crown of religion), was born and brought up at Baghdad, but he fixed his residence at Damascus and died in that city. He was a Qur'an-reader, a grammarian, and a man of letters; the first of his age in all the branches of erudition, deeply imbued with traditional information received from the best authorities, and so illustrious by his reputation that it is useless for us to expatiate on his merits. Having studied under the most eminent masters, and among the rest, Abul Sa'adat Ibn al-Shajari, Abu Muhammad Ibn al-Khashshab, and Abu Mansur al-Jawaliqi<sup>1</sup>, he left Baghdad when yet a youth, and he revisited it for the last time in the year 563 (A.D. 1167-8). Having fixed his residence at Aleppo, he traded in old clothes, which he took to sell in Asia Minor. He afterwards removed to Damascus, where he gained the friendship and special favour of the Amir 'Izz al-Din Farrukh Shah, son to Shahan Shah and nephew to the sultan Salah al-Din Yusuf Ibn Ayyub. Having accompanied his patron to Egypt, he got into his possession the most valuable works preserved in the libraries of that country, and then returned to Damascus, where he settled. He was visited by numbers for the purpose of studying under his tuition, and the list of (his own) masters, drawn up by himself in alphabetical order, forms a large volume. One of his scholars related to me the following circumstance: "I was sitting at the door of the grammarian Abu Muhammad Ibn al-Khashshab, when the celebrated imam, al-Zamakhshar, came out and advanced towards me. He supported himself on a crutch in walking, (having lost one of his feet, which had been frost-bitten); and the people said: There is al-

---

2 This circumstance is not mentioned in the Kitab al-Aghani, the only work in which there was any probability of finding it.

1 The lives of these three persons will be found in this work.

Zamakhshari. The same person furnished (me with a note copied by him) from (a paper in) the handwriting of Taj al-Din, and which I here give; "Al- Zamakhshari was the most learned Persian of his time in the Arabic language, having surpassed them all by the knowledge which he obtained of it (by practice) and by the study of works treating on the subject. He was the last of their men of talent, and was well known to be a Motazelite. He came to us at Baghdad in the year 533 (A.D. 1138-9), and I saw him twice at the house of my master Abu T-Mansur al-Jawaliqi, under whose tuition he was reading some introductory works on philology,<sup>2</sup> with the design of procuring from him a licence to teach them; for al-Zama Khshari, with all his learning, had never met (with masters of repute so as to study under them), neither had he received any oral information (which he was authorised to communicate to others).<sup>3</sup> When I was at Cairo, the shaykh Muhadhdhab al-Din Abu Talib Muhammad, surnamed Ibn al-Khaymi, related to me this anecdote: "The shaykh Taj al-Din al-Kindi wrote to me, from Damascus, a poem containing these lines:

"O my friend, you so sedulous to fulfil the duties of friendship! you have kept your promise towards us and laid upon us a heavy debt (of gratitude). We are here in Syria, possessed with the desire of seeing you;<sup>3</sup> do you, in Egypt, feel desire to see us? In withholding from you the respect due to your merit, there we held the first rank; but you hold the first rank in the bestowing of favour upon us. It is out of our power that you should see us with you, and it is out of yours that we should see you with us. May God fulfil His promise towards those who keep theirs; may He grant (to our friend) as full a recompense as fidelity we have shown."

To this, "said Ibn al-Khaymi," I replied in a piece of verse which contained these lines:

"O you, descendants of Kindah who inhabit Syria we have failed in our duty towards you. To fulfil the obligations of friendship, we should have died on your departure from us."

Ibn al-Khaymi recited to me also the following verses as Taj al-Din's:

---

2 The word من فواتحها are so vague in their meaning, that the phrase to which they belong may be translated thus: Under whose tuition he was reading the introductions of some philological works, or under whose tuition he was reading some philological works, from beginning to end.

3 Literally: Pledges in the possession of desire towards thee.

"Let the astrologer grovel in his delusion, if he pretend to the knowledge of events brought round by the revolution of the sphere. To God alone pertains eternal knowledge, and neither man nor angel shares with Him therein. Astrologers make of their impiety a net to catch wealth; what evil means they employ, a net and infidelity!"

The following lines were written to Taj al-Din by Abu Shuja' Ibn al-Dahhan al-Faradi, whose life shall be given later:

"May the Lord in His bounty grant thee, Zayd! such additional favours as may surpass thy utmost hopes! May God never work a change in thy happy state as long as state and change shall be discussed by grammarians<sup>4</sup>. It is to thee, above all men, that a grammatical allusion should be addressed; have not grammatical examples been formed with the name?"<sup>5</sup>

When the shaykh Taj al-Din was far advanced in years, he composed these lines:

"I see men desire long life, but length of life proves only the nothingness of the past, and bringeth with it misery. In the season of youth I wished that Go might lengthen my days, and truly such a gift is a favour. But when I obtained my wish, that age which I desired so much became an affliction. When alone, my imagination sets before my mind the image of myself borne on the shoulders of men who walk with rapid pace<sup>6</sup>. When the Zephyr flits past me, its breath reminds me (not of garden but,) of those excavations which are covered with earth<sup>7</sup>. Here I am now, exposed to the fearful thunders and lightnings<sup>8</sup> of one and ninety years. People say: 'Medicine will do the good; but for me there is one medicine only the mercy of God.'"

4 State and change, or, as the original words are sometime translated, the terms of circumstance and the exchange or permutative, are two subjects which the Arabian grammarians have treated with great ability.

5 Alluding to the usual example قام زيد stetit Zeidus
 ضرب زيد عمرا زناك verberavit Zeidus Amrum, etc.

6 That is: The image of his own funeral. The rapid march of Muslim funeral procession is well known.

7 He means the graves, but is unwilling to pronounce a word of such sinister meaning.

8 A metaphor for threats. It is employed in the Qur'an.

Taj al-Din was born at Baghdad on the morning of Wednesday, 25th Sha'ban, A.H. 520 (September, A.D. 1126);* he died at Damascus on Monday, the 6th of Shawwal, 613 (January, A.D. 1217)** and was interred the same day at Mount Qasiyun. As for the shaykh Muhammad al-Din (Ibn al-Khaymi), he told me himself that his genealogy was as follows: Abu Talib Muhammad Ibn Abi 'I-Hasan 'Ali Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Mufaddal Ibn al-Tamaughaz. He recited to me a great deal of poetry composed by himself and by others. I got acquainted with him at our assemblies in Cairo, and was informed by him that he was born at al-Hillah al-Mizyadiyah<sup>9</sup> on the 28th of Shawwal, A.H. 549 (January, A.D. 1155).*** He died (at Cairo) on Wednesday, 20th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 642 (May, A.D. 1245),**** and was interred the next morning in the cemetery of the Lesser Qarafah. I attended his funeral service. He was considered to be a perfect master of (the pure Arabic) language, and a correct transmitter of poetical pieces and of (phrases illustrative of) philology. Qasiyun is a mountain which overlooks Damascus; it contains the tombs and mausoleums of the inhabitants, with a mosque, a number of colleges and Muslim monasteries. (Two of the rivers which water Damascus,) the Thaura and the Yazid have their sources in this mountain.

238 ZIRI IBN MANAD

The amir Ziri Ibn Manad, a member of the tribe of Sinhajah<sup>1</sup> and sprung from Himyar, was the ancestor of al-Mu'izz Ibn Badis (whose life will be found in another part of this work). Mention has been already made of his son Bulukkin (no. 118), of his great-grandson Badis (no. 107), and of his descendant Tamim (no. 125): in this last article, we have traced up, in the fullest manner, the descent of the family; Ziri was the first of them who attained supreme power. It

* 15 September--Ed.

** 17 January--Ed.

*** 5 January--Ed.

**** 17 May--Ed.

<sup>9</sup> See n. 211.

<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khalikan pronounces this word sunhajah, or sinhaja, but the manuscripts of the History of the Berbers by Ibn Khaldun write it Sanhajah. It is an Arabic corruption of the Berber name Zanak زناك or Sanak صناك was he who founded and fortified the city of Ashir; he commenced that undertaking during the revolt of Abu Yazid against al-Qa'im Ibn al-Mahdi and his son Isma'il al-Mansur (no. 95). Ziri having established his power at Ashir and subdued the surrounding country, received from al-Mansur the gift of the town of Taharat and its dependencies. He was an able ruler, brave and enterprising. The secret jealousy and hatred which subsisted between him and Ja'far al-Andalusi (no. 135) led to a battle which terminated by the death of Ziri. This event occurred in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 360 (July, A.D. 971); it is said that his horse having stumbled, he was thrown to the ground and then killed. His reign lasted twenty-six years. We have already spoken of Ashir in the life of Ibn Qurqul (no. 18 note<sup>2</sup>). Tahart is a city in North Africa: there are two places which bear this name, one Old Tahart, and the other New Tahart, but I do not know which of them it was that came into the possession of Ziri.<sup>3</sup>

239 ZAYNAB THE DAUGHTER OF AL-SHA'RI

Zaynab, called also Hurrah, and surnamed Omm al-Muwayyad, was the daughter of Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Ahmad Ibn Sahl Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Ubdus* the Sufi, a native of Jurjan and an inhabitant of Naysapur, who was generally known by the surname of al-Sha'ri. His daughter Zaynab was a woman of great instruction, having met (and studied under) a number of persons eminent for their learning, and from whom she obtained certificates authorising her to teach that information and traditional knowledge which she had acquired under their tuition. Among those from whom she took lessons were Abu Muhammad Isma'il Ibn Abi 'l-Qasim Ibn Abi Bakr the Qur'an reader and a native of Naysapur, Abu 'l-Qasim Zahir al-Shahhami and Abu Bakr Wajih al-Shahhami the sons of Abu Tahir, 'Abd al-Mun'im al-Qushayri, and Abu 'l-Futuh 'Abd al-Wahhab

---

2 This is an oversight; the author merely refers back to the present article. In my translation of the Arabic historians, who treat of the dynasties of North Africa, will be found a note on the precise situation of Ashir, a point which had not been hitherto ascertained. It is sufficient to state here that this city was built on the range of those precipitous hills to the south of Algeria, which are named in modern maps Tittery Doch.

3 New Tahart was founded by 'Abd al-Rahman the Rustemide, A.H. 144. It was this city which was given to Ziri by al-Mansur.

* M. de Slane gives 'Ahdus.--Ed.

Ibn Shah al-Shadiyaikhi* (native of Shadhiya kh near Naysapur). She received also licences to teach from the hafiz 'Abd al-Ghafir al-Farisi, the very learned al-Zamakhshari, author of the Kashshaf, and other masters of traditional learning. I possess a licence which she granted me in the year 610 (A.D. 1213-4; I was then little more than two years of age,) as, my birth took place on Thursday afternoon, 11th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 608) 22nd September, A.D. 1211).<sup>1</sup> I was born at Arbela, in the college founded by the sultan of that city, al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muzaffar al-Din, the son of Zayn al-Din. Zaynab was born at Naysapur, A.H. 524 (A.D. 1130), and died in the same city, in the month of the latter Jumada, A.H. 615 (A.D. 1218-9). Sha'ri means one who prepares or sells camels hair; I do not know, however, which of her ancestors it was who, by following this profession, obtained that surname.

س

240 SALIM IBN 'ABD ALLAH AL-'ADAWI

Salim, the son of 'Abd Allah and surnamed Abu 'Amr** or Abu 'Abd Allah, was grandson to the Khalif 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab (through whom he descended from 'Adi Ibn Ka'b Ibn Luwa'i, for which reason he bore the surname of) Al-'Adawi. He was one of the chief jurisconsults of Madinah and also one of the principal Tubi's his birth, his learning and by his veracity as a Traditionist. He gave the Traditions on the authority of his father and others, and his own authority was cited by al-Zuhri and by Nafi'. He died towards the end of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 106 (May A.D. 725), or 108 according to another statement. The khalif Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik had presided at the pilgrim age that year, and on his return from Makkah, he entered Madinah at the moment of Salim's death. It was he who pronounced the funeral service over the body, and he proceeded to the burying-ground of al-Baqi' for that purpose: the crowd being so great (that it was impossible to perform it at the house of the deceased). Hisham, on * M.de Slane gives Shadhiyaji-Ed.

<sup>1</sup> It is possible for a child of that age to learn by heart some of the shorter Traditions, some of which consist only in a few words.

** H. de Slane gives 'Umar.--Ed.

seeing the multitude of people which had assembled there, said to Ibrahim Ibn Hisham al-Makhzumi: "Make a levy of four thousand men from among these people, to serve me as soldiers;" and for this reason it was, that the year of Salim's death was called the year of the four thousand. Muhammad Ibn Ishaq, the author of the work entitled al-Maghuzi wa 6'l-Siyar, relates as follows: "I saw Salim the son of 'Abd Allah and the grandson of 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab; he always wore woollen.<sup>1</sup> he was a corpulent man and lived by the labour of his own hands. (The khalif) Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik entered one day into the Ka'abah, and seeing Salim, told him to ask whatever he desired, on which Salim answered: 'By Allah! I shall ask of God only, when I am in God's house."

**[Salim narrates: "I presented myself before al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik who said to me: "How beautiful is your body! What is your diet?' 'Cake and olive oil', said I. Then he said: 'will you like to have them?' I said: 'I abstain till I have an urge for them. When I have a desire I eat them."

He used to say: "Beware of constantly taking meat because it (produces) strong desire like that for drink."

'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz wrote to Salim Ibn 'Abd Allah to transcribe a few epistles of 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab. He wrote (in reply): "O 'Umar [I remind you of the kings whose eyes were taken out, which had never been satisfied with what they enjoyed; and their bellies were struck off, which were never satiated; and they became carcasses, buried under mounds of earth; and if they had been near our residence their stink smell must have caused us trouble.]

241* SALIM AL-KHASIR

**Salim Ibn 'Amr Ibn Hammad Ibn 'Ata was surnamed 'al-Khasir' (a loser) because of the following circumstance. He sold (a copy of)

1 This would seem to prove that he belonged to the fraternity of the Sufis.

* This notice is not to be found in the autograph, nor in de Slane's edition. It is, however, included in subsequent editions.--Ed.

** The editor of the Cairo (1948) edition says in a foot-note that his name was Salm and not Salim.--Ed.

the Qur'an and bought a harp with that money. He publicly committed carnal acts, debauchery, and shameless deeds. He wrote an eulogium on Caliph al-Mahdi in which the following verses occur:

"The hour of departure has arrived and the camel litters are packed, and (the camel-driver who is) hard working, ever ready to travel causing inconvenience, has by singing urged the camels to proceed. I drank pure unadulterated water of prophet-hood at the peaks of Meccan hills."

He (al-Mahdi) wanted to reduce his reward. So Salim took an oath not to accept but a reward greater than that of Ibn Abu Hafsah. Al-Mahdi had rewarded a sum of one hundred thousand dirhams to Ibn Abi Hafsah for presenting a qasidah the opening line of which runs thus.

"Her phantom passes visiting you on the way".

Then Salim took an oath not to accept but a reward of one hundred and one thousands of dirhams. He said (to the Caliph): "Place the two qasidahs before the scholars to judge if mine is superior or his." Then al-Mahdi ordered a reward of one hundred and one thousands of dirhams for him. This became his capital.

When al-Rashid took the oath of allegiance for Muhammad Ibn Zubaydah, he said:

"Tell the abodes by twany dunes which have been watered by morning clouds full of showers.

All the people have taken oath of allegiance to Muhammad Ibn Zubayda Bint Ja'far who is rightly guided leader."

Zubaydah filled his mouth with pearls which he sold for twenty thousand dinars.

Salim died during the reign of al-Rashid and left behind thirty-six thousand dinars which he had entrusted to Abu al-Shimr al-Ghassani. By chance Ibrahim al-Mawsili once sang before al-Rashid who was much delighted. He said: "O Ibrahim! Ask for what you like." He said "O my Chief! I ask you for a thing which will not trouble you in the least." He said, "what is that?" He replied: "Salim has died without leaving an heir; he has left a sum of thirty-six thousand dinars with Abu T-Shimr al-Ghassani. So order him to pay this amount to me. He ordered accordingly. After this al-Jammaz and his father claimed this amount as inheritance, being his relatives.

When Abu T-Atahiyyah said (this verse):

"May God make you high, O Salim Ibn 'Amr!, Greed has humiliated the necks of people."

Thereupon Salim got angry and said: "He considers me to be greedy"; and he retorted:

What bad piety it is, that he preaches piety to others and does not put it into practice himself.

Had he been true in his piety, his house must have been a mosque in the noon and the evening.

He abandons the world which he had not possessed nor had he made an effort to gain it.

He fears that his sustenance will exhaust and the sustenance that is with God will never exhaust.

Sustenance is destined for whom sooner you see and reaches every white and coloured person.

Every one gets sustenance whether he strives for it or not."

Salim was one of the pupils of Bashshar (Ibn Burd). Then he began to boast that his own verses were more tender than those of Bashshar. He became angry and said:

"He who takes care of people dies not get his objective and he succeeds who slanders and deceives."

Salim retorted:

"He who cares for people dies of grief; and he who is courageous succeeds and enjoys. "Thereupon Bashshar got furious and said: "My verse is taken away and by God I did not eat any thing today, nor have I slept. "He added: "He has plagiarised my ideas for which I had toiled and clothed them in words more appropriate than mine. I shall never reconcile with him."

Then (people) continued asking him to reconcile with him and subsequently he yielded.

Salim died in A.H. 186/A.D. 802.

242 ABU BAKR IBN 'AYYASH

Abu Bakr Salim Ibn 'Ayyash Ibn Salim al-Khayyat al-Asadi al-Kufi (a member of the tribe of Asad, a native of Kufah), an eminent Traditionist and celebrated for his learning, was one of those who received from 'Asim the readings of the Qur'an, and handed them down. He had been enfranchised by Wasil Ibn Hayyan al-Ahadab. The following anecdote respecting him is related by al-Mubarrad in his Kamil: Abu Bakr Ibn Ayyash said: "I was suffering from an anxious desire (of meeting one whom I loved), when I called to mind the verse of Dhu 'l-Rummah's:

'Perhaps a flow of tears will give me ease from pain; perhaps it may cure a heart whose sole companion is sad thoughts.'

"On this I withdrew to a private place and wept, by which means my sufferings were calmed." A number of other anecdotes are related concerning him. Some say that Abu Bakr was his real name and not a surname, but other mention that he was called Shu'bah. The following relation has been handed down in his own words: "When a misfortune befel me in my youth, I bore it with firmness and kept form weeping by strength of endurance;<sup>1</sup> this however was hurtful to me, and I suffered much from it; but one day, being at al-Kunasah,<sup>2</sup> I saw an Arab of the Desert mounted on a camel, who stopped and recited these lines:

"My two friends!<sup>3</sup> (rein over your camels and) turn their breasts towards Huzwa, that spot so long abandoned. There we shall weep over the abodes (of our friends, now in ruins)! Perhaps a flow of tears may give me ease from pain; perhaps it may cure a heart whose sole companion is sad thoughts."

I asked who he was, and they told me he was Dhu 'l-Rummah. Some time after, misfortunes fell upon me, and having wept, I obtained relief. On this I said: 'That scoundrel of a wild Arab! how knowing he was.' Eighteen days after the death of al-Rashid, Ibn 'Ayyash died at Kufah, A.H. 193 (April, A.D. 809), at the age of ninety-eight years. Al-Rashid died at Tus on the eve of Saturday, the 3rd of the latter Jumada of that year (23rd March, A.D. 809). It is also said that Ibn 'Ayyash was a nawla to the tribe of Kahil Ibn Asad Ibn Khuzaymah.

---

1 Here the author relates, perhaps through inadvertence, another version of the same anecdote.

2 Al-Kunasah, a village near Kufah, (Qamus. Marasid).

3 See no. 52, note 1.

243 SABUR IBN ARDASHIR THE WAZIR

Abu Nasr Sabur Ibn Ardashir, wazir to the Daylamite sultan Baha al-Dawlah Abu Nasr son of 'Adad al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, was illustrious as a powerful chief and eminent as a wazir, equally remarkable for his abilities and for his learning. His palace was the constant resort of the poets of the day. Al-Tha'libi mentions him in the Yatimah, and devotes a special chapter of that work to the poets who celebrated his praise. Among the number was Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ba bbagha,' who composed these lines in his honour:

"I blamed Fortune for withholding the accomplishment of my desires, and she answered: 'Your reproaches are unreasonable; that which you ask cannot be granted. I replied: 'It depends on you that my hopes of riches be not frustrated. 'You are mistaken,' said she, 'it depends upon Sabur. Apply to the Wazir Abu Nasr and make an exorbitant demand; the extravagance of your suit will be easily pardoned.' I followed the advice which Fortune gave me; and good advice, even from an enemy, deserves thanks."

Another of those poets, Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Harun, addressed him in a poem containing this passage:

"O thou who ensures the repose of the empire in those days of trouble! thou who art firm in heart when fate itself trembles! Why does the world treat me so cruelly? I cannot obtain therein a place of abode, and I (wander from one country to another) like a novel thought when it passes into a proverb. Were fortune just, were she indulgent, I should have possessed, under thy protection, horses and servants. For how admirable are the words which I have scattered abroad! those precious pearls! did maidens possess them, they would not consent to remain without necklaces; and those brilliant thoughts! did maidens read them, their eyes would require no kuhl to increase their brightness."<sup>1</sup>

The wazir having been deposed and afterwards reinstated, Abu Ishaq al-Sabi wrote to him these lines.

---

1 Such is the real meaning of a verse containing a series of quibbles impossible to be translated. In the Arabic text we find the word عيون with the sense of eyes, of excellent things, and of essence of constituent substance; in the two last cases it is opposed to the word معان which means reality and thoughts.

"Wedded to the wazirat, you divorced her<sup>2</sup> from you when she was in fault and acted wrong. It was then necessary that she should belong to another before she could legally return to you.<sup>3</sup> She is now yours again, and she made an oath that no bridegroom, excepting you, should pass a night with her and live."

He founded at Baghdad a house of learning (or college) and the poet Abu 'l-'Ala al-Ma'arri alludes to it in this passage from one of his most celebrated qasidahs:

"And in the house of Sabur, a sprightly songstress enlivened our evenings with a voice melodious as the dove's."

Sabur died at Baghdad, A.H. 416 (A.D. 1025-6); he was born at Shiraz on the eve of Saturday, the 15th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A.H. 336 (May, A.D. 948). His sovereign Baha' al-Din died at Arrajan in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 403 (November-December, A.D. 1012), aged forty-two years, nine months add twenty days. Sabur is an Arabic alteration of the Persian words shah pur, the king's son. Here, according to the custom of the Persians, the noun governed in the genitive is placed before the governing noun (which is not the case in Arabic). The first who bore this name was Sapur Ibn Ardashir Ibn Babek Ibn Sasan, one of the kings of Persia. Al-Daraqutni says that we must pronounce Ardashir; a second author states that this word means in Persian flour, milk, but another says flour, sweet. Ard signifies flour, shir milk, and shirin sweet. Some pronounce this name Azdashir<sup>4</sup>.

244 SARI AL-SAQATI

Abu 'l-Hasan Sari Ibn al-Mughallis al-Saqati (the seller of cast clothes), was one of the men of the path<sup>1</sup>, (tariqah) and of the masters

2 To maintain the propriety of the metaphor, it was necessary, in making the translation, to consider wazirat as of the feminine gender.

3 It is well known that by the Muslim law, a man cannot take back his wife, when he has repudiated her by an absolute divorce, until she has been married and divorced by another.

4 In Arabic manuscripts, this name is generally written in the last manner. See additions and corrections.

1 See no. 111 note (3).

of the truth; ارباب الحقيقة the first person of his time by his devotion and his acquaintance with the doctrines of Sufism<sup>3</sup>. He was maternal uncle to Abu 'l-Qasim al-Junayd and his master (in Sufism); his own master was Ma'ruf al-Karkhi. It is said that al-Saqati one day in his shop, when Ma'ruf came to him with an orphan boy and said: Clothe this orphan." "I clothed the boy," said al-Saqati, "and Ma'ruf was rejoiced thereat and said; 'May God render the world hateful to thee and grant thee repose from all the cares!' I immediately left my shop, hating nothing so much as the world; and I owe my present state (of quietude) to the blessed merits of Ma'ruf." The following anecdote is related on good authority: Sari said that for thirty years he never ceased imploring divine pardon for having once exclaimed: (Praise be to God! and on being asked the reason, he said: "A fire broke out in Baghdad, and a person came up to me and told me that my shop had escaped, on which I uttered those words; and even to this moment I repent of having said so, because it showed that I wished better to myself than to others." Al-Junayd related as follows: "I went one day to see my uncle al-Saqati and found him in tears. 'What causeth thee to weep?' said I. 'Yesterday,' replied al-Saqati, 'my little girl came and said to me: Father! the night is warm and I have brought a pitcher (of water) to hang it up here for thee.<sup>4</sup> A heaviness then came over my eyes and I fell into a sleep, during which I saw the most beauteous maid of God's creation descend from heaven. 'For whom art thou destined?' said I. 'For him,' she replied, 'who drinketh not of water cooled in a pitcher.' I immediately took the pitcher and dashed it to the ground." Al-Junayd said that he saw the fragments lying about and that al-Saqati left them there till they were covered by the accumulation of dust. Sari al-Saqati died at Baghdad, A.H. 251; or, by another account, on Wednesday, the 6th of Ramadan, after day-break, A.H. 256 (August, A.D. 870)*; but some place his death in the year 257. He was interred in the Shunizi cemetery. The Khatib says in his history of Baghdad; "The Shunizi burying-ground is situated behind the place called at-Tuthah and near the canal made by 'Isa Ibn 'Ali the Hashimite, and called after him the river Isa. I heard one of my masters says that the Koraish grave yard (at Baghdad) was known in old times by the name of the

2 See no. 142, note truth.

3 Literally: "With the sciences of the profession of the divine unity." Every necessary information on this abstruse subject will be found in M.de Sacy's analysis of Jamil's lives of the Sufis; Notices et Extraits, tom. XII. page 345.

4 Water placed in a porous earthen jar cools by evaporation.

* 9 August.--Ed.

lasser Shunizi, and that the cemetery at the back of al-Tuthah bore that of the greater Shunizi. They were so called after two brothers, one of whom was buried in each.' The tomb of Sari al-Saqati is a conspicuous and well-known object; close beside it is that of al-Junayd. Al-Saqati used frequently to recite these lines;

"When I complained of the pains of love, my mistress said: 'Thou tellest me a falsehood; why do I see thy bones clothed with flesh? There can be no love (in a man) unless his skin cleave to his entrails, and his mind be so greatly troubled, that he answers not when called.'"

245 AL-SARI AL-RAFFA

Abu 'l-Hasan al-Sari Ibn Ahmad Ibn al-Sari al-Kindi al-Mawsili (member of the tribe of Kindah and native of Mosul), surnamed al-Raffa (the danner), was a poet of celebrity. In his youth, he wrought as a lace-maker at a shop in Baghdad, but at the same time, he composed poetry and cultivated belles-lettres with assiduity. By his perseverance he succeeded in attaining great proficiency as a poet, and having visited Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Hamdan at Aleppo, he made poems in his honour and remained there for some time. After the death of that prince, he proceeded to Baghdad and celebrated the praises of al-Wazir al-Muhallabi and other persons of eminence, by whom his poetic talents were highly appreciated and generously rewarded. The enmity which he bore towards the two Khalidites, Abu Bakr Muhammad and Abu 'Uthman Sa'id was so great that he accused them of stealing his verses and those of others; he even went so far that, in transcribing the diwan of Kushajim, the celebrated poet,<sup>1</sup> who was then considered in those countries as the pink of excellence in literature, and whose compositions al-Sari took as models for his own, he inserted, in the copies which he wrote out, the best of the poems made him and by the Khalidites: in this, his object was not only to augment the size of the book so as to get a higher price for it, but also to give value to his own poetry and to cast discredit on the Khalidites, by making it appear that what he had said of their plagiarisms was true. To this circumstance must be attributed the interpolated pieces in Kushajim's diwan, and which are not to be found in the original copies. Al-Sari was by nature a poet; his style is sweet, his thoughts are elegant, and he is particularly copious in the variety of his comparisons and descriptions. But he had neither a pleasing countenance nor a graceful figure; he did not possess even a tolerable skill in any other science but poetry. Previously to his death, his poetical composition filled nearly three hundred leaves, but since that, the collection has increased, and a philologist of later times has arranged it in alphabetical order, Al-Sari mentions his (former) profession in a piece of verse, from which we extract these lines:

1 See note on Kushajim, under Imam Ja'far al-Sadiq (no. 128).

"By means of my needle I formerly preserved my self-respect, and avoided the prostitution of my poetic talent. It furnished me with sustenance, so slight indeed, that it seemed to come to me through the needle's eye."

The following verses, taken from one of his qasidahs are among the best specimens of his talent for eulogy:

"When he pours forth his liberality, his looks are mild and his face beams with pleasure, but in the shock of adverse hosts, they become stern. When he halts, his dwelling is spacious (for his guests are many), but when he marches to battle with his squadrons, he makes the plain (too) narrow for the enemy."<sup>2</sup>

Al-Tha'labi, in the Muntakhil, cites these verses by al-Sari: "Thou hast conferred on me such a favour, that thy beneficence makes the darkness seem to me as light; to me who before found the brightness of day obscure (and cheerless). Now I am the envy of my friends; and before, I was the pity of my enemies."

One of his finest passages on the beauty of his mistress is the following:

"I should lay down my life for her who costs me my life and yet refuses me a simple salutation! The death which awaits me lies in ambush in those eyes! it is thus that death lies hid in the sharp edge of the sword."

Al-Sari's collected poetry is all very good: he composed also the works entitled: al-Muhibb wa 'l-Mahbub (the lover and the beloved), al-Mashmum wa 'l-Mashrub (perfumes and liquors), and the Kitab al-Dirah<sup>3</sup>.

2 That is, he reduces his enemies to the last extremity. This verse reproduces the idea which is expressed in the Qu'ran, surah 9, verse 119.

3 The word Dirah ديرة is so uncertain in its signification that it is impossible, without having examined the work itself, to explain its title. Hajji Khali'ah does not mention it in his Bibliographical dictionary.

He died at Baghdad between the years 360 and 370, according to the Khatib in his History of that city; and others state that the year of his death was A.H. 364. Ibn al-Athir says in his Annals that he died A.H. 366 (A.D. 976-7).

246 HAYS-BAYS AL-SAYFI<sup>1</sup>

Abu 'l-Fawaris Sa'd Ibn Muhammad Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Sayfi, a celebrated poet and a member of the tribe of Tamim, bore the surname of Shihab al-Din (flambeau of religion), and was generally known by the appellation of Hays-Bays. He was a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i, having studied jurisprudence at Ray under the Qadi Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-karim al-Wazzan and maintained (the usual) discussions on points of controversy. He yielded, however, to his passion for literature and composed verses of which the merit was enhanced by a dignified style; he drew up also some epistles remarkable for their precision and elegance of expression. The hafiz Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ani mentions him with high commendation in the Kitab al-Dhayl and gives some of the pieces (or sentences) which he, Hays-Bays, had learned by oral transmission; the same hafiz had read the collected poetical works and the epistles of Hays-Bays, under the direction of their author. By his learning and talent Abu 'l-Fawaris contributed to the instruction of many, and by his acquaintance with the poetry and the various dialects of the desert Arabs, he held the first place amongst his contemporaries; but it is said that he was full of arrogance and presumption. He never addressed any person but in the purest Arabic;<sup>2</sup> having once obtained an order for a sum of money payable in the city of Hillah, he proceeded thither to receive the amount of the bill, which was drawn on the farmer of the revenues in that district. On his arrival he sent his boy to this person, who not only refused listening to his claim, but called his master a scoundrel. On this Hays-Bays went to the governor of the town, Diya al-Din Muhallil Ibn Abi 'l-Askar al-Jawami, an old and intimate friend of his, and the latter sent one of the ushers of his court with Hays-Bays to enforce payment. Abu 'l-Fawaris was not satisfied, however, with what his friend the governor had done for him, and he

---

1 [Al-Sha'ir, in Tehran edition--Ed.]

2 Literally: In the Arabic language; that is to say, in the dialect of the desert Arabs.

reproached him with his conduct in the following letter: "I did not imagine that an acquaintance and a friendship of so many years could have left on the heart that (slight) degree of impression which I have here discovered; nay, I even thought that, were the mightiest army to bear hostile design against me, warriors in armour, thick-necked lions of the family of Abu 'l-'Askar, had risen to my assistance; how then should it not be with an agent who levies taxes on poor market-people?. With one who farms the revenues of that miserable place Hillah and of its petty circumscription?<sup>3</sup> Yet the only answer which I received to my complaint was this: he sent, forsooth, a hireling to reprimand him and exact from him a payment which he was bound to make: So shall it not be, by Allah!

The lions, the lions of the forest think not of spoil in the day of battle, but of him whose spoils they are to win."

And I swear by Allah, and by his Prophet, and by the Prophet's household! that if thou givest me not such a token of respect as shall be a subject of conversation for the females of Hillah at their weddings and assemblies, thy friend shall not remain in this, thy Hillah should he be even obliged to pass the night on the causeway or on the bridges. Suppose that I did lose my money;<sup>4</sup> must I then lose my honest pride! O whot an insult! what an insult! Adieu!"

He always wore the Bedwin dress with a sword suspended from his shoulder. this circumstance induced Abu 'l-Qasim (Hibat Allah) Ibn al-Fadl, whose life shall be given later, to compose on him the lines which follow; we must however observe that 'Imad al-Din in his Kharidah, attributes them to the Ra'is<sup>5</sup> 'Ali Ibn al-A'rabi, who died, according to him, in the year 547 (A.D. 1152-3):

"Affect as you may the manners of the desert Arabs and wear (like them) a high-peaked cap, there is not in you a single hair of the tribe of Tamim. Eat the lizard which burrows in the samds, cut up

3 This passage is incorrectly given in all the copies. The true reading exists in the autograph alone; it is as follows.

فكّين بعامل سويقة و ضامن حليّة و حليقه

[*This verse was composed by Abu Zamima in the praise of al-Mu'tasim on his victory a 'Amuriyah. Ed.]

4 The expression حمر النعيم signifies literally. rubre deliciarum which, in Arabic, is equivalent to deliciae rubrae or deliciae aurae.

5 The word rais (chief) was the title usually given to persons holding a high rank in the civil service. See no 184, note on ra'is.

the dried fruit of the colocynth,<sup>6</sup> and drink as you please of the urine of the accustomed to give hospitality, and ready to protect his honour from insult."

When these verses came to the knowledge of Abu I-Fawaris, he composed the following in reply:

"Strive not to abase exalted worth, when you yourself are pointed at with respectful admiration. The noble and generous man injures his character by hostility towards one who is equally noble and generous. Wine though it possesses good qualities was declared impure, and forbidden because it attacked the reason."

Al-Bujayri,* the khatib, or public preacher at the town of al-Huwayzah, addressed him in these lines:

"It is true, Hays Bays, that we are not of the true Arabic race, yet you belied the family of Bujayr as you have already belied the tribe of Tamim."<sup>7</sup>

The following relation was made by the Shaykh Nasr Allah Ibn Mujalli, inspector of the arsenal<sup>8</sup> (at Baghdad), a man of unimpeached veracity and a strict sunnite: I saw in a dream 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, and I said to him; 'Commander of the faithful! you** (and Muhammad) took Makkah and proclaimed that whoever entered the house of Abu Safyan should be in safety, yet you know what happened to your son al-Husayn<sup>9</sup> on the (fatal) day of al-Taff.<sup>10</sup> To this he replied: 'Did you hear Ibn al-Sayfi's verses on this subject?.' 'No,' said I. 'Go then,' he rejoined, 'and hear them from him!' On awaking, I hastened to the house of Hays-Bays, and having called him out, I told him my dream, on which he sobbed aloud and began to shed tears. 'By 6 The colocynth was much used as a medicine by the Arabs of the desert, but the poet here pretends that they made it into soup.

* The Cairo and Tehran edition give Buhari-Ed.

7 The author should have given a word of explanation relative to these verses of al-Bujayri, and stated the reason which induced him to compose them; their drift would then be understood. It is necessary to observe that the autography writes البجشري (al-Bujayri) بجشري and (Bujayr).

8 Literally: Inspector of the manufactory at the magazine.

** [ Evidently a historical blunder-Ed. ]

9 Literally: And was consummated on your son al-Husayn what was consummated. He alluded to his murder, but did not choose to pronounce the word, lest he should hurt still more the parental feelings of Ali.

10 Al-Taff, a region in the open country near Ku'fa; it was there that al-Hussain was slain. (Mara'sid.)

Allah! he exclaimed, 'I never communicated these verses by word or writing to any human being, and it was only this very night that I composed them!' He then recited them to me, and they were as follows:

"When we ruled, mercy was our very nature; but when you came to power, the palins flowed with blood. You declared it lawful to massacre your prisoners; but we were always human and pardoned ours. Therein lies the difference between us; but each vase can exude only the liquor it contains."

Abu 'l-Fawaris having one day remarked a great commotion among the people, he asked what had brought them into such confusion (or hays-bays, as he called it) and state this expression considered most singular) it continued ever after to be given him as a nickname. These two words (when thus united) signify trouble or calamity: it is thus that the Arabs of the Desert say, in speaking of persons under misfortune, that they have fallen in to hays-bays. He died at Baghdad on the eve of Wednesday, the 6th of Sha'ban, A.H. 574 (January, A.D. 1179), and was buried the next morning in the cemetery of the Quraysh, situated on the west side (of the Tigris). When asked concerning his age, he would reply that he was living in the world at random; the fact being, that he did not know the date of his birth. He used to assert that he descended from Aktham Ibn Sayfi al-Tamimi, the philosopher of the Arabs.<sup>11</sup> He left no posterity. Al-Huwayzah is a village in the province of Khuzistan, twelve miles distant from al-Ahwaz.

247 ABU 'L-MA'ALI AL-HAZIRI

Abu 'l-Ma'ali Sa'd Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Qasim Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Qasim al-Ansari al-Khazraji (descended from the Ansars of the tribe of Khazraj) al-Warraaq al-Haziri (the book-copyist of al-Hazirah), and generally known

---

<sup>11</sup> Aktham Ibn Sayfi, the philosopher or the judge of the Arabs, was one of the most influential men of the tribe of Tamim. When Muhammad announced his doctrines, Aktham recommended his people to adopt them, but he did not set them the example. He died at one of the stations of his tribe in the desert, towards A.H. 44. - See Rasmussen's Historia Ante-islamica, p. 116.

by the appellation of Dallal al-Kutub (the book-broker), was a man possessed of considerable information and a good talent for poetry. He compiled a number of works in which he displayed no inferior abilities, particularly his Zinat al-Dahr, etc. (ornament of the age, refuge of contemporaries, and citation of the beauties contained in modern poetry). In this work, which he designed as a continuation to Abu 'l-Hasan al-Bakharzi's Dumyat al-Qasr, he mentions a great number of his contemporaries and predecessors, with a sketch of their lives and some extract from their poetry. The katib 'Imad al-Din speaks of him in the Kharidah and gives numerous pieces of verse which he had learned from him; some of these were by Abu 'l-Ma'ali himself and the rest by other persons, for he was particularly diligent in collecting the poetry of others and inquiring into their history. His Lumah al-Mulah (flash of anecdote, or rather flashes of anecdotes) is a proof of his extensive acquirements.<sup>1</sup> The following verses are by Abu 'l-Ma'ali:<sup>2</sup>

"Seape evenit ut juvenis, in cujus gena rosa fuit et in cujus ore vinum, haud mihi mitem se preaberet donec super auroram faciei ejus errepuissent tenbrea. Pulli equini ad instar refractarius fuit donec um compescuisset frenum."*

By the same:

"Tenebrea lanuginin circumdederunt genas ejus et amore ejus captus suspiria duxi, dicens; Aqua vitea in ore ejus dulci sita est; sinite me in tenebras ingredi."

This idea bears some resemblance to that which Ibn Rashīq has expressed in the following piece;

"Seape juvenis fuscus, aureo colore, ex oculis siccis imbres eliciens (crudelitate sua) firenum lanuginis sustinere nesciens, sicut pullus equinus habenam adhuc insuetam repellens, opinatus est

1 According to Hajji Khalīfrah al this work is a collection of pieces in prose and verse.

2 The pieces which Ibn Khalīkan has here inserted would not have been reproduced in this translation, did they not serve to prove either the extreme corruption of the age in which he lived, or the singular influence which the platonic fancies of the Sufis exerted over the poetry of the period.

* English version:

"And he with beard has a rose in his cheek and liquor in his mouth. He did not yield to me till the morning of his post (beauty) turned into darkness. (He is) like the colt which colts under the rider and is controlled by the bridle.--Ed.

lanuginem illam e corpore meo eagritudinem expellere posse, et caput avertit me videns, prea molestia et pudore. Sed nescivit illam (lanuginem) viridarium esse in corde meo cupidinem germinare faciens. Videsne genam ejus nil aliud ess quam balteum cui ensis appensus est?"

In the life of Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, the author of the 'Iqd, we have given a passage which contains an idea similar to that expressed in this last verse (see page 92). The following lines are by al-Haziri:

"Pons lanuginis extensus super aquam juventutis quæa genas suas permeat, mihi vlam preabuit ad obliviscendum amorem, cum jam essem vinctus et captivus."

By the same:

"I complained of the pains I suffered for the love of one whose absence tortured my heart; (pains like) a glowing fire not to be extinguished! My absence, replied she, can best give you respite from your sufferings; did the sun not retire, his light would burn (the world)."

The compositions of this poet abound with graceful thoughts expressed with great elegance. He died at Baghdad on Monday the 25th (some say the 15th) of Safar, A.H. 568 (October A.D. 1172)* Monday fell on 25 afar 16 October. On 15 Safar it was Friday. Ed: and was buried in the cemetery at the Gate of Harm. - Haziri means belonging to Hazirah, a place higher up (the river) than Baghdad; it has produced many learned men, who all bore this surname, and it gives its name to the Hazirahcloth.

248 SA'ID IBN JUBAYR

Abu 'Abd Allah (some say Abu Muhammad) Sa'id Ibn Jubayr Ibn Hisham, surnamed al-Asadi, was a black and a client by enfranchisement to the tribe of Walibah Ibn al-Harith, a branch of that of Asad Ibn Khuzaymah. This eminent Tabi'i was a native of Kufah; he acquired his learning under the tuition of Ibn 'Abbas and

---

* Monday fell on 25 Safar, 16 October. On 5 Safar it was the day.--
Ed.

'Abd Allah Ibn 'Umar,<sup>1</sup> the former of whom told him one day to teach the Traditions. "I teach the Traditions?" exclaimed Sa'id, "and you here!" "Is it not a favour which God grants you," replied Ibn Abbas, "in procuring you the opportunity of teaching them in my presence? For if you do it right, it is well; and if you make mistakes, I correct you." When Ibn 'Abbas lost his sight, Sa'id was inscribed on the list of the muftis, an honour which he had always refused to accept, and which now gave him great dissatisfaction.

*He learned the reading of the Qur'an from Ibn 'Abbas, not directly (from himself, but from one of his disciples);<sup>2</sup> he received from him also the explanation of the Qur'an an most of the Traditions which he transmitted to others. His own authority was cited for the reading of the Qur'an by al-Minhal Ibn 'Amr<sup>3</sup> and Abu 'Amir Ibn al-'Ala, who had learned it from him, but indirectly, Wafa Ibn Ilyas relates that Sa'id once asked him, during the month of Ramadan, to hold the Qur'an for him till he read it, and that he did not rise

1 Abu 'Abd al-Rahman 'Abd Allah, son of 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, was one of the most eminent among the companions of Muhammad by his piety, his generosity, his contempt of the world, his learning and his virtues. Though entitled by birth to aspire to the highest places in the empire, he never hearkened to the dictates of ambition; possessing a vast influence over the Muslims by his rank, his instruction, and his holy life, he neither employed nor abused it in favour of any party, and during the civil wars which raged among the followers of Islamism, he remained neutral, solely occupied with the duties of religion. For a period of sixty years, persons came from all parts to consult him and learn from him the Traditions. His generosity was equal to his piety, and it is stated that he would frequently distribute thirty thousand dirhams in charity on the days in which he gave audience. His slaves well knew the extent of his kindness, and many of them affected an extreme devotion with the well-grounded hopes of obtaining their liberty. When his friends remonstrated with him on the subject, telling him that his slaves were only deceiving him, he used to answer, "I let myself be deceived by him who essays to do it in pretexting God's name." He died at Makkah. A.H. 73 (A.D. 692-3), aged 84 years. Al-Bukhari says: "The most authentic Traditions are those given by Malik, after Nafi', on the authority of Ibn 'Umar. (Tab. al-Fuqaha, fol.5.)

* From: "He learned" to "best known" not in the autograph.—Ed.

2 In the style of the Traditionists and Qur'an-readers, the word عرضا is opposed to سألا

3 The author of the Tabaqat al-Muhaddithin gives a short account of al-Minhal Ibn 'Amr. According to his statement, al-Minhal was a client by enfranchisement to the tribe of Asad Ibn Khuzaymah and a native of Kufah. He then mentions the names of the doctors under whom he studied and those of his pupils, but he does not give the date of his death.

from his place till he had read it through: Sa'id himself mentioned that he once recited the whole of it in one of the raka'as<sup>4</sup> which he made in the temple of Makkah. It is related by Isma'il Ibn 'Abd al-Malik<sup>5</sup> that Sa'id Ibn Jubayr once acted for them as imam in the month of Ramadan, and that one night he recited the Qur'an according to the reading of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Utbah Ibn Mas'ud;<sup>6</sup> another night, according to that of Zayd Ibn Thabit; following this, each successive night, a different mode of reading. A person having once asked Sa'id to put down for him in writing the explanation of the Qur'an, he flew into a passions and exclaimed: "I should rather be palsied in one half of my body than do so." It was said by Khasif that the best acquainted among the Tabi'is with the laws of divorce was Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab, - with the rites of the Pilgrimage, 'Ata,<sup>7</sup> with the distinction between what was lawful and what was forbidden, Tawus, and with the interpretation of the Qur'an, Abu 'l-Hajjaj Mujahid Ibn Jubayr,<sup>8</sup> but he observed that Sa'id Ibn Jubayr had a more general knowledge than all of the whole of these sciences. Sa'id began the world as a secretary to 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Utbah Ibn Mas'ud and then served Abu Burdah Ibn Abi Musa al-Ash'ari<sup>9</sup> in the same capacity. Abu Nu'aym<sup>10</sup> says, in his History of Isphahan: "Sa'id came to this city and sojourned in it for a time, after which he went to 'Iraq and took up his residence in the village of Sunbulan."<sup>11</sup> It is related by Muhammad Ibn Habib that when Sa'id Ibn Jubayr was at Isphahan, they asked to hear from him the Traditions, but he would not communicate any to them. Yet when 4 For the pronunciation of this word I follow the Qamus.

5 This Isma'il was probably a son of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan, the fifth Umayyad khalif.

6 This was nephew of the celebrated Qur'an reader 'Abd Allah Ibn Mas'ud. His father, 'Utbah, was one of the Ansar. (Talqih.)

7 There were two celebrated Tabi'is who bore this name; the most eminent was 'Ata Ibn Abi Rabah, whose life is given in this work. The other, named 'Ata Ibn Yasaar, is noticed in the life of his brother Sulayman; no. 258.

8 The celebrated Imam and Tabi'i Abu al-Hajjaj Mujahid Ibn Jubayr was a doctor of the highest authority in jurisprudence and explanation of the Qur'an. He received his instruction from some of the principal Companions of Muhammad. 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Umar respected him to such a degree that he held his stirrup when he was getting on horseback and arranged his clothes. He died A.H. 101 (A.D. 719-20 or 111 (Tab al-Fuqaha.)

9 The life of Abu Burdah is given in this work.

10 The life of Abu Nu'aym has been already given, no. 32.

11 Sunbulan, a place at Isphahan. (Marasid)

he returned to Kufah he taught them publicly; on this some one said to him: "Abu Muhammad! you would not teach the Traditions when at Isphahan, and here you are now, teaching them in Kufah! Sa'id replied: "Set forth your wares where you are best known."<sup>12</sup> Sa'id joined 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays in his revolt against 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan.<sup>13</sup> When Ibn al-Ash'ath lost his life after the defeat of his partisans at Dayr al-Jamajim,<sup>14</sup> Sa'id fled to Makkah, but was arrested by Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qasri,<sup>15</sup> the governor of that city, and sent to al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf with Isma'il Ibn Awsat* al-Bajali.<sup>16</sup> Al-Hajjaj, on seeing him, said: Wretch, son of Wretched! didst thou not come to Kufah when a vile Arab of the desert was imam there,<sup>17</sup> and did I not put thee in his place?" "Yes," "And did I not appoint thee qadi? and when the people of Kufah murmured and said that none but an Arab of the desert was fit for that office, did I not replace thee by Abu Burdah Ibn Abi Musa, ordering him, however, not to decide any question without consulting thee?" "Yes." "Did I not admit thee to my evening parties as a companion, though the company were all Arab chieftains?" "Yes." "The first time I saw thee, did I not give thee one hundred thousand dirhams to distribute among the needy, without questioning thee afterwards about the manner in which the money was employed?" "Yes." What then made thee revolt against me?" "An oath which bound me to Ibn al-Ash'ath." Here al-Hajjaj grew angry and said, after a pause: "And before that wert thou not bound by an oath to the Commander of the faithful, 'Abd al-Malik? By Allah! I shall put thee to death; guard, strike off his head." This passed in the month of Sha'ban, A.H. 95 (April-May, A.D. 714), or 94, at Wasit, outside of which place Sa'id was interred; his tomb is still visited by pilgrims. He was forty-nine years of age at the time of his execution. On the day in which he was arrested, he said: "An informer has denounced 12 Literally: Spread open your cloth where you are known. This is evidently a proverbial expression, but I do not find it in al-Maydani.

13 See Price's (Retrospect,) tom. I, p. 455; Abu'l-Fida, year 77; al-Makin, p. 65, etd.

14 Dayr Al-Jamajim lies at seven parasangs from Kufah, on the road leading to Basrah. This convent or dayr, received its name from the wooden cups, or drinking-vessels (jamajim), which were made there (Marasid.)

15 His life has been already given, no. 2.4

* Cairo edition gives wasit and it is written in the marginal note that Awsat is a corruption.—Ed.

16 This Isma'il was probably sent with the prisoner to guard him.

17 Al-Hajjaj alluded to Shabib Ibn Yazid; see his life in this volume.

me in God's holy city, but I call him to an account for it before God?" The person whom he meant was Khalid al-Qasri.<sup>18</sup> Ahmad Ibn Hanbal said: Al-Hajjaj killed Sa'id Ibn Jubayr, yet there was not a man on the face of the earth who did not stand in need of (Sa'id and) his learning." Al-Hajjaj died the same year in the month of Ramdan, or, by another account, six months after Sa'id, and during that interval, God did not put it in his power to slay another human being. When Sa'id was decapitated, a great quantity of blood flowed from the trunk, and al-Hajjaj called in physicians to consult them about it, and to know why all the other persons whom he had executed before that, bled very little; to this they made answer: "When you put this man to death, his soul was still in his body, and the blood follows the soul; but as for the others, their soul was gone with fright before you killed them, and therefore their blood was diminished." - (The khalif) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan having dreamt that he made water four times in the mihrab<sup>19</sup> of the mosque, he sent for Sa'id and having spoken to him about it, he received this answer: "Four sons, sprung from your loins, shall govern the empire." This prediction was fulfilled by the accession of his sons al-Walid, Sulayman Yazid, and Hisham. - When al-Hasan al-Basri was informed that Sa'id Ibn Jubayr had been put to death by al-Hajjaj, he exclaimed: "O God! be (turnea) against this reprobate of (the tribe of) Thaqif! Almighty God! if there be any persons on earth, from east to west, who were accessory to his death, lay them prostrate into the fires of hell! "It is related that al-Hajjaj, when on the point of death, would faint away, and on recovering, cry out. "But what business has Sa'id Ibn Jubayr with me? The report was, that whenever he fell asleep during his last illness, he saw Sa'id come up and seize him by the girdle, saying "Enemy of God, arise! why didst thou murder me?" On which he would awake in terror and exclaim; "What business has Sa'id Ibn Jubayr with me?" It is related also that a person saw al-Hajjaj in a dream, after his death, and asked him what God had done to him. "He put me to death," replied al-Hajjaj, 'once, for each person whom I put to death, and seventy times for Sa'id Ibn Jubayr." - The shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi mentions in his book, entitled al-Muhadhdhab, that Sa'id Ibn Jubayr could play at chess with his back turned to the chess-board, and in the chapter on evidence, he cites this fact under the head of chess-playing, (it being questioned whether a chess-player's evidence could be received in a court of law).

---

18 See the account of khalid's death, no. 204.

19 See the no. 16, note on mihrab.

249 SA'ID IBN AL-MUSAYYAB

Abu Muhammad Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab Ibn Hazn Ibn Abi Wahb Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'A'idh Ibn 'Imran Ibn Makhzum, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and a native of Madinah, was one of the seven great jurisconsults of that city. We have already given the lives of two; that of Abu Bakr (no. 114) and that of Kharijah (no. 202). This Sa'id was the chief of the first series of the Tabi'is and united to the knowledge of the Traditions and of jurisprudence, the fear of God, profound piety, and contempt for worldly goods. He received instruction from the limp of Sa'd Ibn Abi Waqqas<sup>1</sup> and Abu Hurayrah. 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Umar<sup>2</sup> once said to a person who questioned him (on a point of religion): "Go and ask that man about it" meaning Sa'id, "and then come and relate to me his answer." The other obeyed his orders and Ibn 'Umar said: "Did I not tell thee that he was one of the learned?" Another time, when speaking of him, he observed to his disciples that if the Prophet were to see Sa'id, he would feel joy at the sight. This doctor met a number of Muhammad's companions and learned (Traditions) from them; he visited also the Prophet's widows and gathered from them information. The greater part of the authenticated Traditions given on his authority were received by him from

---

1 Abu Ishaq Sad Ibn Abi Waqqas Malik Ibn Wahib, descendant of 'Abd Manat, was, by his own account, the third person whom Muhammad converted to Islamism, being then seventeen years of age. He fought in all the Prophet's battles, and was employed as governor by 'Umar and Uthman. He died at his castle in 'Aqiq, a town ten miles from Madinah, and was interred at the Baqi' or cemetery of this latter city. His death occurred between A.H. 50 and 58 (Majma al-Ahbab, 2 and 3. See on p. 437 MS. fonds St. Gormain, no. 131.)

'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Sakhr al-Dawzi (member of the tribe of Daws, a branch of that of Azd), and surnamed Abu Hurayrah (the man with the kitten), was a contemporary of Muhammad and one of his most devoted followers. He bore the name of 'Abd Shams before his conversion. The surname of Abu Hurayrah was given him by his people because he brought them home one day, in the sleeve of his cloak, the young of a wild cat which he had found whilst tending his flocks. Muhammad sometimes called him Abu Hirr (the man with the cat). It is related that his mother resisted all his efforts to convert her to Islamism, on which he begged of the Prophet to pray that her heart might be opened to the truth; the prayer was effectual; on returning home, he was informed by her that she now acknowledged only one God and his apostate Muhammad. He embraced Islamism, A.H. 7 and died at Madinah. A.H. 57 (A.D. 676-7), at the age of 78. (Siyar al-Salaf. Mathew's Mishcat al-Masabih,).

2 See no. 249, note on 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Umar.

Abu Hurayrah, whose daughter he had married, Al-Zuhri and Makhul being asked who was the ablest jurisconsult they had ever met, they replied that it was Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab. By his own declaration, he performed the pilgrimage forty times, and it is stated that he said: "For the last fifty years I have not missed the first Takbir<sup>3</sup> nor seen the back of a man during the public prayer;" such was his punctuality in arriving sufficiently early to obtain a place in the first rank of the congregation. It is related also that during the space of fifty years he said the morning prayer without making any ablution since that of the preceding evening (when he said the last prayer of the day)<sup>4</sup> Sa'id was born in the third year of the khalifat of 'Umar (A.H. 15-16, A.D. 636-7); he came to manhood during the khalifat of 'Uthman, and died at Madinah, A.H. 91 (A.D. 709-10), or, by other accounts, A.H. 95, or one of the intervening years; some even say that his death did not take place till the year 105. His father's name must be pronounced Musayyab (as being the passive participle of the verb Sayyab), but it is related that Sa'id himself pronounced it Musayyib (as the active participle) because he had said: "May God reward (sayyab) him who pronounces my father's name Musayyib."<sup>5</sup>

250 ABU ZAYD AL-ANSARI

Abu Zayd Sa'id was son to Aws Ibn Thabit Ibn Zayd Ibn Qays Ibn Zayd Ibn al-Nu'man Ibn Malik Ibn Tha'labah Ibn Ka'b Ibn al-Khazraj; but Muhammad Ibn Sa'id says, in his Tabaqat, that Thabit, Abu Zayd's grandfather, was the son of Bashir Ibn Abi Zayd Thabit

---

3 The takbir consists in the repetition of the adhan immediately before the prayer.

4 This is a proof that he did not take any sleep during the interval; for, in that case, the ablution would have been encessary. He most probably passed the night in devotional exercises.

Takhir means to say Allahu Akbar. But here it refers to the opening takhir repeated at the commencement of the prayers.

5 There is here a grammatical quibble in the original text which disappears in the translation. Indeed on examining the passage attentively I think it may very well signify: May God reward him who rewards my father! In which case his father's name should be pronounced Musayyab, for this word means rewarded. Ibn Khallikan's statement is confirmed, however, by the author of the Tabaqat al-Fuqaha, who says that Sa'id was well pleased when he heard his father's name pronounced Musayyib.

Ibn Zayd Ibn Qays; the former genealogy is given by the Khatib in his History, and God knows which of the two is correct. Abu Zayd, surnamed al-Ansari,<sup>1</sup> was a native of Basrah and a philologist: he held the first rank among the literary men of that time, and devoted his attention principally to the study of the philology of the Arabic language, its singular terms and rare expression. In his religious opinions he was a Qadarite,<sup>2</sup> but his authority as a correct transmitter of pieces preserved by tradition is admitted. Abu 'Uthman al-Mazini related that he was once present when al-Asma'i went up to Abu Zayd who was then surrounded by his pupils, and after kissing him on the head,<sup>3</sup> sat down among them and said: "Thou hast been our lord and master for the last fifty years." Al-Thawri relates that Ibn Munadh<sup>hir</sup> said to him: "Shall I give you the characters of your pupils? Al-Asma'i has the best-stocked memory of them all; Abu 'Ubaydah surpasses them in general information; and Abu Zayd al-Ansari is the surest authority in traditional knowledge." Al-Nadr Ibn Shumayl mentions that he, Abu Zayd al-Ansari and Abu Muhammad al-Yazidi studied all three together in the same book. The following anecdote is told by Abu Zayd, to whom it was related by Khalaf al-Ahmar;<sup>4</sup> "I went to Kufah," said Khalaf, "to take down in writing whatever pieces of (ancient) poetry the learned men of that city might communicate to me (by oral tradition); but as they were very tenacious of their information, I offered them forged pieces, and obtained from them genuine ones in exchange. Some time after, I had a severe sickness and (repenting of my imposture) I said to them: 'Alas, sirs! I have now turned myself wholly to God, and I must confess that the verses which I gave you were made by myself.' They would not, however, believe me, and these pieces still continue to be attributed

---

1 He was so called because he drew his descent from the Ansars.

2 The Qadarites held the heretical doctrine of man's free-will. See Pocock's Specimen and M. de Sacy's Eposse de l'Histoire des Druzes, Introduction, page x, note.

3 It must be recollected that the master and the scholars were seated on the ground.

4 Abu Muhriz محرز Khalaf al-Ahmad Ibn Hayyan was a descendant from one of the prisoners whom Qutaybah Ibn Muslim carried off from Khurasan on conquering that province. He was a poet of some talent, and made verses which he attributed to the Arabs of the desert; he composed also a work treating of them and containing poems descriptive of their manners. (Fihrist, fol. 66). The year of his death is not given, but, by what Ibn Khalikan says, he must have lived in the latter half of the second century of the Hijrah. In the Hamasah, p. 382, is a poem attributed to Ta'babata Sharran, but in reality composed by Khalaf al-Ahmar.

to the Arabs of the desert." Abu Zayd composed a number of useful philological works, which as his treatises on the bow and the shield, on camels, on the natural constitution of man, on springs of water, on the dialects, on rare expressions, on the plural and dual, on milk, on the tents of the Arabs, on the softened pronunciation of hamzah on the (shepherd's) rod, on wild animals, on the difference (between the parts of the human body and those of animals),<sup>5</sup> on the first and fourth forms of certain verbs, on names rarely borne, on the hamaza, on nouns of action,<sup>6</sup> etc. I have seen a fine work of his, a treatise on plants, which contained a number of curious passages. It is related of Shubah Ibn al-Hajjaj that, as he was one day dictating Traditions to a circle of pupils, he got fatigued with his occupation, and looking around, he saw Abu Zayd al-Ansari in the last rank of his auditors and called to him, saying. "O Abu Zaid":

"It is dumb, the dwelling of (my beloved) Mayya, and answers us not! Could it speak, it would give us news in abundance."<sup>7</sup>

"Come here to me, Abu Zayd!" The disciple then drew near to his master, and they began to converse together and recite poems, on which one of the students who were learning the Traditions said to him: "O Abu Bistam! we wear the skin off the backs of our camels in journeying hither, that we may learn from your mouth the Traditions respecting the blessed Prophet, and yet you neglect us and amuse yourself with poetry." Shu'bah, on hearing this reproach, flew into a rage and exclaimed: "I know best, fellow! what is fitted for me; and I swear by the one only God! that I have a sounder knowledge of this (meaning poetry) than of that (meaning the Traditions)."<sup>8</sup> Abu Zayd lived to a very advanced age, having nearly attained his hundredth year; he died at Basrah, A.H. 215 (A.D. 830-1), or by other accounts in 214 or 216; aged, it is said, 93 years; some say 95 or 96.

---

5 See the Aandschriften, or catalogue of M. de Hammer's manuscripts, page 50.

6 The greater part of these treatises were only collections of passages in prose and verse, composed by celebrated authors and selected by the compiler as applicable to his subject. M. de Hammer possesses a volume of Asma,as works containing six pamphlets of this kind. See his Handschriften, No. 61.

7 This is the beginning of some ancient poem.

251 AL-AKHFASH AL-AWSAT

Abu I-Hasan Sa'id Ibn Mas'adah, surnamed al-Akhfash al-Awsat (or the second), was a client, by enfranchisement, to the tribe of Mujashi' and a native of Balkh. He and al-Akhfash al-Akbar (Akhfash major) Abu 'l-Khattab were both grammarians of the school of Basrah: Abu 'l-Khattab was a native of Hajar (or Bahrayn) and a client to one of the tribes of that country; his real name was 'Abd al-Hamid Ibn 'Abd al-Majid, and he had Abu 'Ubaydah and Sibawayh among his pupils. Al-Akhfash al-Awsat was one of the greatest Arabic grammarians; though older than Sibawayh, he had studied grammar under him,* and he used to say: Sibawayh did not insert a single passage in his Book<sup>1</sup> till he had submitted it to my examination: he then showed that he understood the subject better than I; now, however I know it better than he." The following anecdote was related by the family of Sa'id Ibn Salim<sup>2</sup> to Abu 'l-Abbas Tha'lab, by whom it has been handed down; "Sa'id, having one day received the visit of al-Farra, said to us. 'Here is the chief of the philologists and of the grammarians who is come to our house. To which al-Farra replied: 'Not so, whilst al-Akhfash lives.'" It was this al-Akhfash who added a new measure, called al-Khabab, to those already known in prosody; a circumstance noticed by us in the life of al-Khalil (no. 208). He is author of the following works:<sup>3</sup> The Awsat, or medium treatise, on grammar, Explanation of the figures of rhetoric employed in the Qur'an; on analogical deductions, a grammatical work; on Derivation; on Prosody on Rhyme; on the Thoughts which usually occur in Poetry; the Book of Kings; a treatise on Interjections; the Great Collection of (Philological and grammatical) Questions; the Lesser Collection of Questions etc. He was (what the Arabs call) ʔn ajla'; that

---

* There is a discrepancy here. In the foregoing sentence he includes Sibawayh in Akhfash's pupils and here he says him to be his master--Ed.

1 The celebrated treatise on Arabic grammar by Sibawayh is generally called the Book (Kitab).

2 Sa'id Ibn Salim (or Salm سلم according to the MS. No. 634) Ibn Qutaybah Ibn Muslim Ibn 'Amr was a resident in Khurasan, where he governed some cantons near Marw under the authority of the Khalif. He taught the Traditions in that province, to which he had gone during the reign of al-Ma'mun. He was learned in the grammar of the Arabic language and in the Traditions, but was very reserved in communicating his information to others. (The Khatibis History of Baghdad, fol. 108.)

3 The works of the old philologists and grammarians formed two classes, the book (Kutub) and composed books (Kutub musannafah). See Introduction.

is, one who cannot close his lips over his teeth. The word akhfash means having little eyes and a bad sight. He died A.H. 215 (A.D. 830), but some say A.H. 221. The name of al-Akhfash al-Asghar (Akhfash minor) was given to him till 'Ali Ibn Sulayman, another Akhfash, came into notice; it was then changed into al-Akhfash al-Awsat (Akhfash). Mujashi Ibn Darim is a branch of the tribe of Tamim.

252 SA'ID IBN AL-MUBARAK AL-DAHMAN

Abu Muhammad Sa'id Ibn al-Mubarak, a grammarian and native of Baghdad, is generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Dahman. He descended from Abu Yasar Ka'b al-Ansari,<sup>1</sup> as may be seen from the following genealogy: Sa'id Ibn al-Mubarak Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Sa'id Ibn Muhammad Ibn Nasr Ibn 'Asim Ibn 'Abbad Ibn Tsam Ibn al-Fadl Ibn Zafar Ibn Ghallab Ibn Hamd Ibn Shakir Ibn 'Iyad Ibn Hisn Ibn Raja Ibn Ubayyi Ibn Shibl Ibn Abi 'I-Yasar Ka'b al-Ansari. Ibn al-Dahman learned the Traditions from Abu al-Qasim Hibat Allah Ibn al-Hasin, Abu Ghaliib Ahmad Ibn al-Hasan Ibn al-Banna, and others; by his knowledge of grammar he was the Sibawayh of that time, and he composed on this subject many instructive works, amongst others, a commentary in about forty-three volumes on the 'Idah and Takmilah (of Abu 'Ali 'I-Farisi) a greater and a less work both entitled al-Fusul (chapters) a large commentary in two volumes on Ibn Jinni's grammatical treatise, the Luma', and entitled by him al-Ghurrah (the bright star); this is the best of all the numerous commentaries on the Luma' which I have seen. His other works are; a treatise on Prosody, in one volume; lectures on Grammar, in one volume likewise; the Sa'idian epistle on the Kindian plagiarisms, in which he exposes the stolen thoughts of al-Mutanabbi (al-Kindi), in one volume; a common-place book in seven volumes entitled Zahr al-Riyad (flowers of the meadows), the Kitab al-Ghuniyah (the abundant aid, an orthographical work) treating of the letters d ض and z ظ the 'Uqud (collars) on the long and short alif and on the letter r; another, Ghuniyah, on those words which bear opposite significations, etc. When Ibn al-Dahman was at Baghdad, a number of other

---

1 Abu 'I-Yasar Ka'b Ibn 'Amr, a member of the tribe of Khazraj, and a native of Madinah, was one of the Ansars. He was present at all the battles fought by Muhammad, and at that of Badr he took al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib prisoner. Died at Madinah, A.H. 55 (A.D. 674-5)-(Siyar al-Lalaf, Talqia).

grammarians, such as Ibn al-Jawaliqi, Ibn al Khashshab, and Ibn al-Shajari,<sup>2</sup> all of them great masters in their art, were residing in that city, yet the public considered him as their superior in talent. He after-wards left Baghdad and proceeded to Mosul with the intention of visiting the Vazir Jamal al-Din al-Isbahani, surnamed al-Jawwad (whose life we intend to give under letter M.), and being received by him with great favour, he remained for a considerable period under his protection. The same year an inundation of the river occurred at Baghdad, and as he had left his books behind him in that city, he despatched a person thither to bring them to him, in case they had escaped injury. This collection, in the formation of which he had passed his life, had been entirely submerged, but the greatest damage which it had suffered was caused by the waters of a tanyard situated behind his house, which overflowed at the same time and entered into the room where the books were deposited. They were brought to him in that state, and being advised to fumigate them and save as many as he could, employed upward of thirty pounds weight of ladanum<sup>3</sup> for that purpose, but the smoke affected his head and eyes to such degree that he lost his sight. Numbers have profited under his tuition and I saw the people of Mosul and the neighbouring countries study with great assiduity the works of which the titles have been given above. He died at Mosul on a Sunday in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 569 (May, A.D. 1174), or 566 according to Ibn al-Mustawfi, and was buried near the Maydan Gate, cemetery which is named after al-Mu'afa Ibn Imran. He was born on Thursday evening, the 26th Rajab, A.H. 494 (May, A.D. 1101),* in a part of Baghdad called Nahr Tabiq. Some say, however, that his birth took place on Friday. He composed some good poetry of which we may cite the following passages:

"Avoid levity of conduct-it discredits a man's character; but gravity exalts him in public estimation. Be not deceived by the smiles; the cloud utters not its thunder but when it smiles forth (the lightning-flash)."

By the same:**

"Think not, with your talent for poetry, to become our equals; the hen has feathers, yet she cannot fly."

2 The lives of these three grammarians are given by Ibn Khallikan.

3 Ladanum is a gum which exudes from a species cistus.

* According to Eduard Mahler it was Monday the 27th May, Ed.

** These words are omitted by de Slane--Ed.

By the same:

"Think it not strange that I should dread the day of my separation from you; I, of whom lions stand in dread. Did you never remark that a new garment cries aloud when a piece is (torn away and) separated from it?"

The katib 'Imad al-Din mentions him with commendation in the Kharidah and gives (slight) sketch of his life.<sup>4</sup> It is related by Abu Sa'id al-Sam'ani that the hafiz Ibn 'Asakir of Damascus told him that he had heard Sa'id Ibn al-Mubarak Ibn al-Dahhan say: "I saw in a dream a person of my acquaintance who seemed to address these lines to his beloved.

'O thou who deferrest to pay the debt towards me; is this procrastination and delay to endure for ever? Soothe my heart with the most trifling favour; a nothing from thee will suffice it.'

'When I saw Ibn al-Dahhan,' continues al-Sam'ani, 'I repeated to him the circumstance, but it was quite unknown to him; he might probably have let it slip from his memory, for Ibn 'Asakir is a narrator of acknowledged veracity.' Ibn al-Dahhan then asked al-Sam'ani to dictate it to him, and having written it down, he headed it with these words: I was informed by al-Sam'ani, on the authority of 'ibn 'Asakir, who cited mine, that, etc. A relation thus given on the authority of two persons who therein cite that narrator's own, is a fact of great singularity.' He had a son called Abu Zakariya Yahya Ibn Sa'id who cultivated literature and poetry; Abu Zakariya was born at Mosul towards the beginning of the year 569 (A.D. 1173), and died in the same city, A.H. 616 (A.D. 1219-20). He was interred in his father's tomb. The following lines were composed by him.

"If I praise obscurity of life, those whose attention I have awakened will rush on before me to enjoy it. By it I was led to happiness, why should I point out thy way to others?"

The following passage is attributed to him:

'I remember that in the days of my youth, my stature was erect like the letter alif (I) traced in a Qur'an by the hand of Ibn Muqlah.<sup>5</sup> But now I am bent down and seem as if I were seeking in the dust for my lost youth.'

4 See Kharidah, Man. No. 1447, fol. 33 v.

5 The life of Ibn Muqlah, the celebrated penman, will found in this work.

253 SUFYAN AL-THAWRI

Abu 'Abd Allah Sufyan al-Thawri was the son of Sa'id Ibn Masruq Ibn Habib Ibn Rafi' Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Mawhibah Ibn Ubayy Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Munqidh Ibn Nasr Ibn al-Hakam Ibn al-Harith Ibn Thajlabah Ibn Malkan Ibn Thawr Ibn 'Abd Manat Ibn Udd Ibn Tabikhah Ibn al-Yas Ibn Mudar Ibn Nizar Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnan. Sufyan al-Thawri was a native of Kufah and a master of the highest authority in the Traditions and other sciences: his piety, devotion, veracity, and contempt for worldly goods were universally acknowledged, and as an imam, he is counted among the Mujtahids. It is said that the shaykh Abu 'l-Qasim Junayd followed his system of doctrine; this, however, is a point on which different opinions are held, as has already been mentioned (no. 142). Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah declared that he did not know a man better informed than Sufyan al-Thawri respecting what was permitted and what was forbidden by the law. It was also said that 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab was the greatest man of the age in which he lived; after him, 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbas; next came al-Sha'bi, al-A'amash, and their contemporaries; then Sufyan al-Thawri. This doctor learned the Traditions from Abu Ishaq al-Sabi'i, al-A'amash, and others of the same eminence; he taught the Traditions to al-Awza'i, Ibn Jurayj, Muhammad Ibn Ishaq,<sup>1</sup> and others of that class. Al-Mas'udi gives the following anecdote in his Muruj al-Dhahab, in the same terms as it was related to him by al-Qa'qa'a Ibn Hakim: "I was one day at the court of al-Mahdi when Sufyan al-Thawri came in and addressed him with the common salutation which one Muslim makes to another, and not with that to which he was entitled as Khalif: during this interview, (the vazir) al-Rabi' (Ibn Yunus) was standing behind the prince and learning on his sword, ready to execute whatever orders he might receive. Al-Mahdi then turned with a smiling face towards Sufyan and said: 'You are much mistaken in some of your ideas respecting me: you imagine that if I wished to do you ill, I could not execute my intention; but now, that you are in my power, do you not fear that I may award you whatever punishment my caprice may dictate? 'If you pass sentence on me,' replied Sufyan, "a powerful sovereign who knoweth right from wrong will pass sentence on you' 'Commander of the faithful!' exclaimed al-Rabi', 'shall this rude fellow be allowed to address you thus? Let me strike off his head'. 'Nay, silence!' replied al-Mahdi, 'he and the like of him would desire nothing better than <sup>1</sup> The lives of all the doctors above-mentioned will be found in this work.

---

to die by our hands, so as to make us wretched (in the next life) whilst they would enjoy eternal happiness: draw up an act nominating him qadi of Kufah and forbidding any person to control his decision. The paper was written out immediately and handed to Sufyan, who withdrew, but then flung it into the Tigris and took to flight.<sup>2</sup> An active search was made after him in all the towns (of the empire) but without success." The place was then given to Sharik Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Nakh'ai, and a poet said on the subject:

"Sufyan avoided temptation and saved his piety by flight, whilst Sharik lay in wait to catch the dirhams."

It is related of Abu Salih Shu'ayb Ibn Harb al-Mada'ini,<sup>3</sup> a hafiz of the first rank and a man of pre-eminent piety, that he said: "I imagine that Sufyan al-Thawri will be brought forth on the day of resurrection and placed by God before His creatures to confound them; it will then be said to them; 'you did not see the Prophet when in the world, but you saw Sufyan al-Thawri; why then did you not take him as a model?' Sufyan was born A.H. 95 (A.D. 713-4); A.H. 161 (A.D. 77-8), at Basrah, where he had concealed himself from the civil authority,<sup>4</sup> and was interred towards nightfall. He left no posterity. - Thawri means descended from Thwar, son of 'Abd Manat. There is another Thawri in the tribe of Tamim, and a third which is a branch of the tribe of Hamdan. It has been stated by some that Sufyan died A.H. 162, but the first is the true date.

254 SUFYAN IBN 'UYAYNAH

Abu Muhammad Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah Ibn Abi 'Imran Maymun al-Hilali was mawla to a woman of the tribe of Hilal Ibn 'Amir, who

2 See note (3), under no. 102.

3 Shu'ayb Ibn Harb learned the Traditions from Sakhr Ibn Juwayriyah جویریة who had received them from Nafi' and others. He died al Mada'in, his native place--Tab (al-Muhaddithin). The year of his death is not mentioned, but we know that his master Nafi' died A.H. 196 (A.D. 811-2).

4 It has been already mentioned that he concealed himself to avoid accepting the place of qadi.

belonged to the same family as Maymunah,<sup>1</sup> one of the Prophet's wives; it is stated, however, that he was mawla to the Banu Hashim, or to al-Dahhak Ibn Muzahim,<sup>2</sup> or to Mis'ar Ibn Kudam.<sup>3</sup> His parents dwelt at Kufah, where it is said he himself was born, and whence he was taken by his father to Makkah. (Muhammad) Ibn Sa'd mentions him in the Tabaqat and places him in the fifth class of the learned men of Makkah. Sufyan was an imam, a man of learning, piety, and mortified life, firm (in controlling his passions), and unanimously appreciated for the exactitude of the Traditions and other relations which he handed down. He made the pilgrimage seventy times, and taught the Traditions and on the authority of (Muhammad Ibn Muslim) al-Zuhri, Abu Ishaq al-Sabi'i, 'Amr Ibn Dinar,<sup>4</sup> Muhammad Ibn Munkadir,<sup>5</sup> Abu l-'Zinad<sup>6</sup> 'Asim Ibn Abi l-'Najud, al-A'amah, 'Abd

1 Maymunah, daughter of al-Harith Ibn al-Hazn and member of the tribe of Hilal, was married to Mas'ud Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi in the time anterior to the announcement of Islamism. Divorced by the husband, she became the wife of Abu Ruhm l' Abd al-'Uzzah, and on his death she was espoused by the Prophet, A.H. 5, (A.H. 7-Ed.). She was the last of his wives. Her death took place A.H. 61, or 36 by another account.-(Talqih.)

2 Abu l-Qasim al-Dahhak Ibn Muzahim, a member of the tribe of Hilal, a native of Kufah, and a relation to Zaynab, one of the Prophet's wives, was a Tabi'i of the third class. He died (A.D. 720-1)-(Nujum).

3 Abu Salamah Mis'ar Ibn Kidam Ibn Zahir ظاهر a member of the tribe of Hilal and a native of Kufah, is known as a hafiz and a devout ascetic. He died A.H. 55 (A.D. 675). (Nujum.)

4 Abu Muhammad 'Amr Ibn Dinar was a mawla and a native of Makkah. He is counted among the most eminent of the Tabi'is and considered as a Traditionists of the very highest authority. He was one of the mujtahid imams, died A.H. 126 (A.D. 743-4), aged 80 years, Tab. (al-Fuqaha).

5 Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn Munkadir, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of Taim Allah, was a Traditionist of good authority. He died A.H. 130 (A.D. 747-8), or 131. (Tab al-Muhaddithin.)

6 Abu l-Zinad 'Abd Allah Ibn Dhikwan ذكران a native of Madinah and a mawla to the tribe of Quraysh, was a doctor of the law and one of the Tabi'is. His varied information, his talents, and his veracity as a traditionists entitled him to a high pre-eminence among the learned of that day. It is related by (Muhammad) Ibn Sa'd that he saw Abu l-Zinad enter into the mosque of the Prophet (al Madinah), with as many followers as a prince; some wishing to consult him on questions relative to inherited property, some on arithmetical questions, some on the meaning of obscure verses in the poems of the desert Arabs, some to learn traditions and some to have other difficulties solved. He died suddenly in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 130 (A.D. 748) aged sixty-six years. (Tab, al-Fuqaha.)

al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr<sup>7</sup> and other learned men. His own authority as a Traditionist was cited by the imam al-Shafi'i, Shu'bah Ibn al-Hajjaj Muhammad Ibn Ishaq, Ibn Jurayj, al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkar, Mus'ab Ibn Bakkar's uncle,<sup>8</sup> 'Abd al-Razzaq Ibn Hamam al-San'ani,<sup>9</sup> Yahya Ibn Aktham the qadi,<sup>10</sup> and a great number of others. I read in a collection of anecdotes that Sufyan one day came out of his house to some persons who had come to learn the Traditions from him, and exclaimed, in a fit of ill humour: "Is it not an unfortunate case that I who sat with (and studied under) Damrah Ibn Sa'id which doctor sat with Abu Sa'id al-Khudri who sat with 'Amr Ibn Dinar who sat with Ibn 'Umar that I who sat with al-Zuhri who sat with Anas Ibn Malik, - "naming many others," should now be obliged to sit with you and give you lessons?" On this, a youth who was in the assembly said to him: "Are you in earnest, Abu Muhammad?" "Yes". "Then the misfortune which the disciples of Muhammad's companions underwent in having you for a pupil was greater than yours in having us." On this, Sufyan cast down his eyes and recited these lines of Abu Nuwas:

"Expose yourself to the aim of the archer, you may yet escape unharmed. (Fear most your own tongue!) better to die of the malady of silence than (live with) the malady of talking."

When the assembly broke up, they began to speak of the cleverness of the lad, who was no other than Yahya Ibn Aktham al-Tamimi,<sup>11</sup> and Sufyan said: "This boy is well fitted for the company of those other people," meaning the persons high in rank and power. It was said by the imam al-Shafi'i that he never saw a person more

7 Abu 'Umar 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, surnamed al-Qibti التبطي a member of the tribe of Quraysh, or, by another account, of that of Lakhm, was a Traditionist and a native of Kufah, where he succeeded al-Sha'bi in the post of Qadi. He died in or about the year 130 (A.D. 747-8) (Tab, al-Muhaddithin.)

8 This doctor's life is given page 136, note (1).

9 Abd al-Razzaq Ibn Hammam al-San'ani (native of the city of San'a in Yemen) al-Himyari (member of the tribe of Himyar) was one of the most celebrated Traditionists of the age. People travelled to Yamen from all parts of the empire to study under him. He was a very learned man and composed some works. Died A.H. 211 (A.D. 826-7). (Al-Yafi'i)

10 The lives of the doctors which have not been given in the preceding notes will be found in other parts of this work.

11 The life of the celebrated qadi Yahya Ibn Aktham will be found in this work.

capable than Sufyan of giving an opinion on a point of law, nor one more averse to doing so. Abu 'Imran, Sufyan's grandfather, was a native of Kufah and had been employed as an 'amil<sup>12</sup> by Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qasri<sup>13</sup>, but when the latter was deposed from the government of 'Iraq, his successor Yusuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi ordered all his 'amils to be arrested, and Abu 'Imran then fled to Makkah, where he settled. Sufyan said that he himself was hardly twenty years old when he went to (reside at) Kufah, and that (on his arrival) Abu Hanifah told his pupils and the people of the city that a hafiz who had known 'Amir Ibn Dinar was come among them. "On this," said Sufyan, "I was visited by persons who wished to speak to me about Ibn Dinar, and it was Abu Hanifah who thus made of me a Traditionist. I once questioned Abu Hanifah about Ibn Dinar and he answered; "My son! I never learned but three Traditions from him, and have a very confused recollection of them." Sufyan was born at Kufah on the 15th of Sha'ban, A.H. 107 (December, A.D. 725)* and died at Makkah on Saturday, the last day of the latter Jumada, A.H. 198 (February, A.D. 814);** but some place his death on the first of the month of Rajab. He was buried at al-Hajun, a hill towards the upper part of Makkah, near which the inhabitants of that city are interred: it is often mentioned by poets in their verses.

255 AL-SAYYIDAH SUKAYNAH

Al-Sayyidah<sup>1</sup> Sukaynah, the daughter of al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Talib, was the first among the women of her time by birth, beauty, wit, and virtue. Left a widow by Mus'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, she became the wife of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Uthman Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Hakim Ibn Hizam, to whom she bore a son named Qurayn.* Her third husband,

---

12 See no. 184, note 'amil.

13 See his life, no. 204.

* 26 December Ed.

** 25 February Ed.

1 The titles of Sayyid (lord) and Sayyidah (lady) are given to the descendants of 'Ali and Fatimah, the daughter of Muhammad. Sayyid has become Sidi or Si in the vulgar pronunciation, and Sayyidah is usually changed into Sidah or Sit.

* Cairo edition gives Qurayb--Ed.

husband, al-Asbagh Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwan divorced her before the consummation of their marriage; she was then espoused by Zayd Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Uthman Ibn 'Affan, who also was obliged to divorce her by order of-Ed. (the khalif) Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. In another statement, the order of her successive husbands differs from that which we have here given. It was after he that the head-dress al-turrah al-Sukayniyah was so called.<sup>2</sup> Many amusing anecdotes are related of her witty sallies and repartees to poets and other persons: meeting one day with 'Urwah Ibn 'Udhaynah<sup>3</sup>, a man eminent for his learning and piety, and author of some pretty poetry, she said to him: "Was it you who made these verses:

"When I feel in my heart the flames of love, I try to cool its ardour by draughts of water. Could I even succeed in cooling with water the exterior of my heart, how should I extinguish the fire which rages in its interior?"

On his answer that they were composed by him, she asked him again if he was the author of the following piece:

"When I revealed to her the secret of my love, she replied, 'You used to desire (secrecy and) concealment when with me; be veiled then (as to your passion; see you not how many are around us? To this I answered, The love I bear you and the (pains) I feel have already cast a veil over my sight."

He admitted that these verses were also his, on which she said to the slave-girls who were (standing) around her: "You are free if such verses ever came from a heart wounded by love!" 'Urwah had a brother called Bakr,* whose death he lamented in the following lines:

"Cares have come to visit me: 'it is thus with the cares of man. The Pleiades are within a span's breadth of setting. I watch the stars as they culminate in the Milky Way of travel on in their course. (I cannot sleep) for the sadness of which I am the constant companion; my heart seems to contain a fire of burning coals. (My sorrow is) for Bakr, my brother! Bakr has departed from me! what life can now be pleasing after (the loss of) Bakr?"

2 Sukaynah was one of the most brilliant women of her epoch. Her rank, learning, wit, and good taste entitle her to general admiration, and her judgment was consulted by the first poets of the day.

3 Abu 'Amir 'Urwah, Ibn Udhaynah, a member of the tribe of Layth, a poet and a Traditionist, died A.H. 118 (A.D. 736). ('Uyun al-Tawarikh.).

* M.de Slane gives Abu Bakr--Ed.

When Sukaynah heard these verses, she asked who was Bakr? and on being informed, she exclaimed: "What! that little blackamoor who used to run past us? Why, every thing is pleasing after the loss of Bakr, even (the common necessities of life) bread and oil!" It is related that a musician once sung these verses to al-Walid Ibn Yazid the Umayyad during a social party, and the prince said, on learning from him that they were by 'Urwa Ibn Udhaynah: "What life can be pleasing after the loss of Bakr? Why, the life we are now leading. The poet has left us room enough to answer his question."<sup>4</sup> 'Urwah was extremely moderate in his desires, and he composed poems on contentment which have circulated widely. He once set off from Hijaz with a number of other poets to visit (the court of) Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik in Syria. When they were introduced, the khaliḥ recognised 'Urwah and said to him: "Are you not the author of these lines:

I am not inclined to prodigality, and I know that He who is my purveyor will come to my assistance. If I strive attain his favours, my efforts fatigue me; and if I abstain from seeing them, I receive them without undergoing any toil?

I do not see that you act in conformity to your words, for you have now come from Hijaz to Syria in search of favours." "Commander of the faithful," replied 'Urwah, "You have given me a good lesson and reminded me of that which the lapse of time had caused me to forget." He then withdrew immediately, and mounting his camel, set off for Hijaz. During the remainder of the day, Hisham did not perceive his absence, but that night he awoke from his sleep, and recollecting the poet, he said to himself: "That man is a member of the tribe of Quraysh and his words are wisdom; he came to see me, but I repulsed him and refused to grant what he required; he is also a poet and I shall be exposed to his satires" The next morning, he asked about him and learned that he had returned home, on which he exclaimed: "Well! I shall show him that favours can find him out." He then called one of his mawlas, and giving him two thousand dinars, he told him to bear them to 'Urwah Ibn Udhaynah. The poet had just entered his house when the mawla arrived and knocked at the door; 'Urwah came out to him and said, on receiving the money: "Give my salutation to the Commander of the faithful, and ask him what he now thinks of my verses: I toiled for favours and was called a liar;" "I then returned home and they came to me."

---

4 Literally: He has enclosed in a wide (extent of ground).

* According to the autograph it should be rendered: I toiled for farmers which I was denied—Ed.

This anecdote has no connexion with the present article, but having made mention of 'Urwah, we were induced to insert it. The ideas contained in the verses composed by 'Urwah have been expressed in the following terms by Muhammad Ibn Idris, surnamed Marj Kuhl, a Spanish poet:

"The favours which you pursue are like your own shadow; follow them, you cannot catch them; turn away from them, they will follow you."

Sukaynah died at Madinah on Thursday, the 5th of the first Rabi', A.H. 117 (April, A.D. 735)*. Some say that Sukaynah was a surname given to her by her mother al-Rabab, daughter of 'Amra 'l-Kais Ibn 'Adi, and that her true name was 'Aminah: but others say it was 'Umaynah or 'Umaymah. The genealogist Muhammad Ibn al-Sa'ib al-Kalbi<sup>5</sup> relates as follows: "I was asked by 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib what was the real name of Sukaynah, the daughter of al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali, and on my answering that it was 'Umaymah, he told me I was right." Marj Kuhl died A.H. 634 (A.D. 1236-7), in his native place, the island of Shuqr (Xucar) in Spain. He was born A.H. 554 (A.D. 1159).

256 SULAYM AL-RAZI

Abu 'l-Fath Sulaym Ibn Ayyub Ibn Sulaym al-Razi, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i, was eminent by his learning and noted for his talents and piety. He composed a great number of works, such as the Isharah (indication),<sup>1</sup> an explanation of the obscure terms occurring in the Traditions, and the Taqrib (simplification),<sup>2</sup> which must not be confounded with a work bearing the same title, cited by the imam al-Haramayn in his Nihayat and by al-Ghazzali in his Basit and Wasit;

---

* The day, and date do not tally. According to Mahler's calculation Monday 4 April corresponded to 5 Rabi al-Awwal. If Ibn Khallikan has given the day correctly it should be 7 April.--Ed.

5 Abu 'l-Nadr Muhammad Ibn al-Sa'ib, a member of the tribe of Kalb and one of the learned men of Kufah, was a genealogist, a historian, and an interpreter of the Qur'an. He composed works on the subjects, and died at Kufah. A.H. 146 (A.D. 763-4). Fihrest, fol. 131.

1 This work is a development of the principles of jurisprudence.

2 This also is a treatise on the secondary points of the law.

this latter being composed by al-Qasim Ibn al-Qaffal al-Shashi. Sulaym's Taqrib is cited, however, in the Wasit, chap. II. of the section on pledges and mortgages. He learned jurisprudence from Abu Hamid al-Isfara'ini and instructed Abu 'l-Fath Nasr al-Maqdisi in that science. "I entered Baghdad when a mere youth," says Sulaym, "for the purpose of studying philology, and I used to go to a shaykh"—naming him who taught there. One morning I went to his house rather early, and was told that he had gone to the bath. I directed my steps thither, but passing by the mosque where Abu Hamid al-Isfara'ini was giving his lessons, I went in and sat down among the scholars. He was then explaining the laws on fasting and treating this question: In one of the rights of Ramadan, a man embraces a woman, but ceases before accomplishing his desires on perceiving that it is daybreak; has that man broken the fast?<sup>3</sup> Pleased with what I heard, I took down notes of the lecture on a blank leaf of a book which I had with me, and on returning to the house where I was stopping, I repeated the lesson to my fellow-lodgers, and resolved on hearing the book of fasting explained to the end, and on nothing it down; I therefore went assiduously to Abu Hamid's course of lessons till I had completed my task."<sup>4</sup> Sulaym never let an instant of time pass unemployed, and therefore a portion of the Qur'an or of the rosary when mending his red pens, when passing thorough the streets, and during those moments which he could not devote to study. Animated with the desire of propagating knowledge and of communicating his information to others, he settled at Sur (Tyre), a city of Syria but he made the remark that his reputation fell at Sur whilst that of Abu 'l-Hasan al-Mahamili rose at Baghdad. He was drowned in the Red Sea near Jiddah, on the last day of the month of Safar, A.H. 447 (May, A.D. 1055),* on his return from the pilgrimage; he had then passed his eightieth year. His body was interred in an island near al-Jar, not far from the ferry established between the Arabic coast and 'Aydhab (on the Egyptian side). Razi means native of Ray, a large city in Daylam between Qumis and 3 During the fast of Ramadan, the Muslim must not only abstain from all nourishment during the interval between daybreak and sunset, but also avoid intercourse with the other sex during the same period. It need scarcely be observed that in the original Arabic this question is expressed in the crudest terms, the Muslim law not allowing circumlocutions of any kind, but requiring that every action and every thing should be designated by its right name.

---

4 This passage fixes clearly the meaning of the word Ta'liqah, which is the term employed here in the original Arabic to designate those notes of which Sulaym speaks.

* 30 May.—Ed.

Persian 'Iraq. This relative adjective receives the addition of the letter z, as is the case with Marwazi (see no. 3). Al-Jar is a village on the coast of the Red Sea at the distance of a day and night from Madinah; this place gives its name to the Jarian wheat. Abu 'I-Qasim al-Zamakhshari says, in his geographical dictionary under the letter shin,<sup>5</sup> that al-Jar is a village on the sea-coast, at which the vessels<sup>6</sup> coming from Qulzum (Suez), "Aydhab. and the sea of al-Naam<sup>7</sup> coast anchor. Ibn Hawqal states, in his geography, that al-Jar, the port of Madinah, is situated on the sea-coast at the distance of three stations from that city. Jiddah is another port on the same sea. Abu Sa'id Ibrahim, the son of Sulaym, died on Tuesday the 26th of Dhu 'I-Hijjah, A.H. 491 (November, A.D. 1098).* He is spoken of by Ibn 'Asakir, in his History of Damascus who mentions that he learned the Traditions from a number of the most eminent shaykhs, who also received some from him. His veracity (as a Traditionist) is well established.

257 SULAYMAN IBN YASAR

Abu Ayyub (or Abu 'Abd al-Rahman or Abu 'Abd Allah) Sulayman Ibn Yasar, a mawla to Maymunah,<sup>1</sup> one of the Prophet's

5 Al-Zamakhshari had the strange idea of placing under the letter shin a list of all the places between Yanbu' and Makkah.

6 Vessels مطايا the ordinary signification of the word is beasts of burden, but as it possesses the same primitive signification as مراكب (1. beasts of burden, 2. ships), it may also bear the secondary one.

7 This extracted literally from the work of al-Zamakhshari, but the sea of al-Na'am بحر النعمان is not mentioned again by him, neither is it to be found in the works of other Arabic geographers; it is perhaps a mistake of al-Zamakhshari, who might have intended to write بحر عمان the sea of Oman, or the Indian Ocean; or else بحر النعمان the sea of al-Nu'man: an island bearing this name lies near the Arabian coast at about one degree south of the gulf of Ayla. See the charts of Niebuhr and Berghaus, and the French translation of al-Edrisi's Geography, tom. I, p. 332.

* 23 November, Ed.

1 See note (1), no. 255.

wives, and brother to 'Ata Ibn Yasar,<sup>2</sup> was one of the seven great jurisconsults of Madinah, three of whom have been already mentioned in this work. He was learned (in the law, a sure authority (in the Traditions), devout, pious, and an example set up by God for general limitation<sup>3</sup>. Al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad<sup>4</sup> said: "We consider Sulayman Ibn Yasar as more intelligent than Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab;" but he did not say that he was a more learned man or an abler jurisconsult. He taught the Traditions on the authority of Ibn 'Abbas, Abu Hurayrah, and Umm Salamah;<sup>5</sup> al-Zuhri and other great Traditionists taught Traditions on his authority. When ever Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab was asked for a fatwa, or opinion on a legal question, he used to tell the applicant to go to Sulayman Ibn Yasar, whom he declared to be the most learned (doctor) then living. It is related by Qatadah (Ibn Di'ama) that on arriving at Madinah, he asked who was the most learned of the inhabitants without exception, and received for answer; Sulayman Ibn Yasar. He died at the age of seventy-three, in the year 107 (A.D. 725), or, according to other statements, in A.H. 100, or 94.

258 AL-A'MASH

Abu Muhammad Sulayman Ibn Mihran, a native of Kufah and generally known by the name of al-'amash (the blear-eyed), was a

---

2 'Ata Ibn Yasar, a mawla to Maymuna, wife of the Prophet, was a Tabi'i of the first class. His authority as Traditionist and jurisconsult is admitted by all the doctors. He died A.H. 94 (A.D. 712-2). (Tab. al-Fuqaha.)

3 The word حجة means a convincing proof, a confutation. Pious men are so denominated because God will bring them forward on the day of judgement to confute such sinner as pretend that they had no person to set them the example of holiness. See no. 254.

4 Al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Hanafiyyah, a native of Madinah and Tabi'i is considered as a good authority for Traditions. His pupils were very numerous. He died A.H. 100 (A.D. 718-20). (Tab. al-Fuqaha.)

5 'Umm Salamah was daughter to Abu 'l-Salt Sahl, surnamed for his hospitality, Zad al-Rakk (the provision of the caravan), and member of the tribe of Makhzum. During the first persecutions against Islamism, she and her husband Abu Salamah fled to Abyssinia, where she bore him Salamah. She became a widow A.H. 4, and the same year the Prophet took her as a wife. She died at Madinah, A.H. 59 (A.D. 678-9), and was interred in the Baqi' cemetery near that city. Talqih, MS. No. 634, fol. 7.)

mawla to the family of Kahil, a branch of the tribe of Asad. This celebrated imam was gifted with superior abilities; he was learned (in the law), and esteemed an exact and trustworthy Traditionist. His father inhabited Dunbawend, from which he removed to Kufah, accompanied by his wife who was then pregnant, and she was there delivered of al-A'mash. - Al-Sam'ani observes that he was known, not as a native of Dunbawend, but as a native of Kufah. Al-'amash and his contemporary al-Zuhri were both in the province of Hijaz at the same epoch; he saw also Anas Ibn Malik and conversed with him, but had not the good fortune to hear from him any of the Traditions; those which he gave on the authority of Anas came to him from the disciples of that imam, and he attributes them directly to Anas without citing the names of those through whom they passed from 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Awfa.<sup>1</sup> He had met and conversed with the most eminent among the Tabi'is, and his authority was cited for Traditions by Sufyan al-Thawri, Shu'bah Ibn al-Hajjaj, Hafs Ibn Ghiyath<sup>2</sup> and a number of other great doctors. He possessed a subtle wit and was inclined to pleasantry: some students having gone to him one day to learn Traditions, he said to them on coming out of his house: "Were there not in the house a person" (meaning his wife) - "whom I detest more than I do you, I should not have come out to you." Having one day quarrelled with his wife, he called in a man to effect a reconciliation, and this mediator addressed the woman in the following terms: "Do not mind his bleary eyes and his thin legs, but consider that he is an imam and that he is in high estimation." On this al-A'mash exclaimed: "God confound thee! thy sole intention is to point out my defects to her." Being asked by Dawud Ibn 'Umar al-Ha'ik (the tailor) if the prayer was valid at which a tailor presided as imam, he replied: "That cannot invalidate the prayer if no ablution has been made previously<sup>3</sup>," Dawud then asked him if the evidence of a tailor was receivable in a court of law and got this answer: "It is receivable when accompanied with the

---

1 Abu Ibrahim 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Awfa surnamed Abu Mu'awiya al-Darir (the blind) al-Aslami الأسلمى was a Traditionist of great reputation, having known and conversed with Muhammad. He died at Kufah his native place, A.H. 87 (A.D. 706). (Tab. al-Muhad.)

2 Abu 'Umar Hafs Ibn Ghiyath, a member of the tribe of Nakha'ah and a native of Kufah, in which place he filled the duties of a qadi, is known as a Traditionist. Born A.H. 117 (A.D. 735); died A.H. 196 (A.D. 811-2), (Tab. al-Muhad.)

3 Prayer is not valid unless preceded by an ablution. From 'his it may be perceived that al-A'mash pretended to consider the prayer invalid if the imam was a tailor.

testimony of two respectable witnesses."<sup>4</sup> It is said that the imam Abu Hanifah went to see him during a fit of illness, and having sat by him for a long time, he said, when about to retire: "It seems to me that my presence is irksome to you." "By Allah!" replied the other, "you are irksome to me even when you are in your own house." Another time, a party of friends came to visit him and sat a long while with him; he at length lost patience, and taking hold of his pillow, he rose up and exclaimed: "May God restore to health one whom you have made sick by your wishes for his recovery." It was one day mentioned in his presence that the Prophet said: "If a man oversleeps himself when he should have risen in the night (to pray), it is because Satan has made water in his ear." On this al-A'mash observed that the soreness of his own eyes must have been produced by Satan's urine. Numerous other anecdotes of a similar kind are told of him.

"It is related by Abu Mu'awiyah al-Darir that Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik wrote to al-A'mash, requiring him to compose a book on the virtues of 'Uthman and the crimes of 'Ali. When al-A'mash read the letter, he put it into the mouth of a sheep which ate it up<sup>5</sup>, and then said to the bearer: "Tell him that I answer it thus." On this, the messenger informed him that unless he brought back a written answer, he should lose his life, the khalif having sworn to put him to death if he returned without one: (findig, however, that al-A'mash was inflexible), he begged of the doctor's friends to interfere, and they at length prevailed on him to send a written reply; it was worded in these terms: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement! Commander of the faithful! had 'Uthman possessed all the virtues in the world, they had been of no utility to you; and if 'Ali committed all the crimes of which the human race were guilty, they had done you no injury. Mind the qualities of your own little self, and adieu!"

Al-A'mash was born, A.H. 60; some say however that he came into the world on the same day. In which al-Husayn was killed: this was the day of 'Ashurah,<sup>6</sup> A.H. 61 (10th October, A.D. 680). The 4 To establish a point before the qadi, the evidence of two respectable witnesses is necessary.

* From. 'It is' to 'adieu' not in the autograph.—Ed.

5 It may be perceived from this that the letter was written on papyrus.

6 The tenth day of the month of Muharram is called the day of 'Ashurah. It is held sacred by the Muslims. For the manner in which this festival is celebrated in Egypt, see Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. II, p. 166.

father of al-A'mash was present when al-Husayn lost his life. Ibn Qutaybah, in his Kitab al-Ma'arif, counts al-A'mash among those persons who were born two months before their time. He died in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 148 (May, A.D. 765), but some accounts place his death in 147 or 149. - Za'idah Ibn Qudamah<sup>7</sup> related that he one day followed al-A'mash and saw him enter the cemetery and lie down in a newly made grave; he then came out of it, and shaking the earth off his head, he exclaimed "O! how narrow a dwelling!" Dumawand is a place situated in the province of Ray in Persian Iraq. Some call it Dumawand, but incorrectly. We have already spoken of it (no. 217).

259 ABU DAWUD AL-SIJISTANI

Abu Dawud Sulayman Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Ishaq Ibn Bashir Ibn Shaddad Ibn 'Amr Ibn Imran al-Azdi (of the tribe of Azd), al-Sijistani, was a hafiz learned in the Traditions and the sciences connected with them, skilful in discerning those of feeble authority, and eminent for this piety and holy life. He travelled to various countries to learn the Traditions and he took them down in writing from the mouths of the doctors in Iraq, Khurasan, Syria, Egypt, and Mesopotamia. He was one of the earliest authors who compiled a book of Traditions (Kitab al-Sunan), and this work he presented to Ahmad Ibn Hanbal, by whom it was admired and approved: the shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi, in his Tabaqat al-Fuqaha, counts Abu Dawud among the disciples of that imam. When Abu Dawud composed his Kitab al-Sunan, it was said by Ibrahim al-Harbi<sup>1</sup> that the Traditions had been rendered easy to Abu Dawud as iron was rendered soft to Dawud.<sup>2</sup> "I wrote down," says Abu Dawud, "five hundred thousand Traditions respecting the Prophet, from which I selected those, to the number of four thousand eight hundred, which are contained in this book (the sunan). I have mentioned herein the authentic, those which seem

---

7 Abu l-Salt Za'idah Ibn Qudamah, a member of the tribe of Thaqif and a native of Kufah, held an eminent rank among the traditionists. He died in Asia Minor (Rum), A.H. 161 (A.D. 777-8. Tab. al-Muhaadithin. Ibn al-Athir's Kamil).

1 See no. 19, note al-Harbi.

2 According to the Muslims, Dawud or David, the son of Solomon, made coats of mail, and by divine favour the iron was wrought by him with as much ease as if it had been wax.

to be so,<sup>3</sup> and those which are nearly so; but of them all, a man only requires four for his religious conduct: the first, those words of the Prophet: "Deeds are to be judged by the intentions"; the second, by the same: A proof of man's sincerity in Islamism is his abstaining from what concerns him not; the third, by the same: The believer is not truly a believer until he desireth for his brother that which he desireth for himself; and the fourth, by the same: The Lawful is clear and the Unlawful is clear, but between them are things doubtful, etc."<sup>4</sup> Sahl Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Tustari went to see Abu Dawud, who was highly pleased on learning his arrival, and made him sit down. "I have a service to ask of you, Abu Dawud!" said Sahl. "Name it," replied the other. "Not till you promise to do it in case it be a thing possible." "If it be possible I shall grant it." Then put out that tongue with which you related the Traditions concerning the blessed Prophet, so that I may kiss it." Abu Dawud granted his request. He was born A.H. 202 (A.D. 817-8). After visiting Baghdad several times, he went down to Basrah, where he continued to reside till his death. He expired on Friday, the 15th of Shawwal, A.H. 275 (February, A.D. 889).* His son Abu Bakr "Abd Allah Ibn Abi Dawud was hafiz of the first eminence at Baghdad, a man of acknowledged superiority for learning, an imam and the son of an imam. He composed the Kitab al-Masabih<sup>5</sup>, and studied in Egypt and Syria under the same masters as his father; he learned the Traditions in Baghdad, Khurasan, Ispahan, Sijistan, and Shiraz. His death took place A.H. 316 (A.D. 928-9). The hafiz Abu 'Ali al-Naysaburi<sup>6</sup> and Ibn Hamzah al-Isbahani<sup>7</sup>

3 In the Arabic text, read شيء

4 The rest of the Tradition is as follows: Which most men do not understand; and he who avoids the things which are doubtful preserves his honour and his religion. For the text of this Tradition, See Hamaker's Wakidde Expugnatioe Memphis, etc. p. 120 notes.

* 22 February--Ed.

5 The subject of this work was unknown to Hajji Khalifah.

6 Abu 'Ali al-Hasayn Ibn 'Ali al-Naysaburi (native of Naisapur), a hafiz celebrated for the extent and correctness of the information which he had received from the most eminent Traditionists of his time, was equally illustrious for his piety and holy life. He inhabited Baghdad. Born A.H. 277 (A.D. 890-1), died in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 349 (A.D. 960). (Al-Dhahabi's Annals, MS. No. 646).

7 Abu Ishaq Ibrahim Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hamzah Ibn 'Umarah al-Isbahani (native of Isbahani) was a hafiz of great celebrity. He died A.H. 353 (A.D. 964). (Al-Dhahabi's Annals, No. 646).

cite his authority.<sup>8</sup> Sijistani is derived from Sijistan, the name of a well known province; but some say that (in the present case) it comes from Sijistan or Sijistanah, a village in the dependencies of Basrah.

260 AL-HAMID THE GRAMMARIAN

The grammarian Abu Musa Sulayman Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ahmad, a native of Baghdad and surnamed al-Hamid, is noted as one of those persons who were versed in the system of grammar drawn up by the learned men of Iraq. He had for master in that science Abu 'l-'Abbas Tha'lab, and was the most eminent of his pupils; he replaced him when absent and succeeded him on his death. Some good works on philological subjects were composed by him and other information was obtained from him and handed down by Abu 'Umar al-Zahid (al-Mutarriz) and by Niftawayh's boy, Abu Ja'afar al-Isbahani, surnamed Barzawayh.<sup>1</sup> Al-Hamid was a man of piety and virtue, and pre-eminent by his knowledge of rhetoric, grammar, philology, and poetry. He had studied also under the grammarians of Basrah, and combined their doctrines with those which he had learned from the Kufah grammarians, but he testified a strong prejudice against the former on the subject of the grammatical doctrines which they had taught him. He copied books with great correctness, and composed himself a number of works, such as (collections of passages in prose and verse composed by the Arabs of the desert and relating to) the human frame, bets and archery, plants, and wild animals; he wrote also an abridgment of grammar. He died at Baghdad on the eve of Thursday, the 23rd of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 305 (June, A.D. 918),* and was interred in the cemetery outside the gate called the Bab al-Tin. He was surnamed al-Hamid (the sour) on account of his malignant disposition: on his death-bed, he left his books to Abu Fatik

---

8 The inability of the translator to ascertain what is meant in this phrase by the words من صنف الصحيح obliges him to pass them over. The printed Arabic text corresponds exactly with that of the autograph M.S.

1 The author of the Fihrist, MS. No. 874, fol. 121 says nothing more of Barzawayh than this: "Barzawayh برزويه no mention is made of any works composed by him."<sup>10</sup>

* 4 June--Ed.

al-Muqtadiri<sup>2</sup> to prevent them from falling into that hands of literary men, to whom they might have been serviceable.

261 ABU 'LQASIM AL-TABARANI

Abu 'l-Qasim Sulayman Ibn Ahmad Ibn Ayyub Ibn Mutayr al-Lakhmi al-Tabrani was the chief hafiz of his time. Having set out from Syria to collect Traditions relative to the Prophet, he spent thirty-three years in visiting 'Iraq, Hijaz, Yaman, Egypt, and the cities of Mesopotamia. The quantity of Traditions which he learned by oral transmission was very great, and the number of persons from whom he received them amounted to one thousand. He wrote some useful and curious books, replete with information, amongst the rest, his large, small, and medium editions of the Mu'jam (alphabetical dictionary of Traditionists), which are the best known of his works. The hafiz Abu Nu'aym and many others cited him as an authority. He was born at Tabariyah (Tiberias) in Syria, and having settled at Isbahan, he continued there till his death, which took place on Saturday, the 28th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 360 (September, A.D. 971),* at about the age of one hundred years. Some state, however, that he died in the month, of Shawwal. He was buried close to the grave of Humamah al-Dawsi,<sup>1</sup> one of the Prophet's companions. Tabarani means native of Tabariyah (Tiberias); as for Tabari, we have already mentioned that it is derived from Tabaristan. Lakhmi means descended from Lakhmi, whose real name was Malik Ibn 'Adi. (under no. 65) we have related the origin of his surname and that of his brother Judham.

262 ABU 'L-WALID AL-BAJI

Abu 'l-Walid Sulayman Ibn Khalaf Ibn Sa'd Ibn Ayyub Ibn Warith al-Tujibi al-Andalusi al-Baji was a member of the sect of Malik and

---

2 This Abu 'l-Fatik appears to have been a slave enfranchised by the khalif al-Muqtadir.

* 23 September--Ed.

1 Humamah al-Dawsi died at Isbahan, to which place he had accompanied Abu Musa 'al-Ash'ari on a military expedition. (Siyar al-Salaf.)

one of the most eminent men in Spain as a Hafiz and a learned scholar. He lived in the eastern part of that peninsula, and travelled to the East about the year 426 (A.D. 1034-5), when he stopped three years at Makkah with Abu 'l-Dharr al-Harawi,<sup>1</sup> and made the pilgrimage four times. From thence he went to Baghdad, where he resided for three years, during which time he studied jurisprudence, read the Traditions, and made acquaintance with the learned men of the first rank, such as Abu 'l-Tayyib al-Tabari, the Shafite doctor, and Abu Is'haq al-Shirazi, the author of the Muhadhdhab. He passed a year at Mosul with Abu Ja'afar al-Simnani,<sup>2</sup> and pursued his studies in jurisprudence under that doctor's tuition. He continued in the East nearly thirteen years. The khatib Abu Bakr (al-Baghdadi) is cited by him as an authority for some of his information, and the same hafiz has also cited the authority of al-Baji, thus, he says; "Al-Baji recited to me these verses, composed by himself:

'Since I have learned for a certainty that the sum of my life is but an hour, why should I not be sparing of it, and devote it to piety and virtue?'

He composed a great number of works, such as the Kitab al-Muntaqi (choice selection),<sup>3</sup> the Ihkam al-Fusul fi-Ahkam al-Usul chapters

1 Abu 'l-Dharr 'Abd Ibn Ahmad al-Harawi (native of Herat) was a doctor of the sect of Ma'lik and shaykh of the Haram, or sacred territory of Makkah. He learned the Traditions of Herat, Baghdad, Damascus and other cities, and composed some works, such as Sahih, or collection of genuine Traditions, a Mu'jam, or biographical dictionary of his own masters, etc. In points of belief he followed the doctrines of al-Ash'ari, in which he had been instructed by the qadi Abu Bakr al-Baqillani. He was a hafiz, and ascetic, and had been noted for his sufism; but he afterwards married an Arab wife and went to dwell among that people in the desert. Born A.H. 356 (A.D. 967); died at Makkah A.H. 433 (A.D. 1041-2). (Iqd al-Tamim, MS. No. 721, fol. 161).

2 The qadi Abu Ja'far Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Simnani inhabited Baghdad and taught the Traditions there. His veracity, learning, talents, and elegant language acquired him general favour. In religion he was a Hanafite, and he composed some works on jurisprudence. Assemblies were regularly held by him at his house, and in those meetings the jurisconsults and the theologians debated different questions in his presence. He was qadi of Mosul and remained there till his death, which happened in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 444 (July, A.D. 1052). His birth took place in the year 361 (A.D. 971-2) Simnan is a town in the province of Qumis, but Abu Ja'far drew his origin from a Simnan in 'Iraq. (Najm al-Mubtadi MS. fonds St. Germain, No. 85, fol. 93 Tabaqat al-Hanafiyah MS. St-Germain, No. 132, fol. 161.)

3 This work appears to have consisted of Traditions, servig as basis to the legal doctrines of the sect to which Abu 'l-Walid belonged.

of established authority on the maxims of dogmatic theology), a Ta'dil wa Tajrih,<sup>4</sup> containing an inquiry into the credibility of the Traditionists whose authority is cited by al-Bukhari in his sahid, etc. He was one of the great Muslim imams. It is mentioned by him that he heard Abu 'l-Dharr 'Abd Ibn Ahmad al-Harawi say: "Were certificates of capacity valid, travelling in search of learning would be useless." On his return to Spain, he exercised the functions of a qadi; it is even stated that he acted as such at Aleppo. He was born at Batalyaws (Badajos) on Tuesday, the 15th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 403 (May, A.D. 1013),* and died at al-Mariya, A.H. 474, on the eve of Thursday, the 19th of Rajab (December, A.D. 1081),** between the first and second hours of prayer.<sup>5</sup> He was interred at the Ribat by the sea-side, and the funeral service was said over him by his son Abu 'l-Qasim. Abu 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, the author of the Isti'ab, studied under him, and Abu Muhammad Ibn Hazm al-Zahiri had with him some conferences and discussions, the exposition of which would here occupy too much space. - Bajii means native of Bajah (Beja), a city in the Spanish peninsula. There is another Bajah in the province of Africa, and a village bearing the same name lies near Isbahan. - Batalyaws shall be noticed hereafter: as for al-Mariya (Almeria), we have already spoken of it (no. 18).

263 ABU AYYUB AL-MURIYANI

Abu Ayyub Sulayman Ibn Abi Sulayman Makhlad<sup>1</sup> (or Dawud) al-Muriyani al-Khuzi was a Wazir to Abu Ja'far al-Mansur, having succeeded to Khalid Ibn Barmak, the grandfather of the Barmekides. He enjoyed the highest favour with the khalif by reason of a service which he had rendered him on a former occasion. It was this: Sulayman Ibn Habib Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Suffah to whom Abu 4 Ta'dil wa Tajrih signifies justification and impugning. Works bearing this title treat of the credibility of Traditionists.

* 26 May--Ed.

** 23 December--Ed.

5 The first time of prayer is the Maghrib, or sunset, the Muhammedan day commencing at the moment; the second is the 'Isha', when the evening has closed and it is quite dark; the third is the Subh, or Fajr, day break; the fourth the Zuhr, a little after noon; the fifth the 'Asr', mid-time between noon and nightfall. See Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. I, page 82.

1 This name should perhaps be pronounced Mukhallad.

Ayyub acted as secretary previously to the khalifat of al-Mansur, had nominated that prince as his deputy in one of the cantons of Fars; but afterwards, on suspicion of his having embezzled the public money. He had him severely flogged and then obliged him to pay a heavy fine: it was even his intention to disgrace him publicly after having subjected him to bodily punishment, but Abu Ayyub aided the prince to make his escape. Al-Mansur on his accession to the khalifat, beheaded Sulayman Ibn Habib and chose Abu Ayyub as his Wazir in gratitude for his conduct. At a later period, the Khalif's feelings towards his minister underwent an entire change; he reproached him with peculation, and had even some thoughts of making him feel the weight of his vengeance. During the long period that this enmity subsisted, Abu Ayyub never went into al-Mansur's presence without apprehensions for his life; and as he always with drew unharmed, it was said that he had an ointment, prepared by a magical operation, with which he rubbed his eyebrows before he entered. This idea got such credence among the common people, that Abu Ayyub's ointment became a current expression. One of his ingenious parables is thus related by Khalid Ibn Yazid al-Arqat: "Abu Ayyub was one day holding a public sitting to issue his commands and his prohibitions, when a messenger came to him from al-Mansur. On seeing him, he turned pale, and when the man had retired, we expressed our astonishment at his apprehensions. On this, he repeated to us the following fable: 'It is related that the falcon said to the cock: There is not on earth a more ungrateful animal than you are. Why so?' said the cock. 'Because your masters took you when yet in the shell and had you hatched, bringing you thus into the world; they fed you with their hands and you remained among them till you grew up; but now, not one of them can go near you without your flying to this side and that side and screaming out. As for me, I was taken from the mountains when already aged, and they instructed me and tamed me; then they let me go, and I catch game in the air which I bring to my master. To this the cock answered: Had you seen as many falcons on the spit and ready for rousting as I have seen cocks, you would be even more fearful than I. And you, my friends', continued the Wazir, 'did you know what I know, you would not wonder at my being afraid even in the height of the favour which you see me enjoy;'" "The khalif's vengeance fell at length upon Abu Ayyub in the year 153 (A.D. 770); he was tortured, deprived of all his property, and he died A.H. 154. Muriyani means belonging to Muriyan, a village in the province of al-Ahwaz, or of Khuzistan, according to Ibn Nuqtah.<sup>2</sup> *Kh*uzi means belonging to 2 The life of Ibn Nuqtah will be found in this work.

Khuzistan, a country between Basrah and Fars. Some say, however, that this surname was given to him for his avarice, because he took up his residence in the valley of al-Khuz when at Makkah.<sup>3</sup>

264 SULAYMAN IBN WAHB

Abu Ayyub Sulayman was the son of Wahb<sup>1</sup> Ibn Sa'id Ibn 'Amr Ibn Husayn<sup>2</sup> Ibn Qays Ibn Qital.*<sup>3</sup> When Yazid Ibn Abi Sufyan became governor of Syria, Qital was employed by him as a secretary, and he afterwards served Mu'awiyah in the same capacity; Mu'awiyah passed him over to his son Yazid, and it was in the reign of this khalif that he died. Qays, Qital's son, was nominated by Yazid to the vacant place, and having served successively Yazid, Marwan Ibn al-Hakam, 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan and Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, he died in the reign of the last. Al-Husayn, the son of Qays, was then appointed secretary by Hisham, and after him he served Marwan Ibn Muhammad al-Ja'di, the last of the Umayyads; he was then employed by Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, who, on joining the party of Abu Ja'far al-Mansur,<sup>4</sup> procured for him a full pardon from the conqueror. Al-Husayn was then employed as a secretary by al-Mansur and by al-Mahdi, in whose reign he died, on a journey to Ray. Al-Mahdi then nominated 'Amr, al-Husayn's son, to the vacant place 'Amr passed subsequently into the service of Khalid Ibn Barmak and died, leaving a son named Sa'id, who remained

---

3 Shib'b al-Khuz (the valley of al-Khuz) is the name of a place near Makkah. He perhaps chose this retired place for his habitation, to avoid receiving company.

1 The family of Sulayman was originally Christian, but had embraced Islamism. (Fakhr al-Din), MS. No. 895, fol. 228). The father of his ancestor Qital bore the name of Matta (Mathew).

2 This name is written with the vowel-points in the Fihrist. The beginning of this article to the words We have already stated is copied verbatim from that work.

3 The orthography and true pronunciation of this name are uncertain.

* The Cario edition gives Qihab which is not legible in the autograph—Ed.

4 Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, governor of 'Iraq for Marwan Ibn Muhammad, fought for his master till the last, and held out in Wasit eleven months against Abu Ja'far al-Mnsur. It was only on learning the death of his sovereign that he surrendered. (See Price's Retrospect.)

constantly with the Barmak family. Wahb, the son of Sa'id, entered into the service of Ja'far Ibn Yahya (the Barmakid), and afterwards passed into that of al-Fadl Ibn Sahl, surnamed Dhu 'l-Riyasatayn. Al-Fadl used to say of him: "I wonder how any person can keep company with Wahb, and not feel seriously affected at his own inferiority." On the death of al-Fadl, his brother al-Hasan took Wahb as his secretary, and confided to him the government of Kirman and Fars, both of which provinces prospered under his administration, Wahb was drowned on his way from Fam al-Silh to Baghdad, whither he had been sent by al-Hasan with a letter for al-Mamun. Sulayman, the son of Wahb, was only fourteen years of age when he became secretary to al-Mamun; he afterwards entered into the service of Ityakh,<sup>5</sup> from which he passed into that

5 Ityakh, when a boy, was a slave to Sallam al-Abrash, by whom he was employed as a cook, and who sold him to al-Mu'tasim in the year 199 (A.D. 814-5). Being possessed of great courage, he was raised to places of the highest authority by that prince and by his successor al-Wathiq. He was named commander of the the household troops السعونه at Sarra-man-r'aa, and it was by his hand and in his house that persons condemned to death by al-Mu'tasim were executed. Under al-Mutawakkil he held the rank of commander-in-chief, general of the Maghribin and Turkish guard, grand-treasurer, postmaster-general, grand-chamberlain, and governor of Baghdad; but a circumstance happened which inspired the khalif with the utmost dread of his powerful favourite. They had been both drinking together, and al-Mutawakkil, heated with wine, insulted Ityakh so grossly, that the offended officer threatened to take his life. The next morning the khalif was reminded of the scene, and offered an apology for what had passed, but some time after, he procured a person who suggested to Ityakh the propriety of making the pilgrimage to Makkah. The permission of al-Mutawakkil having been obtained, he left Baghdad preceded by all the troops, clothed in a pelisse of honour, and authorised to exercise the supreme authority in every town through which he passed. On his return, in the month of Dhu al-Qa'dah A.H. 230 (July, A.D. 845), he was received with great honour at Baghdad by Ishaq Ibn Ibrahim, who had been nominated governor of that city in the interval, and who now invited him, had been nominated governor of that city in the interval, and who now invited him, in the most pressing manner, to come and stop at his palace. Ityakh hesitated, but yielded at length to Ibn Ibrahim's solicitations, he went in, and at the same moment the guard of four hundred young slaves who always accompanied him were shut out. Ityakh was immediately cast into chains and deprived of every nourishment till he expired, after which witnesses were brought into examine his body and depose that he had died unnatural death.--(Ibn al-Athir; Ibn Shuq.) The latter historian call slyakh the sword of the khalif's vengeance: سيف القتل للخلفاء a little similar to that already noticed, page 347, and which is now sufficiently explained by the observation of Ibn al-Athir in the foregoing extract. At the

(Continued on next page)

of Ashnas<sup>6</sup> being then raised to the Wazirate by al-Muhtadi, he was employed by al-Mu'tamid in the same capacity. He has left a collection of epistles. His brother al-Hasan Ibn Wahb was secretary to (the Wazir) Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyat, and director of the chancery office.<sup>7</sup> He was an able poet and an elegant writer of epistles, a collection of which he published. These two brothers were among the most distinguished men of the time. We have already stated in the life of Abu Tammam (no. 145), that al-Hasan Ibn Wahb conferred on him the place of postmaster at Mosul, and that he composed some elegiac lines on the poet's death; these we have there inserted (no. 145). I cannot give a separate notice on al-Hasan in consequence of my inability to discover the date of his death; for, as I have already observed in my preface, this book is solely intended as an obituary, and when I enter into the particulars of any individual's life, it is not because they are required by the design of the work, but merely because they may furnish instruction and amusement to the reader. The principal poets of the time, such as Abu Tammam al-Buhturi, and others of the same class, composed poems in honour of these two brothers: one of Abu Tammam's finest passages is the following, from a qasidah addressed to Sulayman:

"Family of Wahb! I and every man of education shall follow the path in which you tread. For you my heart (longeth), as the liver parched with thirst (longeth for water); but for the rest of men, my heart is as the hearts of others."

A man of great merit said on hearing these lines, that it would have been more appropriate to address them to the descendants of the Prophet, who alone were worthy of being praised in such terms. Sulayman Ibn Wahb died in prison, on Sunday the 15th of Safar, A.H. 272 (August, A.D. 885),* or by another account in 271. Al-Tabari siege of 'Ammuriyah, A.H. 223, Ityakh commanded the right wing of the Muslim army, and in the year 225 he was appointed governor of Yaman.-(Ibn al-Athir.) His name is differently pointed in the MSS., it is found written ايتاخ Atyakh, ايتاخ Itakh, and اماح M. Hamaker suggests, in his work entitled Expositio adversus Dymyathm, p. 125, that the true reading may be 'Inakh', a word still employed by the Uzbeks to signify prince or amir. In the autograph MS. it is written ايتاخ

---

6 Ashnas, one of al-Mu'tasim's generals, commanden the Van of the Muslims at the sieae of 'Ammuriyah. In the year 225, he married his daughter to Afshin, the General who conquered Babak al-Khurrami. He died A.H. 230 (A.D. 844-5).-(Ibn al-Athir).--See also Freytag's Selecie ex Historia Halebi, p. 84.

7 See note on chancery No. 14.

* 1 August.--Ed.

Al-Tabari says in his History that he died on Tuesday, the 17th of the month,* in the prison where he was confined by the order of al-Muwaffaq Talhah, the father of the Khalif al-Mu'tadid. The poet al-Buhtari composed the following verses on Sulayman:

"His resolutions are following by a prompt execution, and his intelligence discovers plainly to him all things hidden. That which is out of his sight is held present in his mind, and when his eyes slumber, his mind is awake."

This idea has been frequently employed by poets; it is thus that Aws Ibn Hajar al-Tamimi,<sup>8</sup> an ante-islamic poet, has said:

"When the man of penetration thinks of you, he may be said to see and to hear you."

The same idea has been thus variously expressed by different poets:

"He foresees so well the results of an affair, that they might be thought to have already informed him (of their coming).

He foresees so well the results of an affair, that by his good judgment he might be said to witness occurrences before they come to pass.

He knows so well the course of events, that he may be said to have his eye fixed upon to-morrow.

When hearts hold secret converse, (you know what passes in them) as if you saw them plainly."

The different manners of expressing this single idea would form a long chapter, and we shall not expatiate farther on the subject. Sulayman filled successively different places in the public offices of government, and was raised to the Wazirate, which he occupied till the time of his imprisonment and death.

**It is related that khalif al-Wathiq once turned towards Ahmad Ibn al-Khasib<sup>9</sup> the katib, and recited to him these lines of an ancient poet:

* 3 August.--Ed.

<sup>8</sup> Aws Ibn Hajar was a contemporary of al-Hutay'ah and Nabighah al-Ja'di.

** From 'It is' to end not in the autograph.--Ed.

<sup>9</sup> Ahmad Ibn al-Khasib became Wazir to al-Munastir: A.H. 248 (A.D. 862-3).

"Two persons, both of them rich, are my debtors, and had God so willed, they had paid me before this. One of them, O my friends! is Umm 'Amr; as for the other, ask me not her name."

Sulayman, on being informed of the circumstance, exclaimed: "May God protect me! by Umm 'Amr is meant Ahmad Ibn al-Khasim, and by the other it is I who am designated." And such was really the case, the khalif having confiscated their property a few days afterwards.<sup>10</sup> When Sulayman was promoted to the Wazirate, (or by another account, when his son 'Ubayd Allah was raised to that post), the following verses were written to him by 'Ubayd Allah, the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir (whose life will be found farther on):

"Fortune refused us her favour, but showed her kindness for us in granting them to those whom we love and esteem. And I said to her: 'Complete thy beneficence towards them, and leave us in neglect; important business should be done first.'"

265 SANJAR IBN MALIKSHAH

Abu 'l-Harith Sanjar Ibn Malikshah Ibn Alp-Arslan Ibn Dawud Ibn Mika'il Ibn Saljuq Ibn Daqqaq was sultan of Khurasan, Ghaznah, and Mawara-al-Nahr (Transoxiana); prayers were offered up for him from the pulpits of Arabian and Persian Iraq, Adharbijan, Arran, Armenia, Syria, Mosul, Diyar Bakr, Diyar Rabi'ah and the two sacred cities (Makkah and Madinah); money was struck in his name from one extremity of the Muslim empire to the other, and the titles of al-Sultan al-A'azam (the powerful sultan) Mu'izz al-Din (the exalter of the faith) were conferred upon him. His noble spirit and his liberality ranked him among the greatest of princes; it is said that, during five 10 At that time the governors of the provinces confided, to their Katibs, or secretaries, the duty of collecting the public revenue, and the enormous fortunes which some of them acquired in the exercise of this office excited, more than once, the avidity of the court of Baghdad. The speculators were then cast into prison, put to the torture, and obliged to pay heavy sums before recovering their liberty. An instance of this may be found in the Annals of Abu 'l-Fida under the year 230. Sulayman Ibn Wahb was one of the Katibs imprisoned that very year, and he had to pay four hundred thousand dinars for his deliverance. He was then in the service of Itakh. His brother al-Hasan was confined with him, but obtained his liberty at a much cheaper rate; fourteen thousand dinars were all he was obliged to refund (Ibn al-Athir.) See also Ibn Shuqr, vol. VIII. p. 55.

---

successive mornings, he launched into every species of beneficence and gave away seven hundred thousand dinars,<sup>1</sup> besides horses, pelisses, and other valuable objects. His treasurer stated his conviction that the riches contained in his master's treasury surpassed what had ever been possessed by any of the Persian kings (Chosroes): "I one day told him" said he, "that among his stores were one thousand satin dresses, and I requested him to look at them: taking his silence for a proof of his consent, I displayed them all before him, saying: 'Why not look at what belongs to you? why not praise Almighty God for the favours and bounties he has conferred upon you?' On this he extolled his Creator, and observed that it would be disgraceful for a prince like him to have it said (that he hoarded) riches on riches. He then gave orders to introduce his amirs, and he shared all the dresses among them. He possessed also one thousand and thirty pounds weight (ratl) of precious stones; a thing unheard of in the history of any other prince." The authority of Sanjar and his good fortune kept constantly increasing till the year 548 (A.D. 1153-4), when he was defeated and taken prisoner by the Ghuzz<sup>2</sup> a people of Turkish origin. The history of this event is well-known.<sup>3</sup> It was then that the jurisconsult Muhammad Ibn Yahya, Whose life will be found in this work, fell a martyr. The power of Sanjar was broken by these invaders; they tore his kingdom asunder, obtained possession of Naysapur and massacred a countless multitude of the inhabitants. Sanjar remained with them a prisoner for five years, and during the interval, the kingdom of Khurasan was dissolved and the city of Marw fell into the power of Khwarazm Shah.<sup>4</sup> He at length effected his escape, and having returned to Khurasan,* he collected his partisans at Marw, and was on the point of recovering his throne when the term prescribed to his life came to its expiration.

He was born on Friday, the 25th of Rajab, A.H. 479 (November, A.D. 1086,** in the environs of Sanjar, and it was on account of this circumstance that he received his name. His father, the Sultan Malik

1 The dinar of that time may possess an intrinsic value of about nine of ten shillings.

2 Ibn Khallikan calls them the Aghzaz; this is the singular of the word; Ghuzz is the plural. Ibn Khalidun names them the Aghzaz, which word is the plural of the plural form ghuzz.

3 See Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, year 548.

4 For the history of Khwarazm Shah Atsiz Ibn Muhammad Ibn Auusshtikin, see Prices (Retrospect), vol. II, page 390.

* 6 November.—Ed.

** From 'he collected' to 'expiration' not in the autograph.

Shah, happened to stop at that city on his passage through Diyar Rabi'ah, when he received intelligence of the birth of a son; on which he ordered him to be called Sanjar. In the year 490 (A.D. 1097), Sanjar became the lieutenant of his brother Barkyaruq (see his life no. 109), and in 512 (A.D. 1118-9) he obtained the sovereignty of the empire. Having escaped from his captivity among the Ghuzz, he died at Marw on Monday, the 14th of the first Rabi', A.D. 552 (April, A.D. 1157* and was interred in that city. The Saljuq dynasty in Khurasan ceased with his existence, and most of his kingdom fell into the possession of Khawarazm Shahl Atsiz Ibn Muhammad Ibn Anushtikin, the grandfather of Tukush Khwarazm Shah. Ibn al-Azraq al-Fariqi (native and historian of Mayyafariqin) states, in his History, that Sanjar died in the year 555 (A.D. 1160): God knows best!

266 SAHL AL-TUSTARI

Abu Muhammad Sahl Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Yunus Ibn Tsa Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Rafi' al-Tustari, a celebrated saint, gifted with miraculous powers, surpassed all (the sufis) of his time in the practices (of sufi devotion). He became acquainted with the shaykh Dhu 'l-Nun<sup>1</sup> at Makkah. The mortifications (ijihad wariyadat) which he practised were excessive, and the command which he acquired (over his passions and worldly inclinations) was extreme. From the following relation, made by himself, it appears that it was his maternal uncle Muhammad Ibn Sawwar who was the cause of his entering on the path of the devout life "My uncle said to me one day, 'Why dost thou not call to mind God thy creator?' 'How,' said I, 'must I call him to mind?' On rolling thyself up in thy clothes (when going to sleep), say three times with thy heart: "God is with me! God is looking on me! God is witnessing my conduct! and let not thy tongue move to pronounce these words." For some nights I did as he told me and I then informed him of it. 'Repeat the words seven times every night,' was his answer. This I did and I informed him again. 'Repeat them eleven times every night,' said he. I followed his advice, and a sweetness fell into my heart. A year afterwards my uncle said to me: 'keep in mind what I taught thee and persevere in it till thou enterest into the grave; for it will profit thee in this world and in the next.' During some years I continued

---

* According to Edward Mahler's calculation 14 Rabi' al-Awwal fell or Friday 26 April.—Ed.

1 See his life No, 128.

the practice and found the reform, a sweetness in my inmost self. Then one day my uncle said to me: 'O Sahl! he with whom God is, on whom God looketh, and whose conduct God witnesseth, He witnesseth his disobedience unto Him! beware of disobedience.' "Such was the commencement of his devotional career. He dwelt for some time at 'Abbadan and also at Basrah, in which city he died in the month of Muharram, A.H. 283 (February-March, A.D. 896), or 293 by another account. Our Shaykh Ibn al-Athir mentions, in his History, that Sahl was born A.H. 200 (A.D. 815-6); others say 201, at Tustar. Tustari means belonging to Tustar, which is a town of the canton of al-Ahwaz in Khuzistan. This place, which is some times called Shushtar, contains the tomb of al-Bara' Ibn Malik.<sup>2</sup>

267 ABU HATIM AL-SIJISTANI

Abu Hatim Sahl Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Uthman Ibn Yazid al-Jushami al-Sijistani a grammarian, philologist, and reader (i.e. hafiz) of the Qur'an, was the most learned man of Basrah, in which city he had settled. Master of all the branches of belles-lettres, he had for pupils (such scholars as) Ibn Duraya, al-Mubarrad, and others, (who were afterwards) the most eminent scholars of the age. He read twice through Sibawayh's Book, under the tuition of al-Akhafsh; this he mentioned to al-Mubarrad, who declared that he heard him say so. Much of the oral information which he communicated to his pupils had been received by him from Abu Zayd al-Ansari, Abu 'Ubaydah, and al-Asma'i. He was versed in philology and poetry, skilled in prosody, and an able elucidator of obscure expressions. In

---

2 Al-Bara' Ibn Malik Ibn al-Nadr النضر the brother of Anas Ibn Malik, was camel-leader (hadi) to the Prophet, and extemporized to him scraps of poetry (rajaz) when on his journeys and military expeditions. He fought at all his battle and signalized himself by his bravery, having killed, in single combat, during the course of his life, one hundred infidel warriors. He fell a martyr to the cause of Islamism at a battle fought near Tustar A.H. 20-1, (Abu 'l-Mahasin's Nujum, Siyar al-Salaf). Al-Bara' was one of the ahl al-Suffah.- (See Abu 'l-Fida Annals, year 11; De Sacy's Hariri, p. 328.) The hadi جاد or camel-driver, encourages them by his song, and al-Bara' had so sweet a voice that on passing through places where there were women, the Prophet used to silence him, saying: Take care of the glass phials, اياك والقوارير alluding probably to the supposed frailty of the female sex.

the composition of poetry he displayed considerable talent, but his acuteness as a grammarian was so inferior that, whenever he met Abu 'Uthman al-Mazini at the house of 'Isa Ibn Ja'far al-Hashimi, he either pretended business or hurried out of the room to avoid answering any grammatical questions which the other might propose to him. He led a chaste and holy life; every day he gave a dinar in alms, and every week he read the Qur'an through. Some of his poetical pieces are very good, such, for instance, as the lines addressed by him to Abu T-'Abbas al-Mubarrad, who frequented his lessons and studied assiduously under him. Al-Mubarrad was then a youth of great beauty.<sup>1</sup> Abu Hatim said to his pupils: "If you wish to commit a secret to paper, write it down with new milk; the words will appear when the hot ashes of burnt paper are sprinkled over them. Or write with a solution of white zaj (sulphate of iron); the words will become visible when the paper is sprinkled with an infusion of nutgalls. Or else write with the latter, and you may revive the writing by means of the zaj." The following is a list of his works: The Qur'an analysed grammatically; on the faulty expressions employed by the vulgar; on birds; on the genders; on plants; on the words terminated by a long or by a short alif; on the difference between the names given to the members of the human frame and those of animals;<sup>2</sup> on the readings of the Qur'an a work called al-Maqati' wa 'l-Mabadi';<sup>3</sup> on elegance of expression; on the date-tree; on those words which have contrary significations; on the bow, arrow, and dart; on the sword; on the spear: on the coat of mail; on the horse; on wild beasts: on reptiles; satirical pieces: on the grain when growing up; on the human frame; on the cases in which two letters must be united into one;<sup>4</sup> on biestings and new milk; on the vine; on winter and summer; on bees and honey; on camels; on herbage; on abundance and sterility; on the differences which existed between the first copies of the Qur'an, etc. The following is a specimen of his poetry:

"They let that handsome face appear, and then blame those who are tempted. If they wish us to be continent, let them veil that handsome face."

---

1 The original text contains here some verses composed by Sahl on al-Mubarrad. They contain the expression of a strong platonic affection, but they cannot with propriety be translated.

2 See No. 251, note.

3 The title means stops and commencements. Hajji Khalifah does not notice the work, and mere conjectures respecting its subject would be useless.

4 See M.de Sacy's Grammaire arabe, tom. I pages 23 et 53, etc.

He died in the month of Muharram (or of Rajab), A.H. 248 (March-April, A.D. 862),* at Basrah, and was interred in the centre of the Musalla;<sup>5</sup> the funeral service was said over him by Sulayman Ibn Ja'afar Ibn Sulayman Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib al-Hashimi, who was at that time governor of the city.--Jushami is derived from Jusham; there are a number of tribes bearing this name, and I do not know to which of them Abu Hatim belonged.

268 ABU 'L-FATH SAHL AL-ARGHIYANI

Abu 'L-Fath Sahl Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Ali al-Arg<sup>h</sup>iyani, a doctor of the sect of al-Shahfi'i, highly respected for his learning and mortified life, studied jurisprudence at Marw under the shaykh Abu 'Ali 'L-Sinji,<sup>1</sup> and then received lessons from the qadi Husayn al-Marwarudi,<sup>2</sup> with whose system of doctrine he became so well acquainted, that his master declared that no one knew it better. He then went to Naysapur and read over the principles of jurisprudence under the tuition of the Imam al-Haramayn Abu 'L-Ma'ali 'L-Juwayni, at whose assemblies he maintained discussions with general approbation. Having then returned to Arg<sup>h</sup>iyani, he filled the place of qadi for some years, holding at the same time a most exemplary conduct and walking in the path of righteousness. He then made the pilgrimage and became acquainted with the great doctors of 'Iraq Hijaz, and al-Jibal (Persian 'Iraq), from whom he received some Traditions and to whom he communicated others. On quitting Makkah, he went to visit the Sufi<sup>3</sup> shaykh al-Husan al-Simnani, by whom he was advised to

---

* The autograph adds the following information; It is said that he died in 250/864, by another account 254/898 and yet by another account year 255/869.--Ed.

5 The Musalla (place of prayer) is a place in the open air where public prayers are said on the two great Muslim festivals.--See M.de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tome I, page 191.

1 See his life, No. 179.

2 See his life, No. 178.

3 The word 'arif عارف (the knowing), here rendered by Sufi is a technical term of mystic theology. It signifies one who has attained to the knowledge of the divine essence and attributes.--See the vies des Sufis per Djami, in the Notices et Extratis, tom. XII. No. 323.

discontinue the practice of discussing points of the law; he followed this confined himself to his house and lived in solitude. He then built with his own money a little Sufi convent, in which he went to reside and where he remained, composing works and practising devotion till his death. He expired on the first day of Muharram, A.H. 499 (September, A.D. 1105),* as he was just awaking from one of his ecstasies.<sup>4</sup> He is the author of that collection of legal decisions which is called the Fatawa Arghiyaniyah.<sup>5</sup> He had heard the lessons of some eminent doctors, such as Abu Bakr al-Bayhaqi,<sup>6</sup> Nasir al-Marwazi,<sup>7</sup> and 'Abd al-Ghafir Isma'il al-Farisi, the author of the Majma' al-Ghara'ib, the supplement to the History of Naysapur and other works. Arghiyani means belonging to Arghiyān, which is tract of country in the dependencies of Naysapur, containing a number of villages.

269 ABU 'L-TAYYIB SAHL AL-S'ULUKI

Abu 'L-Tayyib Sahl Ibn Muhammad Ibn Sulayman Ibn Muhammad Ibn Sulayman al-Su'luki, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i was a native of Naysapur. We shall give the life of his father and the rest of his genealogy under the letter M. Abu 'L-Tayyib was mufti of Naysapur and son of the (former mufti of that city; he studied jurisprudence under his father Abu Sahl al-Su'luki, who was still living when he received the title of chief doctor of the law (imam). It is universally allowed that for learning and the strict observance

---

* 13 September--Ed.

4 See the meaning of the word hal explained in No. 16.

5 See however what our author says on the subject in the life of Abu Nasr Muhammad al-Arghiyani.

6 See his life, No. 27.

7 Abu 'L-Fath Nasir Ibn al-Husain al-'Qmari al-Marwazi, an eminent professor and dectos of the sect of as-Shafi'i was member of the tribe of Quraysh, and deseendant from the Khalif 'Umar Ibn al-Khhttab. The celebrated hafiz al-Bayhaqi was one of his disciples. He himself stuided at Marw under al-Qaffa, and at Naysapur under abu 'L-Tayyib al-Su'luki. He was an excellent professor, mufti, and controvertist. He terminated a life of modest poverty and virtue in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 44 (March, A.D. 1053)-(Tab. al-Shafi in).

of religion he stood without a rival. He received Traditions from his father, from Muhammad Ibn Ya'qub al-Asamm, from Ibn Musattir, and from others of the same class; he was also a profound jurisconsult, a learned philologist, and an able dogmatic theologian. His disciples gained much instruction from the traditional learning which he imparted to them, and it is said that when he made his course of lectures, upwards of five hundred inkhorns were in service (the number of those who took notes being so great). He was the most eminent professor and imam<sup>1</sup> of the age, and it was from him that the doctors of Naysapur received their information. His death took place in the month of Muharram, A.H. 387 (Jan.-Feb. A.D. 997); it is stated, however, by Abu Ya'la al-Khalili in his Irshad, that he died in the beginning of the year 402.<sup>2</sup> "Su'luki is derived from Su'luk" - such is the sole observation made on this word by al-Sam'ani (in his Ansab):

*It is related by Abd al-Wahid al-Lakhmi that a soreness having fallen on Sahl's eyes, his friends used to go and recite places of poetry and relate historical anecdotes in his presence, a thing customary in such cases, and that the Shaykh Abu 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sulami<sup>3</sup> said to him: Imam! if your eyes could see your face, they would be healed<sup>4</sup>. "With this compliment Sahl was highly pleased, and observed that he had never received one more flattering. On the death of his father Muhammad Ibn Sulayman, the following verses of condolence were addressed to him by Abu 'l-Nasr Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbar:

"Who will hear from me, afflicted and lamenting, a message to one who, by his learning, is the first of all, (Tell him) that patience under affliction best becomes the man whose legal decisions are (just) as the judgments of God."

1 See No. 26, note رياسة الدين والدين

2 Al-Yafi'i and al-'Othmani place his death in: A.H. 404.

* From 'It' to the end not in the autograph.--Ed.

3 This person must not be confounded with a celebrated Qur'an-reader of the same name, noticed in the life of 'Asim Ibn Abi Nujud.-See vol.II. of this work.

4 This is some what analogous to the expressed: A sight of you is good for your eyes.

270 SHAWAR

Abu Shuja' Shawar<sup>1</sup> al-Sa'di (member of the tribe of Sa'd) was the son of Mujir Ibn Nizar Ibn 'Asha'ir Ibn Shas Ibn Mughith Ibn Habib Ibn al-Harith Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Yakhnas<sup>2</sup> Ibn Abi Duwayb 'Abd Allah. Ibn Abi Dhuwayb was the father of Halimah** who nursed the Prophet on the same milk with her daughter al-Shayma. The father of al-Shayma was al-Harith Ibn 'Abd al-'uzza Ibn Rifa'ah Ibn Mallah:*** it was she who was carrying Muhammad in her arms when he bit her, and she showed him the mark, (many years later), when she went to see him. Some say the real name of Ibn Abi Dhuwayb was Abd Allah Ibn al-Harith Ibn Shajinah§ Ibn Jabir Ibn Rizam Ibn Nasirah Ibn Qusah Ibn Nasar Ibn Sa'd Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawazin. The government of Upper Egypt had been confided to Shawar by al-Salih Ibn Ruzzik 'al-'Adid's wazir, who when wounded§ and on the point of death, reproached himself with three faults; the first, his nomination of Shawar; the second,§§ his having built the mosque which bears his own name, and is situated at the Zawilah Gate, because it might be employed with advantage in the defence of Cairo against a besieger; and the third, his having led his troops as far as Bilbays and returning back after spending upwards of two hundred thousand dinars upon them, instead of marching into Syria, taking Jerusalem and eradicating the power of the Franks.

1 It appears from the autograph MS. that his name must be pronounced Shawie, and not Shawir, as I have hitherto written it. Indeed, William of Tyre calls him Sauar, and he should have prevented me from falling into any mistake on the subject.

* The Cairo edition gives Mukhayyi; the autograph 'gives the correct form, Zakhries; de Salve however has read it as Yakhnas--Ed.

2 The printed text has Mukhis, which is a fault.

** The autograph gives this further information: Ibn al-Kalbi says in the gamharat at Nafab that the foster father of the Prophet Abu Dhuwayb was at Harith Ibn Abd Allah Ibn at Shajnah Ibn Nasirah.--Ed.

*** M.de. Slave gives Shihannah.--Ed.

§ The autograph adds: It was he who fostered him when he was with Halimah and it was Shayma who was carrying him (the prophet) in her arms etc.--Ed.

3 The autograph MS. has خرج all the others have خرج

§§ From 'The second' to 'Franks' not in the autograph.--Ed.

Shawar then established his authority in Upper Egypt, and as his ambition, noble spirit, and bravery equally conspicuous, Salih's last advice to his son (and successor) al-'Adil Ruzzik was that he should neither attempt to molest him nor let any change appear in his conduct towards him; Shawar being a person whose fidelity could not be trusted, and who might revolt when it was least expected. It would be too long to relate how Salih's apprehensions were justified; (we shall merely state that) Shawar left Upper Egypt, and traversing the Oasis and deserts, he appeared suddenly at Tarajah, a village near Alexandria, whence he marched to Cairo. He entered that city on Sunday the 22nd of Muharram, A.H. 558 (January, A.D. 1163),* and having put al-'Adil to death, he took possession of the wazirate which had thus become vacant, and got all the authority into his own hands. Al-'Adil had fled from Cairo with his family on the 20th of Muharram, during the night (but had been pursued and made prisoner.) The same year, in the month of Ramadan, Shawar proceeded to Syria with the intention of soliciting succour from (Nur al-Din) Mahmud Ibn Zanki, the sovereign of that country; he had been driven from Cairo by Abu 'l-Ashbal Dirgham Ibn 'Amir Ibn Siwar al-Lakhmi al-Mundhiri,<sup>4</sup> surnamed Faris al-Muslimin (the cavalier of the Muslims). This Arab, who was prefect of the palace,<sup>5</sup> had assembled a great number of adherents and having attacked and defeated Shawar, he obliged him to fly from Cairo, and slew his son Tajy. He then installed himself in the wazirat; it having become the custom of the Egypt that the victor should take the place of the vanquished. It is well-known that Nur al-Din sent the Amir Asad al-Din Shayrkuh to assist Shawar; we need not therefore enter into the longer details on the subject<sup>6</sup> and it finally occurred that Nur al-Din after having entered Egypt three times, as may be seen in his life, slew Shawar on Wednesday, the 17th or 18th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 564 (January, A.D. 1169.)**. Shawar was interred in the funeral chapel

---

* 30 December 1162.--Ed.

4 The titles al-Lakhmi al-Mundhiri given to this Arab chief, prove that he drew his descent from the ancient princes of Hirah.

5 Prefect of the palace; literally, Lietutenant of the door. This was one of the highest dignities under the Fatimids of Egypt. The officer who filled this place went to meet the foreign ambassadors and introduced them to the khalif.- (Al-Maqrizi. MS. St. Germain, No. 106, fhl. 343 v.)

6 For these events consult the Annals of Abu 'l-Fida, and M. Reinaud's Extraits etc.

** According to Edward Mahler's calculation Wednesday could not fall on 17 or 18 Rabi al-Awwal. It could be Saturday 18 January or Sunday 19 January.--Ed.

erected over his son Taj; and which is situated in the lesser Qarafah, near the tomb of al-Qadi al-Fadil. He fell by the hand of the amir 'Izz al-Din Jurdik, an enfranchised slave of Nur al-Din's. Al-Ruhi<sup>7</sup> states, in his (Tuhfat al Khulafa, that he was slain by the sultan Salah al-Din, who was then accompanying his uncle Asad al-Din, and that this event took place on Saturday, the 15th of the first Jumada, in the year above mentioned; and Ibn Shaddad says in his Sirat Salah al-Din:<sup>8</sup> "When Shavar rode forth with his suite to meet Asad al-Din, none dared to attack him except Salah al-Din, who went up to him, and riding beside him, seized him by the collar and ordered his men to fall on. The troops of Shavar took to flight and their camp was plundered; as for himself, he was taken to an isolated tent, and immediately after, there arrived a note in the handwriting of the chief eunuch, by which the Egyptians demanded the prisoner's head in conformity to their usual mode of treating fallen wazirs. His head was therefore cut off and forwarded to them of which they sent to Asad al-Din the pelisse (investiture) of the wazirate. Having put it on, he entered the city and was inaugurated as wazir. This passed on the 17th of the latter Rabi' of the same year. "The hafiz Ibn 'Asakir says in his History: "Shavar came to solicit Nur al-Din's protections, and was received by him with high honour and respect; that prince sent an army with him into Egypt, and by its aid Shavar slew his rival (Dirgham); he did not however fulfil any of his engagements, and he subsequently sent to the king of the Franks, offering a sum of money for assistance. The troops of Nur al-Din had now returned to Syria, and the king of the Franks, animated with the secret hope of getting Egypt into his power, marched as far as Bilbays, of which city he took possession in his own name. Nur al-Din having received intelligence of this event, dispatched (Asad al-Din Shirkuh with) an army into the country, and the enemy, frustrated in their projects, retired on this approach. Shavar's perversity now became evident; he wrote to the enemy for assistance, and Shirkuh, struck with the danger to which perversity exposed him, pretended to be unwell, on which Shavar went to see him, but was attacked and killed by Jurdik and Burghush, both mawlas to Nur al-Din. The death of Shavar was certainly planned by Salah al-Din; it was he who first

---

7 The full names of this writer are Abu 'Abd Allah 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Ruhi. He must have written his Tuhfat al-Khulfa (present for khalifa) subsequently to A.H. 564. Another of his works, the Bulghat al-Zutafa, is noticed in the Bib. Bodl Catal.

* 15 February.--Ed.

8 See Schulten's Saladini vita et res gestae, p. 34.

laid violent hands on him. Asad al-Din then remained in undisputed possession of the supreme authority; the doctrines of the sunnah were again openly professed in Egypt, and the khutbah was made in the name of the Abbasids after a lapse of time which precluded all hopes of its re-establishment." The doctor 'Umarah al-Yamani, whose life shall come later, composed some poems in honour of Shawar, and the following lines are taken from one of them:

Iron recoils from iron, but Shawar never recoils from defending the religion of Muhammad. Time made an oath to produce another man like Shawar; thy oath is false, O Time! expiate therefore thy perjury."

'Umarah relates that at the period of Shawar's success and of the fall of the Ruzzik family, a number of their former partisans and of those upon whom they had heaped favours, were assembled around Shawar on one of the days in which he held a public sitting to receive visitors, and that they attacked the character of their former benefactors in the hopes of gaining their new master's favour. On this occasion, 'Umarah, who was present and who had met with great kindness from Salih Ibn Ruzzik and his son al-'Adil on his arrival in Egypt, recited to Shawar the following verses:

"Thy reign has restored health to our feverish times, and the evils which excited the complaints of the epoch have disappeared. The (briliant) day of the Ruzzik family have passed away; their praises are heard no longer, but blame ceaseth not (to pursue them). (It is now) as if the good and the just<sup>9</sup> of that family had never filled younger throne. Here are those who roused against them their evil fortune whilst it still slumbered (and peace maketh leaves to grow on the salam tree).<sup>10</sup> We thought-and our thoughts

---

9 There is here a play upon the names of Salih and 'Adil, which mean good and just.

10 Such is the literal meaning of the original Arabic. There can be no mistake in the printed text, as it agrees exactly with the copy of the same poem contained in 'Umarah's at-Nukat al-'Asriyat, or historical anecdotes of the wazirs of Egypt, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 810. fol. 26, which manuscript has been corrected by the author himself. The last word of the verse he has pointed so that it must be pronounced salam; yet the autograph of Ibn Khallikan writes it salim سليم a word which does not exist in Arabic.

As the leaves of the salam tree were used in dyeing, and were therefore frequently stripped off, we may suppose the poet to mean, that as the salam tree, if left untouched, is covered with leaves and gives shade to the traveller, so the Ruzzik family, had they enjoyed peace, might have flourished and proteched all those who sought their shelter.

are sometimes mistaken --that the troop of their partisans was invincible; but when you darted upon them like a falcon (upon his quarry), that flock of vultures betrayed them (and took to flight). Yet they were no despicable foes, but they were overwhelmed by the torrent of your success. In exalting your enemies, I only mean to exalt your own glory; excuse me then, and blame me not. If I feel grateful to them for their kindness in former days, it is because I remember what I experienced, not because I had previously bound myself to praise them. Were I to open my mouth only to blame them, thy magnanimity would shrink and oblige me to close it. God, in his kindness, commands us to good and to avoid saying evil of others."

'Umarah then proceeds to state that Shawar and his sons praised him highly for his gratitude to the family of Ruzzik. As for al-Malik al-Mansur (the victorious prince) Abu T-Ashbal Dirgham (the lion, father of the whelps) Ibn Siwar al-Lakhmi, he left Cairo on the approach of Shawar with the troops from Syria, and was slain on Friday, the 28th of the latter Jumada,* or, by another account, in the month of Rajab, A.H. 559 (May A.D. 1164). He fell near the sepulchral chapel of al-Sayyidah Nafisah<sup>11</sup> situated between Old and New Cairo. His head was cut off and borne about on a lance, and his body lay there for three days till it was partly devoured by dogs; it was then interred near the Birkat al-Fil,<sup>12</sup> and cupola was erected near it. This I have read in some histories and there is still a cupola at the Birkat which I am inclined to think is that very one. The word Wahat (Oasis) serves to designate a long tract of country lying parallel to Upper Egypt, and situated in the deserts which extend to Barqah and are crossed by the road leading to Maghrib. Tarujah is a village near Alexandria; its principal produce is earaway. Shawar's descent, as it is given at the beginning of this notice, was copied by me from a (genealogical) tree which was communicated to me by one of his descendants.

---

* 22 May 1164.--Ed.

<sup>11</sup> Her life will be found in this work.

<sup>12</sup> The Birkat al-Fil, or Elephant's Pond, lay between Cairo and the citadel. (Al-Maqrizi)

The correct pronounciation of this name is Mukhayyis.--Ed.

271 AL-AFDAL SHAHANSHAH

Abu 'l-Qasim Shahanshah, surnamed al-Malik al-Afdal (the excellent prince) was the son of Badr al-Jamali Amir al-Juyush. His father Badr was of Armenian extraction, and had been purchased as a slave by Jamal al-Dawlat Ibn 'Ammar<sup>1</sup>, who brought him up and advanced him in the World. Badr's porudence, perspicacity, and energy of character ranked him among those men of eminent abilities whose number is so few, and he was therefore named lieutenant-governor of Tyre, or perhaps of Acre, by al- Mustansir, the ruler of Egypt. At the period in which the authority of that prince had been greatly enfeebled and the affairs of the empire had fallen into disorder<sup>2</sup>, a state of things which we shall describe in his life, he heard of Badr al-Jamali's merit and called him to his assistance. It was then in the depth of winter, a period in which it is not usual to make a voyage, but Badr embarked and arrived at Cairo on the eve of Wednesday, the 28th of the first Jumada* some say of the second, A.H. 466 (January, A.D. 1074), and received from al-Mustansir the direction of all the public affairs. By his presence the authority of the prince recovered the respect which it had lost, and order was re-established in the state. Having been named wazir of the sword and the pen (chief of the civil and military), qadi 'l-qudat (chief Qadi) and president of the missionaries,<sup>3</sup> he displayed such talent in his administration, that his arrival in Egypt was generally said to be the commencement of al-Mustansir's good fortune and the end of his abasement. He was surnamed Amir al-Juyush (commander in chief). At the moment he first entered into al-Mustansir's presence, a person was reading the Qur'an to that prince and had just pronounced the words: And God has now assisted you with Badr<sup>4</sup> but did not finish the verse; on which al-Mustansir declared that had he finished it, he

1 This was probably Abu Talib Ibn 'Ammar, qadi and governor of Tripolis, who died A.H. 464, and whose nephew and successor, 'Jalal al-Mulk Abu 'l-Hasan Ibn 'Ammar, took an active part against the first crusaders.

2 See the Memoire sur la vie de Mustansir in M. Quatremere's Memoires sur l'Egypte.

* 27 January.--Ed.

3 The Fatimites kept up till the last their establishment of missionaries, who secretly propagated the Shite doctrines in foreign countries and were their most active political agents.

4 Qur'an, surat 3, verse 119.

would have struck off his head.<sup>5</sup> Badr continued in power till upwards of eighty: his death took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'adah, or of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 488 (November, A.D. 1065).<sup>6</sup> It was he who built the great mosque situated in the Suq al-Attarin (Druggist street) at Alexandria; he finished its construction in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 479 (June-July, A.D. 1086). He built also the chapel of the Head at 'Asqalan.<sup>7</sup> During his last illness he was replaced as wazir by his son al-Afdal Shahanshah, whose conduct towards Nizar the son of al-Mustansir and Iftikin the Afdalite, governor of Alexandria, is so well known.<sup>8</sup> Having made them prisoners, he took them to Cairo, after which they were never more heard of. This was in the year 488 (A.D. 1095), sometime after al-Mustansir's death. He then placed on the throne Ahmad al-Musta'li, that prince's son, and continued to act as Wazir. As for Iftikin, he was executed publicly,<sup>9</sup> and so for Nizar, it is said that he was immured by his brother al-Musta'li's orders, and he thus perished. We have already spoken of him in the life of al-Musta'li (no. 73). Iftikin was one of al-Afdal's mamluks, and Nizar is the person from whom the Ismailite princes, the possessors of the fortress of al-Alamut and other castles in Persia, claim their descent.<sup>10</sup> Al-Afdal was an able ruler and possessed a superior judgment; it was he who, on the death of al-Musta'li, placed al-'Amir, that sovereign's son, on the throne: he then took the direction of public affairs into his own hands, and having confined the prince in his palace, he prevented him from indulging his passion for pleasure and amusements. This treatment induced al-'Amir to plot against his Wazir's life, and on the evening of Sunday, the 30th of Ramdan, A.H. 515 (December, A.D. 1121),* as al-Afdal rode forth from his habitation in the imperial 5 The rest of the verse is as follows: When you were despicable (to others); fear therefore God that ye may peradventure be thankful. Had the reader gone farther, the first part of the verse would have been no longer applicable to Badr, on account of the modification which the sense receives from the sequel. It would then have meant; And God had already given you the victory at Badr; besides which the expression, "when you were despicable," would not have been flattering to the ears of the prince.

6 Most historians place Badr's death in A.H. 487.

7 It was at 'Asqalan that the head of al-Husayn, the grandson of Muhammad, was interred before its removal to Egypt. - (Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, year 61).

8 See the history of this affair, No. 73, note on Nizar.

9 Our author here contradicts what he has just said, a few lines above.

10 See note on Nizar No. 73, towards the end.

* 11 December.-Ed.

palace (which edifice is on the bank of the Nile and is now called the Dar al-Wukala), he was attacked by the conspirators and slain whilst proceeding towards the river. He was the father of Abu 'Ali Ahmad Ibn Shahanshah of whose conduct towards al-Hafiz Abu 'I-Maymun 'Abd al-Hamid al-'Ubaydi,* sovereign of Egypt, we shall make mention in the life of that prince. In our notices on al-Musta'li and 'Urtuq al-Turkumani (no. 77) we have spoken of al-Afdal and mentioned that he took Jerusalem from Sulkrnan and 'Il-Ghazi, the son of 'Urtuk. Al-Afdal left after him such a quantity of wealth as was never heard of before; the author of the Du'al al-Munqati'ah<sup>11</sup> states that it consisted of six hundred millions of dinars<sup>12</sup>; two hundred and fifty bushels of dirhams, all of full weight and coined in Egypt; seventy-five thousand satin robes; thirty camel-loads of (perfume) boxes in 'Iraq gold; a gold inkhorn mounted with a precious stone valued at twelve thousand dinars; one hundred gold nails, each weighing one hundred dinars, ten of which were in each of his ten sitting rooms; and on each nail was hung a turban ready folded and embroidered in gold; each of these turbans was of a different colour, and he selected from among them whichever he was inclined to wear; he possessed besides five hundred chests of clothing for the persons in his service, all of the finest stuffs which Tennis and Damietta could produce: as for the horses, slaves, mules, saddles, perfumes, ornaments for the person, and furniture which he left after him, God alone knew their quantity. Besides all that, were cows, sheep, and buffalows in such an incredible number that no person would dare to mention it; their milk was farmed out, and in the year of his death it brought thousand dinars. Among his effects were found two large trunks containing gold needles for the use of the female slaves and the women.

272 NUR AL-DAWLAT SHAHANSHAH

The amir Nur al-Dawlat (light of the empire) Shahanshah Ibn Najm al-Din Ayyub Ibn Shadhi Ibn Marwan was the eldest brother of Shah al-Din, and the father of the two princes, 'Izz al-Din Farrukh Shah

* The Cairo edition gives 'Abd al-Majid for 'Abd al-Hamid.--Ed.

11 See note on Du'al-Munqati'ah at No. 68, page 152.

12 This is an absurd exaggeration; 600,000,000 dinars or 300,000,000 pounds sterling!

and al-Malik al-Muzaffar Taqi al-Din 'Umar, the former of whom was father to al-Malik al-Amjad, prince of Ba'albek, and the latter was sovereign of Hamat.<sup>1</sup> We intend to give the life of Taqi al-Din. Shahanshah fell in an engagement with the Franks,<sup>2</sup> who had assembled to the number, of, it is said, seven hundred thousand men, horse and foot, with the intention of invading all the Mulsim countries. They advanced to the gates of Damascus, but by the assistance of God they were defeated. Shahanshah was slain in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 543 (July-August, A.D. 1148). His son 'Izz al-Din (glory of religion) Abu Sa'id Farrukh Shah (fortunate king) bore the title of al-Malik al-Mansur (the victorious prince) and was gifted with a noble, generous, and lofty spirit. When the sultan Salih al-Din returned to Egypt, he left Farrukh Shah as his lieutenant at Damascus, and that city enjoyed great prosperity under the firm and able administration of its new governor. He died there in the year 578, towards the end of the first Jumada (September, A.D. 1182); such is the statement made by the Katib 'Imad al-Din in the work entitled al-Barq al-Shami, but Ibn Shaddad says, in his History of Salah al-Din, that the sultan received intelligence of his nephew's death in the month of Rajab, 577<sup>3</sup>; this, however, was circumstance with which 'Imad al-Din must have been better acquainted than Ibn Shaddad. Shahanshah had a daughter, named 'Adhra, who founded the college at Damascus which is called after her the 'Adhrawiyah: she died on the 10th of Muharram, A.H. 593 (December, A.D. 1196).* As for al-Malik al-Amjad (the illustrious prince) Majid al-Din (glory of religion) Abu 'I-Muzaffar Bahram Shah, the son of Farrukh Shah, he possessed considerable abilities, and was allowed by Salah al-Din to retain the government of Ba'alabek. He is the author of some pieces of poetry which have been collected into a diwan. When Ba'alabek was taken from him by al-Ashraf Ibn al-'Adil,<sup>4</sup> he proceeded to Damascus, where he was murdered, in his own residence, by one of his mamluks, on the eve of Wednesday, the 12th of Shawwal, A.H. 628 (August, A.D. 1231).<sup>**</sup>

---

1 Taqi l-Din 'Umar was ancestor to Abu 'I-Fida.

2 See M. Reinaud's Extraits d'auteurs arabes relatifs aux Croisades, o. 93.

3 See Schulten's Saladini vita et res gestae, pp. 48, 49.

* December.—Ed.

4 Al-Ashraf received the principality of Damascus, A.H. 626 (A.D. 1228) and then took possession of Ba'albek.-(Al-Yafi'i),

** 13 August.—Ed.

273 SHABIB IBN YAZID AL-KHARIJI

Abu 'l-Dahhak Shabib al-Shaybani was the son of Yazid Ibn Nu'aym Ibn Qays Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Salt Ibn Qays Ibn Sharahil Ibn Murrah Ibn Hammam Ibn Dhul Ibn Shayban Ibn Tha'labah; the remainder of the genealogy is well known.<sup>1</sup> Shabib Ibn Yazid al-Khariji (the heretic rebel) revolted at Mosul in the reign of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan whilst al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf al-Thhqafi was governor of Iraq. He slew successively five generals whom al-Hajjaj had sent against him, and he then left Mosul with the intention of reaching Kufa and meeting al-Hajjaj on his way from Basrah to that city, but the latter arrived there with his cavalry after a forced march and anticipated his antagonist. This was in the year 77 (A.D. 696-7). He then fortified himself in the citadel<sup>2</sup> and, the next morning, Shabib entered the city with his mother Jahizah and his wife Ghazalah. They immediately proceeded to the mosque accompanied by seventy men, and Ghazalah recited in it the morning prayer, and thus fulfilled a vow which she made of saying a prayer of two rak'ahs and of reading the surats of the Cow and the Family of 'Imran<sup>3</sup> in that mosque, if ever she entered the city. Her courage and bravery were extreme; she fought in all her brother's battles, and on one of these occasions al-Hajjaj himself fled before her, a mark of cowardice for which a poet reproached him in these lines:

"You are a lion against me, but in battle an ostrich which spreads its wings and hurries and hurries off on hearing the chirping of the sparrow. Why did you not go forth in the conflict and fight with Ghazalah hand to hand? But no! your heart fled from you (as if) with the wings of a bird."

Jahizah, Shabib's mother, was also very brave and fought in all his battles. He himself had assumed the title of khalif and was long successful in resisting al-Hajjaj, who was at length assisted by a powerful army, sent to him by 'Abd al-Malik from Syria, under the orders of Sufyan Ibn al-Abrad al-Kalbi. When these troops arrived at Kufah, al-Hajjaj went forth with them against Shabib, who, overpowered by numbers, took to flight after a combat in which he lost his sister, his mother, and the bravest of his partisans. Pursued by Sufyan at the head of the Syrian troops, he was overtaken at

---

1 See Eichhorn's Monumenta antiq. arabum, tab. IX.

2 Literally the castle of the government.

3 These are the second and third suras of the Qur'an.

al-Ahwaz, and unable to resist, he fled before them to the river Dujayl. On crossing the bridge, his horse became unruly and threw him into the river; borne down by the weight of his coat of mail, helmet, and the rest of his armour, he yielded to his fate, and answered to one of his companions who exclaimed: "How! Commander of the faithful! is drowning to be your lot?" "Yes; such is the decision of the Mighty and the All-knowing." His body having been afterwards cast on shore by the river, it was conveyed by the post-horses to al-Hajjaj, who ordered it to be opened and the heart extracted. His commands were obeyed and the heart was found to be as (hard as) a stone, rebounding when struck against the ground. Within it was discovered another heart, about the size of a small ball, and this contained the drop of congealed blood (out of which each man is formed).<sup>4</sup> An eye-witness relates as follows: "I saw Shabib enter the mosque; he had on a cloak with a hood, spotted over from drops of rain; he was tall and an olive complexion; his hair was curly and of a black colour mixed with gray, and the mosque shook under his weight." He was born on the festival of the Sacrifice (10th of Dhu 'I-Hijjah), A.H. 26 (September, A.D. 647),* and was drowned in the Dujayl, as we have said, A.H. 77 (A.D. 696-7). Sometime after his death, a Kharijite named 'Itban Ibn Wasilah al-Harari was brought before 'Abd al-Malik; this 'Itban belonged to the tribe of Shayban and was one of the heretics<sup>5</sup> who revolted in Mesopotamia; his mother, whose name was Asilah or Wasilah, was of the tribe of Mahlum. He had composed a long qasidah, which is inserted by al-Marzubani in his Ma'jam,<sup>***</sup> (and which gave great offence to the khalif). 'Abd al-Malik then addressed him in these terms; "Enemy of God! was it not you who said:

"If your family produced Marwan and his son ('Abd al-Malik), and 'Amr and Hashim and Habib, ours has given birth to Husayn and al-Batin, and from us sprang Shabib, commander of the faithful?"

To this 'Itban made answer: "Commander of the faithful! I did not say so; my words were: 'and from us, sprang Shabib, Commander of the faithful!'" The khalif was delighted with the answer and 4 See Qur'an, Surat 22, verse 5, and s. 96, v. 2.

* 16 September.--Ed.

5 In the Arabic text, for سراءة read شراءة

** Correct pronunciation is Muhallam.--Ed.

*** Correct pronunciation is Mu'jam'--Ed.

ordered him to be set at liberty. His reply was certainly admirable, for if the word amir (commander) be pronounced amiru in the nominative case, it is Shabib who is declared to be the commander of the faithful; but if it be pronounced amira in the accusative, the interjection O must be understood, and the verse will then mean, O Commander of the faithful! Shabib sprang from our family, and nothing more. The passage which follows is extracted from a collection of biographical notices on persons generally known by their surnames; this collection is contained in Ibn 'Asakir's History of Damascus, towards the end of the work: "Abu 'l-Minhal al-Khariji, a poet: he went to ask 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan's pardon for having addressed to him these verses:

"Bear a message to the Commander of the faithful and a prudent counsellor, if sought for, is always to be found. Tell him that no peace can exist as long as an orator of the tribe of Thaqif mounts the pulpits of our land. Give (that) satisfaction to the tribe of Bakr Ibn Wa'il,<sup>6</sup> or a fatal day shall await you in 'Iraq'".

(Then follow the two verses given above.) "Abu Minhal was the surname of 'Itban Ibn Wasilah, and by the orator of the tribe of Thaqif he meant al-Hajjaj. Jahizah was the person whose silliness gave rise to the proverbial expression, more foolish than Jahizah. So says Ibn al-Sikkit in the chapter of Kitab Islah al-Mantiq which treats of words to which the vulgar given a wrong application. The father of Shabib was one of the Muslims who fled to Kufah during the persecution against Muhammad and his party. In the year 25 (A.D. 645-6) he accompanied Sulayman Ibn Rabia'ah al-Bahili on a military expedition into Syria, during which they ravaged part of that country and carried off spoil and prisoners. The father of Shabib bought one of the captives, a young girl of a rosy complexion, tall and handsome, and ordered her to become a Muslim. On her refusal, he beat her, but she nevertheless would not consent. He then made her his concubine, and in her pregnancy, when the child quickened, she said that she felt something in her. This gave rise to the proverb of which we have spoken. She afterwards became a convert to Islamism and brought forth Shabib, in the year 26 A.H. on the festival of the Sacrifice 10 dhu al-hijjah. She told her master that before giving birth to the child, she dreamt that she had been delivered of a boy, and that a flame of fire then issued from her and mounted up between the earth and the sky, after which it fell into the water and was extinguished. 'And,' said she, as the day of his birth is a day of bloodshed, I hope my son will reach to eminence and spill much blood;" The Dujayl (little Tigris) is a large river in the province of al-Ahwaz, having a number of towns and villages on its banks; it takes its rise near Isbahan, and its bed was dug by Ardashir Ibn Babek, the first of the Sasanite dynasty at al-Madain (Ctesiphon). It must not be confounded with the Dujayl of Baghdad which branches off the Tigris opposite to al-Qadisiyah, on the west side of the river, between Tikrit and Baghdad, and waters an extensive territory. Haruri means belonging to Harurah, a village in the territory of Kufah, where the Kharijites first assembled; it was for this reason, that they were called the Harurites.

---

6 Bakr Ibn Wa'il was one of Shabib's ancestors: See Richhonor, Tab, IX.

274 THE QADI SHURAYH

Abu Umayyah Shurayh Ibn Qays Ibn al-Jahm Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn 'Amir Ibn al-Harith Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Thawr Ibn Muratt<sup>1</sup> belonged to the tribe of Kindah (al-Kindi).

Thawr Ibn Muratt<sup>1</sup> was the person who bore the appellation of Kindah. Great differences subsist between the genealogies given as those of Shurayh, but the preceding is the most correct of any. This eminent Tabi'i came into the world before the promulgation of Islamism, and was appointed qadi of Kufah by 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab. He filled that post seventy-five years, with only one interruption, at the period of Ibn al-Zubayr's revolt, when he obtained the authorisation of al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf to discontinue his services, and did not judge in any cause till three years after, on the death of Ibn al-Zubayr. Gifted with deep intelligence, penetration, knowledge, judgement, and great skill in distinguishing right from wrong, he was the ablest qadi of the age; it is even stated by Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, that he possessed considerable talent as a poet. He was one of the four persons who were called the smooth-faced chiefs (al-Sadat al-Tuls); the other were "Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr, Qays Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ubadah<sup>2</sup>

---

1 In my Diwan d'Amra 'l-Kais, page 1, this name is incorrectly transcribed Murti.'

2 Abu 'Abd Allah Qays Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ubadan Ibn Daylam was placed by his father in the service of the Prophet, and merited, by his generous character and bravery, the honour of being admitted into his master's and al-Ahnaf Ibn Qays, he whose prudence became proverbial<sup>3</sup>. Shurayh was much inclined to pleasantry; 'Abi Ibn Artah went to his house one day, and the following dialogue ensued: "Where are you qadi? may God direct you!" "I am between you and the wall." "Listen to me." "I can hear very well."- "I am a native of Syria." It is a distant land." "And I have married a wife from your country." "May you live happily and have many children." "And I wanted to take her on a journey." "Each man has the best right over his own family." "But I engaged not to remove her from native place." "Engagements are binding." "Judge then between us." "I have already done so." "And against whom have you given it?" "Against your mother's son." "On whose evidence?" "On the evidence of your maternal aunt's sister's son."

(Contd.. on next page)

It is related that (the Khalif) 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib went before the qadi Shurayh with a tributary subject<sup>5</sup> who was his adverse party in a suity; when he entered, Shurayh stood up (to salute him), on which he said: "This is the first time you ever did wrong." He then leant back against the wall, observing that if his adversary had been a Muslim, he would have sat down by his side. It is also stated that 'Ali once convened a meeting of the Qur'an-readers in the court of the mosque; when they were assembled, he told them that he should soon quit them, and began to question them on different points. During all the time, Shurayh kept silent, till 'Ali at length asked his opinion. When the consultation was over, 'Ali addressed him in these terms: "You may go; you are the most excellent of men;" or by another relation, "You are the most excellent of Arabs." Shurayh took a wife in the tribe of Tamin, whose name was Zaynab. Being once displeased with her, he beat her, but afterwards repented of his conduct and pronounced these verses: familiarity and of bearing his standard in some of his campaigns. He was appointed governor of Egypt by the Khalif 'Ali, A.H. 37 (A.D. 657), but a few months afterwards he lost his place though the machinations of Mu'awiyah (see Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, year 36). He fought under 'Ali against the Kharijites at al-Nahrawan, and against the Syrians commanded by Mu'awiyah, at Siffin. In the year 41 he led the van of al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali's army at al-Mada'in, and when that prince acknowledged the authority of Mu'awiyah, he followed his example and then returned to Madinah, where he finished his days, A.H. 39 (A.D. 678-9).-(Abu 'l-Mahasin's Nujum and al-Bahr al-Zakhkhar.)

---

3 The life of al-Dahhak Ibn Qays, surnamed al-Ahnaf, will be found in this volume.

4 This is a common proverb. See Freytag's Meidani, tom I. p. 669.

5 In Arabic dhimmi; see No. 117, note 2.

"I have seen men beat their wives; may my right hand be dried up on the day in which I again strike Zaynab. Shall I strike her when she has committed no fault?. It would not be just in me to strike the guiltless. Zaynab is the sun, and the rest of women are stars; when she appears not one them is seen.'.

Such is the manner in which this anecdote is related by (Ibn 'Abd Rabbih) the author of the 'Iqd. It is related that Ziyad Ibn Abih<sup>6</sup> wrote these words to (the Khalif) Mu'awiyah Commander of the faithful! My left hand holds 'Iraq in submission unto you, and my right is unoccupied and waits to be employed in your service; appoint me therefore governor of Hijaz. "This request having reached the ears of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Umar,<sup>7</sup> who was residing at Makkah, he exclaimed: "O God! withhold from us the right hand of Ziyad." A pestilential swelling immediately broke out on it, and the assembled physicians having advised amputation, Ziyad called in Shurayh and consulted him on the lawfulness of such an operation; Shurayh returned this answer; "God's bounty towards you has a certain measure, and your life a fixed limit: if you are to live longer in this world, I should not wish to see you without a right hand<sup>8</sup>; and if the time of your death be now come, you will have to say, when asked by thy Lord how you lost your hand; 'It was through dislike of meeting thee, and to avoid what thou hadst predestined,'" Ziyad died that day, and his enemies having then reproached Shurayh with preventing his hand from being cut off, they received from him this answer "He asked counsel from me, and he whose counsel is asked should act with sincerity; were it not so, I should have wished his hand to be cut off one day, and his foot another, and then every limb of his body, day by day." The qadi Shurayh died A.H. 87 (A.D. 706); at the age of one hundred years; but other accounts place his death in the years 82, 78, 80, 79, and 76 at the age of one hundred and twenty years, or of one hundred and eight. Kindi is the relative adjective derive from Kindah, which was the surname of Thawr Ibn Muratt' Ibn Malik Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlan. Some say that Thawr was the son of 'Ufayr Ibn al-Harith Ibn Murrah Ibn Udad: he received the name of Kindah" because he had been ungrateful (Kanada) for his father's kindness.<sup>9</sup>

---

6 See No. 141, note 9.

7 See note (1), No. 249.

8 Amputation of the hand was the punishment inflicted on thieves.

9 The Qamus says, that Kindah was so called because he had been ungrateful for his fathers's kindness and went to live with his maternal uncles.

275 THE QADI SHARIK

Abu 'Abd Allah Sharik al-Nakha'i descended from al-Nakh' by the following line; he was the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Sharik al-Harith Ibn Aus Ibn al-Harith Ibn al-Adhal Ibn Wahbil Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Malik Ibn al-Nakh'; in the life of Ibrahim al-Nakhai (no: 1) will be found the rest of the genealogy. Sharik filled the place of qadi at Kufah under the reign of al-Mahdi, but was deprived of his situation by the Khalif Musa al-Hadi. He was a man of learning and an able jurisconsult, shrewd, acute, and intelligent. During a discussion which he had with Mas'ab Ibn "Abd Allah al-Zubayri<sup>1</sup> in al-Mahdi's presence, Mus'ab reproached him with depreciating the Khalifs Abu Bakr and 'Umar, and received this answer: "I do not depreciate your ancestor, and yet he was their inferior." In the course of conversation which passed at his house concerning (the khalif) Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan, some person said that he was a man of prudence: on which Sharik observed that he who treated the just rights of others with contempt, and waged war with 'Ali the son of Abu Talib, could not be held as such. Another time, a number of students went to hear Traditions from him, and finding that he smelt of wine (nabidh), they observed that if such an odour came from them, they should be ashamed of themselves, to which he replied: " (Y6lu say that) because you feel that you might be justly suspected." Having one day gone to see al-Mahdi, that Khalif said to him: "I have three proposals to make to you, and I shall insist on you according to one of them; you must become a qadi,<sup>2</sup> or teach Traditions to my sons and instruct them, or eat amorsel with me. "Sharik, who had not as yet acted as qadi, reflected for sometime, and then answered that of the three things, eating a morsel would be the easiest on his conscience. Al-Mahdi then told him to sit down, and called in his cook, he ordered him to prepare a number of dishes and, the rest, marrow coagulated with sugar-candy and honey. When this collation was set before Sharik, he partook of it, and when he had finished, the cook said to al-Mahdi. "By Allah! Commander of the faithful! now that the Shaykh has eaten of that, he is undone." "And such was in fact the case," said (the wazir) al-Fadl Ibn al-'Rabi' "for after that, the Shaykh instructed the Khalif's sons, and taught them the Tradition, and

1 See note on Mus'ab No. 84.

2 The aversion of pious Muslims to fill the place of qadi has been already notified, No. 104. Sharik had another motive for refusing such a post: it would have been necessary for them to take the oath of allegiance to the Umayyides, and to this, as a partisan of 'Alis' family he could not conscientiously assent:

served under the 'Abbasids in the capacity of qadi. "Sometime after having received a draft of the (court) banker for his service, he insisted on being paid in coin of full weight, and when the other told him that, after all, (the difference) would not suffice to by him a suit of clothes, he answered: "And yet I gave for it something better than a suit of clothes: I gave up for it my religious convictions." Al-Hariri relates in his Durrat al-Ghawwas, that Sharik was one day speaking of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib's merits in the presence of a member of the Umayyad family who used to frequent his society, and the latter said: "He was indeed an excellent (ni'am) man." "How," exclaimed Sharik, "is it in speaking of 'Ali that it should merely be said, He was an excellent man?" The Umayyad remained silent till Sharik's anger cooled and then said. "O Abu 'Abd Allah! did not God say, when speaking of himself, And we were able to do this; for it is we who are most (ni'am) powerful?<sup>3</sup> And did he not say of Job, We found him a patient person: how excellent (ni'am) a servant was he! for he was one who frequently turned himself unto us?<sup>4</sup> "And of Solomon, And he gave unto David, Solomon; how excellent (ni'am) a servant!<sup>5</sup> Who then not be satisfied at 'Ali's being spoken of in the same terms which God was pleased to apply to himself and to his prophets?" Sharik then perceived his mistake and conceived for the Umayyad a higher esteem than ever. As qadi, he judged with strict equity and was almost always in the right. He had an answer ready on every occasion; being asked his opinion concerning a man who intended, at morning prayer, to say the qunut<sup>6</sup> before making ruku's,<sup>7</sup> but who did not say it till after, he replied: "That man intended to do wrong, but did right." He was born at Bukhara, A.H. 95 (A.D. 713-4); he filled the post of qadi at Kufah and afterwards at al-Ahwaz, and died at the former place on Saturday, the first of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 177 (February, A.D. 974). Khalifah Ibn Khayyat mentions that his death occurred in the year 177 or 178. Harun al-Rashid was then at Hirah, and went to say the funeral service over him, but finding on his arrival that it had been already performed, he returned back. "Nakha'i is derived from al-Nakh', which is the name of great branch of the tribe of Madhhij;"

---

3 Qur'an, sur. 77, v. 23.

4 Ibid, sur. 38, v. 44.

5 Ibid, sur. 38, 29.

6 See page 143, note on qunut.

7 The form of prayer consists of a number of ruku's or inclinations of the body, accompanied with certain pious invocations. See Lan'e Modern Egyptians, vol. I. p. 86, and D. Ohlsson's Tab. gen del'Emp. Othom tom. II. p. 82.

so I find it stated by Ibn al-Kalbi in his Jamharat al-Nisab, and I have read in another copy (of the same work) that Ibn Abi Sharik, Sharik's ancestor, was named Aws, and that he was son to al-Harith Ibn Wahbi (a genealogy different from that given above). God best knows the truth.

*276 SHAQIQ AL-BALKHI

Abu 'Ali Ibn Ibrahim al-Balkhi, one of the Shaykhs of Khurasan, was very eloquent about tawakkul (trust in God) and used to praise it vehemently. He lived in the company of Ibrahim Ibn Adham and acquired (the principles of) the Tariqah from him, and he was (spiritual) guide of Hatim al-Asamm (the Deaf). He visited the land of the Turks for trading, in his youth. He entered their temple and said to a savant; "Verily, whatever you are doing is false. For this creation there is a Creator and there is none like Him; He makes provisions for all." The other replied; "Your actions do not correspond with your statements". Shaqiq said: "How?" He said you believe that there is a Creator, omnipotent, and you have travelled to this place in search of your provision. "Shaqiq stated; "This remark of the Turk was the cause of my abstainence." Then he retired and gave in alms whatever he possessed and engaged himself in the pursuit of knowledge.

He died in the year A.H. 153 (A.D. 774) Ibn al-Jawzi has noticed him al-Shudhur al-Uqud.

277 SHUHDAH AL-KATIBAH BINT AL-IBARI

Shuhdah Bint (daughter of) Abi Nasr Ahmad Ibn al-Faraj Ibn 'Umar al-Ibari, surnamed Fakhr al-Nisa (glory of women) and al-Katibah (the femal scribe,) sprang from a family established at Dinawar; but she herself wa born and died at Baghdad. By her learning she acquired an extensive reputation and ranked among the first scholars of the age; she wrote a beautiful hand and instructed great numbers

---

* This notice is neither to be found in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition. It is included in subsequent editions.--Ed.

in the traditions, which she had received from the highest authorities: thus connecting the traditionsists of the rising generation with those of the past. She died on the afternoon of Sunday, the 13th of Muharram, A.H. 574 (July, A.D. 1178), aged upwards of ninety years, and was interred in the cemetery outside the Abzar<sup>1</sup> Gate. Ibari is derived from ibar, the plural of ibra (needle,) which is the name of the instrument used in sewing. The person who bore this surname must have made or sold needles. Dinawar is a town in Jibal (Persian Iraq) Dinawari, the surname derived from it has been borne by many learned men. Abu al-Sa'd al-Sam'ani says that this name is pronounced Daynawar, but Dinawar is preferable<sup>2</sup>. Her father, Abu Nasr Ahmad died at Baghdad on Saturday, the 23rd of first Jumada, A.H. 506 (November, A.D. 1112*) and was interred at the Abzar Gate. Ibn al-Najjar says in his History of Baghdad, speaking of Abu'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn Yahya al-Durayni, who is better known by the name of Thiqat al-Dawlat<sup>3</sup> al-Anbari (al-Durayni) was a man of eminent rank and a favourite of the khalif al-Muktafi (li amrillah;) he possessed some instruction and had a talent for poetry. He built a college for Shafi'is on the bank of the Tigris, at the gate of al-Azj, and erected close by it a convent for (ribai) Sufis; on these two establishments he settled a handsome property. He studied the Traditions, for al-Sam'ani says that he served (as a domestic and pupil) of Abu Nasr Ahmad Ibn al-Faraj al-Ibari and received from him his daughter Shuhdah al-Katibah in marriage. He then rose in the world till he became the favourite of al-Muktafi. His birth took place A.H. 475 (A.D. 1082-3) and his death A.H. 549 on Tuesday the 16th of Sha'ban October, (A.D.** 1154). He was interred in the court of his house situated in the square before the principal mosque, but on the death of his wife Shuhdah, in the month of Muharram, A.H. 574 his body was removed to the Abraz cemetery, and interred, (near her) close to the Tajiyah college."

278 SHIRKUH IBN SHADHI

Abu 'l-Harith Shirkuh Ibn Shadhi Ibn Marwan, surnamed al-Malik

* 16 November-Ed.

1 In the autograph this name is written as Abraz.

2 Abu 'l-Feda pronounces this name Daynawar.

3 Thiqat al-Dawlat is a title of honour, which might be translated: devoted to the dynasty.

** 26 October-Ed.

al-Mansur (the victorious Prince) Asad al-Din, the lion of the faith was uncle to the sultan Salah al-Din. Some particulars of his life have been already given in the life of Shawar, who (as we have there said) went to Syria, A.H. 559 (A.D. 1163-4) to obtain Nur al-Din's assistance against the Franks<sup>1</sup>. It is stated however by Baha al-Din Ibn Shaddad in his History of Salah, al-Din<sup>2</sup> that he proceeded to Syria, A.H. 558 and that they Shirkuh and Shawar entered Egypt on the 2nd of latter Jumada* of the same year. Nur al-Din sent with him a detachment of troops under the command of Asad al-Din Shirkuh, but on their arrival, Shawar acted with such duplicity and bad faith, that on the 7th of Dhul 'Hijjah in the same year, they set out again for Damascus. In the month of the first Rabi' (January, A.D.) Shirkuh proceeded a second time to Egypt with the design, which he had already formed during his first expedition of getting that country into his own possession. He followed the road which leads through Wadi 'l-Ghizlan<sup>3</sup> and appeared before Itfih.<sup>4</sup> In this expedition he fought the celebrated battle of al-Babayn near 'Ishmunayn<sup>5</sup> Salah al-Din who accompanied him then entered Alexandria, where he fortified himself, and had to sustain a siege against Shawar and the Egyptian army. Asad al-Din Shyikuh, who had marched into Upper Egypt, then returned and halted at Bilbays, where he made a peace with the Egyptians. Being there joined by Salah al-Din, whom they escorted to him across the country, he withdrew into Syria. In the year 564 the Franks took Bilbays and massacred the inhabitants, on which the people of Egypt sent to Shirkuh for assistance, promising to accept whatever conditions he might propose. Encouraged by their favourable disposition, he entered Egypt in the month of the first Rabi' of the above year December, A.D. 1168 and delivered them from the Franks. Shawar then formed the design of Shirkuh and his principal officers, but they anticipated his project by putting him to death, as we have already related no. 271; Shirkuh was then raised to the wazirat on Wednesday, the 17th of the latter Rabi' A.H. 564; he filled that post two months and five days when he died suddenly

1 Consult Abu 'l-Fida's Annal, and Reinaud's Extraits d'auteurs arabes relatifs aux Croisades

2 Salarini vita et res gestae, p. 30.

* 8 May 1162 A.D.—Ed.

3 I have not been able to determine the precise position of Wadi 'l-Ghizlan, or Gazelle Valley. It lies probably between Atfih and Suez.

4 Atfih is situated on the Nile, above Cairo.

5 In this battle he defeated the combined army of the Franks and Egyptians.

at Cairo, on Saturday the 28th or, according to al-Rawhi, on Sunday the 23rd<sup>6</sup> of the latter Jumada 564 (March, A.D. 1169). He was buried in that city, but afterwards, his body was conveyed to, Madinah, in pursuance to his last wishes. Salah al-din was his successor. Ibn Shaddad says in his History: "Asad al-Din was a great eater, and extremely fond of the coarsest kinds of animal food; this subjected him to indigestions and cholics, from which he did not recover without suffering severely; and he died from a sharp attack of this kind which was followed by a violent quinsy. He left an only son, named Nasir al-Din Muhammad, and surnamed al-Malik al-Qahir (the powerful prince). In the month of Rajab which followed Shirkuh's death, his family were deprived of Emessa, which was taken from them by Nur al-Din; but Salah al-Din, on obtaining possession of Syria, restored it to Nasir al-Din, who continued to hold it till his death, which took place on the 9th of Dhu'l Hijjah, A.H. 581 March, A.D. 1186. His body was taken to Damascus by his wife and cousin, Sitt al-Sham, the daughter of Ayyub, who interred it near the tomb of her brother Shams al-Dawlat Turan Shah whose life has been given, no. 126, in the funeral chapel erected by her in the college which she had founded outside the city. The government of Emessa passed to his son (who was named after his grandfather) Asad al-Din, Shirkuh. This prince was born A.H. 637 (A.D. 1173-4) and died at Emessa on Tuesday, the 19th of Rajab, A.H. 637 (February, A.D. 1240); he was interred in a funeral chapel within the city walls.* (Besides Emessa, he possessed Rahabal, Tadmur (Palmyra) and Maksin in the province of al-Khabur<sup>7</sup>. He left a number of children and was succeeded by his son al-Malik al-Mansur (the victorious prince) Nasir al-Din, the champion of the faith) Ibrahim, who remained in possession of the government till his death, which took place at Nayrab<sup>8</sup> in the Ghutae<sup>9</sup> of Damascus, on Friday, the 10th of Safar, A.H. 644 (June, A.D. 1246). His body was borne to Emessa and interred in the mosque of al-Khidr<sup>10</sup> which is situated to the south of the city. His 6 Saladini vita, p. 34.

* From 'Besides' to end not in the autograph.—Ed.

7 Al-Khabur is a river in Mesopotamia.

8 Nayrab is situated at half a parasang from Damascus, in the midst of gardens.—(Marasid).

9 The Ghutah is the name given to the cultivated country around Damascus.

10 Khidr is considered by the Muslims as one of the ancient patriarchs and prophets. He is the tutelary saint of travellers on land, as Elias is of voyagers. These two meet once a year at Makkah during the pilgrimage. See Reinaud's Monuments Arabes, Persons et Turcs, tom. I p. 169.

son, al-Malik al-Ashraf (the most noble prince) Muzaffar al-Dawlat (the victory of the empire) Abu 'I-Fath Musa succeeded to the throne. When I was in Damascus, towards the end of the year 661 C:tober-A.D. 1263 this prince informed me that he was born in the year of the defeat sustained by the Khwarazmites in the land of Rum<sup>11</sup> and that his father was returning from it with the troops when he received intelligence of the birth of a son; that battle was fought in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 627 (July-August, A.D. 1230) as we have stated in the life of al-Malik al-Ashraf, Musa Ibn al-'Adil, where we have given some account of it. He related to me also that when his father received this pleasing news, he said to al-Malik al-Ashraf Ibn al-'Adil: "My lord, Ya Akhwand, the number of your slaves is increased by one." On this the prince ordered the child to be called after himself, Al-Malik al-Ashraf Musa, the son of al-Mansur, died at Emessa on Friday, the 10th of Safar, A.H. 662 (December, A.D. 1263)* and was interred near the tomb of his grandfather Asad al-Din Shirkuh, inside the city: his birth may be placed by approximation in the month of Shawwal, 627 (August-September, A.D. 1230) Shirkuh is a Persian word, and signifies the lion of the mountain; shir means lion, and kuh, mountain. In the year 555 (A.D. 1162) Shirkuh set out from Damascus for the pilgrimage to Makkah, and took the road leading through Tayma and Hunayn; that same year Zayn al-Din 'Ali Ibn Baktikin set out with the same intention, and proceeded thither by the road of the 'Iraq pilgrim-caravan; the two princes met at al-Hulayfah.<sup>12</sup>

---

11 In A.H. 627 Jalal al-Din, prince of Khwarazm, took the city of Khalat خلاط in which he committed every excess; but al Malik al-Ashraf, the former sovereign of the place, joined his troops to those of 'Ala al-Din Kayqubad Ibn Kaykhusru, prince of Rum, and assisted by the Syrians under the command of Siwash, he marched against the Khawarazmites, defeated them completely and retook the city.-(Abu 'I-Fida'a Annals Price's Retrospect, t II. p. 415. Abu 'I-Faraj, translation, p. 306. Al-Yafi'i's Annals.)

* 14 December.-Ed.

12 Hulayfah, or Dhu Hulayfah is a village six or seven miles from Madinah. It may be seen that I read واجتمع بالحليف and not واجمعا بالخليف as in the printed text and the manuscripts. This passage and the history of Shirkuh's descendants is not to be found in the autograph MS.

ص

279 ABU 'UMAR AL-JARMI

Abu 'Umar Salih Ibn Ishaq al-Jarmi was a jurisconsult, a learned grammarian, and a philologist. Having left Basrah, his native place, he proceeded to Baghdad, where he studied under al-Akhfash and others; he met there also Yunus Ibn Habib, but did not see Sibawayh. In philology he had four masters Abu 'Ubaydah, Abu Zayd al-Ansari, al-Asma'i, and their contemporaries. He was religious, devout, exemplary in his life, and orthodox in his belief. He taught the traditions, and composed a good grammatical treatise, which was entitled al-Farkh (the chicken,) because it was hatched from Sibawayh's great work, the Kitab. When at Baghdad he had discussions with al-Farra. Abu 'I 'Abbas al-Mubarrad relates as follows; Abu 'Umar al-Jarmi told me that he had read through the Diwan of the Hudhaylites under al-Asma'i, who surpassed Abu 'Ubaydah by his superior acquaintance with that work; and he mentioned to me that on finishing, al-Asma'i said to him: 'O Abu 'Umar; if a member of the tribe of Hudhayl happen to be neither a poet, nor an archer, nor a runner, there is no good in him. Speaking also of this passage of the Qur'an: And follow not that whereof thou hast no knowledge,<sup>1</sup> he said to me: "Say not, I have heard When you did not hear, or I have seen when you did not see, nor I have known, when you did not know; for the hearing, the sight, and the heart shall all be subjects on which thou wilt have to answer before God" Al-Mubarrad said also: "None knew better than al-Jarmi the Kitab of Sibawayh; and it was under him that the great majority studied. He was deeply learned in philology, and knew by heart many illustrative passages and the subject; he wrote also some works of an original cast, and he held a high rank as a traditionist and historian. He is the author of a fine work on the life of Muhammad Kitab fi 'l-Siyar, a treatise on the forms of verbs and nouns,<sup>2</sup> another on prosody, an abridgment of grammar, and an explanation of the difficulties in the verses quoted by Sibawayh (in his grammatical work, the Kitab). The hafiz Abu Nu'aym mentions him in the history of Isbahan. Al-Jarmi died A.H. 225 A.D. 832-40. The relative adjective Jarmi is derived from Jarm; there were

---

1 Qur'an, sur. 17, v. 38.

2 See Hajji Khalifah, No. 31.

a number of tribes so called, but I know not which of them it was that gave its name to this Abu 'Umar. He did not belong to the tribe, but had dwelt with them for a time, whence his appellation of al-Jarmi. I have since found in the Fihrist<sup>3</sup> a work composed by Abu 'l-Faraj Muhammad Ibn Ishaq, who is generally known by the name of Ibn Abi Ya'qub al-Warraq (the copyist) al-Nadim al-Baghdadi: that Abu Umar was a mawla to the tribe of Jarm Ibn Rabban and al-Sam'ani says in his genealogical work that Rabban was the son of 'Imran, the son of Alhaf, the son of Quda'ah, the progenitor of a well known tribe. It has been stated, however, that Abu 'Umar was mawla to the tribe of Bajilah, a branch of which bears the name of Jarm Ibn 'Alqamah Ibn Anmar. God alone knoweth the truth. What a well-turned satire Ziyad al-A'jam<sup>4</sup> has directed against the tribe of Jarm, where he says:

"Jarm forced me to give him some juice of the vine; and who is Jarm? and what is that juice? He never drank it when it was permitted: never, as long as there was a market<sup>5</sup> did it mount to his head. But when its use was forbidden by a divine revelation, the man of that tribe is never sober."

In these verses, he names the wine, metaphorically, the juice of the vine, for a reason too long to be explained, but the sum of what the commentators say is that he called it so from its gliding smoothly (insiyaaq) down the throat.

280 SALIH IBN MIRDAS

Abu Ali Salih Ibn Mirdas surnamed Asad al-Dawlat, lion of the empire, belonged to the tribe of Kilab, his father Mirdas being the son of Idris Ibn Nasir Ibn Humayd Ibn Mudrik Ibn Shaddad Ibn

3 I have given a short account of this ancient and curious work in the Journal Asiatique for December, 1839, page 521.

4 The poet Abu Amamah Ziyad Ibn Sulaym, a mawla to the tribe of 'Abd Qays, and surnamed al-A'jam (the foreigner) on account of certain faults in his pronunciation of Arabic, accompanied Abu Musa al-Ash'ari to the siege of Istakhar, which city was taken, according to al-Dhahabi, MS. No. 626, fol. 158, in the year 28 (A.D. 648-9). He was present at Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik's death, which took place at Rusafah A.H. 125. The year of his own death is not given.-(Al-Suyuti's Sharh Shawahid al-Mughni, MS. No. 1238, fol. 51.)

5 The poet means that they preferred selling their wine to drinking it, or else that they were too avaricious to lay out their money on it.

'Ubayd Ibn Qays Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Bakr Ibn Kilab. Kilab was the son of Rabi'ah Ibn 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'h Ibn Muawiyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawazin Ibn Mansur Ibn Ikrimah Ibn Khasfah<sup>1</sup> Ibn Qaylan<sup>2</sup>* Ibn Mudar Ibn Nizar, Ibn Ma'd Ibn 'Adnan, Salih Ibn Mirdas (the chief of) a nomadic tribe of Arabs, marched against Aleppo, which was then governed by Murtada 'l-Dawlat Ibn Lulu al-Jarrahi, who had been a slave to Abu 'l-Fadail Ibn Sa'd al-Dawlat Nasr Ibn Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Hamadan and who now acted there as the lieutenant of the Fatimid sovereign of Egypt, al-Zahir Ibn al-Hakim al-'Ubaydi. Intrepid, resolute and powerfully supported by the members of his family and tribe, Salih wrested Aleppo from the hands of Murtada 'l-Dawlat on the 13th of dhu 'l-Hijjah A.H. 417 (January, A.D. 1027) and fixed his residence in the city, where he established a regular administration. Al-Zahir then sent against him a numerous army under the command of Amir al-Juyush, general in chief, Anushtikin, surnamed al-Dizbiri after Dizbir Ibn Ruwaytam<sup>3</sup> al-Daylami, who was at that time his lieutenant at Damascus, and had acquired a high distinction by his activity, courage, and skill in military affairs. Salih, being informed of this general's approach, went forth to meet him and gave him battle at al-Uqhuwanah. He lost his life in this engagement, which took place in the month of the first Jumada, A.H. 420 (May-June, A.D. 1029,) or 419 by another account. He was the first of the Mirdas dynasty, a series of princes who reigned at Aleppo.<sup>4</sup> We shall make mention of his great-grand-son Nasr in the life of the poet Abu 'l-Fityan Muhammad Ibn Hayyus. Al-'uqhuwanah, a village of Syria, is situated in the government of Palestine, near Tiberias. There is another village of the same name in Hijaz, which was the residence of al-Harith Ibn Khalid Ibn al-'Asi Ibn Hisham Ibn al-Mughayrah al-Makhzum<sup>5</sup> who composed on it these verses;

1 This is the true reading, and not حنفة or حصة as in the MSS.

2 The autograph MS. has قيس عيلان

* M.de slane gives Ghaytan and the cairo editions adds the word - ud- (Ibn) before it.--Ed.

3 In the autograph this name is written اوتيم Autim.

4 An abridged account of this dynasty, extracted from Kamal al-Din's History of Aleppo, has been published in Latin By M.J.J. Mueller, 1829. Bonn.

5 Harith fils de Khalid Elmakhzoumi, poete distingue parmi les Coraychites, etait petait petir file de cet Ellassi, qui, ayant perdu toute sa fortune au jue contre contre Aboulahab, oncel de Mahomet, avait ensuite joue et perdue sa liberate. Harith cultive presque exclusivement le fenere erotique. Il florissait sous les Omeyyades, et fut gouverneur de la Makka pour le calife Abdelmalik fils de Merwan. Il etait amoureux Ad'yche fille de Talha et la celebrait dans ses vers - (Aghani, t. I. f. 200 v.) M. Caussin de Perceual.

Tell him who asks where we reside, that "Ughuwanah is our abode and well it suits us. We here enjoy a life of pure felicity, untroubled by calumny, and misfortune afflicts us no longer.

281 SA'ID THE PHILOLOGER

Abu 'I-Ala Sa'id Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Isa al-Raba'i,<sup>1</sup> a native of Baghdad and philologist, is the author of the work entitled Kitab al-Fusus, Book of Mottoes or Texts. Having made his studies in the East under Abu Sa'id al-Sirafi (see no. 156), Abu Ali al-Farisi (no. 157) and Abu Sulayman al-Khattabi (no. 198), he passed into Spain about the year 380/A.D. 990 in the reign of Hisham al-Mu'wayyad Ibn al-Hakam, whose minister al-Mansur Ibn Abi 'Amir then held the direction of the government. Sa'id was born in the province of Mosul, but had removed from thence to Baghdad. He was learned in philology, skilled in general literature and history, prompt in his repartee, an able poet, and an agreeable and instructive companion. By these talents he captivated the attention of al-Mansur, and was treated by him with extreme favour and liberality; notwithstanding which, he always found good pretext for asking more money, and good reason for obtaining it. He composed for al-Mansur the work entitled al-Fusus, in which he adopted the plan followed by Abu 'Ali al-Qali in his Amali.<sup>2</sup> He received from his patron, in return, a recompense of five thousand dinars, but his book was rejected by the public on account of the false statements which it was suspected to contain. Having gone to the city of Denia, he went to a public audience given by al-Muwaffaq Mujahid al-'Amiri<sup>3</sup> the governor, among the number present was a philologist named Bashshar, a blind man, who (being informed that Sa'id was there) asked permission from Mujahid to rally the new-comer, and though the prince advised him not to attack a person who was so prompt in his repartees, he would not renounce his project but cried out; "Abu 'I-Ala!" "At your service," replied Sa'id. "What does the word jaranful signify in the dialect of the Desert Arabs?" Sa'id, who knew that he himself had invented the word and that it did not really exist in the language,

---

1 Al-Raba'i means descended from Rabi'ah, but as a number of Arabic tribes bore this name, I am unable to indicate that to which Sa'id belonged.

2 See No. 94, note Amali.

3 See no. 123, note or Mujahid.

remained silent for sometime, and then replied, but without any equivocation or periphrase: The jaranful is one who has commerce with blind men's wives and not with other women: and the jaranful is no longer a jaranful when he quits them for others.<sup>4</sup> Bashshar, on hearing this, was covered with shame and confusion, whilst every persons present burst into laughter. Mujahid then said to him, I told you to abstain, but you would not take advice." Sa'id died A.H. 417/ A.D. 1026-7 in Sicily.<sup>5</sup> Al-Mansur at length discovered the falsehood of Sa'id as a transmitter of oral information, and being told that the contents of the Fusus were forged, he threw it into the river, on which a contemporary poet said:

The Fusus sinks in the sea so does every thing heavy.

To which Sa'id replied (in the same rhyme and measure).

The Fusus has returned to its element; it is from the bottom of the sea that pearls, fusus, are taken.

To avoid prolixity, we shall abstain from relating any of the numerous anecdotes told of his ready wit in replying to questions calculated to embarrass him.

282 SAYF AL-DAWLAT SADAQAH AL-ASADI

Abu 'I Hasan Sadaqah Nashir al-Asadi (member of the tribe of Nashirah, a branch of that of Asad), and surnamed Sayf al-Dawla' Fakhr al-Din (sword of the empire, glory of the faith), was the son of Baha al-Dawlat Abu Kamil Mansur Ibn 'Ali Ibn Mazyad. He was lord of al-Hallah al-Sayfiyah and was generally known by the denomination of the king of the Arabs. Powerful, enterprising, and formidable to the neighbouring princes, he dared to thwart the projects of the Saljuq Muhammad Ibn Malikshah Ibn Alp Al-Arsalan; and his resistance led to a war. The two armies met near al-Nu'maniyah<sup>1</sup> on Friday, the 4 This is not very intelligible.

5 According to al-Humaydi, cited by Ibn Bashkuwal in his Silat, Sa'id had retired to Sicily during the troubles in Spain.

1 Al-Nu'maniyah lay half way between Wasit and Baghdad, on the bank of the Tigris. (Merasid.)

29th of the latter Jumada* some say on the 20th of Rajab** A.H. 501 Feb.,/A.D. 1108 and, in the action which ensued, Sadaqah lost his life.<sup>2</sup> His head was borne to Baghdad. 'Izz al-Din 'Ali Ibn al-Athir says, in his corrections on al-Sam'ani's work, the Ansab, that Sadaqah was slain in the year 500: God knows best the truth. It was for this prince that the sharif Abu Ya'la Muhammad Ibn al-Habbariyah, whose life will be found farther on, composed his metrical treatise entitled al-Sadih wa 'l-Baghim. His father, Abu Kamil Mansur died towards the end of the first Rabi' A.H. 479, beginning of July A.D. 1086. His grandfather, Abu 'l-A'gharr Dubays,<sup>***</sup> surnamed Nur al-Dawlat (light of the state), died on the eve of Sunday, the 10th Shawwal, A.H. 473 (March, A.D. 1081) or 474**** after a rule of sixty-seven years: in the year 408 when he commenced his reign, he was only fourteen years of age. 'Ali Ibn Mazyad, Sadaqah's great-grandfather, died A.H. 408 (A.D. 1017-8). We have already given the life of Dubays, the son of Sadaqah (page 504.) Al-Hillah a town in 'Iraq between Baghdad and Kufah is situated on the Eurphrates, in the territory of Kufah; it was founded in the year 495 (A.D. 1101-2) by Sayf ad-Dawlat Sadaqah, whose life we have just given, and was named al-Sayfiyah, after him,<sup>3</sup> al-Nu'maniyah is a city lying between al-Hillah and Wasit.

ض

283 AL-AHNAF IBN QAYS

Abu Bahr al-Dahhak Ibn Qays<sup>1</sup> Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Husayn Ibn

* 14 February.—Ed.

** 6 March.—Ed.

2 For a full account of these events, see the selection from Ibn al-Athir in the first vol. of the Extraits des historiens arabes relatifs aux Croisades; a collection now publishing by the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. See also Abu 'l-Fida's Annals, year 601.

*** M.de Sane gives Abu 'l-V'azz. Ed.

**** According to Edward Mahler's calculations Sunday fell on 7 Shawwal (21 March)—Ed.

3 There were a number of places in 'Iraq which bore the name of Hillah (station).

1 This al-Dahhak Ibn Qays is a different person from the al-Dahhak

(Contd.. on the next page)

'Ubadah Ibn al-Nazal Ibn Murrah Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn al-Harith Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ka'b Ibn Sa'd Ibn Zayd Manat Ibn Tamim, surnamed al-Tamimi, was generally known by the appellation of al-Ahnaf (club-foot): it was he whose prudence became proverbial. Some say that his real name was Sakhr. His ancestor al-Harith bore the surname of Muqa'is. Al-Ahnaf was one of the principal Tabi'is and had been a contemporary of the Prophet, but did not serve under him. The hafiz Abu Nu'aym mentions him in the History of Isbahan, and Ibn Qutaybah speaks of him in the Kitab al-Ma'arif in these terms: "When the Prophet went to the tribe of Tamim inviting them to embrace Islamism, al-Ahnaf was among them. As they did not consent to become Muhammad's followers al-Ahnaf said to them: 'He verily invites you to adopt what is honourable for the character and forbids you what is disgraceful to it; become therefore Muslims!'" He then professed Islamism, but did not go to see the Prophet; however, he visited afterwards the khalif 'Umar. "From that time he held a high rank among the Tabi'is, being the chief of his tribe, and possessing a great reputation for intelligence, acuteness, learning, and prudence. He related Traditions on the authority of (the Khalifs) 'Umar, 'Uthman, and 'Ali, and his own authority was cited for some Traditions by al-Hasan al-Basri. At the battle of Siffin he fought on the side of 'Ali, but he stayed away from the battle of the Camel and joined neither party. In the reigns of 'Umar and 'Uthman, he had been present at some of the conquests made by the Muslims in Khurasan. When the authority of Mu'awiyah was solidly established, al-Ahnaf went one day into his presence: "By Allah!" said the khalif, "never till the day of judgment shall I call to mind the battle of Siffin, without feeling my heart glow with anger." "By Allah!" replied al-Ahnaf, "We have still in our bosoms those hearts which detested you, and we still bear in our scabbard the swords with which we fought you; if you advance an inch towards war, we shall advance a foot, and if you walk to (give us) battle, we shall run to meet you!" He then rose up and withdrew. A sister of Mu'awiyah, who had heard the conversation from behind the tapestry, then asked him who was the person who had used such threatening language, and Mu'awiyah answered: "that is the man who, if angered, has one hundred thousand of the tribe of Tamim to share his anger, without asking him the reason of it." It is related that when this khalif declared his son Yazid as his successor, he seated him in a red<sup>2</sup> pavilion, and those who were present went up successively and saluted Mu'awiyah, after which they bowed towards his son. One of them having performed this ceremony, turned again to Mu'awiyah, and said: "Commander of the faithful! I am well convinced that had you not confided to him the government of the Muslims, you had ruined their affairs." Mu'awiyah then addressed al-Ahnaf who was seated in his presence; "what is the matter with you, Abu Bahr? you say nothing!" "I fear God too much to speak a falsehood," replied he, "and I fear you too much to speak the truth." "Well," said Mu'awiyah, 'may God reward you for your obedience towards him.' He then ordered a present of several thousand (dirhams) to be given to (the other). When al-Ahnaf was going out, the same man who had spoken to the khalif met him at the door, and said: "O, Abu Bahr! I am convinced that, of all God's creatures, this man and his son are the worst; but they keep their money under bolts and locks, and there is no possible means of getting it out but by words such as you have heard." "Keep off!" replied al-Ahnaf, "a double faced man shall have no favour in the sight of God." One of al-Ahnaf's sayings was this: "I have followed three rules of conduct which I now mention merely that the man of reflection may profit by my example: I never interfered between two parties unless invited by them to do so; I never went to the door of these people," meaning princes, "unless sent for by them; and I never rose from my place to obtain a thing when all men were anxious to possess it." Another of his sayings was: "Come! I shall point out to you virtues which none can depreciate:<sup>3</sup> evenness of temper, and the avoiding of what is base. Come! I shall tell you what is the worst of maladies: a low mind and a foul tongue." He also said: "The noble man never use deceit; the wise man never tells a lie, and the true believer never backbits. "Better," said he again, "better than the treasures which parents heap up for children, better than the wealth left by the dead to the living, is the gratitude of the good and the learned for favours conferred upon them." "Excess in laughter," he observed, "drives away respect; excess in jesting drives away politeness, and the man is known by the company he keeps." Hearing a person say one day that he cared neither for praise nor blame, he observed to him: "You repose there, where men of

---

Ibn Qays who fell at the battle of Marj Rahit. They were contemporaries. See Reiske's note in the Annals of Abu 'l-Feda, tom I. NO. 168 in which it is necessary, however, to rectify a double error. In place of de quo vid. ann. 127, gens Schaibanita, read de quo vid. ann. 67. gente Tamimita, Tamim, al-Dahhak's ancestor, was son of Murr, son of Udd, son of Tabikhah and descendant of Mudar, but Shayban sprang from Rabi'ah, Mudar's brother.

2 Red was the colour of the 'Umayyads, green that of the 'Alides, and black that of the 'Abbasides. Even before the promulgation of Islamism, red or scarlet tenets indicated that their possessor were princes. See my Diwan d' Amro 'l-Kais, p. 8.

3 Here the Arabic text should run thus: المحدة بلاشرية generous minds labour." He said again: "In our assemblies avoid the mention of women and of food; I detest the man who is always speaking of his belly and of his pleasures; and he who avoids food even when he wishes for it, proves by that, the nobelness of his mind." The following anecdote is told by Hisham Ibn 'Uqbah, the brother of the celebrated poet Dhu'l-Rummah: "I saw al-Ahnaf go up to some persons who were in discussion about the price to be paid for a man's blood who had been killed. He told them to state the sum they required, and they asked the double of that fixed by law.<sup>4</sup> When they had ceased talking, he said: 'I myself will give you what you ask, but I shall make one observation: Almighty God has declared that the price of blood shall be single (not double) and his Prophet also has done the same<sup>5</sup> you are plaintiffs to-day, but to-morrow, if you are defendants I fear that your adversaries may require from you the same price which you yourselves have exacted! 'Well!' said they, 'reduce it to the usual sum!' On hearing this, he praised God with thanks, and rode off. Being asked what was prudence, he replied that it consisted in humility joined to patience; and he used to say, when persons were surprised at this mildness; 'I have the same feelings as you, but I am patient.' He observed also that he had derived more help from prudence than from the strength of men.

"It was Qays Ibn 'Asim al-Minqari." said he, "who taught me mildness: one of his nephews killed a son of his, and the murderer was brought before him with his hands tied behind his back. 'Why frighten the youth?' said he. He then turned towards him and spoke thus: 'O, my son! evil is that which thou hast wrought; thou hast lessened the number of thy family, weakened the strength of thy tribe, given joy to thy enemies, and done harm to thy people! Let him go; and bear the price of blood to the mother of the victim, for she is not of our tribe.' The murderer then retired; and all this while Qays remained seated, and did not even change colour."

When Ziyad Ibn Abih was governor of Persian and Arabian Iraq, he treated al-Ahnaf and Harithah Ibn Badr al-Ghudani with great favour and attention; but the latter was so strongly addicted to drinking, that the people of Basrah complained of his conduct to Ziyad, whom they even reproached for admitting such a drunkard

---

4 The legal price of blood, in the case of murder without premeditation is one hundred camels.

5 See Mishkat al-Masabih, vol. II. p. 866.

• From 'It was' to 'colour' not in the autograph.—Ed.

into his familiarity. To this remonstrance Ziyad replied: "How, sirs, can I cast off a man who, since I came to 'Iraq, has always ridden by my side and yet never struck his stirrup against mine? neither did he precede me, so as to have his back turned towards me, nor did he remain behind, so that I had to look round after him; in summer, he never sat between me and the zephyr; in winter, he never stood between me and the sun, and I never questioned him on any science without thinking it impossible for him to know another so well." I have since met with this anecdote in al-Zamakhshari's Rabi' 'l-Abrar, in the chapter entitled On Intercourse with Females, where it is given in precisely the same terms. As for al-Ahnaf, nothing could be said against his conduct. When Ziyad died, his son and successor, 'Ubayd Allah, said to Harithah: "You must either cease drinking or quit me;" "You know," replied Harithah, "on what terms I lived with your father." "As for my father," answered 'Ubayd Allah, "he held a pre-eminence in which no reproach could reach him; but I am a young man, and people will judge of me from those who have influence over me: now you make long potations, and I am afraid that, when I bid you sit near me, the smell of the wine may be thought to come from myself. Give it up then, and be the first of those to be admitted into my presence and the last to quit it." To this Harithah replied; "I should not give it up for Him (God) who is able to do me evil and good; shall I then renounce it to be well with you?" "Leave me then, but choose any government I have it in my power to give." "Let me have Surraq, for its wine has described to me as good, and given me Ram-Hurmuz besides." 'Ubayd Allah granted the request, and harithah proceeded to his government. Whilst they escorted him to some distance on his way the following lines were addressed to him by Anas Ibn Abi Anas<sup>6</sup> or, according to another statement, by al-Aswad al-Du'ali:

"Harithah, son of Badr, you now fill a place of authority; live in it like a rat, to wile and thief. Despise not the smallest sums that you may find; recollect that your share in the wealth of 'Iraq consists in Surraq. Then rival the tribe of Tamim in riches, for riches give a tongue to the most timid of men. All people then shall praise you; some of them liars, and speaking only to please you; the rest sincere in their words, but knowing not what they say, and incapable of proving that what they utter is true."

---

6 Abu Sulayt سلطه Anas Ibn Abi Anas, a member of the Banu Najjar (a family of Madina), was one of Muhammad's Companions and fought on his side at the battle of Badr. (Asma al-Rijal, MS. No. 379).

As for al-Ahnaf, he lost 'Ubayd Allah's favour, and persons far inferior to him obtained preference. About this time, 'Ubayd Allah assembled the chief men in 'Iraq, and al-Ahnaf among the rest, and proceeded with them to Syria, for the purpose of paying their salutations to (the khalif) Mu'awiyah. On their arrival, 'Ubayd Allah went in to Mu'awiysh, and informed him that the head men of 'Iraq had come. "Bring them in to me," said the khalif. "one by one, and according to the degree of estimation in which you hold them." 'Ubayd Allah obeyed, and the last person whom he introduced was al-Ahnaf. Mu'awiyah, who knew his merit, and always treated him with the utmost honour on account of his pre-eminence and high authority as chief (of the tribe of Tamim), no sooner saw him than he exclaimed: "Come here to me, Abu Bahr."<sup>7</sup> He then made him sit down beside himself, on the same cushion, and naving asked him how he was, he entered into conversation with him and withdrew his attention from the rest of the company. The members of the deputation then began to extol 'Ubayd Allah, and express their gratitude to the khalif for giving them such a governor, but al-Ahnaf remained silent. "Why do you not speak, Abu Bahr?" said Mu'awiyah, "If I speak," replied al-Ahnaf, "I must contradict them." On this Mu'awiyah, said "Bear ye witness that I depose your governor, 'Ubayd Allah; go now and find a fit person whom I may appoint in his stead; and at the expiration of three days I shall expect your presence." On retiring, some hoped to obtain the government for themselves, and others for persons whom they designated; they therefore applied secretly to the intimate friends of Mu'awiyah, in order to procure, through their influence, the accomplishment of their respective projects. When the three days were gone by, they and al-Ahnaf went to Mu'awiyah, and by his directions they took their seats in the audience chamber, according to their ranks as before. The Khalif then called al-Ahnaf over to him as usual, and after conversing with him for sometime, he asked the others the result of their deliberation. Each of the deputies then proposed his candidate, and made a long speech in his favour. This led to warm debates and a discussion, during which al-Ahnaf continued silent; he had not even spoken a word on the subject to any person, the three preceding days. "And you, Abu Bahr," said Mu'awiyah, "why do you not speak." "If you intend to nominate a member of your own family," replied al-Ahnaf, "you will not find one equal to 'Ubayd Allah, or capable of replacing him; but if you mean to appoint another person, then do as you please." Whilst the sitting lasted, not one of those who had extolled 'Ubayd Allah at their first presentation, ever mentioned his name or asked to have him sent back to them. Mu'awiyah, having listened to al-Ahnaf's observations, said to the assembly: "Bear witness that I restore 'Ubayd Allah to his government." On this, they all repented having proposed any other candidate, and Mu'awiyah perceived that, in thanking him for having given them such a governor as 'Ubayd Allah, they had not been actuated by any love for him, but that they merely acted in the usual way men do when speaking of person under whose authority they are placed. The deputies having retired, Mu'awiyah, took 'Ubayd Allah in private, and said to him: "How could you undervalue such a man as that?" meaning al-Ahnaf; "he has deposed you and reinstated you in your government, although he never uttered a word; whilst those people whom you preferred to him, and on whom you placed your reliance, did not render you the least service or even think of you when I authorised them to nominate your successor. It one like al-Ahnaf that a person should choose, when wants a good supporter and a precious friend." On their return to Iraq 'Ubayd Allah treated al-Ahnaf with great respect, and made him his intimate and confidential friend. It was thus that, in this well-known circumstance, he was abandoned by those in whom he had placed his trust and on whose support he relied, whilst al-Ahnaf alone rendered him any service.

<sup>7</sup> The Khalif here addresses him by his surname; a mark of intimacy and friendship.

Al-Ahnaf lived till the time of Mus'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, and accompanied him to Kufah,<sup>8</sup> in which city he died. His death is commonly placed in the year 67 (A.D. 686-7), but other accounts assign the year 71, 77, and 68 as the date of that event. He was then seventy years of age, but it is stated by some that he had reached a very advanced age.<sup>9</sup> He was interred at al-Thawiyah, near the tomb of Ziyad.<sup>10</sup> The following anecdote is related by 'abd al-Rahman Ibn 'Umarah Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Abi Mu'ayt: "I attended the

---

8 See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, to. I.; adnoiat. hist p. 96 Price's Retrospect v. I. p. 440.

9 In the autograph, Ibn Khallikan had originally written this passage as it stands in the other MSS. and in the printed text; but having inserted afterwards in the margin that al-Ahnaf died at the age of seventy, he was obliged to modify the next phrase. In place of ركان (and he) he substituted وقيل انه كان (and it is said that he); but this correction has been neglected by succeeding copyists.

10 According to Abu 'l-Mahasin, in his al-Bahr al-Zakhir, Ziyad Ibn Abih died at al-Thawiyah.

funeral of al-Ahnaf, at Kufah, and was one of those who went down into the vault. When I settled the body in its place, it seemed to me that the tomb widened to as great an extent as my sight could reach.<sup>11</sup> I spoke of this to my companions, but they saw not what I saw." This story is mentioned by Ibn Yunus in his Biography of strangers who visited Egypt, in the life of this same 'Abd al-Rahman. Al-Ahnaf was one of those persons surnamed al-Tuls, whose names we have mentioned in the life of the qadi Shurayh (No. 275). He was born natibus cohearentibus; which rendered a surgical operation necessary. He was ahnaf of one foot, that is, he walked on the wahshi (or instep) of it; whence his surname. He lost his eye at the taking of Samarqand;<sup>12</sup> but some say by the small pox. His teeth were solidly united together. His head was small, and his beard inclined to one side. His grandfather, Mu'awiyah Ibn Husayn was slain by 'Antarah Ibn Shaddad al-'Absi, the famous cavalier, on the day of al-Faruq, one of the celebrated combats of the ancient Arabs.<sup>13</sup>

In this article are some words which require explanation. Ahnaf means inclined: the wahshi of the foot is the back (or upper part) of it. Ghudani is derived from Ghudan Ibn Yabru, 'branch of the tribe of Tamim. Ram-Hurmuz is a place so well-known that it is not necessary to indicate the pronunciation of its name. It lies in al-Ahwaz, a province of Khuzistan, situated between Basrah and Fars, Surraq lies also in the province of al-Ahwaz. Al-Thawiyah, pronounced also al-Thuwayyah is the name of a place outside Kufah; it contains the tombs of some of Muhammad's Companions and of other eminent persons: water is to be found there. Al-Ahnaf had a son called Bahr, and it was for this reason that he bore the surname of Abu Bahr (the father of Barh). Bahr was a weak and indolent<sup>14</sup> boy; when asked why he did not take example of his father, he replied: "From laziness." With him died al-Ahnaf's posterity.

11 This was of course to be considered as a mark of divine favour to the dead man. May God make thy grave wide for thee was a common prayer of the ancient Arabs over the tomb of departed friend.

12 According to the Khulasat al-Akhbar, cited in Prince's Retrospect, Samarqands was taken by Ubaid Allah Ibn Zayd in the year 54. D. Herbelot says that Catiba ben Moslemet, meaning Qutaybah bin Muslim, took it in the reign of al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, A.H. 85; but al-Walid did not come to the throne till the year 86. Ibn Khallikan states, in the life of Qutaybah, that this was the general who reduced Samarqand.

13 See Rasmussen's Historia Anteislamica, p. 87.

14 All the copies and the printed text have مصروفا but the autograph writes this word نصروفا

284 TAWUS

Abu 'Abd al-Rahman Tawus Ibn Kaysan al-Khawlani al-Hamdani al-Yamani, one of the most eminent Tabi'is, was of Persian extraction. He received Traditions from Ibn 'Abbas and Abu Hurayrah, and Traditions were given on his authority by Mujahid and 'Amr Ibn Dinar. As a jurisconsult he held a high rank and possessed a great reputation. (On this subject an anecdote) is related by Ibn 'Uyaynah: "I asked," said he, "'Abd Allah Ibn Yazid<sup>1</sup> in what class he studied under Ibn 'Abbas. and he replied with 'Ata and his co-disciples. 'And Tawus?" said I. 'O,' exclaimed he, 'that is quite another thing, he was admitted with the chosen few.' 'Amr Ibn Dinar said that he never saw the like of Tawus. When 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz became khalif, Tawus wrote to him these words: "If you wish your government to be good in every way, confide the places of authority to virtuous men:" on which 'Umar said: "After that, every other recommendation is useless." He died at Makkah whilst performing the pilgrimage, on the day preceding that of the Tarwiyah (8th of Dhu 'I Hijjah), in the year 106 (April, A.D. 725* or by another account, in 104. Funeral prayers were said over him by Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. It is related by one of the learned that on the death of Tawus at Makkah, it was impossible for the funeral to set out on account of the crowd, and that the governor of Makkah, Ibrahim Ibn Hisham al-Makhzumī, had to send the guard to clear the way. "I saw," says the same person, "'Abd Allah, the son of Hasan, (the son of Hasan)<sup>2</sup> the son of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, with his shoulder under the bier; he had already lost the cap off his head and his cloak was torn to pieces on his back;" I saw at Baṭ-bekk, within the town, a tomb to which pilgrimages are made, and the natives pretend that it contains the body of Tawus; this, however, is a mistake. Abu 'I-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi says in his Kitab al-Alqab (book of surnames): "Tawus was his surname and his real name wa; Dhakwan. He bore the surname of Tawus (peacock) because he was the peacocks (chief) of the Qur'an-readers." The general opinion

---

1 Five persons bearing this name are notices in the Asma al-Rijal, M.S. No. 379, and two in the Tabaqat al-Muhaddithin.

* 26 April—Ed.

2 This addition is authorized by the autograph.

is that Tawus was his real name. It is related that the khalif al-Mansur sent for Malik Ibn Anas and 'Abd Allah the son of Tawus: when they entered into his presence, he reflected for a short time and then said to 'Abd Allah: "Relate to me some of the Traditions which you learned from your father." On this 'Abd Allah spoke as follows: "My father taught me this Tradition: 'He shall be punished the most severely of all men on the day of resurrection, to whom God has confided a portion of his authority and who allows injustice to enter into his judgments.'" Al-Mansur remained silent for a considerable time, and Malik, in relating the fact afterwards, observed; "I tucked up my clothes lest some of his blood might fall on them,"<sup>3</sup> but al-Mansur then said: 'Hand me that ink-horn.' He repeated the order three times, but 'Abd Allah did not obey. 'Why do you not give it to me?' asked the khalif.- 'Because I fear that you may use it in writing something contrary to God's law, and I should then be your accomplice.'-- 'Up, both of you, and leave me! exclaimed al-Mansur. 'That is just what we desire to do,' replied 'Abd Allah. --From that day," said Malik, "I have never ceased to acknowledge the eminent merit of the son of Tawus."- Khawlani means descended from Khawlan; Khawlan, whose real name was Afkal Ibn 'Amr Ibn Malik, was the progenitor of a great tribe which settled in Syria. We have already spoken of Hamdani:<sup>4</sup> Tawus was affiliated to the tribe of Hamdan by enfranchisement.

285 ABU 'L-TAYYIB AL-TABARI

Abu 'l Tayyib Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir Ibn 'Umar al-Tabari, a qadi and a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shafi'i was a high and sure authority as a doctor, veracious, learned, versed in the dogmas and secondary principles of the law, exact in his researches on the principles of jurisprudence, conscientious, virtuous, and holy in his conduct.

---

3 He imagined that al-Mansur would have struck off 'Abd Allah's head.

4 This is a mistake; he has hitherto said nothing of it. Hamdani همدانی which must not be confounded with Hamadani همدانی (native of Hamadan) means sprung from Hamadan, the ancestor of a great tribe of Yemenite Arabs and the fifth in descent from Kahlan. The surname of Hamadani entitled Tawus to that of al-Yamani (native of Yemen), which he also bore.

*He composed poetry as good as might be expected from a jurisconsult: the hafiz Abu Tahir al-Silafi, in his life of Abu 'l-Ala al-Marri, gives the following anecdote, which was handed down to him though a series of Traditionists whose names he mentions, as having been related by Abu 'l-Tayyib al-Tabari: "When the celebrated scholar Abu 'l-'Ala al-ma'arri came to Baghdad and took up his residence in the Suwayqah Ghaliib (the little bazar of Ghalib), I wrote to him these lines:

'What is that which furnishes a liquid not to be drunk by him who draws it, and yet its flesh is allowed. He who pleases may eat the flesh of it living or dead, but if he attempts to drink its milk, he is an erring man. When its produce is full grown, its flesh is good, and he who eats thereof is considered by all the doctors of the law as not deserving any reprehension. But if its produce be eaten when still young, it is stringent, and no reasonable man would partake of it. The word of this enigma can only be divined by a man of eminence, by one who knows the secrets of men's hearts and has acquired extensive knowledge.

Abu'l-'Ala immediately dictated the following answer to my messenger:

Thy question admits of two solutions, both of them suitable; some therefore may answer it and yet be mistaken. He who thinks that vine is the word of the enigma is not in the wrong, and he who thinks that it is date-tree must not be called a fool. Their flesh is the grape and the date; both may be lawfully eaten, but their milk is the delicious wine. However, the fruit of the palm-tree is bitter when green, and grapes still green are gathered and eaten. Let the highly-respected qadi require from me an answer to questions numerous as the stars,—any more lofty and more difficult to reach,—and if I answer them not, I shall deserve never to know them, but the friend who loves him will encounter every difficulty.

To this I made the following answer:

'One who could hardly find his equal in the world, a man of ample knowledge and perfect every way, has excited me to reflection. His heart is a library of all the sciences, and his mind is active as an ardent fire. He understands equally well the most obscure and the simplest ideas; their difficulties are for him plain and clear. When he awakes a man's heart to friendship, he leads him though resisting, a prisoner, captivated by the beauty of his eloquence. He explains and exposes so well every point, that it may be perceived and understood by even an inattentive mind. I admire his talent for composing verses so promptly and with so little hesitation. He draws (his information) from (his mind which is) a sea (of knowledge), and his merit exalts him even to the mansion of the planets. May the bounteous God in his mercy grant him the full enjoyment of his talents during a lengthened life!

---

* From 'He composed' to 'his book' not in the autograph.—Ed.

"On this, Abu 'l-'Ala dictated extempore these lines to the messenger:

'You, O qadi! whose acuteness (in argument) is as a drawn sword to confound the adversaries of the truth; your heart is the dwelling of science, and your merit, in every discussion, is admitted as superior. Though possessing little worldly wealth, you are rich in treasured science. When you maintain a controversy, you are a falcon and you opponents are as pigeons; you seem to speak with al-Shafi'i's mouth, and, prompt in replying, to draw your arguments from his mind. Who now can say that the learning of (al-Shafi'i) the son of Idris, has been lost, when you undertake to light the (part of true) direction. Your kindness was so great, that I could not give you sufficient thanks, and it had been better for me to abstain from replying. (Let me have) your pardon; for I answered, confiding in your kindness; human nature is careless and reflects not. You also did wrong in sending me a note which should have been my first and my last title of glory, but, preoccupied by the talents and the kindness of your messenger, I had not time to learn it by heart. That note could have justly claimed the merit of giving fresh perfume to musk, and being deposited in the most exalted place of honour. Let some poets depict themselves in their verses, you depict yourself better than they in your learning and your poetry. The earth is proud to bear you on its surface, and well may it be proud of a such as you."

The following anecdote is related by al-Sam'ani in his Dhayl, when giving the life of Abu Ishaq 'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn Mahmuyah al-Yazdi:<sup>1</sup> "He (Ibn Mahmuyah) and his brother had but a single turban

1 The Imam Abu 'l-Hasan-not Abu Ishaq as the MSS. of Ibn Khallikan have it-'Ali Ibn Ahmad Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Ahmad Ibn al-Husayn Ibn and a single shirt between them, so that when one of them went out, the other was obliged to stay at home.

"I went to see him one day", continues al-Sarī'ani "and present him my respects, and I had with me 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn al-Ghazanwi the preacher, when, on entering his house, we found him without any clothing except an izar<sup>2</sup> tied round his waist. He begged of us to excuse him for appearing in that state, and added: 'When we wash our clothes, we are as the persons whom the qadi Abu 'l-Tayyib al-Tabari describes in this verse:

'People who, when they wash the robes in which they deck themselves, taken the house for a cloak till he that washes has done his task."

Al-Tabari lived to the age of one hundred and two years, without any alteration or decay of his mental faculties; he continued till his death earth to give decisions on points of law, to correct the mistakes of other jurisconsults, to fulfil the duties of qadi at Bagdad, and to attend the khalif when he went out in state. He studied the law at 'Amul under the tuition of Abu 'Ali 'l-Zujaji,<sup>3</sup> the disciple of Ibn al-Qass, and he learned the reading of the Qur'an at Jurjan from Abu S'ad al-Isma'ili<sup>4</sup> and Abu 'l-Qasim (Yusuf) Ibn Kaji.<sup>5</sup> He then proceeded to Naysabur, where he met Abu 'l-Hasan (Muhammad) al-Masarijisi<sup>6</sup> under whom he studied jurisprudence for four years.

Mahmuyah al-Qazdi (a native of Yazd in the province of Fars) was an eminent doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i and a Qur'an-reader. He composed a number of works on the law and the Traditions. His life was spent in the practise of devotion and self-mortification, and he died A.H. 551 (A.D. 1156-7) at the age of seventy-eight. His learning was equal to his piety. He had made his studies at Isbahan. (Tab. al-Fuq. fol. 114. Tab. al-Qurra, MS. No. 742, fol. 157, verso).

2 See Introduction note on ثوبان.

3 The qadi Abu 'Ali al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad al-Zujaji, one of the great jurisconsults of 'Amul and an eminent doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i, was a native of Tabaristan. He composed some works on jurisprudence and died between A.H. 370 (A.D., 980) and 400 (Tab. al-Shaf. Tab. al-Fuq.)

4 Abu Sa'd Isma'il al-Isma'ili, the son of Abu Bakr al-Isma'ili, (see No. 4). studied under his father and became shaykh of the Shafites in Jurjan. By his profound knowledge in jurisprudence, dogmatic theology, and Arabic language, and by his skill in drawing up bonds, he obtained the reputation of being the imam of his time. He composed some works on law, and died A.H. 396 (A.D. 1005-6) aged 63. (Tab. al-Shaf.).

5 The life of Ibn Kaji is given by Ibn Khaltikan.

6 The life of al-Masarijisi will be found in this work.

From thence he removed to Baghḍad, where he followed the course of lectures given by the Shaykh Abu Hamid al-Isfara'ini. Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi was a pupil of al-Tabari's and he speaks of his master in these terms. "Of all the men I ever saw, not one surpassed him in conscientious efforts to clear up points of law;<sup>7</sup> in his scrupulous verification of authorities, and in the justness of his views." He composed a commentary on al-Mazani's Mukhtasar and on Abu Bakr Ibn al-Haddad al-Misri's Furu'.* He wrote also a great number of works on the doctrines of the Shafite sect, on the points of controversy between the sects, and on dialectics. The shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi says; "I followed his lessons with assiduity for upwards of ten years, and I acted as a professor, with his authorisation, for two years, during which I instructed his scholars in the mosque where he himself taught. He then confided to me the direction of his whole class." He inhabited Baghḍad and acted as qadi in the suburb of Karkh on the decease of Abu 'Abd Allah al-Saymari; this place he continued to hold till his death. He was born at 'Amul A.H. 348 (A.D. 959-60), and died at Baghḍad on Saturday, the 20th of the first Rabi', A.H. 450 (May, A.D. 1058);* the next morning, he was interred in the cemetery at the Gate of Harb (Bab Harb). The funeral service was said over him in the mosque of al-Mansur. We have already mentioned (No. 154) that Tabari means belonging to Tabaristan. 'Amul (written with a long A.) is the name of a great city, the metropolis of Tabaristan.

286 IBN BABSHADH THE GRAMMARIAN

Abu 'l-Hasan Tahir Ibn Ahmad Ibn Babshadh was the greatest grammarian of his time in Egypt; it is said that his family belonged originally to Daylam. He is the author of some instructive works, particularly the celebrated Muqaddamah, or introduction to grammar, to which he joined a commentary.

<sup>**</sup>He composed also a commentary on the Jamal of al-Zajjaji, and another on the U'ul of Ibn al-Sarraj.<sup>1</sup>

7 Literally: Note one was more perfect in injihad (or, as a mujtahab, bi- The meaning of this term has been already explained, No. 92, note on mujtahid).

* 16 May Ed.

** From 'He' to 'al-Sarraj' no. in the autograph.--Ed.

1 The lives of Ibn al-Sarraj and al-Zajjaji will be found in this work.

During his retirement from the world he compiled a copious treatise on grammar (which, however, he left unpublished): it is said that a fair copy of it would have formed nearly fifteen volumes. The grammarians into whose hands it afterwards fell, called it the Ta'aliq al-Ghurfa.<sup>2</sup>

It passed first from him to his disciple Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Barakat al-Sa'adi the grammarian and philologist, who replaced him as a professor; it passed then to Ibn Barakat's disciple and successor, the grammarian Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Barri, and from him to his pupil and successor the grammarian Abu 'l-Husayn, who was generally known by the opprobrious surname of Thalt al-Fil (elephant's dung). It is stated that each of these persons left it to his disciple with the recommendation of keeping it carefully, and students frequently endeavoured to obtain leave to copy it, but without success.*

By his learning and writings, Ibn Babshadh was highly useful. He held a place at the Chancery-office, at Misr, and no paper went out of it without being submitted to his examination: if he perceived in it any fault of grammar or of style, he had it rectified by the clerk who wrote it out; but if he found it correct, he gave his approval to it and it was then sent off to its address. For this service he received a salary from the treasury, which was paid to him monthly. He filled this post for sometime (but at length gave it up). It is said that he was induced to do so from the following circumstance: Being one day on the roof of the mosque at Old Cairo with some other persons, eating a collation, a cat went over to them and they gave it a bit of meat. The animal took it into its mouth and went off, but soon returned again, on which they threw another morsel to it. This it carried off also, and it kept going and coming a great number of times, at each of which it received from them another bit. Struck with this in regularity, and knowing that no single cat could eat all that they had given, they suspected something extraordinary, and followed the animal. They then saw it clamber over a wall on the roof and go down into an empty place like an abandoned room. There they found another cat, but blind, eating of the food which had been brought to it and set before it by its companions. They were much struck with this, and Ibn Babshadh said: "Since God has caused this dumb animal to be served and fed by another cat, and has not

---

2 This title means notes taken in the garret or attic. It will be seen farther on, that Ibn Babshadh took up his residence in the attic story, or rather in a small room on the roof of the mosque of Arm.

* From 'It' to 'success' not in the autograph.--Ed.

withheld from it its nourishment, how could he let a human being such as I am perish of hunger?" He immediately broke off all the ties which bound him to the world; he gave up his place, renounced his salary and shut himself up in a chamber, where he pursued his studies in the full confidence that God would provide for him. His friends then took care of him and supported him till he died. His death took place on the evening of the third day of Rajab, A.H. 469 (January, A.D. 1077).* in Old Cairo, and he was interred in the greater Qarafah cemetery. I have visited his tomb and the date here given I took from the stone at the head of his grave. He came by his death in the following manner: On quitting the world, he collected his property and sold it all, except those articles which he absolutely required; he then took up his abode in an upper room ghurfah) of the mosque of 'Amr Ibn al-'As, or, as it is now called al-Jami 'al-'Atiq (the Old Mosque), at Old Cairo. One night, he went out on the roof of the mosque and having stumbled on one of the openings serving for the admission of light into the interior, he fell thorough, and the next morning he was found dead.-Babshadh is a Persian word including the ideas of joy and happiness.<sup>3</sup>

287 TAHIR IBN AL-HUSAYN AL-KHUZA'I

Abu 'l-Tayyib Tahir Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Mus'ab Ibn Ruzayq Ibn Mahan (or, as I have read somewhere else: Ruzayq Ibn As'ad Ibn Radhuyan, or, as I have found it in another place: As'ad Ibn Zadan (some say, Mus'ab) Ibn Talhah Ibn Ruzayq) al-Khuza'i, surnamed Dhu 'l-Yaminayn (ambidexter), was a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Khuza'ah: his grandfather Ruzayq Ibn Mahan having been a manumitted slave of Talhat al-Talhat al-Khuza'i,<sup>1</sup> him who was so highly celebrated for his nobleness of soul and his excessive liberality. Tahir was one of al-Mamun's ablest supporters; when that prince was residing at Marw, the capital of Khurasan, he revolted against his brother Al-Amin and dispatched Tahir, with an army, to attack him at Baghdad, an event of which the history is well-known.<sup>2</sup> Abu Yahya

* 31 January--Ed.

3 This derivation does not seem to be perfectly correct.

1 Ibn Khallikan speaks again of Talhat al-Talhat in the life of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir.

2 See any of the works on Muslim history under the year 195 of the Hijrah.

'Ali Ibn 'Isa Ibn Mahan was sent by al-Amin to repel Tahir, but, in the battle which ensued, he lost his life. Ibn al-'Azimi al-Halabi (the nativus of Aleppo)<sup>3</sup> says in his History that al-Amin sent 'Ali Ibn 'Isa Ibn Mahan against Tahir Ibn al-Husayn and that they encountered at Ray, where 'Ali was slain on the seventh of Sha'ban, A.H. 795 (May, A.D. 811);* and al-Tabari, in his History, states that the battle took place in the year 195, without marking in what month; but he then says: "'Ali was slain in battle and Tahir sent a messenger to Marw with the news. These two places are separated by an interval of about two hundred and fifty parasangs; the express was on the way from the eve of Friday till Sunday morning". He does not mention the month "and he arrived with dispatch on Sunday." Further on, he says "'Ali Ibn 'Isa went forth from Baghdad on the seventh of Sha'ban, A.H. 195." It is therefore manifest that Ibn al-'Azimi has confounded the date of 'Ali's death with that of his departure from Baghdad. Al-Tabari then says; "The news of his death arrived at Baghdad on Thursday the 15th of Shawwal** of the same year." It is therefore probable that he lost his life on seventh or ninth of Shawwal, and that the copyist wrote the name of this month, Sha'ban by mistake; and, in that case, he may have left Baghdad in Sha'ban as al-Tabari has said, and his death may have taken place in the month of Shawwal or Ramadan; but this God knows best. Tahir then marched towards Baghdad, taking possession of all the places through which he passed, and having besieged al-Amin in that city, he slew him on Sunday the 6th (or the 4th) or Safar, A.D. 198 (October, A.D. 813).*** This is the account given by al-Tabari, but another historian says. "Tahir sent to al-Mamun, requesting his permission to do as he pleased with al-Amin in case he took him prisoner, but in reply, al-Mamun sent him a shirt with no opening in it for the head: by this Tahir knew that he wished him to be put to death,<sup>4</sup> and he acted accordingly." He sent al-Amin's head to Khurasan that it might be presented to al-Mamun, who was then declared khalif. Al-Mamun treated Tahir with great respect for the

---

3 Sas No. 78, note on al-'Azimi, the historian Ibn al-'Azimi must have written subsequently to A.H. 527, as he mentions that Zinki attacked Damascus in that year. (Zubdat al-Halab, MS. No. J28, f. 160. r. 1, ult.)

* 5 May.--Ed.

** 10 June A.D. 811.--Ed.

*** According to Edward Mahler's calculation Sunday fell on 2nd or 9th Safar/2 or 9 October.--Ed.

4 A shirt without an opening for the head could not be of any use except to cover a body without a head.

soundness of his counsels and the services which he had rendered. When Tahir attained the height of his eminence, some one said to him at Baghdad: "May you well enjoy the rank which you now hold and which none of your rivals in Khurasan have ever reached!" to which he replied: "That is what I am unable to enjoy, since I cannot see the aged females of Bushanj climbing up to the roofs of their houses that they may get a sight of me as I pass by." He said this because he was born at Bushanj and had passed his youth there; his grandfather Mus'ab having been governor of that place and of Heart. Tahir was not only a brave soldier, but an elegant scholar.<sup>5</sup> As he was one day making an excursion in his barge (on the Tigris) at Baghdad, the poet Muqaddas Ibn Sayfi al-Khaluqi went to meet him at the landing - place and said: "O amir: will you be pleased to hear some verses of my composition?"

"Let us have them," said he. The poet then recited these lines:

"I wonder how the bark of the son of al-Husayn can escape from sinking; and may it never be submerged! It is palaced between two seas; one of them (a sea of generosity) is upon it, and the other is beneath it. I wonder how its planks, on being touched by his hand, do not shoot out leaves and flowers."

"Give him three thousand dinars," said Tahir.--* "Give me more," said Ibn Sayfi, "and you shall have more verses."-- "I have got enough," replied Tahir. Similar to this are the following well-turned verses addressed by a poet to a man in high station who had set out on a voyage:

"When he embarked on the sea, I implored God with humility and said: "O thou whose bounty causeth the breezes to blow! let generosity flow from his hands (as abundant) as the waves of the ocean; preserve him from danger, and let the waves of the ocean be (smooth) like his hand!"

When Tahir was besieging Baghdad, he found himself in want of money and wrote for some to al-Mamun. The prince, in reply, sent him a letter addressed to Khalid Ibn Jilawayh the katib, requesting him to lend the sum which Tahir required; this, however,

---

5 Correct the Arabic text and read كان شجاعا ادبيا

* It appears that de Slane has misunderstood the antecedents of pronouns. The correct version should be: He (Tahir) said to him (the poet), "Add (more verses) so that we may add (more rewards)." He (the poet) said 'I have got enough.'--Ed.

Khalid to refused to do. On taking Baghdad, Tahir caused Khalid to be brought before him and declared that he would make him die by the worst of deaths. On this Khalid offered a large sum to save his life, but his proposal was rejected; he then said: "I have composed some verses; "hear them, and after that, do what you will." Tahir, who was fond of poetry, replied: "Let us have them;" and Khalid recited these lines:

"A falcon, they say, once met a sparrow of the plain, driven into danger by the decree of fate. He darted on it and was striking it down with his wing, when it said; "I am not a fit quarry for one like thee; even were I roasted I should be a despicable morsel." The haughty falcon, full of generous pride, contemned his prey, and the sparrow then escaped."

Tahir approved the verses and pardoned him. He had but one eye, and this induced 'Amr Ibn Banah, whose life shall be given later, to compose on him this verse:

"O thou ambidexter! thou hast an eye too little, and a hand too much,"<sup>6</sup>

Isma'il Ibn Jarir al-Bajali was assiduous in his praise of Tahir, and the latter, having been told that the verses Isma'il addressed to him were by some other poet, resolved on putting his talent to the test, and said: "Make a satire on me," This he refused to do, but being forced at length by Tahir's insisting, he wrote down (7) and handed to him the following verses:<sup>7</sup>

"I see thee with but one eye, and that eye seeth but little. Since thou hast lost one, thou shouldst find some person to answer for the safety of the other; for I am certain that thou wilt soon have to thy way".

Tahir, having read these lines, warned him not to repeat them and tore the paper. When al-Mamun obtained the sovereign power on the death of his brother al-Amin, he wrote from Khurasan, where he was residing, to Tahir Ibn al-Husayn who was then at Baghdad. In his letter, he directed him to give up to al-Hasan Ibn Sahl the person of whom we have spoken No. 171,- all the countries which he had subdued, namely: Arabian and Persian 'Iraq, Fars, al-Ahwaz,

---

6 Meaning by this that he deserved to have this hand cut off for robbery.

7 This he did lest the company might hear the verses.

Hijaz, and Yaman, after which he was to proceed to ar-Raqqah and assume the government of Mosul, Mesopotamia, Syria, and the West (Egypt and North Africa). This happened towards the close of the year 198 (August, A.D. 814). The particulars of Tahir's proceedings are very numerous (and may be found in any of the works on general history). We shall give the life of his son 'Abd Allah and of his grandson 'Ubayd Allah. Tahir was born A.H. 159 (A.D. 775-6), and died on Saturday the 24th of the latter Jumadi A.H. 207 (November, A.D. 822)* at Marw. "Al-Mamun had conferred on him the government of Khurasan, where he arrived in the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 206 (September, A.D. 821),** [some say, 205]. He chose for his lieutenant his son Talhah." such are as-Salami's<sup>8</sup> words in his History of the governors of Khurasan. Another writer says "Tahir renounced his allegiance to al-Mamun, who learned the circumstance from Khurasan. This intelligence alarmed him exceedingly but the next day he received other dispatches, by which he was informed that Tahir fell ill of a fever after his revolt and had been found dead in his bed.

***Harun Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn al-Mamun relates the following circumstance in his History: "Tahir went one day to ask some favour from al-Mamun; the prince granted it and then wept till his eyes were drowned in tears.' Commander of the faithful! said Tahir, 'why do you weep? May God never cause you to shed a tear! The universe obeys you, and you have obtained your utmost wishes.'- 'I weep not,' replied the khalif, 'from any humiliation which may have befallen me, neither do I weep from grief, but my mind is never free from cares.' "These words gave great uneasiness to Tahir, and (on retiring) he said to Husayn, the eunuch who waited at the door of the khalif's private apartment: "I wish you to ask the Commander of the faithful why he wept on seeing me." He then sent him one hundred thousand dirhams. Some time afterwards, when al-Mamun was alone and in a good humour, Husayn said to him: "Why did you weep when Tahir came to see you?- "What is that to you?" replied the prince.- "It made me sad to see you weep." answered the eunuch, "I shall tell you the reason, but if you ever allow it to pass your lips, I shall have your head taken off." "O, my master! did I ever disclose any of your secrets? "I was thinking of my brother Muhammad (al-Amin)," said the khalif, and of the misfortune which

---

* 12 November.-Ed.

** 'Some say, 205' not in the autograph.-Ed.

8 This historian's names are Abu 'l-Husayn 'Ali Ibn Ahmad al-Salami.

*** From 'Harun' to 'Sauce' on p. 348, not in the autograph.-Ed.

befel him, so that I was nearly choked with weeping; but Tahir shall not escape me! I shall make him feel what he will not like. "Husayn related this to Tahir, who immediately rode off to Ahmad Ibn Abi Khalid<sup>9</sup> and said to him: I am not parsimonious in my gratitude, and a service rendered to me is never lost; contrive to have me removed away from al-Mamun." "I shall," replied Ahmad; "come to me tomorrow morning." He then rode off to al-Mamun and said: "I was not able to sleep last night," "Why so?" said the khalif. "Because you have entrusted Ghassan<sup>10</sup> with the government of Khurasan, and his friends are very few<sup>11</sup> and I fear that ruin awaits him." "And whom do you think a proper person for it?" said al-Mamun. "Tahir," replied Ibn Abi Khalid. "He is ambitious<sup>12</sup>" observed the khalif. "I will answer for his conduct," said the other. Al-Mamun then sent for Tahir, and named him governor of Khurasan on the spot; he made him also a present of a eunuch whom he had brought up, and to whom he had just given orders to poison his new master if he remarked anything suspicious in his conduct. When Tahir was solidly established in his government, he ceased making the (khutbah for al-Mamun) this event is related in the following terms by Kulthum Ibn Thabit, the director of the post establishment in Khurasan: "Tahir mounted the pulpit on Friday, and pronounced the khutbah; when he came to the part in which the Khalif's name should be mentioned, he stopped short. A despatch was immediately sent off by express to inform al-Mamun of the circumstance, and the next morning, Saturday, Tahir was found dead in his bed. A second despatch containing this intelligence was forwarded to al-Mamun. On receiving the packet containing the first despatch, he called in Ahmad Ibn Abi Khalid, and said. 'Go immediately, and bring here as you promised to do. He even insisted that he should set out that very day, and it was with great difficulty that he consented to his remaining another night. The following day, the second despatch arrived, bringing the news of Tahir's death.'" It is said that the eunuch administered the poison to him in some a sauce.

On his death, his son Talhah was nominated by al-Mamun to the government of Khurasan; but some say that he was merely 9 See No: 8. note Wazir Ibn Abi Khalid.

10 Ghassan Ibn 'Abbad was appointed governor of Sind by al-Mamun "A.H. 213." (Ibn al-Athir).

11 Literally: "He and his (companions) could eat up the head between them." She Freytag's Proverbs of al-Maydani, tom. 1. p. 73, No. 189.

12 Literally: "He is hungry."

appointed to act as the lieutenant of his brother 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir (whose life we intend to give). Talhah died at Balkh, A.H. 213 (A.D. 821-9). Different reasons have been assigned for the origin of Tahir's surname Dhu 'I-Yaminayn (ambidexter); some say that in the battle with 'Ali Ibn Mahan, he smote a man with a sword which he wielded in his left hand, and cut him in two. On this a poet said:

"When you strike a foe, each of your hands is a right hand!"

It was then that al-Mamun gave him this surname. His grandfather Mus'ab Ibn Ruzayq was secretary to Sulayman Ibn Kathir al-Khuza'i, the chief of the 'Abbasid mission. He expressed his thoughts with great elegance, and one of his sayings was: "How indispensable for a katib is a mind by means of which he may reach the highest rank, and a disposition which may lead him to the acquisition of noble qualities, and a generous pride, which may preserve him from mean desires and base behaviour." - Bushanj is a town in Khurasan, seven parasangs from Herat. Khaluqi means belonging to Khaluq or Khalukah, a well-known Arabian tribe.<sup>13</sup> Al-Husayn Ibn Mus'ab, Tahir's father, died in Khurasan, A.H. 199 (A.D. 814-5); al-Mamun attended his funeral; and sent a message of consolation to Tahir, who was then in 'Iraq.

288 SAYF AL-ISLAM TUCHTIKIN

Sayf al-Islam (the sword of Islamism) Abu'l Fawaris Tughtikin, the son of Ayyub Ibn Shadhi Ibn Marwan,<sup>1</sup> and surnamed al-Malik al-'Aziz Zahir al-Din (the great prince, supporter of the faith), held the sovereignty of Yaman. When his brother, the sultan al-Malik al-Nasir Salah al-Din, became master of Egypt, he sent his other brother Shams al-Dawlat Turan Shah--him whose life has been given, No. 126,--to take possession of Yaman. That prince got the greater part of the country into his power, but then returned from it, as we have already mentioned. In the year 557 (A.D. 1181-2) the sultan sent thither Sayf al-Islam, who was a man of courage and generosity,

---

<sup>13</sup> Ibn Khallikan might have mentioned from which of the great Arabian stems the tribe of Khalukah branched off. That it was not well-known, is proved by the silence of the best genealogists.

<sup>1</sup> The life of Ayyub has been already given, No. 106.

noted for his talents as an administrator and his justice as a governor. His bounty and beneficence drew poets about him from the most distant lands, and amongst the rest Ibn 'Unayn of Damascus, whose life will be found in this work, and who came to celebrate his praises in some brilliant qasidahs, which procured him rich rewards from the prince's liberality. The favour of his patron then enabled him to acquire a large fortune, and he left Yaman with his riches: On arriving in Egypt, which was now under the rule of al-Malik al-'Aziz 'Imad al-Din 'Uthman, the son of Salah al-Din, he was oblied by the clerks of the Alms-Office to pay the legal alms<sup>2</sup> on all the merchandise which had brought with him. This induced him to compose the following verses:

"All the persons named al-'Aziz (the great) are not worthy of such a title: it is not every thundercloud which brings with it a genial shower. How different is the conduct of the two 'Aziz--One bestows alms, the other takes them."

Sayf al-Islam died on the 19th of Shawwal, A.H. 593 (September, A.D. 1197)* at al-Mansurah, city founded by himself in Yaman. He was succeeded in his government by al-Malik al-Mu'izz Fath al-Din Ismail, the prince for whom Abu 'l-Ghana'im Musallam Ibn Mahmud Ibn Ni'mah Ibn Arsilan al-Shayzari (native of Shayzar in Syria) composed his 'Aja'ib al-Asfar wa Ghara'ib al-Akhbar, (wonders of travel and singular narratives), work containing a copious account of his travels** and much information respecting (the eminent) men (whom he had met). Al-'Izz Ibn 'Asakir<sup>3</sup> says that Sayf al-Islam died at Hamra,<sup>4</sup> a town in Yaman, and Abu 'l-Ghana'im, the writer above mentioned, states in his Jamharat al-Islam zat al-Nathr wa 'l-Nazm<sup>5</sup>

2 The legal alms are a property tax of two and a half percent zakat--Ed.

* 4 September.--Ed.

** According to the autograph reading it should be translated: containing a large number of his verses--Ed.

3 This is in the margin of the autograph and not in the author's hand--For 'Asakir I should read al-Athir.

4 The town of al-Hamra lay between Jublah and Ta'izz.

5 The last word of this title is written نظام in the original manuscript and in the hand writing of Ibn Khalikan himself. All the other MSS. have نظم (nazm), which is manifestly correct: the first part of the title should rhyme with second. This work, which is not noticed by Hajji Khalifah, was perhaps a penegyric on the prince Sayf al-Islam.

(Collections respecting Islamism - or Islam - containing pieces in prose and verse), that the death of Sayf al-Islam took place at Ta'izz<sup>6</sup> in the college of which town he was interred. He then adds: "His son Fath al-Din Abu 'l-Fida Isma'il was Salin in the month of Rajab, A.H. 598 (April, A.D. 1202), at 'Aji, a place situated to the north of Zabid<sup>7</sup> Fath al-Din was succeeded by his brother al-Malik al-Nasir Ayyub."<sup>8</sup> Abu 'l-Ghana'im, the author of this work, was versed in polite literature and had a talent for poetry; he was still alive A.H. 617 (A.D. 1220-1), but he died in that same year on in one of the years ensuing. His father Abu 'l-Thana Mahmud was a grammarian, and professed that art in the Mosque (jami') at Damascus. The hafiz Ibn 'Asakir makes mention of him in the great History (of Damascus), and Tmad al-Din says, in the Khnridah that he died A.H. 565 (A.D. 1169-70). Sharaf al-Din 'Unayn relates that this Mahmud recited to him the following lines of his own composing.

"They pretend that the R's requisites in winter are many,<sup>9</sup> but it is not a falsehood to say that there is only one-When you have the K of Kis (money-bag), you have them all, in the wild wass is found every sort of game."<sup>10</sup>

**Tughtikin* is a Turkish name.

6 Ta'izz; as it is written in the Marasid, is the Taas of the gazetteers.

7 Zabid is the same city as the Zebid of the gazetteers.

8 A fuller account of these princes will be found in Johansen's Historian Iemanae, p. 150 et seq.

9 This alludes to a couple of verses composed by Sukkara, and inserted by al-Hariri in his twentyfifth Maqamah. (See De Sacy's edition, p. 262.) Their meaning is nearly as follows: Winter is come and I have for it seven things requisite when wet weather keeps me within doors; they are; kian (shelter), kis (purse), kanum (stove) a kas (cup) of wine, after some Kabab (roasted meat - see Lane's Modern Egyptians. v. I. p. 108), a plump kuss (girl). and a Kisa (warm covering). The kuss (arvum genitile) was frequently designated by the metonymy of the sixth kaf (Al-Kaf al-Sidisah).

10 The Arab hunters considered the flesh of the wild ass as preferable to that of all other animals, because it had the taste and qualities of every sort of game. The expression itself is proverbially employed to designate a single object which can replace a number of others.

* M-de Slame has omitted. And his grandfather Arsilan was mamtuk of Ibn Munqidh, the governor of Shaylzar, Ed.

289 AL-SALIH IBN RUZZIK

Abu 'I-Gharat Tala 'I Ibn Ruzzik, surnamed al-Malik al-Salih (the virtuous prince), was a wazir of Egypt. He had been originally entrusted with the government of Munya Bani Khasib, a place in the province of Upper Egypt (Sa'id), but on the assassination of al-Zafir Isma'il (see his life, No. 96), the officers of the palace sent to request his assistance against 'Abbas and his son Nasr, authors of the crime. He immediately proceeded to Cairo at the head of an immense multitude of Arabs from the desert. On his approach, 'Abbas and his son fled with their partisans, amongst whom was Usamah Ibn Murshid Ibn Murqidh, who had been a sharer in their guilt (see his life, No. 81) Salih then made his entry into Cairo and being appointed wazir to (the khalif) al-Fa'iz, he became the absolute master of the state and director of the government. This took place on the 19th of the first Rabi', A.H. 549 (June, A.D. 1154).* He was eminent by his personal merit, profuse in his donations, accessible to suitors, a generous parton to me, of talent, and a good poet. I have read his collected poetical works forming two volumes, from which I took the following passages:

'How often does time set before us its vicissitudes, that they may serve our instruction; yet we turn away and heed them not. We forget that the honour of death must come and we never think of it till our maladies remind us.'

There was a youth whose slender form and pliant waist seemed, from their movements to have acquired a portion of the intoxication which his eyes shed around. His glances were so penetrating that, in the morn of battle, I might have drawn them from their eyelids to serve me as a sword, 'The musk of that 'idhar,' I exclaimed, "has a traced double alif (-u-) on his cheek, and not double lam (-ud-)."<sup>1</sup> It is not down which spreads over his cheeks, but the locks of his hair which have broken loose.' Behold with wonder a Sultan whose justice is universal and who himself suffered from the tyranny of love.<sup>2</sup> By Allah! were it not that flight is a shameful word and shameful in itself, I should have fled to him for protection against his own cruelty."<sup>3</sup>

* 3 June, Ed.

1 See the observations in the Introduction in this volume.

2 By the sultan, he means himself.

3 I shall henceforward omit every piece similar to this, unless there be means of disguising it offensive character.

